On March 4 the fourth and last concert in the series will be a violin recital by Georges Enesco, the distinguished violinist, conductor and composer, who conducted and also gave a violin solo at the recent performance of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Mr. Enesco is at present guest conductor of that orchestra.

Tickets for these three events are on sale at the Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street. Telephone Montclair 2-6770. 9 to 11 A. M.

.BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

JAN 8 - 1938

Second Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Given At Academy Last Evening

Brooklyn society attended the second concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening. A capacity audience appreciatively received the well-rounded and representative program conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who introduced a new score, an orchestra suite by Prokofieff as drawn from the incidental music to the Soviet film "Lieutenant Kije." The concert opened with Beethoven's third symphony in E flat major, "Eroica," and closed with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mrs. Edwin L. Garvin was hostess n the Brooklyn committee box. She and former Judge Garvin entertained their box guests at dinner at their home, 1 Grace Court, before the concert. The guests included Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, Mrs. William H. Good, William M. Parke and Mr. and Mrs. Butler Graham of Manhattan.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince was hostess in a box to Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff and Theodore Fitch, director of the Brooklyn Music School Settlement.

Col. Fay W. Brabson, commandingofficer at Fort Hamilton, and Mrs. Brabson were box hosts to Lt. Col. and Mrs. Floyd Carlock, Lt. Col. and Mrs. H. W. James and Major and Mrs. G. W. Lester.

In the Alumnae Association of Adelphi Academy box were Miss Adeline Pettit, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene Field Scott and Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart.

Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson entertained at dinner at their home, 135 Eastern Parkway, for the box guests, who included Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell and Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Conroy.

Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman of the Brooklyn committee which, with the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, sponsors the series of concerts given by the orchestra in Brooklyn.

Mrs. Walter M. Bristow entertained for her daughter, Miss Dorothy Bristow, at dinner at their residence, 174 8th Ave., before the concert. The guests were the Misses Janis Baker, June Baker, Kathleen Barron, Elizabeth Behr, Dorothy Bierwirth, Marion Brockway, Marian Carpenter, Katharine Davidson, Elizabeth Engel, Marion Ingersoll, Lillian Kraus, Dorian Moorhead and Sally Sloane.

At the third Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening, Feb. 10, half the program will be devoted to the memory of the late Maurice avel, French composer, who died recently.

132

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1938

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH CHORUS

Helsinki University Singers Heard Here for the First Time at Carnegie Hall

SIBELIUS PROGRAM GIVEN

'Origin of Fire,' Billed as a Local Premiere, Presented by Ross in 1931

By OLIN DOWNES

The brilliant concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was distinguished by the presence and the first public appearance in this city of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, which took part in the performances of unknown or unfamiliar works of Sibelius. The performances of the chorus, like those of the orchestra, aroused immense enthusiasm, felt alike for the singing and the heroic music.

The Sibelius composition referred to were "The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestra, and "The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra. Both were announced as performed for the first time in New York. This is an error. "The Origin of Fire" was performed for the first time in this city, and probably in this country, by Hugh Ross, the Schola Cantorum and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 19, 1931. The performance was extensively reported at the time. One rises to ask by what facile process of assumption this score was announced as unheard in this country, and even as about to be performed in Boston for the first time in America.

The "first performance" for New York was that of "The Captive Queen," and a thrilling experience it was. This is, in essence, patriotic music. The Captive Queen is Finland, long under Russian misrule. George Sjoblom of THE TIMES, whose words are quoted in the Boston Symphony program book, tells us that "the symbolism of Cajander's poem was clear to every Finn. . . . The music of the 'Captive Queen' belongs in the same category as 'Finlandia' and several other works of Sibelius which caused feelings to blaze like lightning."

Prophecy of Freedom

The poem ends with the prophecy of the freedom which came to Finland after Cajander's death. It inspired in Sibelius simple, powerfully rhythmed, earnest and wildly exciting music. The artistic means employed are more elaborate, as the workmanship is far more advanced than that of "Finlandia." And this involves the remarkable use of Sibelius's special resource—the orchestra. The orchestra, now with dirgelike chords underlying the verses of lamentation; the orchestra, now skirling and rumbling like a volcano—"ancestral voices prophesying war"—then setting the rhythm of the march that carries forward the voices so irresistibly in its stride.

Some may say that this music is simple to the point of obviousness. In that very fact lies much of its greatness. It is for men and a nation, not only connoisseurs and critics. It is quite unabashedly a music that communities and armies could sing. Sibelius, the author of symphonies which have much that represents the most profound and original elements in modern music, shows here where his roots are, and it is from those roots that he draws his strength. Moreover, and notwithstanding the simplicity and straightforwardness of it all, there isn't a measure which fails to reveal the workmanship of the great artist. It is a pity that no composer in America is able to do something as simple and great as that—in America, or in defeatist Europe either. But every bush doesn't bear a Sibelius.

Singing Matches Music

It may be said that the quality of the singing matched that of the music. All were moved by the sound, by the resonance and metal of the voices, the earnest faces, the rhythm and power of it all. The singers meant what they sang, and the audience knew it. Dr. Koussevitzky, obviously delighted with this performance, saluting and congratulating the singers, was fortunate indeed in their collaboration and in the opportunity they provided for introducing such music.

Perhaps the last measures of sustained and unsupported song in this composition are a trifle anti-climactic. That is a detail which did not stand in the way of the overwhelming effect of this performance.

"The Origin of Fire" is also of the Finnish people, in that the verses are from the Kalevala, and the style that of legends and of the Finnish runes. There is the thought of the earth plunged in darkness and cold, the heavens robbed by Louhi of sun and moon, and the search of Ukko, lord of all the gods, to find and restore the flame. Then Ukko strikes new fire, which falls through the "six spangled vaults of heaven."

The music begins in simple narrative fashion, in the folk-rhythm of the Kalevala, which Longfellow adopted for his "Hiawatha." The narrative is begun by the baritone, and the part was taken last night, with obvious sincerity and feeling, by Helge Virkunnen, the possessor of a very resonant voice if not of the most finished vocal style. The orchestra acquires constantly more color and rhythm. The modal harmonies with which the chorus takes up the tale are singularly naive and impressive. There is a magnificent peroration for voices and instruments.

Tone Poem Also Given

These two choral works, and the short tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," made the second half of the program and contributed a highly suggestive grouping of compositions. "Ukko the Fire-maker" was written in the period of the early symphonies of Sibelius, in 1902. The "Captive Queen" and "Pohjola's Daughter" came in 1906. But in ways of national feeling and folklore the three are of a piece. "Pohjola's Daughter" represents one of Sibeliu's most poetical works for orchestra. The sledge-ride of Wainomoinen; the coquetting of the daughter of the North, who sits weaving and mocking him on the rainbow; the chagrin of the magician who unsuccessfully woos her; the resumption of the ride; the disappearance of the figure in the distant landscape—this is sheerly of fantasy and folk-lore, and most beautifully mythical music. We do not, however, agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music. We find his tempi too fast, and the style not sufficiently simple and "volkstuemlich."

The concert began with a rousing performance by the magnificent string section of the Third Brandenberg Concerto of J. S. Bach, which was followed by Brahms's Third Symphony. The strings played with exemplary gusto and vividness and rhythm in Bach's work. But an experiment made by Dr. Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. He shifted second violins over with the firsts at his left, leaving violas and 'cellos on the other side. Whether the result was due to the F-holes of the violas facing away from the audience, or to the reinforcements of the choir on the left by the basses back of them, the effect was that violas and 'cellos were over-balanced by the others, so that all passages of imitation or of independent counterpoint for the lower instruments were not heard in their proper tonal proportion. Meanwhile the brilliancy of the violins was excessive from the standpoint of tone-color. This did not inhibit some superb playing, but it was not the perfect effect.

The dominating orchestral effect was the Brahms Symphony No. 3, which powerfully impressed the audience. The music glowed with full measure of its energy, health and romantic feeling. Seldom have we heard the lightning of the first theme so leap from the instruments, or the three-note motive represented by the great swelling introductory chords given such passionate strength. The tempo was a real allegro con brio, which is what the composer asks, though Dr. Koussevitzky found it expedient to modify this in certain places.

The orchestral tone was a glory to the ear, whether it was that of strings, wood or brass. Who is there, at all familiar with the symphony, who will forget the twilight progressions that bring the end of the second movement? The tempo of the third movement was somewhat too fast—perhaps to counteract the general tendency of musicians to drag and sentimentalize this part of the symphony. But it was too fast for the theme to be fully sung, while it emphasized the undercurrent of agitation which tinges Brahms's melancholy.

The essence of the music was recaptured in the finale, rugged and glorious, "echt Brahms"—the music of a bear and also a dreamer. Delighted, the audience applauded for minutes, and the conductor shared its approval with the unsurpassed orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

Helsinki Chorus at Woolsey Hall Soon

A brilliant evening of song is promised to local music-lovers on Monday evening, January 31st, when, in Woolsey hall, the Helsinki University chorus will appear under the auspices of the Yale Glee club. The great organization of 62 singers is making its first American visit, touring this country for one month and appearing in the leading musical centers only during this limited time. Three times already they have sung with the Boston Symphony orchest under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, and last Monday evening gave a sensational concert in Carnegie hall, New York. Credit for the local engagement of the great singing group must be given to Marshall Bartholomew, director of the Yale Glee club, who, as president of the Intercollegiate Musical council which is sponsoring the American tour of the chorus, made arrangements for them to appear in New Haven when plans for the visit were made several months ago.

The Helsinki University chorus has come to America with the most distinguished backing of both this country and Finland. The list of Finnish sponsors is a huge one headed by Jan Sibelius, who, among other noted Finnish composers, has written many of his famous chorus songs for this group.

Among the honorary American sponsors are John Barbirolli, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitsky, Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Nikolai Sokoloff, Eugene Ormandy and Werner Janssen, to mention some of the best nown names in the musical world.

Out of Finland's well cultivated musical life the Helsinki chorus came into being in 1883, and for over a half century they have played an important part in the creation and development of Finnish music. The singers are all students in the University of Helsinki, or other higher educational institutions of Finland, who voluntarily and without compensation contribute their services. In 1935 the chorus made an extensive tour of Europe, giving concerts in Sweden, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Hungary and Italy. The success of this tour was so outstanding that when the question of making an American visit was projected, the public became spontaneously and whole-heartedly interested, and the foremost men in the cultural life of Finland willingly volunteered to sponsor the tour.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 1938

Symphony Lecture

The Boston Symphony's program here Jan. 25 will be the subject of another in the series of free lectures by John B. Archer, next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Mr. Archer has made an arrangement for piano, four hands, of the Brahms Double Concerto for Piano and 'Cello, opus 102, which will be played by Mrs. Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg and Mrs. Helen Schanck Appleby.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Jan. 23—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John B. Archer, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4 p. m.

Jan. 24—New Bedford Civic Music Association, Arthur Carron, tenor; New Bedford high school, 8 p. m.

Jan. 25—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 1938

NEWS PICTURES TO BE EXHIBITED

Best Journal-Bulletin Photos Taken During 1937 Will Be Shown to Public.

DISPLAY TO OPEN SUNDAY

Pictorial Diary of Life in State Will Continue Through Jan. 30 at School of Design Museum

The pictorial record of life in Rhode Island, as captured daily by the news cameramen of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin will be shown to the public Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock in the new gallery of the School of Design Museum when the annual exhibit of the 100 Best News Photographs of the Year is opened.

The exhibition, carefully selected from thousands of prints made by the cameramen, will continue through Jan. 30 from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. week days and 2 to 5 on Sundays. The exhibition will be free, except on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays when a small charge is made by the school.

Selected for Interest

The photographs are selected primarily for their news interest, not for their artistic excellence. They illustrate events in all parts of the State, and they have wide variety of subject matter. About 80 per cent. are "spot news" photographs. The others are feature pictures. Most of them have been taken without time for posing or for studied consideration of lighting and other effects. They had to be snapped on the instant. And yet, the skill, luck and intuition of the experienced news cameraman enable him to get remarkably artistic results under difficult conditions.

All these pictures appeared in the Providence Journal or the Evening Bulletin last year, most of them in black and white, others in the Artgravure Section.

Big Fire Pictured

The contrasts in these pictures are the contrasts of life itself.

"$200.000 in Smoking Ruins" shows one of the year's biggest fires, at the Crook plant in Valley Falls . . Maribel Vinsen and Karl Schaeffer dance on the ice at the Auditorium . . . . Trappist monks dedicate a new novitiate . . . Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is honored at a reception . . . . Police break up a fist fight among striking meat packers . . . Youngsters ingeniously make animals out of vegetables . . . A boy's clothes left in his cart on the bank of a pond tell the tragic story of a drowning . . . A citizen reaches into his pocket for a nickel to feed a park-o-meter . . . A new building is added to the School of Design . . . A hockey fan puts the referee in his place with a vigorous word . . . Firemen in a boat search at night for the pistol used in the Webster murder . . . A California mother and her children enjoy a Rhode Island clambake . . . .

And scores of others.

All year the men in charge of the exhibition watch the newspapers closely for unusual pictures. Promising negatives are filed, with the stories of the pictures accompany and with the names of the photographers. By the end of the year, hundreds of candidates have been collected.

Then a selection is made of the 100 that best represent all types of work a newspaper photographer is required to do. The negatives chosen are printed, all the prints being of a uniform size, 11 by 14 inches. Some of the negatives may be only 1 by 1½ inches, but all are "blown up" to the larger size. This brings out details more clearly.

The prints are on the glossy paper used for photographs from which newspaper cuts are to be made. There is no resort to special papers to enhance the artistic merits of the photograph. The mounts, however, are made of a silver paper manufactured especially for the Journal and Bulletin. In the lower right hand corner of each picture the title is affixed.

Shown Other Places

Great care must be taken in mounting the prints, in order that they may withstand atmospheric conditions in various places where they are exhibited. Besides the Museum of the School of Design, they are shown in the gallery of the Newport Art Association, in the Westerly Library, at Rhode Island State College and in other communities.

Several requests have come from outside the State for the exhibition, because the Journal and the Bulletin are the only newspapers in the country, as far as is known, that provide such a display. However, the prints are not sent outside the State but are given to public schools and other institutions where they may continue to be of interest and value to Rhode Islanders. One set, for instance, has been given to the public schools in this city.

Interest in the exhibition has increased so considerably from year to year that the pictures will be made available in book form this year.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
JAN 15 1938

Strange Sounds At Boston

Symphony Rehearsing 'American Panorama' by Amfitheatrof

CHICAGO, Jan. 14.—Strange sounds, have been coming from the Boston Symphony orchestra at rehearsals. In the midst of the tones of the typical symphonic string, woodwind, and brass instruments, a police siren will shrill, three saxophones gurgle, a Hawaiian guitar slur, a piece of railroad rail clink under a hammer, and two pianos clatter a jazz duet under the rhythmic guidance of Jesus Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler. Moreover, a curious syncopated "whoosh" sound will emerge from French horns blown with the mouthpieces missing.

The orchestra has been playing "American Panorama." It was composed in Italy before America ever was seen by its composer, Daniede Amfitheatreof, who will conduct it. He is of Russian descent, a musician who became a naturalized citizen of Italy, and now is acting as guest conductor in the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, who is on his annual midwinter vacation of two weeks. Mr. Amfitheatrof says he got his American atmosphere from motion pictures, talking with friends who had visited this country, and listening to a few jazz bands in Europe, and some jazz and swing recordings imported from America.

"In "Panorama," the music is easily identifiable as creating an impression of America. Playing it taxed the technique of 110 Boston Symphony virtuosos. It is said to possess symphonic calibre enough to place it nearer Liszt's "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" than to Gershwin's "An American in Paris."

Mr. Amfitheatrof will conduct the concert on Monday evening and the "Commuter's matinee" on Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Commuters not only will be able to hear this striking up-to-date piece, but also the classic beauties of a suite from the quintets of Boccherini (contemporary of Haydn), and the high-spirited Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

Sunday's program in Symphony hall, which will constitute the first Boston appearance of Yehudi Menuhin, 20-year-old violin virtuosos, with his brilliant and pretty sister Hephzibah, 17, as pianist and co-recitalist, has reduced available seats—even on the stage, to the vanishing point.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 17 1938

GUEST CONDUCTOR FOR HUB CONCERT

Patrons of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony, as well as the commuters who in increasing numbers attend the Tuesday afternoon series, will this week not only have the opportunity to see a guest-conductor, Daniele Amfitheatrof, in action, but to hear his own composition, "An American Panorama." This was composed in Italy before he had visited America at all. On the programs also will be a suite from a Boccherini Quintet, and the high-spirited Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

132

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1938

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE WITH CHORUS

Helsinki University Singers Heard Here for the First Time at Carnegie Hall

SIBELIUS PROGRAM GIVEN

'Origin of Fire,' Billed as a Local Premiere, Presented by Ross in 1931

By OLIN DOWNES

The brilliant concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, last night in Carnegie Hall was distinguished by the presence and the first public appearance in this city of the Helsinki University Chorus of Finland, which took part in the performances of unknown or unfamiliar works of Sibelius. The performances of the chorus, like those of the orchestra, aroused immense enthusiasm, felt alike for the singing and the heroic music.

The Sibelius composition referred to were "The Captive Queen," ballad for chorus and orchestra, and "The Origin of Fire," for baritone, male chorus and orchestra. Both were announced as performed for the first time in New York. This is an error. "The Origin of Fire" was performed for the first time in this city, and probably in this country, by Hugh Ross, the Schola Cantorum and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 19, 1931. The performance was extensively reported at the time. One rises to ask by what facile process of assumption this score was announced as unheard in this country, and even as about to be performed in Boston for the first time in America.

The "first performance" for New York was that of "The Captive Queen," and a thrilling experience it was. This is, in essence, patriotic music. The Captive Queen is Finland, long under Russian misrule. George Sjoblom of THE TIMES, whose words are quoted in the Boston Symphony program book, tells us that "the symbolism of Cajander's poem was clear to every Finn. . . . The music of the 'Captive Queen' belongs in the same category as 'Finlandia' and several other works of Sibelius which caused feelings to blaze like lightning."

Prophecy of Freedom

The poem ends with the prophecy of the freedom which came to Finland after Cajander's death. It inspired in Sibelius simple, powerfully rhythmed, earnest and wildly exciting music. The artistic means employed are more elaborate, as the workmanship is far more advanced than that of "Finlandia." And this involves the remarkable use of Sibelius's special resource — the orchestra. The orchestra, now with dirgelike chords underlying the verses of lamentation; the orchestra, now skirling and rumbling like a volcano—"ancestral voices prophesying war" — then setting the rhythm of the march that carries forward the voices so irresistibly in its stride.

Some may say that this music is simple to the point of obviousness. In that very fact lies much of its greatness. It is for men and a nation, not only connoisseurs and critics. It is quite unabashedly a music that communities and armies could sing. Sibelius, the author of symphonies which have much that represents the most profound and original elements in modern music, shows here where his roots are, and it is from those roots that he draws his strength. Moreover, and notwithstanding the simplicity and straightforwardness of it all, there isn't a measure which fails to reveal the workmanship of the great artist. It is a pity that no composer in America is able to do something as simple and great as that—in America, or in defeatist Europe either. But every bush doesn't bear a Sibelius.

Singing Matches Music

It may be said that the quality of the singing matched that of the music. All were moved by the sound, by the resonance and metal of the voices, the earnest faces, the rhythm and power of it all. The singers meant what they sang, and the audience knew it. Dr. Koussevitzky, obviously delighted with this performance, saluting and congratulating the singers, was fortunate indeed in their collaboration and in the opportunity they provided for introducing such music.

Perhaps the last measures of sustained and unsupported song in this composition are a trifle anti-climactic. That is a detail which did not stand in the way of the overwhelming effect of this performance.

"The Origin of Fire" is also of the Finnish people, in that the verses are from the Kalevala, and the style that of legends and of the Finnish runes. There is the thought of the earth plunged in darkness and cold, the heavens robbed by Louhi of sun and moon, and the search of Ukko, lord of all the gods, to find and restore the flame. Then Ukko strikes new fire, which falls through the "six spangled vaults of heaven."

The music begins in simple narrative fashion, in the folk-rhythm of the Kalevala, which Longfellow adopted for his "Hiawatha." The narrative is begun by the baritone, and the part was taken last night, with obvious sincerity and feeling, by Helge Virkunnen, the possessor of a very resonant voice if not of the most finished vocal style. The orchestra acquires constantly more color and rhythm. The modal harmonies with which the chorus takes up the tale are singularly naive and impressive. There is a magnificent peroration for voices and instruments.

Tone Poem Also Given

These two choral works, and the short tone poem "Pohjola's Daughter," made the second half of the program and contributed a highly suggestive grouping of compositions. "Ukko the Fire-maker" was written in the period of the early symphonies of Sibelius, in 1902. The "Captive Queen" and "Pohjola's Daughter" came in 1906. But in ways of national feeling and folklore the three are of a piece. "Pohjola's Daughter" represents one of Sibeliu's most poetical works for orchestra. The sledge-ride of Wainomoinen; the coquetting of the daughter of the North, who sits weaving and mocking him on the rainbow; the chagrin of the magician who unsuccessfully woos her; the resumption of the ride; the disappearance of the figure in the distant landscape—this is sheerly of fantasy and folk-lore, and most beautifully mythical music. We do not, however, agree with Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this music. We find his tempi too fast, and the style not sufficiently simple and "volkstuemlich."

The concert began with a rousing performance by the magnificent string section of the Third Brandenberg Concerto of J. S. Bach, which was followed by Brahms's Third Symphony. The strings played with exemplary gusto and vividness and rhythm in Bach's work. But an experiment made by Dr. Koussevitzky was not wholly successful. He shifted second violins over with the firsts at his left, leaving violas and 'cellos on the other side. Whether the result was due to the F-holes of the violas facing away from the audience, or to the reinforcements of the choir on the left by the basses back of them, the effect was that violas and 'cellos were over-balanced by the others, so that all passages of imitation or of independent counterpoint for the lower instruments were not heard in their proper tonal proportion. Meanwhile the brilliancy of the violins was excessive from the standpoint of tone-color. This did not inhibit some superb playing, but it was not the perfect effect.

The dominating orchestral effect was the Brahms Symphony No. 3, which powerfully impressed the audience. The music glowed with full measure of its energy, health and romantic feeling. Seldom have we heard the lightning of the first theme so leap from the instruments, or the three-note motive represented by the great swelling introductory chords given such passionate strength. The tempo was a real allegro con brio, which is what the composer asks, though Dr. Koussevitzky found it expedient to modify this in certain places.

The orchestral tone was a glory to the ear, whether it was that of strings, wood or brass. Who is there, at all familiar with the symphony, who will forget the twilight progressions that bring the end of the second movement? The tempo of the third movement was somewhat too fast—perhaps to counteract the general tendency of musicians to drag and sentimentalize this part of the symphony. But it was too fast for the theme to be fully sung, while it emphasized the undercurrent of agitation which tinges Brahms's melancholy.

The essence of the music was recaptured in the finale, rugged and glorious, "echt Brahms"—the music of a bear and also a dreamer. Delighted, the audience applauded for minutes, and the conductor shared its approval with the unsurpassed orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER
JAN 15 193

Helsinki Chorus at Woolsey Hall Soon

A brilliant evening of song is promised to local music-lovers on Monday evening, January 31st, when, in Woolsey hall, the Helsinki University chorus will appear under the auspices of the Yale Glee club. The great organization of 62 singers is making its first American visit, touring this country for one month and appearing in the leading musical centers only during this limited time. Three times already they have sung with the Boston Symphony orchest under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, and last Monday evening gave a sensational concert in Carnegie hall, New York. Credit for the local engagement of the great singing group must be given to Marshall Bartholomew, director of the Yale Glee club, who, as president of the Intercollegiate Musical council which is sponsoring the American tour of the chorus, made arrangements for them to appear in New Haven when plans for the visit were made several months ago.

The Helsinki University chorus has come to America with the most distinguished backing of both this country and Finland. The list of Finnish sponsors is a huge one, headed by Jan Sibelius, who among other noted Finnish composers, has written many of his famous chorus songs for this group.

Among the honorary American sponsors are John Barbirolli, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitsky, Leopold Stokowski, Frederick Stock, Nikolai Sokoloff, Eugene Ormandy and Werner Janssen, to mention some of the best nown names in the musical world.

Out of Finland's well cultivated musical life the Helsinki chorus came into being in 1883, and for over a half century they have played an important part in the creation and development of Finnish music. The singers are all students in the University of Helsinki, or other higher educational institutions of Finland, who voluntarily and without compensation contribute their services. In 1935 the chorus made an extensive tour of Europe, giving concerts in Sweden, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Hungary and Italy. The success of this tour was so outstanding that when the question of making an American visit was projected, the public became spontaneously and whole-heartedly interested, and the foremost men in the cultural life of Finland willingly volunteered to sponsor the tour.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 1938

Symphony Lecture

The Boston Symphony's program here Jan. 25 will be the subject of another in the series of free lectures by John B. Archer, next Sunday afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Mr. Archer has made an arrangement for piano, four hands, of the Brahms Double Concerto for Piano and 'Cello, opus 102, which will be played by Mrs. Edith Gyllenberg Waxberg and Mrs. Helen Schanck Appleby.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 16 193

Jan. 23—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program, John B. Archer, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4 p. m.

Jan. 24—New Bedford Civic Music Association, Arthur Carron, tenor; New Bedford high school, 8 p. m.

Jan. 25—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 14 193

NEWS PICTURES TO BE EXHIBITED

Best Journal-Bulletin Photos Taken During 1937 Will Be Shown to Public.

DISPLAY TO OPEN SUNDAY

Pictorial Diary of Life in State Will Continue Through Jan. 30 at School of Design Museum

The pictorial record of life in Rhode Island, as captured daily by the news cameramen of the Providence Journal and Evening Bulletin will be shown to the public Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock in the new gallery of the School of Design Museum when the annual exhibit of the 100 Best News Photographs of the Year is opened.

The exhibition, carefully selected from thousands of prints made by the cameramen, will continue through Jan. 30 from 10 a. m. to 5 p. m. week days and 2 to 5 on Sundays. The exhibition will be free, except on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays when a small charge is made by the school.

Selected for Interest

The photographs are selected primarily for their news interest, not for their artistic excellence. They illustrate events in all parts of the State, and they have wide variety of subject matter. About 80 per cent. are "spot news" photographs. The others are feature pictures. Most of them have been taken without time for posing or for studied consideration of lighting and other effects. They had to be snapped on the instant. And yet, the skill, luck and intuition of the experienced news cameraman enable him to get remarkably artistic results under difficult conditions.

All these pictures appeared in the Providence Journal or the Evening Bulletin last year, most of them in black and white, others in the Artgravure Section.

Big Fire Pictured

The contrasts in these pictures are the contrasts of life itself.

"$200,000 in Smoking Ruins" shows one of the year's biggest fires, at the Crook plant in Valley Falls . . . Maribel Vinsen and Karl Schaeffer dance on the ice at the Auditorium . . . . Trappist monks dedicate a new novitiate . . . . Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is honored at a reception . . . . Police break up a fist fight among striking meat packers . . . . Youngsters ingeniously make animals out of vegetables . . . . A boy's clothes left in his cart on the bank of a pond tell the tragic story of a drowning . . . . A citizen reaches into his pocket for a nickel to feed a park-o-meter . . . . A new building is added to the School of Design . . . . A hockey fan puts the referee in his place with a vigorous word . . . . Firemen in a boat search at night for the pistol used in the Webster murder . . . . A California mother and her children enjoy a Rhode Island clambake . . . .

And scores of others.

All year the men in charge of the exhibition watch the newspapers closely for unusual pictures. Promising negatives are filed, with the stories of the pictures accompany and with the names of the photographers. By the end of the year, hundreds of candidates have been collected.

Then a selection is made of the 100 that best represent all types of work a newspaper photographer is required to do. The negatives chosen are printed, all the prints being of a uniform size, 11 by 14 inches. Some of the negatives may be only 1 by 1½ inches, but all are "blown up" to the larger size. This brings out details more clearly.

The prints are on the glossy paper used for photographs from which newspaper cuts are to be made. There is no resort to special papers to enhance the artistic merits of the photograph. The mounts, however, are made of a silver paper manufactured especially for the Journal and Bulletin. In the lower right hand corner of each picture the title is affixed.

Shown Other Places

Great care must be taken in mounting the prints, in order that they may withstand atmospheric conditions in various places where they are exhibited. Besides the Museum of the School of Design, they are shown in the gallery of the Newport Art Association, in the Westerly Library, at Rhode Island State College and in other communities.

Several requests have come from outside the State for the exhibition, because the Journal and the Bulletin are the only newspapers in the country, as far as is known, that provide such a display. However, the prints are not sent outside the State but are given to public schools and other institutions where they may continue to be of interest and value to Rhode Islanders. One set, for instance, has been given to the public schools in this city.

Interest in the exhibition has increased so considerably from year to year that the pictures will be made available in book form this year.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
JAN 15 1938

Strange Sounds At Boston

Symphony Rehearsing 'American Panorama' by Amfitheatrof

CHICAGO, Jan. 14.—Strange sounds, have been coming from the Boston Symphony orchestra at rehearsals. In the midst of the tones of the typical symphonic string, woodwind, and brass instruments, a police siren will shrill, three saxophones gurgle, a Hawaiian guitar slur, a piece of railroad rail clink under a hammer, and two pianos clatter a jazz duet under the rhythmic guidance of Jesus Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler. Moreover, a curious syncopated "whoosh" sound will emerge from French horns blown with the mouthpieces missing.

The orchestra has been playing "American Panorama." It was composed in Italy before America ever was seen by its composer, Daniede Amfitheatreof, who will conduct it. He is of Russian descent, a musician who became a naturalized citizen of Italy, and now is acting as guest conductor in the absence of Serge Koussevitzky, who is on his annual midwinter vacation of two weeks. Mr. Amfitheatrof says he got his American atmosphere from motion pictures, talking with friends who had visited this country, and listening to a few jazz bands in Europe, and some jazz and swing recordings imported from America.

"In "Panorama," the music is easily identifiable as creating an impression of America. Playing it taxed the technique of 110 Boston Symphony virtuosos. It is said to possess symphonic calibre enough to place it nearer Liszt's "Second Hungarian Rhapsody" than to Gershwin's "An American in Paris."

Mr. Amfitheatrof will conduct the concert on Monday evening and the "Commuter's matinee" on Tuesday at 3 o'clock. Commuters not only will be able to hear this striking up-to-date piece, but also the classic beauties of a suite from the quintets of Boccherini (contemporary of Haydn), and the high-spirited Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

Sunday's program in Symphony hall, which will constitute the first Boston appearance of Yehudi Menuhin, 20-year-old violin virtuoso, with his brilliant and pretty sister Hephzibah, 17, as pianist and co-recitalist, has reduced available seats—even on the stage, to the vanishing point.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 17 1938

GUEST CONDUCTOR FOR HUB CONCERT

Patrons of the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony, as well as the commuters who in increasing numbers attend the Tuesday afternoon series, will this week not only have the opportunity to see a guest-conductor, Daniele Amfitheatrof, in action, but to hear his own composition, "An American Panorama." This was composed in Italy before he had visited America at all. On the programs also will be a suite from a Boccherini Quintet, and the high-spirited Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

DETROIT, MICH.
SATURDAY NIGHT

JAN 15 [illegible]

Bloomfield Hills-Birmingham

A CONCERT program of unusual interest forms the nucleus about which revolves much of the social activity of the coming week in Bloomfield Hills.

It has been quite some time since a musical event has inspired the number of dinner parties that are now being planned to precede the appearance Wednesday evening of the Helsinki University Choir of Finland in concert program at the Cranbrook Auditorium. The choir, a male group of 59 voices, all students of Helsingfors University, is under the direction of Morlli Turunen and made its debut in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 26. This, the first American tour of the organization, is under the honorary sponsorship of Jean Sibelius, well known Finnish composer. Both Mr. and Mrs. Eliel Saarinen and Mr. and Mrs. John W. Gillette, Jr., will be dinner hosts that evening, later taking their guests to the concert and numerous other dinner groups are being arranged.

At a quiet ceremony in the Hills Saturday morning, with guests restricted to members of the immediate families, Miss Julia Vairo, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Vairo of Detroit, is becoming the bride of Mr. Walter Thompson Bromley, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Latham Bromley of Cranbrook Road, with the Rev. Robert W. Woodroofe of Christ Church officiating. The ceremony is being followed by a breakfast at the Bromley home in the Hills.

One of the few benefit parties on the calendar at the moment is the fourth annual bridge-tea in the interests of the Starr Commonwealth to be held at Birmingham Community House, Monday, Jan. 24, with Mrs. Frank L. Klingensmith as general chairman of the arrangements committee which includes in its membership Mrs. William A. Frayer, Mrs. William G. Lerchen, Mrs. E. G. Wasey, Mrs. W. W. Raymond, Mrs. Frank W. Shuell and Mrs. Draper Allen.

With no less than 10 large dinner parties planned to precede the event in addition to the numbers of smaller gatherings, it would seem that the barn dance is once again in high favor; for Tuesday evening at the Town Hall in Franklin Village an old-fashioned barn dance will take place with guests in costume. Among the many dinner hosts beforehand are Mr. and Mrs. George Wellington Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woodruff, Mr. and Mrs. Truman Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Sewell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Houseal and Mr. and Mrs. James Schermerhorn, Jr.

Despite the fact that rehearsals almost every night in the week automatically limit the number of evenings that may be devoted to affairs purely social, the calendar of both Bloomfield and Birmingham does not show the let-down that might be expected with so very many individuals involved with the dramatic programs of both communities. In the casts for the St. Dunstan plays to be presented Friday evening, Jan. 28, are the following: Poor Aubrey under the direction of Mr. Sheldon R. Noble to be enacted by Mr. Kenneth Bingham, Mrs. Linton Hart, Miss Romayne Thompson, and Mrs. Hubert Davis; A Well Remembered Voice under the direction of Mr. Harry Hoey and Mrs. Sheldon R. Noble with Mr. Vernon Kellett, Mr. Robert Woodruff, Miss Jessie Winter, Mrs. John Schoenfeld, Mr. Richard P. Raseman and Mr. Maurice W. Cochran in its cast; and Heaven on Earth with Mr. Rogers Marquis directing and by Mr. J. Morrison Taylor, Mrs. Helen Wagner Neff, Mrs. C. L. Winningham, Mr. William Comstock and Mrs. Donald Sanderson enacting the roles.

Birmingham Players have an elaborate program planned for presentation Saturday evening, Jan. 22. The Florist Shop by Winifred Hawkridge will be enacted by a cast including Carol Dwelley, Mr. William Martin, II, Mr. D. S. Hastreiter, Mrs. Stanley Sanderson and Mr. Charles J. Shain with Mrs. Rolf Spinning and Mrs. George M. Dwelley directing. The Giant's Stair by Wilbur Daniel Steele has in its cast Mrs. Richard Fowler, Mrs. Thomas Klingensmith, Mr. George M. Dwelley and Mr. G. W. Miller, with direction by Mrs. Henry Hart and Mrs. Donald Stanton. Brothers in Arms by Merrill Denison will be presented by a group including Mrs. Gardner Cobb, Mr. Robert Woodruff, Mr. Loren Robinson, Dr. James Howell, with Mrs. Robert F. Tillotson and Mrs. Franklin Fricker directing. The program also includes two "nifties," Tradition by Mr. James Bullock and At the Races by Dr. James Hassberger. The Afterglow or social period following is in charge of Mrs. Charles E. Carey, Mrs. C. George Shepherd, Mrs. Frank Packard and Mrs. Louis J. Giffels. Reviving a custom that proved popular last season, the Players announce the first of a series of Sunday afternoon teas Jan. 30, from 4 to 7 o'clock.

The traveling trend continues with Mr. and Mrs. George W. Wolf planning to leave soon for a trip to Australia. . . . Mrs. Charles E. Wilson with her daughter, Mrs. E. Curtis Matthews, and daughter-in-law Mrs. Thomas E. Wilson, left Thursday, a few days earlier than they had originally planned, to motor to the Wilson winter home at Miami Beach. . . . With their luggage including stunning outfits of pure white suede cloth and another in Austrian design, Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer Neff left Sunday for Sun Valley, Idaho, to "ski America first." They were accompanied by Mr. Neff's aunt, Mrs. Graham J. Graham, who has on her several European trips had the benefit of expert instruction from the ski professionals of Austria and Switzerland.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS

Concert Thursday by Finnish Chorus

The Helsinki University Chorus, as part of the first American tour, will sing at the Scottish Rite Cathedral next Thursday evening. Their American debut was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on New Year's Day, featuring the first American performances of the choral orchestral works of Jean Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen."

The Detroit audience will hear compositions written especially for this chorus by Sibelius. The program consists entirely of Finnish music. Folk songs and choral compositions by Sibelius, Palmgren, Kuula, Madetoja and Martti Turunen, the director of the chorus, will be heard.

The chorus of 59 comes here through the interest of the Intercollegiate Musical Council and under the sponsorship of notable American conductors: Werner Janssen, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Eugene Normandy, Frederick Stock and Leopold Stokowski. Their itinerary includes concerts at Harvard, Yale and Princeton, appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, New York, and Symphony Hall in Boston, an invitational concert at Cranbrook School on Wednesday evening of this week and at Hill Auditorium in Ann Arbor. American Finns are converging in from a radius of 200 miles to each concert point.

RAVEL MEMORIAL CONCERTS WEEK'S SYMPHONY FEATURE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who returns to his duties this week after his annual vacation of a fortnight, will dedicate the concerts in Symphony Hall at 2:30 tomorrow afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening to the memory of Maurice Ravel, the French composer who died a few weeks ago. Tomorrow's program includes the Piano Concerto of Ravel, the solo part of which will be played by J. M. Sanroma.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

DEC 28 1937

Sibelius Score Lost in Mails

BOSTON—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed yesterday.

ETC.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger

The Critic Talks to MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

ONE of the most interesting, as well as one of the best, performed numbers on the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its recent concert in this city was the Haydn Symphony in G major, No. 7, of the so-called "Paris" symphonies. This was partly because of the charming ingenuousness of the music itself and partly because it is so unusual for us, at least in Philadelphia, to hear a Haydn symphony under any circumstances—and Haydn, despite Berlioz's severe, if not very just, estimate of him, is still worth an occasional performance. But the Haydn symphonies, as well as most of those of Mozart, present several considerations as to why they are not more frequently played on regular symphony programs.

There is still not the slightest question as to the beauty of the music per se, which is shown by the fact that Haydn, as a composer of string quartets, still stands among the greatest. But the difference is that the physical form of the string quartet has not changed in any way since the time when the combination was first used. The violin, the viola and the violoncello were perfected before the first quartets were written and they still remain just as they were. Had any or all of these instruments undergone such modifications as has the piano, for example, the history of the string quartet today would unquestionably be very different from what it is and there would be a very different alignment of composers in this form.

* * *

THIS is shown by the history of the ancient viols, which were the direct predecessors of the later stringed instruments. Once very popular and largely written for by composers of that day, they were superseded by the later and better instruments, and the music written for the "chest of viols," as they were then termed, went almost as completely out of existence as the instruments themselves and today both are extremely difficult to get, despite their former popularity. What has saved the early string quartets (although by no means all of them) from a similar fate is the fact that the medium of interpretation has not changed since the time they were composed, and the perfection of that medium has encouraged composers ever since to write chamber music for these instruments.

Thus the chamber music of the early masters today stands upon its own musical merits and with no regard as to the instruments. Despite the immense improvements in construction of the piano, since the time of Mozart, some five or six of the twenty-five piano concertos which he composed are still played, although music which was unquestionably intended to sound bravura on the instruments of his day does not sound so at all upon a modern grand piano. These changes in the physical conformation of the piano is doubtless responsible for much of the neglect of the sonatas for that instrument of Haydn and Mozart, for, unlike Bach, in some of his keyboard music, neither Mozart nor Haydn appears to have visualized the instrument of the present time, whereas Bach seems to have done so.

* * *

THE falling off in popularity of the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart may be ascribed chiefly to certain physical changes, first in the increase and the perfecting of the instruments of the orchestra, all of which, except the strings, have undergone radical modifications for the better, and perhaps even more so to the change in the size of concert halls. In their day, organized concerts as known today did not exist and when a composer wrote an important orchestral work it was the custom to present it, generally at a concert made up of his own works, as a benefit for himself. This custom prevailed up to and including the final symphonies of Beethoven. Thus the halls in which concerts of this kind were presented were very small as compared with those of today.

As music became more the property of the public and less that of the noble families of the time, audiences increased and larger halls were necessary, this in turn demanding an increase in the size of the orchestras, although Mozart once did hear, through the beneficence of a wealthy admirer, his D major symphony performed by an orchestra of 100 men and was delighted with the result according to a letter which he wrote to his father. But compared with present-day standards, both halls and orchestras were small and music for them had to be composed with this in mind. The whole matter was a gradual growth and there is no doubt that these works sound somewhat thin today in spite of their intrinsic musical beauties.

* * *

BOTH Stokowski and Toscanini have given the G minor symphony of Mozart in Philadelphia in recent years with "an orchestra the size of the one used by the composer." The experiments cannot be described as successful, for in the Academy of Music the greatly reduced orchestra sounded thinner than ever. As the writer suggested at the time, if these distinguished conductors wanted to reduce the orchestra to that of Mozart's day the concert should have been given in an auditorium certainly no larger than the old Musical Fund Hall, which, of course, would not be practicable for the sole reason of playing the work exactly as the composer wrote it. It is, perhaps, significant that neither conductor ever repeated the experiment.

The matter of reorchestration of these musically beautiful works has sometimes been suggested, but the writer is not aware that it has ever been attempted and it would present insurmountable difficulties. A composer able to write music which exists for some 200 years is generally capable of selecting his own [illegible]t- [illegible]u- [illegible]he [illegible]be [illegible]th [illegible]les by a great musician and the result did not improve the symphony at all, for it was not conceived for a modern orchestra with many instruments which had not been added to the orchestra in the day of the composer. However, in those benighted times music written for the piano was played on that instrument and not by an orchestra of 100 men, and conductors seemed to be satisfied with the orchestral repertoire.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS

Sharps and Flats

NEW YORK concert-goers like the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At its first concert at Carnegie Hall, Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, reports that the audience "shouted and cheered after the concluding performance of the Sibelius Second Symphony."

"The orchestra sounded this music magnificently," say Mr. Downes. "The excitement of the last two movements that join together mounted, to the very end, which Mr. Koussevitsky made especially broad and mighty, with the plagal close that shouts defiance under the skies. Then came the public demonstration.

"The program was a simple one, and very effective. It consisted of two symphonies, the first one being possibly the greatest ever written—Beethoven's "Eroica"; the second the wildly dramatic symphony of Sibelius.

* * *

The University of California at Los Angeles is presenting the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and Otto Klemperer in two recitals on the Westwood Campus. John Charles Thomas, Metropolitan Opera baritone, and Marian Anderson, Negro contralto, are the other artist attractions.

WESTHAMPTON BEACH, N. Y.
WEEKLY CHRONICLE

[illegible] 1938

Before the second season concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, last Friday evening, Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson entertained at dinner at their home, 135 Eastern Parkway, for their box guests, who included Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell and Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Conroy.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN [illegible]

Who's Top[illegible]

By PIER[illegible]

Whoever relishes a brief period of gruesomeness would have experienced it to the [illegible] most limit a few evenings ago on [illegible] occasion of the [illegible]

pearance of the season the part of Georges Enesco as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and the third program performed by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Toscanini.

The Boston Symphony is seemingly unvaryingly superb these days, under Serge Koussevitzky. Some connoisseurs consider this the first of all orchestras. . . . anywhere. Whether or no, it certainly is second to no other. And Koussevitzky is now a master leader.

Enesco, whose eminence as a musician is conceded to be at the very head, makes no fuss while conducting. He is too serious, too conscientious, to indulge in anything remotely touching upon showmanship. If he is not a favorite with the throng, he assuredly has the respect of the musicians.

Toscanini seems not so effective in the NBC hall as he was in Carnegie, with the Philharmonic-Symphony. There are diverse opinions among the radio listeners qualified to judge; and it is barely possibly that the Italian maestro may feel less happy than he expected to be.

With The Orchestras.

We have had two performances by the Boston [illegible]phony, a first ap-

---

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS-SUN

JAN 19 1938

Singers Appear With Boston Symphony

They have appeared in three joint concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, two in Boston and one in Carnegie hall, New York. [illegible] Downes, music critic for th[illegible] York Times reports that [illegible] Hall was packed to the [illegible] last night (January 10) [illegible] Helsinki university cho[illegible] made its New York debut [illegible] day evening with the B[illegible] phony orchestra, gave a p[illegible] der its own director, Mart[illegible] of Finnish a capella musi[illegible]

The final United States [illegible] will be a re-appearance at C[illegible] hall on February 1, by popular demand, this concert not having been scheduled in the itinerary. Included among their appearances have been Harvard university, Montreal and Toronto, Canada; Princeton university, the University of Michigan, University of Virginia, Washington, D. C., St. Louis and Detroit. From Chicago they go to Marquette and Hancock, Mich.; Virginia and Duluth, Minn.; New Haven, Conn., and New York City.

Six songs of Jean Sibelius, an honorary sponsor, including his choral-orchestral works, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen," are included in the repertoire which also takes in Finnish folksong transcriptions, Genetz, Gripenberg, Haapalainen, Jarnefelt, Kajanus, Kuula, Linnala, Maasalo, Madetoja, Merikanto, Palmgren, Pesola, Tornudd and compositions by the conductor, Mr. Turunen.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

Auditorium Planned For Stockbridge

Performances of the Summer Berkshire Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., were badly disrupted last August by violent rain storms and the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitski, was unable to complete its programs. To prevent another such dilemma from occuring, it was determined to build a summer auditorium and a subscription fund was started to provide $100,000 for this purpose. The committee in charge reports $80,000 already subscribed.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

133

DETROIT, MICH.
SATURDAY NIGHT
JAN 15 1938

Bloomfield Hills-Birmingham

A CONCERT program of unusual interest forms the nucleus about which revolves much of the social activity of the coming week in Bloomfield Hills.

It has been quite some time since a musical event has inspired the number of dinner parties that are now being planned to precede the appearance Wednesday evening of the Helsinki University Choir of Finland in concert program at the Cranbrook Auditorium. The choir, a male group of 59 voices, all students of Helsingfors University, is under the direction of Morlli Turunen and made its debut in this country with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Dec. 26. This, the first American tour of the organization, is under the honorary sponsorship of Jean Sibelius, well known Finnish composer. Both Mr. and Mrs. Eliel Saarinen and Mr. and Mrs. John W. Gillette, Jr., will be dinner hosts that evening, later taking their guests to the concert and numerous other dinner groups are being arranged.

At a quiet ceremony in the Hills Saturday morning, with guests restricted to members of the immediate families, Miss Julia Vairo, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Vincent Vairo of Detroit, is becoming the bride of Mr. Walter Thompson Bromley, son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Latham Bromley of Cranbrook Road, with the Rev. Robert W. Woodroofe of Christ Church officiating. The ceremony is being followed by a breakfast at the Bromley home in the Hills.

One of the few benefit parties on the calendar at the moment is the fourth annual bridge-tea in the interests of the Starr Commonwealth to be held at Birmingham Community House, Monday, Jan. 24, with Mrs. Frank L. Klingensmith as general chairman of the arrangements committee which includes in its membership Mrs. William A. Frayer, Mrs. William G. Lerchen, Mrs. E. G. Wasey, Mrs. W. W. Raymond, Mrs. Frank W. Shuell and Mrs. Draper Allen.

With no less than 10 large dinner parties planned to precede the event in addition to the numbers of smaller gatherings, it would seem that the barn dance is once again in high favor; for Tuesday evening at the Town Hall in Franklin Village an old-fashioned barn dance will take place with guests in costume. Among the many dinner hosts beforehand are Mr. and Mrs. George Wellington Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woodruff, Mr. and Mrs. Truman Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. J. J. Morse, Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Sewell, Mr. and Mrs. Edward B. Houseal and Mr. and Mrs. James Schermerhorn, Jr.

Despite the fact that rehearsals almost every night in the week automatically limit the number of evenings that may be devoted to affairs purely social, the calendar of both Bloomfield and Birmingham does not show the let-down that might be expected with so very many individuals involved with the dramatic programs of both communities. In the casts for the St. Dunstan plays to be presented Friday evening, Jan. 28, are the following: Poor Aubrey under the direction of Mr. Sheldon R. Noble to be enacted by Mr. Kenneth Bingham, Mrs. Linton Hart, Miss Romayne Thompson, and Mrs. Hubert Davis; A Well Remembered Voice under the direction of Mr. Harry Hoey and Mrs. Sheldon R. Noble with Mr. Vernon Kellett, Mr. Robert Woodruff, Miss Jessie Winter, Mrs. John Schoenfeld, Mr. Richard P. Raseman and Mr. Maurice W. Cochran in its cast; and Heaven on Earth with Mr. Rogers Marquis directing and by Mr. J. Morrison Taylor, Mrs. Helen Wagner Neff, Mrs. C. L. Winningham, Mr. William Comstock and Mrs. Donald Sanderson enacting the roles.

Birmingham Players have an elaborate program planned for presentation Saturday evening, Jan. 22. The Florist Shop by Winifred Hawkridge will be enacted by a cast including Carol Dwelley, Mr. William Martin, II, Mr. D. S. Hastreiter, Mrs. Stanley Sanderson and Mr. Charles J. Shain with Mrs. Rolf Spinning and Mrs. George M. Dwelley directing. The Giant's Stair by Wilbur Daniel Steele has in its cast Mrs. Richard Fowler, Mrs. Thomas Klingensmith, Mr. George M. Dwelley and Mr. G. W. Miller, with direction by Mrs. Henry Hart and Mrs. Donald Stanton. Brothers in Arms by Merrill Denison will be presented by a group including Mrs. Gardner Cobb, Mr. Robert Woodruff, Mr. Loren Robinson, Dr. James Howell, with Mrs. Robert F. Tillotson and Mrs. Franklin Fricker directing. The program also includes two "nifties," Tradition by Mr. James Bullock and At the Races by Dr. James Hassberger. The Afterglow or social period following is in charge of Mrs. Charles E. Carey, Mrs. C. George Shepherd, Mrs. Frank Packard and Mrs. Louis J. Giffels. Reviving a custom that proved popular last season, the Players announce the first of a series of Sunday afternoon teas Jan. 30, from 4 to 7 o'clock.

The traveling trend continues with Mr. and Mrs. George W. Wolf planning to leave soon for a trip to Australia. . . . Mrs. Charles E. Wilson with her daughter, Mrs. E. Curtis Matthews, and daughter-in-law Mrs. Thomas E. Wilson, left Thursday, a few days earlier than they had originally planned, to motor to the Wilson winter home at Miami Beach. . . . With their luggage including stunning outfits of pure white suede cloth and another in Austrian design, Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer Neff left Sunday for Sun Valley, Idaho, to "ski America first." They were accompanied by Mr. Neff's aunt, Mrs. Graham J. Graham, who has on her several European trips had the benefit of expert instruction from the ski professionals of Austria and Switzerland.

DETROIT, MICH.
NEWS
JAN 16 1938

Concert Thursday by Finnish Chorus

The Helsinki University Chorus, as part of the first American tour, will sing at the Scottish Rite Cathedral next Thursday evening. Their American debut was with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on New Year's [illegible], featuring the first American performances of the choral orchestral works of Jean Sibelius, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen."

The Detroit audience will hear compositions written especially for this chorus by Sibelius. The program consists entirely of Finnish music. Folk songs and choral compositions by Sibelius, Palmgren, Kuula, Madetoja and Martti Turunen, the director of the chorus, will be heard.

The chorus of 59 comes here through the interest of the Intercollegiate Musical Council and under the sponsorship of notable American conductors; Werner Janssen, Walter Damrosch, Serge Koussevitzky, Eugene Normandy, Frederick Stock and Leopold Stokowski. Their itinerary includes concerts at Harvard, Yale and Princeton, appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, New York, and Symphony Hall in Boston, an invitational concert at Cranbrook School on Wednesday evening of this week and at Hill Auditorium in Ann Arbor. American Finns are converging in from a radius of 200 miles to each concert point.

RAVEL MEMORIAL CONCERTS WEEK'S SYMPHONY FEATURE

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who returns to his duties this week after his annual vacation of a fortnight, will dedicate the concerts in Symphony Hall at 2:30 tomorrow afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening to the memory of Maurice Ravel, the French composer who died a few weeks ago. Tomorrow's program includes the Piano Concerto of Ravel, the solo part of which will be played by J. M. Sanroma.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 28 1937

Sibelius Score Lost in Mails

BOSTON—(AP)—The original and possibly the only manuscript of an early choral-symphonic score by the Finnish composer Jan Sibelius has disappeared while en route from Europe to Boston, a Boston Symphony Orchestra official disclosed yesterday.

ETC.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Evening Public Ledger
JAN 15 1938

The Critic Talks to MUSIC LOVERS

By SAMUEL L. LACIAR

ONE of the most interesting, as well as one of the best, performed numbers on the program given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its recent concert in this city was the Haydn Symphony in G major, No. 7, of the so-called "Paris" symphonies. This was partly because of the charming ingenuousness of the music itself and partly because it is so unusual for us, at least in Philadelphia, to hear a Haydn symphony under any circumstances—and Haydn, despite Berlioz's severe, if not very just, estimate of him, is still worth an occasional performance. But the Haydn symphonies, as well as most of those of Mozart, present several considerations as to why they are not more frequently played on regular symphony programs.

There is still not the slightest question as to the beauty of the music per se, which is shown by the fact that Haydn, as a composer of string quartets, still stands among the greatest. But the difference is that the physical form of the string quartet has not changed in any way since the time when the combination was first used. The violin, the viola and the violoncello were perfected before the first quartets were written and they still remain just as they were. Had any or all of these instruments undergone such modifications as has the piano, for example, the history of the string quartet today would unquestionably be very different from what it is and there would be a very different alignment of composers in this form.

* * *

THIS is shown by the history of the ancient viols, which were the direct predecessors of the later stringed instruments. Once very popular and largely written for by composers of that day, they were superseded by the later and better instruments, and the music written for the "chest of viols," as they were then termed, went almost as completely out of existence as the instruments themselves and today both are extremely difficult to get, despite their former popularity. What has saved the early string quartets (although by no means all of them) from a similar fate is the fact that the medium of interpretation has not changed since the time they were composed, and the perfection of that medium has encouraged composers ever since to write chamber music for these instruments.

Thus the chamber music of the early masters today stands upon its own musical merits and with no regard as to the instruments. Despite the immense improvements in construction of the piano, since the time of Mozart, some five or six of the twenty-five piano concertos which he composed are still played, although music which was unquestionably intended to sound bravura on the instruments of his day does not sound so at all upon a modern grand piano. These changes in the physical conformation of the piano is doubtless responsible for much of the neglect of the sonatas for that instrument of Haydn and Mozart, for, unlike Bach, in some of his keyboard music, neither Mozart nor Haydn appears to have visualized the instrument of the present time, whereas Bach seems to have done so.

* * *

THE falling off in popularity of the symphonies of Haydn and Mozart may be ascribed chiefly to certain physical changes, first in the increase and the perfecting of the instruments of the orchestra, all of which, except the strings, have undergone radical modifications for the better, and perhaps even more so to the change in the size of concert halls. In their day, organized concerts as known today did not exist and when a composer wrote an important orchestral work it was the custom to present it, generally at a concert made up of his own works, as a benefit for himself. This custom prevailed up to and including the final symphonies of Beethoven. Thus the halls in which concerts of this kind were presented were very small as compared with those of today.

As music became more the property of the public and less that of the noble families of the time, audiences increased and larger halls were necessary, this in turn demanding an increase in the size of the orchestras, although Mozart once did hear, through the beneficence of a wealthy admirer, his D major symphony performed by an orchestra of 100 men and was delighted with the result according to a letter which he wrote to his father. But compared with present-day standards, both halls and orchestras were small and music for them had to be composed with this in mind. The whole matter was a gradual growth and there is no doubt that these works sound somewhat thin today in spite of their intrinsic musical beauties.

* * *

BOTH Stokowski and Toscanini have given the G minor symphony of Mozart in Philadelphia in recent years with "an orchestra the size of the one used by the composer." The experiments cannot be described as successful, for in the Academy of Music the greatly reduced orchestra sounded thinner than ever. As the writer suggested at the time, if these distinguished conductors wanted to reduce the orchestra to that of Mozart's day the concert should have been given in an auditorium certainly no larger than the old Musical Fund Hall, which, of course, would not be practicable for the sole reason of playing the work exactly as the composer wrote it. It is, perhaps, significant that neither conductor ever repeated the experiment.

The matter of reorchestration of these musically beautiful works has sometimes been suggested, but the writer is not aware that it has ever been attempted and it would present insurmountable difficulties. A composer able to write music which exists for some 200 years is generally capable of selecting his own orchestral treatment, and any attempt to force these delicately beautiful works into the mold of the huge modern orchestra would be disastrous. It was tried once with one of the Schumann symphonies by a great musician and the result did not improve the symphony at all, for it was not conceived for a modern orchestra with many instruments which had not been added to the orchestra in the day of the composer. However, in those benighted times music written for the piano was played on that instrument and not by an orchestra of 100 men, and conductors seemed to be satisfied with the orchestral repertoire.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
DESERET NEWS
JAN 15 1938

your household circumstances—
ods available.
y shown contains
rls, radish roses, cranberry jelly

SPICED A firm tart app a French fourths cup fourth cup l granulated su whole cloves

NEW YORK concert-goers [illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra. At its first concert at Carnegie Hall, Olin Downes, New York Times music editor, reports that the audience "shouted and cheered after the concluding performance of the Sibelius Second Symphony."

"The orchestra sounded this music magnificently," say Mr. Downes. "The excitement of the last two movements that join together mounted, to the very end, which Mr. Koussevitsky made especially broad and mighty, with the plagal close that shouts defiance under the skies. Then came the public demonstration.

"The program was a simple one, and very effective. It consisted of two symphonies, the first one being possibly the greatest ever written—Beethoven's "Eroica"; the second the wildly dramatic symphony of Sibelius.

* * *

The University of California at Los Angeles is presenting the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and Otto Klemperer in two recitals on the Westwood Campus. John Charles Thomas, Metropolitan Opera baritone, and Marian Anderson, Negro contralto, are the other artist attractions.

WESTHAMPTON BEACH, N. Y.
WEEKLY CHRONICLE
JAN 14 1938

Before the second season concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, last Friday evening, Mr. and Mrs. David C. Johnson entertained at dinner at their home, 135 Eastern Parkway, for their box guests, who included Judge and Mrs. Albert Conway, Mr. and Mrs. John Stillwell and Mr. and Mrs. Gardiner Conroy.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 16 1938

Who's Top

By PIERR

Whoever relishes a brief period of gruesomeness would have experienced it to the [illegible]most limit a few evenings ago [illegible] occasion of the [illegible]

pearance of the season the part of Georges Enesco as guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony, and the third program performed by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Toscanini.

The Boston Symphony is seemingly unvaryingly superb these days, under Serge Koussevitzky. Some connoisseurs consider this the first of all orchestras. . . . anywhere. Whether or no, it certainly is second to no other. And Koussevitzky is now a master leader.

Enesco, whose eminence as a musician is conceded to be at the very head, makes no fuss while conducting. He is too serious, too conscientious, to indulge in anything remotely touching upon showmanship. If he is not a favorite with the throng, he assuredly has the respect of the musicians.

Toscanini seems not so effective in the NBC hall as he was in Carnegie, with the Philharmonic-Symphony. There are diverse opinions among the radio listeners qualified to judge; and it is barely possibly that the Italian maestro may feel less happy than he expected to be.

With The Orchestras.

We have had two performances by the Boston [illegible]ony, a first ap-

---

WAUKEGAN, ILL.
NEWS-SUN
JAN 19 1938

Singers Appear With Boston Symphony

They have appeared in three joint concerts with the Boston Symphony orchestra, two in Boston and one in Carnegie hall, New York. [illegible] Downes, music critic for [illegible] York Times reports that [illegible] Hall was packed to th[illegible] last night (January 10[illegible] Helsinki university cho[illegible] made its New York debu[illegible] day evening with the [illegible] phony orchestra, gave a [illegible] der its own director, Mar[illegible] of Finnish a capella musi[illegible]

The final United State[illegible] will be a re-appearance at [illegible] hall on February 1, by popular demand, this concert not having been scheduled in the itinerary. Included among their appearances have been Harvard university, Montreal and Toronto, Canada; Princeton university, the University of Michigan, University of Virginia, Washington, D. C., St. Louis and Detroit. From Chicago, they go to Marquette and Hancock, Mich.; Virginia and Duluth, Minn.; New Haven, Conn., and New York City.

Six songs of Jean Sibelius, an honorary sponsor, including his choral-orchestral works, "The Origin of Fire" and "The Captive Queen," are included in the repertoire which also takes in Finnish folksong transcriptions, Genetz, Gripenberg, Haapalainen, Jarnefelt, Kajanus, Kuula, Linnala, Maasalo, Madetoja, Merikanto, Palmgren, Pesola, Tornudd and compositions by the conductor, Mr. Turunen.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
JAN 16 1938

Auditorium Planned For Stockbridge

Performances of the Summer Berkshire Festival at Stockbridge, Mass., were badly disrupted last August by violent rain storms and the Boston Symphony, conducted by Serge Koussevitski, was unable to complete its programs. To prevent another such dilemma from occuring, it was determined to build a summer auditorium and a subscription fund was started to provide $100,000 for this purpose. The committee in charge reports $80,000 already subscribed.

SYMPHONIC MUSIC AND CIVIC PRIDE

Jewish Advocate - Dec. 31/37

By M. A. DeWOLFE HOWE

Written Especially for The Jewish Advocate

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conductor, Boston Symphony Orchestra
—Photo Courtesy Boston Herald

It was twenty-four years ago that, at the request of Henry Lee Higginson, I undertook to prepare a history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. When the book was finished in the summer of 1914, soon after the World War began in Europe, I brought the manuscript to Major Higginson for his inspection. He was disposed at first not even to look at it. "There is no use of printing this book," he said; "there may not be any Orchestra in a few months." He felt at the moment that the great work to which he had devoted his enthusiasm and his fortune for thirty-three years was doomed. Dark days were indeed in store for the Orchestra, but it did not cease, and now, twenty-three years later, it is established more firmly than ever as an institution which Boston holds in a cumulative civic pride. The book, be it added, appeared in its first form, on Major Higginson's eightieth birthday, November 18, 1914, and, in an extended form appropriate to the fiftieth anniversary of the Orchestra, in the autumn of 1931.

There is today no need to sing the praises of this Orchestra of ours as a civilizing force in the community. The education of the spirit stands beside the education of the mind as a pressing necessity in a democratic society. Among all the arts none surpasses music in its power of refreshment and inspiration, impartially distributed. In agencies to this end, conducted not for profit but for education in its highest sense, a community generally receives what it deserves and, in the long run, is willing to support. The history of our own orchestra illustrates what is probably bound to happen more and more frequently in this changing world. An individual or a small group gifted with more than common vision establishes something which should endure but, in the very nature of things, cannot command indefinitely the support of an opulent few. The many must make it their own responsibility—a responsibility in itself a privilege.

This is precisely what has been going on in Boston. Orchestral music, thanks in large measure to the radio, has become a public possession. Hearing the best music "over the air" breeds the desire to hear it on the spot of its production. The growing impulse of our people to share in good things, to fill the space between the over-privileged and the under-privileged by augmenting the number of the rightly-privileged, is stirring among the lovers of music in Boston. In recent years the list of citizens and neighbors who support the Orchestra not only by resorting to Symphony Hall but by contributing, beyond the cost of their tickets, to the maintenance of the Orchestra has made a constant and encouraging growth. The chief encouragement lies in the steadily increasing number of givers, however modest their gifts may be.

Let not these words be read as those of a solicitor of funds. They speak rather for a civic consciousness in the field of art. If the deserts of Boston are to be measured in terms of music, the town seems to have deserved much.

"'T is not in mortals to command success,
But we'll do more, Sempronius,— we'll deserve it."

As Boston continues to deserve its music, its mortals will know how to command it. They know already that in this particular domain of art lies one of their most valid rights to civic pride.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

JAN 8 - 1938

Boston Symphony Program Saturday

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, Jan. 7.—Emma Boyne will be piano soloist withthe Boston Symphony Orchestra, playing the Mozart Concerto for Pianoforte in C, Saturday afternoon, at Carnegie Hall. Bach's Concerto No. 8 and Tchaikov-

---

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH

JAN 16 1938

⁘ On the Records ⁘

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

THE AEOLIANS, a group consisting of three members of the Boston Symphony—Minot Beale, violin; George Madsen, flute, and Carl Stockbridge, cello—plus Nellie Zimmer, harp, make their disc bow in "Waltzing Doll," "Flight of the Bumble Bee" and an Intermezzo from "Carmen" (Victor 4376). It's all very sweet and hardly seems worth Beale's time in making the arrangements.

BATON ROUGE, LA.
ADVOCATE

JAN 16 1938

Lost Manuscripts Of Music Usually Show Up in Time

History Contains Several Instances of Literature Turning Up After Century.

By Bernard Freeman

Boston, Jan. 14 (AP)—If past musical history is any precedent, the unpublished manuscript of Jan Sibelius' early choral symphonic work "Origin of Fire," which vanished mysteriously while en route from Europe last month, will turn up in a half-century or so in somebody's attic.

The composition, of which the cello, viola and bass viol parts were radioed across the Atlantic in time for a performance last week by the Boston Symphony orchestra and the Helsinki chorus, recalls tales of numerous original manuscripts that had an uncanny way of disappearing—and later reappearing.

The manuscripts of some of the world's greatest music—Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and his overture and ballet music to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," and several of Muzio Clementi's symphonies have disappeared or lain in oblivion for long stretches, only to reappear and achieve widespread popularity.

Century's Absence.

After the first performance of "Midsummer Night's Dream" in London in 1829, Mendelssohn entrusted the score for safekeeping to a friend, who stammered out the next day that he left the manuscript of the overture in a public coach.

Approximately 10 years ago, after nearly a century's absence, it turned up in London in the Royal Academy of Music, of which the apologetic friend had been a director.

The work, of course, achieved great favor in the intervening years—but only because Mendelssohn, who possessed an amazing memory, wrote out a new score as easily as if he were copying scales.

Schubert's most beloved work, "The Unfinished Symphony," was laid aside in 1822, six years before his death, with only two of the customary four movements completed. Not until 1865 did musicologists finally uncover the masterpiece from an old-fashioned chest in the home of a friend.

The same composer's score for the beautiful "Rosamunde" music disappeared soon after its second performance in 1823 and wasn't heard from again until 1867. Then, Arthur Sullivan, of the famed English comic opera team of Gilbert and Sullivan, found the unpublished score in a cupboard in the Vienna home of Schubert's nephew. Not a musician, the nephew had been unaware of its existence.

In Attic Nearly Century.

Unlike his successful sons, Johann Sebastian Bach was not appreciated until after he died; consequently few knew the "St. Matthew Passion," described by Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "the greatest composition in all musical literature."

After receiving its first performance on Good Friday, 1829, the score lay in a son's attic for nearly a century. Then, the elder Bach having come into his own, young Mendelssohn and a group of friends revived it exactly one century later—on Good Friday, 1829.

When the Italian pianist Clementi died in England in 1832, he was known to have written some 20 symphonies. Yet, although his estates and papers were in perfect order, the symphonic manuscripts were missing. Not until 1917, when a Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, were they found in a trunk in the attic—and then they were incomplete and in utter disorder. How they reached there remains a mystery.

Alfredo Casella pieced them together with parts he found in the library of congress in Washington, and thus they were given to the world.

'Lost Concerto' Not Lost.

Robert Schumann's violin concerta, which recently was played for the first time although written in 1853, has been called erroneously the "Lost Concerto."

Though unperformed, music lovers had known of its existence. They did not hear it, until 1937, however, because the manuscript's owner, Violinist Alfred Joachim, had decreed in his will the concerto should not be played until a century after the composer's death, which would be 1956. The German government permitted the performance last year.

LOWELL COURIER CITIZEN, WEI

MOMENTS MUSICAL

Jan. 19/38

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

Boston Programs.

Daniele Amfitheatrof, as guest conductor, will direct the programs of the Boston Symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, after which his engagement comes to a close. On the programs for chief item he has set the "Divine Poem" of Scriabin. Played for the first time in Boston will be the "Concerto dell' Estate" of Pizetti and for familiar number Beethoven's third Leonore Overture.

ALEXANDRIA, VA.
GAZETTE

JAN 18 1938

MUSIC NOTES

WILLIAM ROBERT ADAM

Sunday's concert will feature the first Washington symphony appearance of Ruth Posselt, violinist and Sir Ernest MacMillan of Canada as guest conductor. The concert consists of the brilliant Sibelius Violin Concerto; a Bach Choralevorspiel; Chausson's Symphony in B Flat Major; "On Hearing the First Cuckoo in the Spring" by Delius; and the "Grand Russian Easter" of Rimsky-Korsakow.

Both programs abound in originality and music that should be heard more often in that it consists of some of the most profound examples of the classic and romantic styles and orchestration that is unique and powerful within its little known bounds.

Miss Posselt is generally considered a neglected violinist since she won the acclaim of Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston critics as a result of her solo appearance with this very notable organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 1

Famous Helsinki Chorus Coming to Woolsey Hall

The current concert season, one of the finest in New Haven's history, will receive an added attraction of extreme merit two weeks hence when the famous Helsinki University Chorus of Finland appears in Woolsey Hall. The date of the concert is Monday evening, January 31, and at that time it is expected that New Haven music-lovers will turn out in force to welcome the great singing organization which is making its first visit to America.

Arriving in this country late last month, the Finlanders found themselves faced with an exacting schedule of concerts to be given in the single month they will remain in the United States. Already their tour is half completed, and they have achieved, in a little more than two weeks, acclaim such as is reserved only for the most sensational successes. Three appearances have been made with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two in Boston and one in New York, each time with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. Three universities, Princeton, Harvard and Virginia, have so far been visited, and they have also sung in Symphony Hall, Boston, and Carnegie Hall, New York. Each appearance has been a brilliant success, and it goes without saying that New Haven's discriminating musical public will turn out en masse when the chorus comes to Woolsey Hall.

Local interest in the affair has been so general since the announcement of the concert several days ago that tickets are to be placed on sale today at Loomis Temple of Music on Chapel Street.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE - DEMOCRAT

938

Famous Finland Chorus to Sing at the Principia

The Helsinki University Chorus from Finland, whose American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra December 31 created something of a sensation, will appear in The Principia Concert and Lecture Course in Howard Hall next Friday evening at 8:15 o'clock.

The 54 singers are chosen from a home chorus numbering nearly three times as many. All are students in the university who voluntarily and without compensation contribute their services, giving at least two concerts a year in Helsinki, in addition to an annual concert tour in Finland and the Continent. The present tour is under the auspices of the Intercollegiate Musical Council, of which Marshall Bartholomew of Yale is president.

Musical life in Finland today is exceedingly flourishing. Opera, annual summer music festivals, orchestral and choral concerts are enthusiastically attended, not only because the Finnish people for centuries have been naturally musical, but because they have been educated to contribute to music, either by performance or appreciation. As long ago as 1556 the university city of Turku maintained an orchestra, and in 1640 the University of Turku gave courses in music and sponsored musical research.

Out of this well-cultivated field has grown the chorus called the Student Singers of the University of Helsinki. From the beginning the principal aim of the chorus, whose formidable Finnish name (Ylioppolaskunnan Laulajat) is nearly always abbreviated to Y. L., was the creation and development of Finnish choral music. During its existence of more than a half century, it has attained a prominent position in the musical life of Finland and has contributed much to the raising of Finnish choral music to its present high level, particularly under the 25-year leadership of Prof. Heikki Klemetti, who became the reformer of Finnish choral music. For the past six years the chorus has been led by the eminent conductor and composer, Martti Turunen.

The Principia program follows:

(1) Terve, Suomeni maa (Hail, Suomi, My Native Land) ....Emil Genetz
(8) Niin mina neitonen (I Sing to You, Fair Maiden) .. Robert Kajanus (Folksong Arrangement. Tenor Solo: Alfons Almi).
(7) Sirkka (The Cricket)— Armas Jarnefelt
(5) Paan (Pan) ..Vaino Haapalainen
(39) Prokko—
(38) Loitsu (Conjuration) Aksel Tornud
(28) Saaristolaispolska (Islanders' Jig) .... Vaino Pesola
(36) Kadonnut venhe (The Missing Boat) .... Martti Turunen Barytone Solo: Helge Virkkunen).
(20) Sotta somer, helka hiekka (The Shingle Crashes) ....Leevi Madetoja
(16) Tullallaa (Chubby-Cheek) — Armas Maasaio (Folksong Arrangement. Tenor Solo: Alfons Almi).
(11) Iltatunnelma (In the Evening)—
(12) Kesakuva (Summer)..Toivo Kuula
INTERMISSION.
(34) Venematka (The Boat-Trip)—
(33) Sydameni laulu (My Heart's Song)—
(31) Saarella palaa (The Fire on the Island ....Jean Sibelius
(24) Kesailta (Summer Evening)— (Folksong Arr. Tenor Solo: Vilpo Lehtinen).
(25) Paimenen ilo (The Shepherd's Joy)
(27) Tuutulaulu (Cradle Song)—
(23) Hiiden orjinen laulu (The Slaves of Hiisi) ....Selim Palmgren

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 17 1938

Toscanini and Sibelius

Second Symphony of Finnish Master Played at Broadcast Concert.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Quibbling over tempi becomes the greatest single bore in the world of music. But what is to be said when an otherwise magnificent performance falls short of conviction by reason of its fundamentals of pace? Such a performance was that which Arturo Toscanini gave of the Sibelius Second Symphony on Saturday night in the fourth of his concerts as conductor of the NBC Symphony Orchestra.

In all that pertained to fervor of utterance, and splendor of detail, this was a performance that possessed the supreme qualities associated with Toscanini's name. It was cameo-cut and crystal clear. The texture of the writing was singularly transparent, with inner voices assuming a more clearly distinguishable individual glow. The playing was as highly vitalized as it was polished and unified. A passion of concentration and mastery ran through it from first to last.

But a tendency to rob basic themes of their breadth was characteristic of this playing from the opening measures of the first movement, which were a shade faster than is customary. If this had been a detail, it would not have justified comment. But as the symphony progressed, it became apparent that those opening measures were determinative; out of them grew the subsequent relation of one tempo to another, not merely within a movement but in the succession of movements. All were on the fast side and the finale, which takes its cue logically from the scherzo, found the orchestra racing through the heroic big theme of triumph in a manner to alter its basic character and effect.

How would the composer have felt about all this? No one can answer that question with complete assurance, particularly since Sibelius has been quoted as saying, on one occasion, that "the right tempo is the way you feel the music." But could Sibelius, or any other composer, "feel" his own music in two ways as disparate as the Toscanini and, let us say, the Koussevitzky "reading" of the ~~finale of~~ this symphony?

This was said to have been Toscanini's first essayal of the symphony. His mark was upon it. But were the tempi he established on this occasion necessarily the final and fixed ones for his future performances of this work? One devout admirer of the great Italian hopes not.

Of the other music played, only the Brahms "Tragic" Overture was of anything like equal moment. Busoni's rondo, "Arlecchinesco," and Tommassini's "Carnival of Venice" variations are virtuoso pieces, calling for virtuoso playing. They received their due and perhaps something more. The playing in both was of a superlative order. Jan Peerce was heard in a brief off-stage solo in the Busoni work. The evening was one of usual enthusiasm, though from his situs in the auditorium this reviewer in some manner missed the wild cheering reported as being audible to radio listeners after the symphony.

DULUTH, MINN.
HERALD

EXTRA TOUCHES

When representatives of the nation's bankers met in convention in Boston, part of the entertainment arranged for them was a concert by the Boston symphony—which was given, surprisingly enough, not in Symphony hall but in the First National bank. The bank, conscious of its obligations as host, issued special instructions to the guards who were to serve as ushers at the concert. They were to wear new black neckties. Before reporting for work they were to polish their shoes. And they were to be sure to brush their teeth.—The New Yorker.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK.
GAZETTE

NOTES OF THE DAY.

Faced with the necessity of calling off a rendition of Jan Sibelius' "The Origin of Fire" because it was found that parts were missing from the newly received choral-orchestral score, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra applied to the composer's publishers at Leipgzig, Germany, by cable. Two days later the parts were received in Boston, by radio-photograph. The matter was quite simple, the Christian Science Monitor reports. The missing parts, scores for viola, cello and bass, were reduced by photograph at Leipzig so that four pages could be contained on the regular 8 by 11-inch radio-photo, were wirelessed to New York, then rushed to Boston by train and enlarged to the desired size. In the meantime, orchestra and chorus, reassured by cablegram from Leipzig that the matter was being attended to, went right ahead with rehearsals of the other parts.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
NEWS

Koussevitsky, the Boston maestro, brought his famous band to our Carnegie hall for a concert recently, and liked to have burned to a crisp! Before the hall he found pickets with signs charging that the conductor supported the Reds! I asked the angry Serge why this was, and he said that not long ago he gave a concert for the benefit of the homeless children of Spain—political faith not specified. Well, all I can say is that if this is being Red, may we all go bright crimson!

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
JAN 22 1938

Music Notes

To Honor Memory of Ravel

In memory of Maurice Ravel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will devote its next programs under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at Carnegie Hall on Friday night and Saturday afternoon, February 11 and 12, and Thursday night, February 10, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, mainly to music by this composer. The program for February 11 includes Ravel's piano concerto, with J. M. Sanroma as soloist, "Ma Mere l'Oye" and second "Daphnis et Chloe" suite and Mozart's symphony in D (K. 504). On February 12 Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Ravel's "Tombeau de Couperin," "Rapsodie Espagnole" and "Scheherazade," with Olga Averino as the vocal soloist, and Schumann's fourth symphony.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
JAN 19 1938

Russian Conductor Gives Commuters Good Program

Amfitheatrof Found Not as Extravagant in Gesture as Reported—Boston Program Holds His Own "American Panorama."

Reports had come in that Daniele Amfitheatrof, who has been serving as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was inclined to be Amfitheatrical, so to speak, given to rather extravagant gestures. Seeing him in action at the Tuesday afternoon "commuters'" concert, this deponent did not get that impression, although the visitor was not so stately and dignified as Dr. Koussevitzky. His movements were graceful, on the whole, the hands seeming to be particularly eloquent in the quieter moods of the music.

A Russian by birth and an Italian by naturalization, he had acquired enough of the spirit of his adopted country to give a sparkling interpretation of Rossini's Overture to Semiramide, lighter music than is often presented at these concerts, but a fine composition of its kind. And especially so in the hands of such a competent orchestra.

It preceded the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. Since the two composers had met and were appreciative of each other's talents, the juxtaposition may not have been inappropriate. Perhaps, the conductor's way with the great symphony was not altogether orthodox in the matter of tempi and emphasis. But it made its effect. And in the rapid movements the orchestra played with more than ordinary verve and spirit.

The conductor's arrangement of a suite for strings from Boccherini's quintets was grateful music in the mood of that day.

The transition from this to the realism of the conductor's own "American Panorama" afforded a sharp contrast. When it was written he had not visited America. But he had evidently received some pretty good impressions at second-hand. Doubtless he had heard of Gershwin and his ilk. To be sure, there was a good deal of noise and the expanded percussion section was kept busy. Saxophones and an Hawaiian guitar are rarities in the rarefied atmosphere of Symphony Hall. But, strident as the composition was at times, it did not depend wholly on noise and dissonances for its effect, but had its melodious and even restful momoments. Moreover, since we have had the locomotive of Pacific 231 and the clangor of a Soviet Iron Foundry in the course of our Symphony Hall experiences, the conductor had some precedent for the inclusion of his own effort at imaginative realism, if it is right to combine those terms. At the two pianos were J. M. Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler. The latter might well consider the "American Panorama" for the Pops. At those informal entertainments there would be no question whatever as to its fitness.

S. R. F.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
JAN 22 1938

Trio of Artists For Musicale

Mrs. Herbert Mann, music chairman of the Quincy Women's Club, has secured a trio of young artists of extraordinary talents for the annual musicale Tuesday. The group includes, Esther May Barrett, soprano; Eva Stark, violinist, and Donald Currier, pianist. Mrs. Harold Blake Wood, state chairman of music will be guest of honor at the meeting at 2 o'clock at the clubhouse.

Miss Barrett has been singing publicly since she was five, the songs her mother taught her in their old Virginia homestead. When she made her recital debut in New York, Olin Downes, famous critic described her voice as one of "fresh and lovely quality." She made her operatic debut as Marguerite in "Faust" and demonstrated that she has marked histrionic ability as well as vocal skill. Called the "poetic songstress" Miss Barrett believes appropriate delivery of the message of a song to be more important than mere vocal display. She thus combines technical perfection, sound interpretation and glowing beauty.

Miss Stark studied violin under Nicolas Kassman of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, and was afterwards associated with the Gordon Musical Foundation and Emanuel Zetlin of New York. At 15 she made her debut, later gave recitals at Jordan Hall and made guest appearances with many New England concert organizations. She also gave recitals in New York and Philadelphia. Last June she returned to Boston to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra as guest soloist. She possesses a fine technical equipment, a beautiful tone and a "noble" style.

Donald Currier, pianist, was awarded the Wollaston Glee Club scholarship in 1932. He appeared as soloist at a Pop concert in Symphony Hall this past season under the direction of Arthur Fiedler and this winter played with the State Symphony Orchestra.

Lowell Morning "Courier-Citizen" + Eve'g "Leader"

Used in both our morning and evening editions S.R.Fleet

SECOND SECTION

Amfitheatrof Graceful in Conducting His Orchestra

Reports had come in that Daniele Amfitheatrof, who has been serving as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was inclined to be Amfitheatrical, so to speak, given to rather extravagant gestures. Seeing him in action at the Tuesday afternoon "commuters'" concert, this deponent did not get that impression, although the visitor was not so stately and dignified as Dr. Koussevitzky. His movements were graceful, on the whole, the hands seeming to be particularly eloquent in the quieter moods of the music.

A Russian by birth and an Italian by naturalization, he had acquired enough of the spirit of his adopted country to give a sparkling interpretation of Rossini's Overture to Semiramide, lighter music than is often presented at these concerts, but a fine composition of its kind. And especially so in the hands of such a competent orchestra.

It preceded the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven. Since the two composers had met and were appreciative of each other's talents, the juxtaposition may not have been inappropriate. Perhaps, the conductor's way with the great symphony was not altogether orthodox in the matter of tempi and emphasis. But it made its effect. And in the rapid movements the orchestra played with more than ordinary verve and spirit.

The conductor's arrangement of a suite for strings from Boccherini's quintets was grateful music in the mood of that day.

The transition from this to the realism of the conductor's own "American Panorama" afforded a sharp contrast. When it was written he had not visited America. But he had evidently received some pretty good impressions at second-hand. Doubtless he had heard of Gershwin and his ilk. To be sure, there was a good deal of noise and the expanded percussion section was kept busy. Saxophones and an Hawaiian guitar are rarities in the rarefied atmosphere of Symphony Hall. But, strident as the composition was at times, it did not depend wholly on noise and dissonances for its effect, but had its melodious and even restful moments. Moreover, since we have had the locomotive of Pacific 231 and the clangor of a Soviet Iron Foundry in the course of our Symphony Hall experiences, the conductor had some precedent for the inclusion of his own effort at imaginative realism, if it is right to combine those terms. At the two pianos were J. M. Sanroma and Arthur Fiedler. The latter might well consider the "American Panorama" for the Pops. At those informal entertainments there would be no question whatever as to its fitness.

S. R. F.

JANUARY 22, 1938 —New England News—

Monitor

Amfitheatrof Says Fa

The Arts in Boston

For the final program of his fortnight of guest conductorship with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Daniele Amfitheatrof chose Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3, Pizzetti's "Concerto dell' Estate," and Scriabin's "Divin Poème."

It was a much subdued conductor who guided his forces through these works yesterday afternoon. Extravagances of posture and gesture were gone, giving way to dignity of bearing and a simpler method of conveying directions. Mr. Amfitheatrof has quickly learned that violent motions are not essential to obtaining results from the Boston orchestra.

The results he did obtain were somewhat uneven. The overture was curiously unexciting for such dramatic music. Again the contrasts were of the black-and-white order, rhythms were inelastic, subtleties of detail were lacking. Mr. Amfitheatrof could not obtain the tone quality or the expression of which the orchestra is capable. Nor even, at all times, the accuracy; there was one very ragged spot. Either the sweeping view of the work as a whole was wanting in his imagination, or he could not bring it out.

The "Divin Poème" was more to Mr. Amfitheatrof's taste, or more within his range. He has Russian blood, and his talent lends itself to music that calls for a broad sweep of the brush, vivid colors and not too much delicacy of touch. His performance of this score was very good, though it was not thrilling and did not light up all the details of the work or reveal its proportions clearly. The reading tended to literalness.

In view of the shortcomings in the interpretation of these familiar scores, it is difficult to speak of the Pizzetti Concerto, which was played yesterday for the first time at these concerts; we cannot be sure that we heard it to the best advantage. Although Pizzetti is a veteran (born 1880) he has never been represented on the programs of the Boston orchestra before. This is not so surprising as it seems at first, for he has devoted himself mostly to the lyric theater and has composed relatively little orchestral music.

This concerto seems more ingratiating, though we cannot join Mr. Casella in rejoicing over its supposed indication that Pizzetti has at last been won over to "pure" music. On the contrary, the concerto is essentially dramatic in style and leaves the impression that the composer must have had in mind a more definite "program" than is recorded in the designations of "Mattutino," "Notturno," and "Gagliarda e Finale." There is a pleasing lyricism in the second section and there are impressive measures at the close. There are other passages, especially in the first movement, that struck us on a first hearing as empty. The work was received with cordiality.

L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Toscanini Conducts His Fourth Broadcast With the NBC Orchestra

Fourth radio concert by the NBC Symphony Orchestra, Arturo Toscanini conductor, broadcast from the R. C. A. Building, Radio City.

Program

1. "Tragic" Overture, Opus 81.... Brahms
2. Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 43 Sibelius
3. Rondo "Arlecchinesco" ....Busoni
4. "The Carnival of Venice"....Tommasini (Thirteen variations a la Paganini, with Introduction and Finale.)

Arturo Toscanini

Conducting his fourth broadcast

MR. TOSCANINI'S Saturday program did not concern itself with such great matters as did those of his preceding three concerts. It is not well to look too steadily into the eye of the sun; and perhaps the great enchanter felt that it would be well for his listeners to drop their gaze for a while from the blazing sky and the high mountains to the hills below, which have their own interest and fascination even for those who know what awaits them when they raise their eyes.

So, after three Saturday evenings of such experiences as the Mozart G minor, the Brahms First, the Schubert C major, the transcribed Lento assai from the F major quartet, "Death and Transfiguration," the "Pastoral," and "La Mer," Mr. Toscanini may have fancied that some of his more susceptible listeners, with memories of Schubert's blinding glories in mind, recalled that cry which a great Elizabethan put into the mouth of one who looked for too many moments upon a beauty that was past—

> "Cover her face; mine eyes > dazzle; she died young."

* * *

Instead, therefore, of such music as the Schubert C major and the "Pastoral" and "La Mer", we had the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms, the Sibelius No. 2, Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," and Tommasini's "Carnival of Venice."

The outstanding item in this program was, of course, the heroic Second Symphony of Sibelius, music of amazing originality and power. Naturally, it dwarfed the music that companioned it, noble as some of that was—in the case of the Tragic Overture—and brilliant as were the others in their several ways. The evening reached its apex in Toscanini's stupendous performance of the huge Sibelius score. So that the program was not quite so relaxing as it may have looked on paper.

Toscanini had not previously conducted anywhere the Second Symphony of Sibelius. This is superb music, and it was deeply stirring to hear it played as Mr. Toscanini played it, with full value given to every moment of its propulsive life, with even the rests filled with expressive continuity.

* * *

This symphony has been the bane of those who would "interpret" it in words. When the eminent Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, an intimate friend of Sibelius, was in Boston as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in March, 1924, he made the statement that Sibelius in this symphony intended to depict in the first movement "the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns undisturbed by thought of oppression." The second movement, he said, is charged with patriotic feeling, "but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul." The third, in the nature of a scherzo, "portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire of the Finns to organize in defense of their rights"; while in the finale, "hope enters their breasts, and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer."

Busoni, who also had been a friend of the composer's, thought quite differently. "Sibelius," he wrote in his Von der Einheit der Musik, "may be thought of as the Finnish Schubert [hardly the most felicitous of comparisons!] The folk-ways of his country flow directly from his heart to his pen. The Second Symphony consists of a Spring-like first movement concealing many unopened buds, a slow movement unfolding the full maturity of late summer, and a scherzo which merges into the finale, where at last the Finnish earth breaks into its own song."

* * *

But alas for verbal "interpretations"! Sibelius himself does not seem to have known anything about these things. If the Scherzo of the Second Symphony portrays, as Mr. Schneevoigt says it does, "the desire of the Finns to organize in defense of their rights;" if the first movement conceals, as the more lyrical Busoni declared, "many unopened buds," this knowledge appears to have been withheld from Sibelius. For in an interview which he gave at London a few years ago he declared brusquely: "My symphonies are music conceived and worked out in terms of music and without any literary basis."

* * *

That is the worst of ascribing "programs" to music, even if first-rate musicians like Busoni contrive them; or even if they proceed from the composer himself. "Music," said Whitman, "is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments."

What awakes in the unmusical when they are reminded by the instruments is generally a picture of some sort. What awakes in musicians of sensitive responsiveness is something that is continuous with the music itself, woven of its own substance, something that fulfills and completes, something with which words can have no commerce save by analogy and image. For what awakes in the musician when he is reminded by the instruments are certain spiritual and imaginative overtones whose identity depends upon the subtlest and most complex interaction between the music and his own brain and nerves. The more sensitive the interchange, the less communicable the result—except in terms of the music's own language.

* * *

What marks the excelling interpreters, those who speak as the composers' deputies, what sets them permanently apart, is, I believe, merely this: that they give us, in their conveyance of great art (a symphony, a song, a character in opera), not some approximation, but what we recognize with absolute certainty as the inner identity of the creator's thought. This, we say, is not a singer telling us what Schubert thought of Death in one of its eternal aspects: this is the awe and mystery and gentleness of Death itself as Schubert felt it. Or, as we realized Saturday with Toscanini, this was not some one describing Sibelius's symphony; this was the other voice of the creator, speaking, with him, of valor and enormous struggle and unconquerable strength and the glory and release of victory.

* * *

The result was completely overmastering. In all the years that Toscanini has been among us, achieving triumph after triumph of the loftiest eloquence, I cannot remember that he has ever surpassed the exhibition of sustained intensity and cumulative power with which he and his co-operative orchestra evolved that long crescendo of exaltation which Sibelius has spread over an entire symphony. This score has been played repeatedly in New York, but we heard it for the first time on Saturday.

It was another Toscanini miracle.

CALUMET, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 19 1938

Additional Hancock

PLAN BANQUET FOR HELSINKI CHORUS

Will Be Held at Hotel Scott Tuesday Following Concert

Sheriff John G. Salmi, chairman of the Copper Country committee sponsoring the Helsinski Chorus concert to be given in the Kerredge theatre the night of Tuesday, January 25, announces that Martti Turunen, conductor of the chorus, and the personnel of 60 male voices, will be the guests of the committee at a banquet to be held in their honor at the Hotel Scott following the concert. The banquet is open to the public.

The Helsinski Chorus, following an European tour, is making its first appearance in America, where it is performing in the leading cities of the nation. The first appearance was in Boston on New Year's eve with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Thursday, January 6, the chorus, again accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared in Carnegie Hall, New York.

Of this chorus Eugene Van Cleef, professor of Ohio State University, says:

"The tour of the Y. L. Chorus from the University of Helsinki will help to arouse American interest in the cultural life of Finland. The general public has learned something about the nation's athletic activities through the medium of Finnish achievements at the Olympics. They have learned a litle about your orchestral music through the remarkable contributions of Sibelius. Magazine articles have described the landscapes and touched to some extent upon the political organization. Little, however, has been known about the choral work and still less concerning the educational qualities of Finland.

"This chorus will not only enlighten our people with respect to the musical abilities of the Finns in this particular field, but coming to us as representatives of the university and of higher learning in Finland, they will no doubt arouse American interest in this direction, much to the advantage of Finnish educational circles. We shall be impressed not only by the fact that Finns pay their debts, but by the high standards of scholarship fostered by them and by the fact that the high order of intelligence of the people is no recent development; that it has been in existence for a long time."

A New York Sun Comment

Regarding a concert in New York in which the Helsinki Chorus appeared with the Boston Symphony, Oscar Thompson of the New York Sun writes:

Soon to give their own concert in Carnegie Hall under their own conductor, Martti Turunen, the Helsinki University Chorus made its first appearance in New York on this occasion with the Boston Symphony, thereby enabling Serge Koussevitzky to perform for the first time here "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra which Sibelius composed some thirty-odd years ago. Also announced as a "first time," though mistakenly so, was "The Origin of Fire," in which the chorus again participated, with Helge Virkunen singing the part for solo baritone.

Besides the two choral compositions, Mr. Koussevitzky's program included "Pohjola's Daughter," so that the entire second part of the concert was given over to an exposition of scores by the Finnish master. Before the intermission came Bach and Brahms, the one speaking in the hearty and virile voice of the G major Brandenburg concerto, the other in the Jovian accents of his third symphony. The cumulative effect of the program was unmistakably that of momentous music, and in this the university singers from Helsinki played a substantial part.

"Pohjola's Daughter" is not a work to challenge the Sibelius symphonies in the import of its ideas, but the beauty of its scoring makes an effect when such skill and affection are lavished upon it as was true in this instance. The two choral works, which came into being when the upsurgence of Finnish national feeling exerted its strongest influence on Sibelius, are of sturdier fiber, but more conventional in style. Though the choral writing gives to "The Captive Queen" its heroic basic character, the orchestration proffers many felicities to catch the ear. The flute has enchanting figurations; there is some fine singing by the cellos. In this work and in "The Origon of Fire," which builds up something of drama as the flame of the Finnish gods goes hurtling through the "six spangled vaults of heaven," the collaboration of the orchestra and chorus was of the most conspicuous unity and balance.

The Helsinki singers, relying, of course, on their native tongue, produced a body of tone at once solid and sonorous, with attacks that were razor-edged and vital with the exuberance of youth. The mass quality was rich, if on the thickish side, and unmistakably North Europe in its suggestion. These young men plainly had been diligently prepared, and so far as the opportunity permitted, they justified the good words said of them in advance of their coming. As an organization they really should be addressed as Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat. They don't mind being called just Y. L. A half-century of activity, carried on with an annual tournover in the student personnel, lay behind last night's admirable singing. Besides shaking hands with individual members of the choir, Dr. Koussevitzky summoned Mr. Turunen from the wings to share the bows. Applause was plentiful also for the baritone soloist, whose part in "The Origin of Fire" was ably sung.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN

Giving Concert Wednesday

Mrs. Hubbard M. Loudon, chairman of Worcester Woman's Club music department, will present Jean Bedetti, Clara Shear and Leo Litwin in a concert Wednesday at 2.45 p. m.

Mr. Bedetti won first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and toured Europe prior to coming to this country where he has been solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1919. Miss Shear, soprano, has sung with the San Carlo Opera Company and the Chicago Civic Opera Company. Mr. Litwin is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music and is well known both as a concert pianist and accompanist.

SCRIABIN'S "POEM" BY SYMPHONY

B. Post — Jan. 28/38

Conductor Amfitheatrof Gives Brilliant Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday, for a second time, Daniele Amfitheatrof conducted a Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to a generally more fortunate outcome than before. The programme, more consistently interesting than that of last week, consisted of Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Pizzetti's "Summer" Concerto and Scriabin's "The Divine Poem."

PIZZETTI'S CONCERTO

The Concerto of Pizzetti had previously been played here by the Conservatory Orchestra. Not a work of great consequence, it nevertheless deserved a hearing at Symphony Hall, where none of its composer's orchestral music had ever been played. A member of the coterie which once included Casella, Malipiero and Respighi, Pizzetti may be described as less brilliant and cosmopolitan than the first, less radical and personal than the second, less facile and flamboyant than the third. An agreeable, reasonably fastidious and wholly competent composer, he lacks strong, individuality, unless his operatic music, unknown in this city, may disclose it.

The recipe for the Concerto, heard with evident delight on the part of yesterday's audience, may be given as follows: take equal parts of Corelli and Puccini, add a dash each of Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Mascagni, stir well and serve warm.

Scriabin's "Divine Poems"

Such music suited well the energetic, enthusiastic temperament of Mr. Amfitheatrof, who had already brought to pass an effective, if not always carefully composed performance of Beethoven's Overture. He was no less at home in the music of Scriabin. Played here twice, in 1924 and 1925, the "Divine Poem" merited a return to the active repertory of the orchestra. It is not as fine or as personal a work as its successors, "The Poem of Ecstacy," and "Prometheus," but it is still the composer's own from top to bottom. The reliance upon Wagner is no more than the early Wagner's dependence upon Weber or the early Beethoven's upon Mozart.

For what it contains, the "Divine Poem," actually a Symphony in three movements, is a trifle too long. Here, as elsewhere, Scriabin seems to be harping over much on one string. We are too steadily conscious of the initial challenging motive, so imperiously proclaimed by the brass, and in particular of the Scriabinish chord, a sort of precursor of the "mystic chord," which underlies it.

Conductor in Better Form

To offset this sameness of effect, there is the music's passion and propulsion, its harmonic and orchestral richness, its ear-filling sonorities. There was something for every member of the orchestra to do, and Mr. Amfitheatrof plainly rejoiced in having so magnificent an instrument at his disposal. The performance of the music of Pizzetti and Scriabin alike stirred the audience to hearty applause. Mr. Amfitheatrof has evidently learned that in Boston, at least, excess of bodily movement on the part of a conductor is not particularly appreciated. His conducting yesterday was free from such eccentricity, and the results attained, as was said above, were on the whole far more satisfactory.

Globe — MUSIC Jan. 22/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Daniele Amfitheatrof was not unmindful of novelty in choosing the program for his final appearances, yesterday afternoon and this evening, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Though he proffered nothing new, he did bring to first performance by the Boston Symphony the "Summer Concerto" of the contemporary Italian, Ildebrando Pizzetti, and he revived "The Divine Poem" of Scriabin after a local silence of 13 years.

In a week's time, Mr. Amfitheatrof has happily modified the gestures to which some exception was taken at his initial concert here. This, coupled with the fact that repeated hearings are the only reasonable basis for a considered opinion of a man's work, make for a more reliable record of his ability than was possible seven days ago.

Mr. Amfitheatrof has a positive talent for conducting that was exhibited to best advantage yesterday in the Pizzetti and Scriabin. His personality is assertive, his inclination obviously is toward dynamic interpretations. Natural and commendable this is, especially in a man under 40. Conductors have their own long gradus ad Parnassum; they are not developed rapidly any more than the Rome where Mr. Amfitheatrof lives was built in the proverbial day.

Serious and conscientious musicianship was implicit last week in the general character of his reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—notably his correct tempi. His shortcomings lie in too robust a scale of dynamic shadings, and orchestral tone lacking in balance. He is apparently more concerned at present—as others before him have been—with broad effects and emotional intensity than with the subtle adjustment of detail which distinguishes the first-rank orchestral leader. Testimony to this end was observable in technical infelicities in his performance of the "Leonore" Overture, a work demanding to uncommon extent both clarity and fine detail.

With Pizzetti's idyllic music, and the grandiose "Divine Poem," both conceived in a lavish orchestral style, Mr. Amfitheatrof was very successful. Not only did he make the most of gorgeous instrumental textures, but what is more remarkable, he brought out the spirit of the modern Pizzetti and the transcendentalist that was Scriabin. The two points of view are quite opposed, and if a conductor can assimilate both he is indubitably a man of parts.

Pizzetti's music is a wealth of melody, warm and sensuous, repetitious to be sure, but possessing distinction and charm in a light-footed manner. Many in yesterday's audience probably found it new, since record of but one previous Boston performance has been vouchsafed—that by Wallace Goodrich and the New England Conservatory Orchestra in 1932.

Scriabin's music and his esthetic attitude—for the two are indissolubly linked—presents a problem to many of us who have somehow survived to this year of grace. He had glorious visions of music as an agent of ethical salvation. What has happened in the last 25 years has done much to sweep away such visions to the last pathetic vestige. Scriabin's powers to express his attitude are another matter, and ultimately must be regarded from one's own taste. He mastered the great modern orchestra, and he achieved original harmonic effects. On the other hand, his structure is weakened by his device of building a composition about a governing, symbolic theme repeated nearly to point of surfeit. Yet no matter how logical may be the argument against Scriabin as a great composer, one comes up against the incontrovertible fact that he did create music of extraordinary emotional power.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will dedicate the Boston Symphony concerts to the memory of Maurice Ravel, the French composer who died last month. There will be a different program, exceptionally, at each of the two concerts. C. W.D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 17 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Toscanini Conducts His Fourth Broadcast With the NBC Orchestra

Fourth radio concert by the NBC Symphony Orchestra, Arturo Toscanini conductor, broadcast from the R. C. A. Building, Radio City.

Program

1. "Tragic" Overture, Opus 81.... Brahms
2. Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 43 Sibelius
3. Rondo "Arlecchinesco" .... Busoni
4. "The Carnival of Venice"....Tommasini (Thirteen variations a la Paganini, with Introduction and Finale.)

MR. TOSCANINI'S Saturday program did not concern itself with such great matters as did those of his preceding three concerts. It is not well to look too steadily into the eye of the sun; and perhaps the great enchanter felt that it would be well for his listeners to drop their gaze for a while from the blazing sky and the high mountains to the hills below, which have their own interest and fascination even for those who know what awaits them when they raise their eyes.

So, after three Saturday evenings of such experiences as the Mozart G minor, the Brahms First, the Schubert C major, the transcribed Lento assai from the F major quartet, "Death and Transfiguration," the "Pastoral," and "La Mer," Mr. Toscanini may have fancied that some of his more susceptible listeners, with memories of Schubert's blinding glories in mind, recalled that cry which a great Elizabethan put into the mouth of one who looked for too many moments upon a beauty that was past—

> "Cover her face; mine eyes
> dazzle; she died young."

* * *

Instead, therefore, of such music as the Schubert C major and the "Pastoral" and "La Mer", we had the "Tragic" Overture of Brahms, the Sibelius No. 2, Busoni's "Rondo Arlecchinesco," and Tommasini's "Carnival of Venice."

The outstanding item in this program was, of course, the ~~heroic~~ Second Symphony of Sibelius, music of amazing originality and power. Naturally, it dwarfed the music that companioned it, noble as some of that was—in the case of the Tragic Overture—and brilliant as were the others in their several ways. The evening reached its apex in Toscanini's stupendous performance of the huge Sibelius score. So that the program was not quite so relaxing as it may have looked on paper.

Toscanini had not previously conducted anywhere the Second Symphony of Sibelius. This is superb music, and it was deeply stirring to hear it played as Mr. Toscanini played it, with full value given to every moment of its propulsive life, with even the rests filled with expressive continuity.

* * *

This symphony has been the bane of those who would "interpret" it in words. When the eminent Finnish conductor, Georg Schneevoigt, an intimate friend of Sibelius, was in Boston as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in March, 1924, he made the statement that Sibelius in this symphony intended to depict in the first movement "the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns undisturbed by thought of oppression." The second movement, he said, is charged with patriotic feeling, "but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul." The third, in the nature of a scherzo, "portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire of the Finns to organize in defense of their rights"; while in the finale, "hope enters their breasts, and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer."

Busoni, who also had been a friend of the composer's, thought quite differently. "Sibelius," he wrote in his Von der Einheit der Musik, "may be thought of as the Finnish Schubert [hardly the most felicitous of comparisons!] The folk-ways of his country flow directly from his heart to his pen. The Second Symphony consists of a Spring-like first movement concealing many unopened buds, a slow movement unfolding the full maturity of late summer, and a scherzo which merges into the finale, where at last the Finnish earth breaks into its own song."

* * *

But alas for verbal "interpretations"! Sibelius himself does not seem to have known anything about these things. If the Scherzo of the Second Symphony portrays, as Mr. Schneevoigt says it does, "the desire of the Finns to organize in defense of their rights;" if the first movement conceals, as the more lyrical Busoni declared, "many unopened buds," this knowledge appears to have been withheld from Sibelius. For in an interview which he gave at London a few years ago he declared brusquely: "My symphonies are music conceived and worked out in terms of music and without any literary basis."

Arturo Toscanini

Conducting his fourth broadcast

That is the worst of ascribing "programs" to music, even if first-rate musicians like Busoni contrive them; or even if they proceed from the composer himself. "Music," said Whitman, "is what awakes in you when you are reminded by the instruments."

What awakes in the unmusical when they are reminded by the instruments is generally a picture of some sort. What awakes in musicians of sensitive responsiveness is something that is continuous with the music itself, woven of its own substance, something that fulfills and completes, something with which words can have no commerce save by analogy and image. For what awakes in the musician when he is reminded by the instruments are certain spiritual and imaginative overtones whose identity depends upon the subtlest and most complex interaction between the music and his own brain and nerves. The more sensitive the interchange, the less communicable the result—except in terms of the music's own language.

* * *

What marks the excelling interpreters, those who speak as the composers' deputies, what sets them permanently apart, is, I believe, merely this: that they give us, in their conveyance of great art (a symphony, a song, a character in opera), not some approximation, but what we recognize with absolute certainty as the inner identity of the creator's thought. This, we say, is not a singer telling us what Schubert thought of Death in one of its eternal aspects: this is the awe and mystery and gentleness of Death itself as Schubert felt it. Or, as we realized Saturday with Toscanini, this was not some one describing Sibelius's symphony; this was the other voice of the creator, speaking, with him, of valor and enormous struggle and unconquerable strength and the glory and release of victory.

* * *

The result was completely overmastering. In all the years that Toscanini has been among us, achieving triumph after triumph of the loftiest eloquence, I cannot remember that he has ever surpassed the exhibition of sustained intensity and cumulative power with which he and his co-operative orchestra evolved that long crescendo of exaltation which Sibelius has spread over an entire symphony. This score has been played repeatedly in New York, but we heard it for the first time on Saturday.

It was another Toscanini miracle.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

JAN 22 193

Giving Concert Wednesday

Mrs. Hubbard M. Loudon, chairman of Worcester Woman's Club music department, will present Jean Bedetti, Clara Shear and Leo Litwin in a concert Wednesday at 2.45 p. m.

Mr. Bedetti won first prize at the Paris Conservatoire and toured Europe prior to coming to this country where he has been solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1919. Miss Shear, soprano, has sung with the San Carlo Opera Company and the Chicago Civic Opera Company. Mr. Litwin is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music and is well known both as a concert pianist and accompanist.

CALUMET, MICH.
NEWS

JAN 19 1938

Additional Hancock

PLAN BANQUET FOR HELSINKI CHORUS

Will Be Held at Hotel Scott Tuesday Following Concert

Sheriff John G. Salmi, chairman of the Copper Country committee sponsoring the Helsinski Chorus concert to be given in the Kerredge theatre the night of Tuesday, January 25, announces that Martti Turunen, conductor of the chorus, and the personnel of 60 male voices, will be the guests of the committee at a banquet to be held in their honor at the Hotel Scott following the concert. The banquet is open to the public.

The Helsinski Chorus, following an European tour, is making its first appearance in America, where it is performing in the leading cities of the nation. The first appearance was in Boston on New Year's eve with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On Thursday, January 6, the chorus, again accompanied by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, appeared in Carnegie Hall, New York.

Of this chorus Eugene Van Cleef, professor of Ohio State University, says:

"The tour of the Y. L. Chorus from the University of Helsinki will help to arouse American interest in the cultural life of Finland. The general public has learned something about the nation's athletic activities through the medium of Finnish achievements at the Olympics. They have learned a litle about your orchestral music through the remarkable contributions of Sibelius. Magazine articles have described the landscapes and touched to some extent upon the political organization. Little, however, has been known about the choral work and still less concerning the educational qualities of Finland.

"This chorus will not only enlighten our people with respect to the musical abilities of the Finns in this particular field, but coming to us as representatives of the university and of higher learning in Finland, they will no doubt arouse American interest in this direction, much to the advantage of Finnish educational circles. We shall be impressed not only by the fact that Finns pay their debts, but by the high standards of scholarship fostered by them and by the fact that the high order of intelligence of the people is no recent development; that it has been in existence for a long time."

A New York Sun Comment

Regarding a concert in New York in which the Helsinki Chorus appeared with the Boston Symphony, Oscar Thompson of the New York Sun writes:

Soon to give their own concert in Carnegie Hall under their own conductor, Martti Turunen, the Helsinki University Chorus made its first appearance in New York on this occasion with the Boston Symphony, thereby enabling Serge Koussevitzky to perform for the first time here "The Captive Queen," a ballad for chorus and orchestra which Sibelius composed some thirty-odd years ago. Also announced as a "first time," though mistakenly so, was "The Origin of Fire," in which the chorus again participated, with Helge Virkunen singing the part for solo baritone.

Besides the two choral compositions, Mr. Koussevitzky's program included "Pohjola's Daughter," so that the entire second part of the concert was given over to an exposition of scores by the Finnish master. Before the intermission came Bach and Brahms, the one speaking in the hearty and virile voice of the G major Brandenburg concerto, the other in the Jovian accents of his third symphony. The cumulative effect of the program was unmistakably that of momentous music, and in this the university singers from Helsinki played a substantial part.

"Pohjola's Daughter" is not a work to challenge the Sibelius symphonies in the import of its ideas, but the beauty of its scoring makes an effect when such skill and affection are lavished upon it as was true in this instance. The two choral works, which came into being when the upsurgence of Finnish national feeling exerted its strongest influence on Sibelius, are of sturdier fiber, but more conventional in style. Though the choral writing gives to "The Captive Queen" its heroic basic character, the orchestration proffers many felicities to catch the ear. The flute has enchanting figurations; there is some fine singing by the cellos. In this work and in "The Origon of Fire," which builds up something of drama as the flame of the Finnish gods goes hurtling through the "six spangled vaults of heaven," the collaboration of the orchestra and chorus was of the most conspicuous unity and balance.

The Helsinki singers, relying, of course, on their native tongue, produced a body of tone at once solid and sonorous, with attacks that were razor-edged and vital with the exuberance of youth. The mass quality was rich, if on the thickish side, and unmistakably North Europe in its suggestion. These young men plainly had been diligently prepared, and so far as the opportunity permitted, they justified the good words said of them in advance of their coming. As an organization they really should be addressed as Ylioppilaskunnan Laulajat. They don't mind being called just Y. L. A half-century of activity, carried on with an annual tournover in the student personnel, lay behind last night's admirable singing. Besides shaking hands with individual members of the choir, Dr. Koussevitzky summoned Mr. Turunen from the wings to share the bows. Applause was plentiful also for the baritone soloist, whose part in "The Origin of Fire" was ably sung.

SCRIABIN'S "POEM" BY SYMPHONY

B. Post — Jan. 22/38

Conductor Amfitheatrof Gives Brilliant Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday, for a second time, Daniele Amfitheatrof conducted a Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to a generally more fortunate outcome than before. The programme, more consistently interesting than that of last week, consisted of Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Pizzetti's "Summer" Concerto and Scriabin's "The Divine Poem."

PIZZETTI'S CONCERTO

The Concerto of Pizzetti had previously been played here by the Conservatory Orchestra. Not a work of great consequence, it nevertheless deserved a hearing at Symphony Hall, where none of its composer's orchestral music had ever been played. A member of the coterie which once included Casella, Malipiero and Respighi, Pizzetti may be described as less brilliant and cosmopolitan than the first, less radical and personal than the second, less facile and flamboyant than the third. An agreeable, reasonably fastidious and wholly competent composer, he lacks strong, individuality, unless his operatic music, unknown in this city, may disclose it.

The recipe for the Concerto, heard with evident delight on the part of yesterday's audience, may be given as follows: take equal parts of Corelli and Puccini, add a dash each of Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Mascagni, stir well and serve warm.

Scriabin's "Divine Poems"

Such music suited well the energetic, enthusiastic temperament of Mr. Amfitheatrof, who had already brought to pass an effective, if not always carefully composed performance of Beethoven's Overture. He was no less at home in the music of Scriabin. Played here twice, in 1924 and 1925, the "Divine Poem" merited a return to the active repertory of the orchestra. It is not as fine or as personal a work as its successors, "The Poem of Ecstacy," and "Prometheus," but it is still the composer's own from top to bottom. The reliance upon Wagner is no more than the early Wagner's dependence upon Weber or the early Beethoven's upon Mozart.

For what it contains, the "Divine Poem," actually a Symphony in three movements, is a trifle too long. Here, as elsewhere, Scriabin seems to be harping over much on one string. We are too steadily conscious of the initial challenging motive, so imperiously proclaimed by the brass, and in particular of the Scriabinish chord, a sort of precursor of the "mystic chord," which underlies it.

Conductor in Better Form

To offset this sameness of effect, there is the music's passion and propulsion, its harmonic and orchestral richness, its ear-filling sonorities. There was something for every member of the orchestra to do, and Mr. Amfitheatrof plainly rejoiced in having so magnificent an instrument at his disposal. The performance of the music of Pizzetti and Scriabin alike stirred the audience to hearty applause. Mr. Amfitheatrof has evidently learned that in Boston, at least, excess of bodily movement on the part of a conductor is not particularly appreciated. His conducting yesterday was free from such eccentricity, and the results attained, as was said above, were on the whole far more satisfactory.

Globe — Jan. 22/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Daniele Amfitheatrof was not unmindful of novelty in choosing the program for his final appearances, yesterday afternoon and this evening, as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Though he proffered nothing new, he did bring to first performance by the Boston Symphony the "Summer Concerto" of the contemporary Italian, Ildebrando Pizzetti, and he revived "The Divine Poem" of Scriabin after a local silence of 13 years.

In a week's time, Mr. Amfitheatrof has happily modified the gestures to which some exception was taken at his initial concert here. This, coupled with the fact that repeated hearings are the only reasonable basis for a considered opinion of a man's work, make for a more reliable record of his ability than was possible seven days ago.

Mr. Amfitheatrof has a positive talent for conducting that was exhibited to best advantage yesterday in the Pizzetti and Scriabin. His personality is assertive, his inclination obviously is toward dynamic interpretations. Natural and commendable this is, especially in a man under 40. Conductors have their own long gradus ad Parnassum; they are not developed rapidly any more than the Rome where Mr. Amfitheatrof lives was built in the proverbial day.

Serious and conscientious musicianship was implicit last week in the general character of his reading of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony—notably his correct tempi. His shortcomings lie in too robust a scale of dynamic shadings, and orchestral tone lacking in balance. He is apparently more concerned at present—as others before him have been—with broad effects and emotional intensity than with the subtle adjustment of detail which distinguishes the first-rank orchestral leader. Testimony to this end was observable in technical infelicities in his performance of the "Leonore" Overture, a work demanding to uncommon extent both clarity and fine detail.

With Pizzetti's idyllic music, and the grandiose "Divine Poem," both conceived in a lavish orchestral style, Mr. Amfitheatrof was very successful. Not only did he make the most of gorgeous instrumental textures, but what is more remarkable, he brought out the spirit of the modern Pizzetti and the transcendentalist that was Scriabin. The two points of view are quite opposed, and if a conductor can assimilate both he is indubitably a man of parts.

Pizzetti's music is a wealth of melody, warm and sensuous, repetitious to be sure, but possessing distinction and charm in a light-footed manner. Many in yesterday's audience probably found it new, since record of but one previous Boston performance has been vouchsafed—that by Wallace Goodrich and the New England Conservatory Orchestra in 1932.

Scriabin's music and his esthetic attitude—for the two are indissolubly linked—presents a problem to many of us who have somehow survived to this year of grace. He had glorious visions of music as an agent of ethical salvation. What has happened in the last 25 years has done much to sweep away such visions to the last pathetic vestige. Scriabin's powers to express his attitude are another matter, and ultimately must be regarded from one's own taste. He mastered the great modern orchestra, and he achieved original harmonic effects. On the other hand, his structure is weakened by his device of building a composition about a governing, symbolic theme repeated nearly to point of surfeit. Yet no matter how logical may be the argument against Scriabin as a great composer, one comes up against the incontrovertible fact that he did create music of extraordinary emotional power.

Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will dedicate the Boston Symphony concerts to the memory of Maurice Ravel, the French composer who died last month. There will be a different program, exceptionally, at each of the two concerts. C. W.D.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM
JAN 22 1938

Something Happening In Music

Musicians of the great world and the common garden variety of people are aware that something of tremendous importance has happened in the world of music. Millions of people are listening to the mighty symphonic compositions of the masters. They do not have to pay high prices for seats or get out into the cold of a winter's night for a hearing of the gorgeous music of the ages played better than men have ever before played it. They sit in slippered ease, as it were, with all the accompaniments of a pleasant evening at home, either with the family or with friends.

When Damrosch started to educate the American people with his masterly interpretations he took another step in the musical education of America that is of such educational and cultural value as we cannot fully estimate. That's why we are aroused by what is happening now. The great advertising firms developed orchestras. The notable orchestras of the country headed by the Boston Symphony permitted broadcasts of their concerts. And now the whole country is talking about the Toscanini concerts from the National Broadcasting Co.'s great auditorium on Saturday nights.

With us of the East we can close the week under the stimulation of the most splendid radio concert music that has yet been presented. Toscanini, great master of music, has command of a magnificent orchestra playing from a stage that was designed for radio performance so that not one least bit of song from any instrument played is lost. Here is artistic perfection with every known fitting to give expression to this noble conductor. Dorothy Thompson says these Saturday night concerts are the greatest artistic performances that one can hear anywhere in the world today. And here they are for every one of us who can command no matter how modest a radio set.

People are talking about these Toscanini concerts. They are subjects of conversation wherever musiv lovers meet. They talk about them as if they had heard them in some close-by concert hall. Previewers are giving them glowing attention in the Metropolitan papers. Music critics are saying that the nearest thing to perfection in orchestral music has now been attained—and for fifty million people to hear if they will but listen.

Nor is the extraordinary appreciation for the Toscanini concerts, the only big news of the week in music. Swing that has for so long had the radio for its field has gone to the concert hall and they like it. Swing was born of the primitive folk. It was the rhythm of the jungle people until these natives of another world and children of another life were brought here to the United States. One hundred and fifty years and more of what America is, has been laid down upon these people. Still they hold to the music of their heritage just as birds do even when brought to a cage. So we have the picture now of the most perfect orchestral concerts of the world coming to the whole American world through the radio, and swing, the child of radio taught to the American public through the radio, ascending in to the concert hall. Something very splendid is happening in the world of music here in the United States. We can tell about it years down, when it will be accepted order of the time.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 20, 1938 B

l Musicians --- News of the Motio

B. Trans.

New Concerto From Pizzetti For Symphony

Amfitheatrof to Present "Concerto dell'estate" Friday and Saturday

Rounding out a program which also includes the third overture to Beethoven's "Leonore," and Scriabin's "Divine Poem," Daniele Amfitheatrof has chosen the "Concerto dell'estate" of Pizzetti for the novelty of his last concerts as guest leader of the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Although Pizzetti has long since taken his place among the leaders of contemporary Italian music, his work has come before American audiences more slowly than that of the great triumvirate of Casella, Respighi and Malipiero, whose names form the complete horizon of Italy's musical present to many a concert-goer.

The reason for the unfamiliarity of Pizzetti's music to Bostonian ears is not far to seek, for most of the composer's life has been devoted to the theater. Incidental songs, chamber music, and symphonic works have been conceived in the intervals between the composition of stage works, and it is a safe presumption that Pizzetti's merit lies in his operas, of which "Debora e Jaele" is generally considered his finest. It has been given in this country by the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York in 1929. If Boston has not heard the operas, it has listened to an occasional song, a violin sonata and other smaller works from time to time. It is interesting to note that the "Concerto dell'estate," though played this week for the first time "at these concerts," received its first Boston performance in Jordan Hall, Jan. 29, 1932, by the New England Conservatory Orchestra under Wallace Goodrich.

The work was completed in 1928. Mr. Amfitheatrof is convinced that the title is to be taken allegorically, and refers to the "summer" of the composer's life rather than to the feelings called to mind by the blossoming and fullness of the year. The story goes that the composer was so saddened and disenchanted by the death of his wife that much time passed without created activity. It was only after a long and painful interlude that a second marriage was able to restore his tranquility and revivify his powers. The legend goes that this work follows hard upon the refulfillment of Pizzetti's personal and artistic life, and it is not difficult to see such a confident vigor and optimism in it. The three movements, "Mattutino," "Notturno" and "Gagliarda e Finale," speak from a warm and unmistakably Italian atmosphere. The exuberance which is the main characteristic of the first and last movements gives way in the "Notturno" to that peculiar idyllic mystery of the Italian night so frequently evident in the works of the younger men among this passionate nation's composers. It reaches its most poignant intensity in the slow movements of Casella when the air becomes sultry, the moonlight spectral and brooding.

The first movement adheres generally to a complicated three-part form with much thematic material in the first part; a theme for various solo woodwind instruments that grows into a great soaring melody for the strings in the second, and a final section comprising a crescendo on the material of the opening, which reaches a brilliant climax with the twelve pealing bells of noon. The "Notturno" is in as simple and direct a form with a very important part for the solo flute. The last movement is a kind of rondo with a galliard for its main material. This ancient French dance will be remembered as the familiar antithesis to the stately gravity of the pavanne, which it customarily followed. Its measure was triple, its character gay; it has often been compared to the saltarello. An episode introduces a haunting chordwise theme reminiscent of the natural horns. Weaving an open air magic this theme returns to suffuse over the final pages a nostalgia of the classical country side.

C. H. L. S.

Jan. 22/38 MUSIC Her.

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 13th regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Daniele Amfitheatrof conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 Op. 72 ..... Beethoven
"Concerto dell' Estate" .... Pizzetti
"Le Divin Poeme," Symphony No. 3 in C minor Op. 43 .... Scriabin

Mr. Amfitheatrof's second week as guest conductor has revealed him as a very much more subdued interpreter than he appeared to be at first. His reading of the Leonore Overture was dramatic and rhythmically impulsive, and that is a proper conception of an overture. There was a passage, too, where he was careful to let us hear the bubbling of the wood-wind through the strings, which some conductors do not bother to quell at that point. The orchestra, likewise, was in capital form.

Those in yesterday's audience who were familiar with Pizzetti's Violin Sonata knew more or less what to expect from an orchestral work by this poetic Italian composer. He is not a blistering or withering modernist, nor does he follow any of the authentic schools of modern musical thought. If he is, on the other hand, a romantic, he is so with the distinction of style and the restraint that marks the work of such composers as Vincent d'Indy, Dukas or Loeffler.

The "Concerto dell' Estate" is a charming work and one that conveys more than a gentle reaction invoked by the moods of summer, the joy of its awakening, the sultry mystery of its nights and the sadness of its passing. These emotions it does arouse; but more than that we have the feeling of a man sensitive to the materials of his art, exploring the texture of sonorities and the lyric character of solo instruments. He is like a poet entranced with the beauty of language, a painter delighting in the glory of color and line.

Note, for example, his use of modal harmony in the Notturno and the finale. Yet he does not steep himself in the church modes, in the manner of some of Vaughn Williams's music, so that the ear grows tired. He blends and contrasts this type of harmony, with its ascetic suggestions, in conjunction with more sensuous sound. He draws constantly on the wood-winds for melodic expression and writes beautifully for each instrument. It is possible that the "Concerto dell' Estate" is a bit repetitious, but its sins are as nothing in this respect compared with Scriabin.

It is, in short, a poetic creation, the deliberation of a sensitive musical mind. It is lovely music to listen to, as it was presented yesterday under Mr. Amfitheatrof's sympathetic guidance. The superb wood-winds of the orchestras deserve special praise for their playing.

Scriabin's majestic tone poem, or symphony, rounded out what proved to be a well chosen and balanced program. Scriabin said so many foolish things and was at once so eccentric and pathetic a figure that many people have been prone to dismiss his music as something too hysterical to bother about. He did, of course, clutter up this score with strange directions, such as "ecroulement formidable," "divine," "grandiose" and "avec entrainement et ivresse." But, with all these posturings, Scriabin did achieve grandeur in the Divine Poem, even if he was a long time about it.

It is hard to understand why Scriabin is any more hysterical than a great deal of Richard Strauss. For ourselves, we much prefer the struggles and triumphs of this symphony to Strauss's "Heldenleben," with which it can be profitably compared. Mr. Amfitheatrof made a few perfectly justifiable cuts in the score. In addition he and the orchestra projected it with the splendor and energy that it so urgently requires.

Mr. Amfitheatrof ends his term as guest conductor at the concert tonight. He has given us two stimulating concerts. The programs next week, devoted chiefly to Ravel, are different for Friday and Saturday. Dr. Koussevitzky returns to Symphony Hall, and the soloists are Mr. Sanroma, Friday, and Mme. Averino, Saturday.

Radio to Honor Composer With Nation-Wide Festival

Providence Journal

Stations and Nets to Pay Tribute to Memory of MacDowell

Jan. 23/38

BY C. E. BUTTERFIELD
Associated Press Radio Editor

New York, Jan. 22.—(AP)—A nation-wide festival, a week's tribute to the American composer, Edward MacDowell, is to find broadcast stations all over the land concentrating upon a single aim within the next seven days. Seven European countries and Canada are to join in.

It will be the third annual MacDowell radio festival in which stations and networks provide special programs with his music as the theme.

Much of the inspiration for the festival is due to the efforts of MacDowell's widow, the former Marian Nevins, who although now 78 years of age, has devoted an important share of her time since her husband's death in 1908 to the establishment of an endowment fund for the MacDowell colony at Peterborough, N. H.

Retreat for Creative Artists

A retreat for American creative artists, the colony is a materialization of the hope of MacDowell to be a factor in fostering the ambitions of other native composers whose works give indications of merit.

The radio festival is another means to this end. It has for its aim the assurance to the serious composer of the performance of his works.

Started three years ago on Los Angeles stations at the suggestion of Mrs. Natalie Alden Putnam, president of the MacDowell Colony League for Southern California, and Edward Lynn, the festival has grown within that time to a scope that is international.

Some MacDowell Programs

Beginning Sunday and continuing through Jan. 30, numerous MacDowell programs are to be sent into the air ways. Included are these on WABC-CBS:

Sunday at 3 p. m., New York Philharmonic Symphony, Georges Enesco conducting MacDowell's symphonic poem "Lancelot and Elaine."

Tuesday at 3:30 p. m., Hollace Shaw, soprano, with concert orchestra in MacDowell compositions.

Thursday at 10 p. m., Victor Bay's essays in music, "The American India," presenting Indian themes in the works of MacDowell and other composers.

The NBC schedule, not yet complete, is to include MacDowell compositions in many of the regular programs, with plans under way also to have a broadcast by Mrs. MacDowell.

In addition, something like a hundred individual stations in various parts of the country are arranging programs, as are England, Ireland, Germany, Poland, Sweden and Norway. Two special features likewise are to be transmitted by the Canadian chain.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Musi

Boston Symphony to Give Ravel on Tuesday Night.—Burgin Sc Violin Concerto. — Fray ar Coming With Providence

A Ravel memorial concert will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, in Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday evening.

Ravel was born March 7, 1875, and died last Dec. 28. The orchestra will play "Le Tombeau de Couperin," which has four divisions, prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon; "Ma Mere l'Oye," five children's pieces first written for two pianos and later orchestrated, and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

The other work on the program will be the violin concerto in D major, opus 77, by Brahms. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor, of the orchestra, will be soloist. It had been expected that the double concerto for violin and violoncello, by Brahms, would be played but the other concerto has been chosen.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

The Harvard Club of Boston will give a dinner honoring the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night. Some 400 members of the Club will be hosts to about 100 musicians who for once will be on hand without their instruments. Certainly a grand tribute by a distinguished organization to fellow citizens and musical brethern. The speakers will be Bently Wirt Warren, Serge Koussevitzky and James Rowland Angell. Edward A. Taft will be toastmaster.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

JAN 22 1938

It is safe to say that Deems Taylor, whose interesting book on music has moved our Catchall to comment, will not be at all disturbed because a concert of swing music has been given in Carnegie Hall in New York. Nor would it bother him if a similar program were given in Symphony Hall, Boston. So far as such concerts go, there's no compulsion on attendance. This one was advertised as devoted to an exposition of swing music, definitions of which, truth to tell, are not exact and vary widely. But if there was an intent to excite curiosity, there was none to deceive. And next time the Boston Symphony orchestra plays in Carnegie Hall those who delight in the style of music it provides will have their turn. There is no reason to feel that the hall has been desecrated.

138

IN MUSICAL EVENTS HERE

Richard Burgin, first violin and assistant conductor, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert Tuesday evening.

Providence Journal — Jan. 23/38

Memorial Program for Maurice Ravel

Boston Symphony to Play Works of French Composer Tuesday.—Jane Johnston and Leroy Goodwin in Recital Thursday

A PROGRAM in memory of the late Maurice Ravel will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at its third concert of the season, Tuesday night at 8:15 o'clock in the Metropolitan Theatre. Except for Brahms's Concerto for Violin in D-major, opus 77, with Richard Burgin as soloist, all the numbers selected are by the French composer.

A lecture on the program will be given by John B. Archer this afternoon, and other events on the week's music calendar include a concert by the Rhode Island Concert Orchestra Wednesday night at Plantations Auditorium and a recital by Leroy F. Goodwin, tenor, assisted by Jane Johnston, soprano, of Boston, Thursday night in Churchill House.

Mr. Archer's lecture on the concert by the Boston Symphony is scheduled for this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library. Under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club it is free to the public. The Symphony's program follows:

Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin"....Ravel
I. Prelude
II. Forlane
III. Menuet
IV. Rigaudon
Concerto for Violin in D-major, opus 77 ....Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo
II. Adagio
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace
Richard Burgin.
"Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), Five Children's Pieces ....Ravel
I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant
II. Petit Poucet
III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes
IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete
V. Le Jardin Feerique
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet; Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite) ....Ravel
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

◈ ◈ ◈

Goodwin-Johnston Program

Leroy F. Goodwin, tenor, and Jane Johnston, soprano, will present the following program in Churchill House Thursday evening accompanied, respectively, by Prof. Arthur B. Hitchcock and Hubert Beard.

"Lungi dal caro bene" ... Giuseppi Sarti
"Waft her, Angels, through the skies" from "Jeptha" .... Handel
Mr. Goodwin.
"O wusst ich doch" .... Brahms
"Auf dem Schiffe" .... Brahms
"Ritorna Vincitor," from 'Aida" ... Verdi
Miss Johnston.
"Cielo e mar," from "La Gioconda" .... Ponchielli
"Oh! ne t'evielle pas," from "Joceiyn" .... Godard
"Il mio tesoro in tanto," from "Don Giovanni" .... Mozart
Mr. Goodwin.
"The Unforeseen" .... Cyril Scott
"Down in the Glen" ...... Elinor Warren
"Lullaby" .... Sadero
"The Night Has a Thousand Eyes" .... Richard Hageman
Miss Johnston.
"Tell Me. Oh Blue, Blue Sky" .... Vittorio Giannini
"Less Than the Cloud" .. Josephine McGill
"Now Sleeps the Crimson Petal" .... Roger Quilter
"Youth" .... Ernest Charles
Mr. Goodwin.
"Duet, "Tardi si fa," from "Faust" .... Gounod
Miss Johnston, Mr. Goodwin

Miss Johnston is a promising young soprano of Boston who has twice been the winner for the State of Massachusetts in the Federation of Music Club contests. She has had considerable experience in church and concert work and is in demand as soloist on club programs. Her accompanist, Hubert Beard, is also from Boston. In addition to his early training he took courses in the music departments of Harvard University and Oxford, England, and has had charge of music in several western colleges. Prof. Arthur B. Hitchcock, accompanist for Mr. Goodwin, is a member of the music department of Brown University.

◈ ◈ ◈

Symphony Numbers

In addition to the works previously announced to be played by Fray and Braggiotti with the orchestra and by themselves, the Providence Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Wassili Leps, conductor, will be heard in compositions by Wagner, Mabel Daniels, Mendelssohn and Berlioz at its concert Tuesday night, Feb. 1, in the Metropolitan Theatre. The Daniels piece, "Pirates' Island," will have its first performance in this city. Wagner's contribution is the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." The Nocturne and Scherzo, from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the "Racoczy March," from "The Damnation of Faust," by Berlioz, are the other numbers.

◈ ◈ ◈

Wagner Arias

As a result of many requests Kirsten Flagstad will include two of her most widely acclaimed Wagnerian arias at her concert in the Metropolitan Theatre Thursday night, Feb. 3. They are, according to the announcement from her manager Aaron Richmond, "Elsa's Dream," from the first act of "Lohengrin," and Sieglinde's aria from the first act of "Die Walkure." Although her Providence program has not been completed it will also include a group of songs in Norwegian as well as some of the greatest masterpieces in song literature.

Testifying to the tremendous popularity of this great soprano is the fact that last season she sang exactly 100 times in this country. This included operatic, concert and radio engagements, recordings and several days spent to making her first movie, a scene to be part of "The Big Broadcast of 1938." In it she appears as Bruennhilde, in "Die Walkuere," singing the thrilling "Ho-yo-to-ho," the Valkyrie's Song.

◈ ◈ ◈

St. Olaf Choir Numbers

Choral numbers to be sung by St. Olaf Lutheran Choir at its concert in the Metropolitan Theatre, Wednesday evening, Feb. 2, under the auspices of Our Saviour's Lutheran Church, include the following: "Sing Ye to the Lord," motet for double chorus, J. S. Bach; "Hvad Est Du Dog Skjon," Edward Grieg, sung in Norwegian; "Misericordias Domini," Francesco Durante, anthem for two choirs, sung in Latin; Finale from "Apostrophe to the Heavenly Host," Healy Willan; "Cherubim Song," M. Glinka; "We Have No Other Guide," C. Shvedoff; "The Twenty-third Psalm," Gustav Schreck, sung in German; "Autumn Woods," Paul Christiansen; "Lo, How a Rose E'er Blooming," Rhenish folk song; "Beauty in Humility," F. Melius Christiansen; "Lost in the Night," Finnish folk song, soprano solo, Gertrude Boe Overby; "Praise to the Lord," published in 1668 by Peter Sohren, arr. by F. Melius Christiansen, choral anthem for double chorus.

The choir was scheduled to start its annual tour yesterday in La Crosse, Wis. It will be on the road three weeks, including the midyear week vacation at St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minn. Members of the choir, all students of St. Olaf College, Northfield, Minn., are allowed two weeks in addition to the regular mid-year vacation to take the trip but have to make up their studies. New York, Worcester and Philadelphia are other cities in the east to be visited. The tour will end in Chicago. Last year the choir went to the Pacific coast and the concerts brought an attendance totaling 36,000. Except for the war years annual tours have been made since 1912. In 1913 and 1930 the choir was heard in a total of 75 concerts abroad. In this country it is recognized by leading critics as one of America's foremost a capella choirs.

But the concert performances are by no means its chief reason for existence. The choir sings every Sunday during the college year at divine service and aims at spreading artistic propaganda and religious faith through song. Furthermore it strives to give a demonstration of the possibility of high achievement by persons of average ability. In a material way the choir has given the college the first section of a music building paid for mostly from the receipts of its tours.

Dr. F. Melius Christiansen, director of the choir and director of music at the college since 1903, developed his present organization from a small body of select voices which served as a college choir in the early days. The minimum of time for practice and general rehearsals is 10 hours a week. Every composition is committed to memory during part practices and no music is used at general rehearsals. There is constant repetition and drill leading to the goal of interpretation and entering into the spirit of the composition.

◈ ◈ ◈

Amfitheatrof Turns Serene

Am.

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

Jan. 23/38

DANIELE AMFITHEATROF apparently knows how to take a scolding. Or that is the only way we can account for the singular transformation that the young Russian-Italian conductor composer underwent in his brief sojourn as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the past two weeks.

It would have been difficult indeed for one having his first experience of Amfitheatrof at the concerts of Friday and Saturday of this week to find in the least credible the reports of his first appearances here.

To think that anyone should have been led to believe this serious, quiet, dignified and scholarly young man a "pepper-upper," a "McCoy of jazz"!

Gone was every vestige of the gymnast. The arduous gestures had been supplanted by a fine restraint in bearing. The baton was confined to the right hand throughout, its use restricted solely to those purposes for which it was intended.

* * *

ASIDE from this, the program went, for the most part, exceedingly well.

A quality slightly too restive weakened the dramatic force of the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 in performance, it is true. The same lack of poise, the failure to achieve unity through a sufficiently broad perception, was evidenced in Mr. Amfitheatrof's reading of the Beethoven Seventh Symphony at last week's concerts. But if Mr. Amfitheatrof's forte is not Beethoven, there was still much to commend in the performances of other works under his direction.

Such as those given Pizzetti's "Concerto dell' Estate" and Scriabia's Third Symphony in C minor, otherwise styled by the composer "Le Divin Poeme."

It is, oddly enough, with the harmonic and rhythmic idiom of the moderns, and with the simple elegance and poetry of the early classics, that Amfitheatrof is most happy. The heroic eludes his grasp at yet. His most outstanding achievements here were probably in the Boccherini Suite which he discovered to Boston audiences during his first appearances.

* * *

THE CONDUCTOR has, of course, had material assistance in the fine co-operation of the orchestra.

The Pizzetti work had not been performed at these concerts previous to Amfitheatrof's presentation of it.

Composed in 1928, it represented a departure from the customary vein of the distinguished Italian composer long engrossed with writing music for the theater.

His venture into the sphere of "pure" music which, in opposition to Casella he had hitherto scorned, brought with it a change in mood.

* * *

CASELLA wrote at the time, "Pizzetti's art has been always severe and somber. Little light in his powerful thought, little joy in the constructions, which seemed quite dominated by a profound melancholy. In the 'Concerto dell' Estate,' on the other hand, sunshine and joy reign supreme. And those are precisely the qualities that attract at the very first in this fine fresco of sound."

On Friday afternoon, at least, the work was given a sparkling performance.

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

Jan. 23/38

A program of unusual interest is announced for the coming visit to Boston of the Cleveland orchestra under the leadership of Artur Rodzinski, Thursday evening, Feb. 10. The Hungarian dramatic soprano, Rose Pauly, who has figured in concert performances of Strauss' "Electra" and "Salome" with this orchestra, and who is taking the title role in the production of "Electra" by the Metropolitan Opera Company this season, will appear at the coming concert in the closing scene of "Salome." The program will be as follows:

Toccata and Fugue, in D minor, Bach
Symphony, Op. 10 ..Shostakovich
Excerpts from the Opera, "Salome" Richard Strauss
Rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 26 . Richard Strauss

---

SYMPHONY TO PLAY RAVEL

Serge Koussevitzky will dedicate the next regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, to the memory of Maurice Ravel, who died December 28th last. By exception, different programs are announced for the afternoon and the evening concert. At the concert of Friday, Ravel's Concerto for Piano and orchestra will be performed by Jesus Maria Sanroma, who also appeared in this work when it was first heard at these concerts in 1932. Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite, and the second suite from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloé" will also be played. The program will be opened with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony in D major (Koechel No. 504.)

The Saturday evening program will include Ravel's "Shéhérazade," Three Poems for soprano and orchestra, all three suggested by the Arabian Nights. The soloist will be Olga Averino, who has appeared previously in this music with the orchestra. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Rapsodie Espagnole" will also be played, and the program will end with his "Bolero." The Fourth Symphony of Schumann will be played in the first part of the programme.

DULUTH, MINN.
NEWS TRIBUNE

Famous Chorus To Sing In City Friday Night

When the famous Helinski university chorus sings in the Armory here Friday night, the choristers will offer three songs by Jean Sibelius which the famous composer himself selected for the Duluth appearance. The composer attended rehearsals of the chorus prior to its departure to this country and instructed the group on the correct manner of interpretation.

The Sibelius works to be sung include "Venematka" (A Boat Trip), "Sydameni Laulu" (The Song of My Heart) and "Saarella Palaa" (The Fire on the Island).

Two capacity audiences will hear the chorus conducted by Martti Turunen at the Virginia concert Thursday night and in Duluth the following night. All seats for the Virginia appearance have been sold for two months while less than 100 tickets remain available for the concert in this city.

The chorus made its American debut on New Year's eve with the Boston Symphony orchestra and critics acclaimed it as a sensational group. On that occasion, the choristers sang "The Origin of Fire," one of Sibelius' most expansive choral and orchestral works. It is this music that was lost in transit across the ocean and the entire score was sent to America via the radio-photo process.

A reception committee of Duluthians will greet the chorus when the members arrive here Thursday morning.

Conductor

MARTTI TURUNEN.

139

Daniele Amfitheatrov D

Trans. Jan. 23/38

Symphony Concert

Guest Conductor Presents Compositions by Beethoven, Pizzetti and Scriabin

By MOSES SMITH

There was nothing sensational about the conducting of Daniele Amfitheatrof, visiting conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the matinee concert in Symphony Hall yesterday. Nor was there anything sensational about the second and final program prepared by the Russo-Italian conductor. The prevailing "atmosphere" was entirely different from that surrounding the concerts of last week under the same auspices. From wild gesticulations Mr. Amfitheatrof had by yesterday settled down into a reasonable and proper composure. His program was similarly less spectacular, of the type made familiar here by more or less weekly concerts during a season of thirty weeks. Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture began it. For novelty there was the by no means startling "Concerto dell' estate" by Amfitheatrof's fellow-countryman (in the land of his adoption), Pizzetti. And to close, the conductor revived Scriabin's "Divine Poem," unheard here in a dozen years, if one may rely more on Mr. Burk's note than on a faulty memory.

The music-making of the afternoon reflected Amfitheatrof's changed style. Gone was last week's orchestral din at climactic moments, except, to a lesser extent, in the performance of "Leonore," which could stand and perhaps even benefit by such treatment. There was little or no reliance on spurious "effects." The conductor seemed at all times to be concentrating on the art of music, not to be putting on a show.

The result was a far more enjoyable concert. The Overture, in particular, was given an exceptionally dramatic and engrossing performance, one of the best in the experience of the present writer. Clarity in exposition was accompanied by sensitive phrasing. There was no dawdling, so that the music moved; but neither was there hurrying with resultant distortion. The contrasts and climaxes were admirably prepared. Without the fine, virtuosic edge of some of the playing at last week's concerts, this performance was far more satisfying and exciting.

How faithful the presentation of the new work was it would be presumptuous to say, but the performance seemed good enough. There was warmth to the instrumental tone as well as sonority, no doubt because Amfitheatrof believes deeply in the music. There was excitement and passion, too, in the playing of Scriabin's tone-poem, which the composer called "Symphony No. 3 in C minor." These qualities, too, must have been traceable to the conductor's sympathy with his fellow-countryman's (by birth) work.

The composition itself did not on this occasion make so telling effect as the remembered impact when Dr. Koussevitzky presented it here. The difference may have been intrinsic in the music. For if Scriabin's tonal orgies (one wants to use a stronger word) were old-fashioned then they are beginning to look threadbare now. Something is also, very likely, ascribable to the differing temperaments and experience of the two conductors. (Along this line it may—or may not—be significant that Dr. Koussevitzky has not in these later years given Scriabin's music the attention he lavished upon it earlier in his term.)

Pizzetti's Concerto, which was completed less than ten years ago, showed signs of wear at its first Symphony Hall performance yesterday. Mr. Burk's program notes contain warm praise for the Concerto from no lesser a hand than that of Casella, who goes out of his way to emphasize the composition's symphonic character in opposition to Pizzetti's more customary operatic vein. To the present writer, on the contrary, the three movements contained much that was operatic, not to say downright sentimental, in cast. This is not to say that, despite annoying reminiscences from other composers, the Concerto does not have an obvious and immediate appeal, nor that what sounds to an American operatic may not be simply Italian. But Casella's warm praise began to take on, after the performance, something of the character of special pleading.

Yesterday's concert, to be repeated, of course, tonight, compels a degree of revaluation of Amfitheatrof. His competence was not in question last week, but his taste was. On this latest occasion he indicated that there is nothing essentially wrong with his taste, either, when he exercises it. One might almost suspect that, coming to Boston, he misjudged the character of the Boston audiences; thought that in order to "make an impression" he would have to do something spectacular. Yesterday he settled down to normal music making and prevailed the more for doing so.

The fact that he should have had any doubts about the ability of the music itself to make its way without gratuitous adornment from the interpreter does, however, indicate that he is not yet of the company of artists. Whether he ever will be has not been made quite clear by his fortnight's stay in Boston.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
RECORD

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

JAN 23 1938

"Lost" Scores Usually Turn Up Years Later

Sibelius Joins Composers Whose Original Music Has Strangely 'Disappeared,' Often Into Trunks of Friends

By BERNARD FREEMAN.

Boston,; (AP.)—If past musical history is any precedent the original score of Jan Sibelius's early choral symphonic work "Origin of Fire," which vanished mysteriously while en route from Europe last month, will turn up in a half-century or so in somebody's attic.

The composition, of which the cello, viola and bass viol parts were radioed across the Atlantic in time for a performance last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the ~~Helsinki~~ Chorus, recalls tales of numerous other original manuscripts that had an uncanny way of disappearing—and later reappearing.

The manuscripts of some of the world's greatest music—Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and his overture and ballet music to "Rosamunde," Mendelssohn's overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream," Bachs's "St. Matthew Passion," and several of Muzio Clementi's symphonies have disappeared or lain on oblivion for long stretches, only to reappear and achieve widespread popularity.

AP.

Jan Sibelius, whose early choral symphonic work, "Origin of Fire," vanished mysteriously last month en route from Europe.

After the first performance of "Midsummer Night's Dream" in London in 1829, Mendelssohn entrusted the score for safekeeping to a friend, who stammered out the next day that he left the manuscript of the overture in a public coach.

Approximately 10 years ago, after nearly a century's absence it turned up in London in the Royal Academy of Music, of which the apologetic friend had been a director.

The work of course, achieved great favor in the intervening years —but only because Mendelssohn, who possessed an amazing memory, wrote out a new score as easily as if he were copying scales.

Schubert's most beloved work, "The Unfinished Symphony," was laid aside in 1822, six years before his death, with only two of the customary four movements completed. Not until 1865 did musicologists finally uncover the masterpiece from an old-fashioned chest in the home of a friend.

Unlike his successful sons, Johann Sebastian Bach was not appreciated until after he died; consequently few knew the "St. Matthew Passion," described by Boston Symphony Conductor Serge Koussevitzky as "The greatest composition in all musical literature."

After receiving its first performance on Good Friday, 1729, the score lay in a son's attic for nearly a century. Then, the elder Bach having come into his own, young Mendelssohn and a group of friends revived it exactly one century later—on Good Friday in 1829.

When the Italian pianist Clementi died in England in 1832, he was known to have written some 20 symphonies. Yet, although his estates and papers were in perfect order, the symphonic manuscripts were missing. Not until 1917, when a Dr. William Cummings, London music scholar, died, were they found in a trunk in the attic.—And then they were incomplete and in utter disorder. How they reached there remains a mystery.

Alfredo Casella pieced them together with parts he found in the Library of Congress in Washington, and thus they were given to the world.

Robert Schumann's violin concerto, which recently was played for the first time although written in 1853, has been called erroneously the "Lost Concerto."

Though unperformed, music lovers had known of its existence. They did not hear it, until 1937, however, because the manuscript's owner, Violinist Alfred Joachim, had decreed in his will the concerto should not be played until a century after the composer's death, which would be 1956. The German government permitted the performance last year.

MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS

Piatigorsky Called Great Violincellist

Famous Artist Will Appear Here As Next Soloist With Orchestra

Great men are apt to agree to disagree. That is why, when three famous men, a conductor, a composer and a writer—representing the creative, interpretative and critical criteria of music—agree to call a musician "great," it is news.

It is, therefore, news that Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals" who plays here on Jan. 31 as guest soloist with the University of Miami Symphony orchestra, has been hailed as "great" by the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, by the most famous living composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman, of the London Times.

Koussevitzky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest 'cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty of volume of tone that are without equal."

Strauss wrote in a letter to Piatigorsky: "Thank you once more for your wonderful Don Quixote; technically, musically and interpretatively a model. I wish for the sake of all of us you could play it wherever the work is performed under a good conductor."

Newman said in the London Sunday Times, under the headline, "A Great 'Cellist": 'The slower sections of Beethoven's Variations on Handel's 'See the Conquering Hero Comes' gave Mr. Piatigorsky opportunities for the display of his exquisite legato, but for the rest one was left wondering which was worse, the original tune or the variations on it. However, even in bad music Mr. Piatigorsky is a great 'cellist, while in good music he is equally great as a 'cellist and still greater as interpreter. To exhibit Mr. Piatigorsky's brilliance we had a Crancoeur Sonata with a very difficult vivo; while the Delius sonata was a stream of loveliness, the slow section in particular yielding up its every secret."

SAN JOSE, CAL.
MERCURY - HERALD

JAN 23 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Works Full Time Basis

'By Associated Press'

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston symphony player who needs and wants the work can have 46 weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

NO HONKY TONKS.

When, October 1 of each year, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk back doors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the summer doorstep.

They emerge from congenial summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready for work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-symphony society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra he specifically pointed out that his men had a right to be cared for through the year. The orchestra was non-union then, of course; it still is, the only non-union first quality orchestra in the country.

SUMMER "POPS."

The management began at once, according to present symphony officials, to plan for summer work which would employ those men who did not want to spend the summer in teaching, in private musical enterprises, or just loafing.

The plan begun in 1885 was a summer popular series — they called them "promenade concerts" then.

The public named this 1 month spring series, when old symphony hall emerges from the winter be-latticed and refurnished, the "pops." They have steadily grown more popular, and steadily better in a musical sense.

Before the war, (but in very few places now) many symphony men could spend their summers in high class ensembles, employed by equally high class hotels.

So the esplanade concerts, given on the Charles River bank, were evolved in 1929. These will have, it is possible, a very handsome new home this summer. But in any case 56-60 symphony men will play for a month by the water as usual.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

THE SPRING musicale of the Worcester Woman's Club follows this year a succession of the finest lectures one could expect in any course, and will have a particularly gala program, with Clara Shear, soprano (from the Chicago Civic Opera Company, the San Carlo Opera Company and the Boston Society of Singers) Jean Bedetti, (solo cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) and Leo Litwin, pianist, (whose concert engagements and accompanying of great artists has taken him all over the country and to Europe, not once but many times.) The concert, under direction of the music department of the club, Mrs. Hubbard S. Loudon, chairman, will be Wednesday afternoon at 2.45 o'clock.

Lost Score of Sibelius Joins Host of Musical Mysteries

By Assoc

BOSTON, Jan. 22.—If past musical history is any precedent, the original score of Jan Sibelius' early choral symphonic work, "Origin of

---

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

JAN 23 1938

Serge Koussevitzy recently co ducted the Boston Symphony O chestra in a presentation of Prokofieff's orchestral suite, "Lieutenant Kije." The suite was written expressly for a Soviet film of the same name, and it is the first work of its magnitude to have reversed the usual order of things by traveling from the motion pictures to the concert stage.

140

FORT WORTH, TEX.
Morning Star - Telegram

JAN 2[illegible]

Boston Arranges Schedule to Keep Symphony Busy All Year

NEW YORK, Jan. 22 (AP).—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony Orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year, has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston Symphony player who needs and wants the work can have 46 weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

When in October, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk back doors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the Summer doorstep.

They emerge from congenial Summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready for work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

Policy Began in 1881.

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra he specifically pointed out that his men had a right to be cared for through the year. The orchestra was non-union then, of course; it still is, the only non-union first quality orchestra in the country.

The management began at once, according to present symphony officials, to plan for Summer work which would employ those men who did not want to spend the Summer in teaching, in private musical enterprises, or just loafing.

The plan begun in 1885 was a Summer popular series—they called them "promenade concerts" then, and that was before the Queens' Hall "promenades" in London. Technically, they remained promenade concerts for decades, although Boston quickly indicated that when it combined good music and good drink, it wanted to take both sitting down.

"Pops" Series.

The public named this two-month Spring series, when old symphony hall emerges from the Winter be-latticed and refurbished, the "pops." They have steadily grown more popular, and steadily better in a musical sense.

Before the war (but in very few places now) many symphony men could spend their Summers in high class ensembles, employed by equally high class hotels. Teaching then was also profitable. These things took the men through the hot months.

Excepting for such old time hotels as the Wentworth north of Boston; the Crawford up in New Hampshire, and the Placid in the Adirondacks, these ensembles have been traded for dance bands.

So the esplanade concerts, given on the Charles River bank, were evolved in 1929. These will have, it is possible, a very handsome new home this Summer. But in any case 50-60 symphony men will play for a month by the water as usual.

By May 1 the regular symphony season is done, for the orchestra does not bang around the country playing for Spring festivals.

The Esplanade.

The "pops" begin after only a three-day rest, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. These continue until July 4; Judd is, for those two months, a licensed "common victualler," which is Massachusetts' way of saying restaurant man with a liquor license.

The week after the "pops" end, the esplanade begins. This closes just in time for the orchestra (all of it this time) to entrain for its August home—"Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshires, where there is building what many musicians have called potentially the most important music festival in the world.

This takes the orchestra through the middle of August and eventually will, it is believed, continue much longer.

Which is where Colonel Higginson's policy has led, after 57 years of development.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 29 1938

BERKSHIRES RENEW PLEA FOR MUSIC SHED

Fund Trustees Seek $22,000 for Completion of Center for Summer Concerts

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., yesterday inaugurated what it hopes will be the final campaign for the balance of the funds necessary for completion of the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., in time for the six Summer concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The dates have been announced as Aug. 4, 6, 7, 11, 13 and 14, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting.

Reports have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the fund, which now exceeds $78,000, disclosing the steps taken by the trustees in cooperation with the trustees of the orchestra. The reports include subscription blanks which, it is suggested, may be sent to potential subscribers. Hundreds of other appeals are being sent to music lovers. All are signed by Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the board of trustees. The completion of the shed requires $100,000.

Inquiries concerning the fund or the 1938 festival may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Music

Brahms Concerto in D Major Features Program to Be Given Tomorrow by Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre.

The Brahms concerto in D major for violin and orchestra will be the chief work on a program otherwise devoted to the works of Ravel, to be performed in memory of the composer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

The soloist will be Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra. It had been understood that the Brahms double concerto for violin and violoncello would be played, with Mr. Burgin and Jean Bedetti in the leading roles, but the violin concerto has been substituted.

The concerto was written in 1878, dedicated to the famous Joachim and first played by him on Jan. 1, 1879, in Leipzig. The composer conducted, and it was on this occasion that he had the famous difficulty with his suspenders that has enlivened musical history.

Joachim was consulted by Brahms while the concerto was being written, and he also was influenced by the "lost" Schumann concerto, in the opinion of those who have heard Schumann's recently rescued work.

The Brahms concerto is in three movements, allegro non troppo, adagio and allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace. There were four movements at first, but the scherzo was finally omitted.

The Ravel works will be three suites, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "Ma Mere l'Oye," and the second, "Daphnis and Chloe" suite.

"Le Tombeau de Couperin" was written in the 18th century style in memory of Francois Couperin, the composer. It comprises a prelude, forlane, menuet and rigaudon.

The Mother Goose suite is in five parts, Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop-o'-My-Thumb, Laideronette, empress of the pagodas; Beauty and the Beast, and the Fairy Garden. They were written as two-piano pieces for Mimie and Jean Godebski, the children to whom they are dedicated. The suite was first played in public by Christane Verger, 6, and Germaine Duramay, 10, at the Salle Gaveau, in Paris.

The second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite has three parts, "Daybreak," "Pantomime" and "General Dance." The ballet was first produced by the Ballet Russe, with Nijinsky and Karasavina, in Paris, in June, 1912.

The scene carries the following description of the significance of the music:

"No sound but the murmur of rivulets fed by the dew that trickles from the rocks. Daphnis lies stretched before the grotto of the nymphs. Little by little the day dawns. The songs of birds are heard. Afar off a shepherd leads his flock. . . . Herdsmen enter, seeking Daphnis and Chloe. They find Daphnis and awaken him. In anguish he looks about for Chloe. She at last appears encircled by shepherdesses. The two rush into each other's arms. Daphnis observes Chloe's crown. His dream was a prophetic vision: the intervention of Pan is manifest. The old shepherd Lammon explains that Pan saved Chloe in remembrance of the nymph Syrinx, whom the god loved.

"Daphnis and Chloe mime the story of Pan and Sprinx. Chloe impersonates the young nymph wandering over the meadow. Daphnis, as Pan, appears and declares his love for her. The nymph repulses him: the god becomes more insistent. She disappears among the rocks. In desperation he plucks some stalks, fashions a flute, and on it plays a melancholy tune. Chloe comes out and imitates by her dance the accents of the flute.

"The dance grows more and more animated. In mad whirlings, Chloe falls into the arms of Daphnis. . . . Young girls enter, dressed as Bacchantes, and shake tambourines. . . . A group of young men comes on the stage. Joyous tumult . . . general dance."

G. Y. L.

KNOXVILLE, TENN.
NEWS - SENTINEL

JAN 23 1938

Maybe We'll Get To See Snow White, Too

"SNOW White and the Seven Dwarfs" is one of the finest things that has come out of Hollywood in many years. We have Evelyn Miller's word for it. Evelyn returned last week after spending several weeks in New York going constantly to plays and concerts. And of it all she liked "Snow White" best.

She saw Lillian Gish and Burgess Meredith in "The Star Wagon," Ruth Gordon and Paul Lukas in "The Doll's House" which she liked very much and "George Cohan in the new Dealish revue, "I'd Rather Be Right." She heard lots of concerts and the Boston Symphony which she thinks is superb.

But back to "Snow White." She is the most adorable little person, tripping over the Walt Disney

---

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS

JAN 23 1938

Boston Symphony Players Get 46 Weeks Employment

NEW YORK, Jan. 22 (AP).—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony Orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year, has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston Symphony player who needs and wants the work can have 46 weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

When, Oct. 1 of each year, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk back doors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the summer doorstep.

They emerge from congenial summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready for work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

Policy Since 1881

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra he specifically pointed out that his men had a right to be cared for through the year. The orchestra was non-union then, of course; it still is, the only non-union first quality orchestra in the country.

The management began at once, according to present symphony officials, to plan for summer work which would employ those men who did not want to spend the summer in teaching, in private musical enterprises, or just loafing.

The plan begun in 1885 was a summer popular series—they called them "Promenade Concerts" then, and that was before the Queens Hall "Promenades" in London. Technically, they remained promenade concerts for decades, although Boston quickly indicated that when it combined good music and good drink, it wanted to take both sitting down.

The public named this two-month spring series, when Old Symphony Hall emerges from the winter be-latticed and refurbished, the "pops." They have steadily grown more popular, and steadily better in a musical sense.

Hotel Ensembles Gone

Before the war, (but in very few places now) many symphony men could spend their summers in high-class ensembles, employed by equally high-class hotels. Teaching then was also profitable. These things took the men through the hot months.

Excepting for such old-time hotels as the Wentworth North of Boston; the Crawford up in New Hampshire and the Placid in the Adirondacks, these ensembles have been traded for dance bands.

So the Esplanade concerts, given on the Charles River bank, were evolved in 1929. These will have, it is possible, a very handsome new home this summer. But in any case 50 or 60 symphony men will play for a month by the water as usual.

It works so—by May 1 the regular symphony season is done, for the orchestra does not bang around the country playing for spring festivals.

2 Months' Liquor License

The pops begin after only a three-day rest, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. These continue until July 4. Mr. Judd is, for those two months, a licenseo "common victualler," which is Massachusetts' way of saying restaurant man with a liquor license.

The week after the pops end, the Esplanade begins. This closes just in time for the orchestra (all of it this time) to entrain for its August home—"Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshires, where there is building what many musicians have called potentially the most important music festival in the world.

This takes the orchestra through the middle of August and eventually will, it is believed, continue much longer. Which is where Col. Higginson's policy has led after 57 years of development.

New Bedford
Mercury Jan. 24/38

Some Impressions Of Amfitheatrof

The Russo-Italian Symphony conductor, Amfitheatrof, young, tall, fit model for a tailor's delight, was studied in the Commuters' matinee the past week with a virgin mind, since only one review of his first concert in Sanders' Theater, Cambridge, has been read, though collected. This fourth performance in Symphony Hall of an identical program (Cambridge did not hear the "American Panorama") found the guest conductor for two weeks not spectacular in any way. His body is supple, but he uses it only for definite indication; his right arm is more flexible than Koussevitzky's but every one to his manner provided results are effected.

This co-conductor with Mitropoulos of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra has several generations of musical heritage and his Italian studies under Respighi should place him favorably. It was observed that two of his selections were of Italian composers—the dashing Overture to "Semiramide" of Rossini and his own orchestral enlargement of three movements from Boccherini string quartets.

In the "Semiramide" which he brought to full excitement and brilliance, but kept entirely in leash for occasional dynamic climax, he stylefully rested left hand on hip when not graphically employed. Only once was this position taken in the Beethoven Seventh. At 36, it may be permitted to lift one's heels when leaving the platform, but a conductor is no tenor, nor vaudeville performer.

If one thought back to Koussevitzky's phrasing of the Allegretto with a shade more approval, the speed and clarity Amfitheatrof secured from the orchestra in the third movement and the final Allegro con brio repeat of the 16th note slide into the thrill-provocative percussion seemed unequalled virtuosity. This new conductor is in no sense a noisy interpreter, as gathered from a first review. He made some nice adjustments—as the neat entrance and exit of a short march rhythm and a precise balance of brasses and strings in the Allegro.

Did any of the New Bedford women who subscribe to the Tuesday afternoon Symphony think of Henry F. Gilbert's score for "Down to The Sea in Ships"? He used the Semiramide and the Allegretto—the latter in the attic trunk scene of the old flag.

Amfitheatrof called the men to their feet after the Boccherini—three charming movements eloquently played for grace and ancient serenity of style. The placing of the two selected double basses in the rear center made a well-composed string aggregation to the eye.

No comparisons obtruded on the pure curiosity and laughing excitement of this European's essay at jazz, folk music, and the sounds of the streets of Gotham. It remains for one hearer to attest that despite noise of strange variety, the whole "Panorama" was accepted as essentially musical and melodious; that the Hawaiian music with those two white-headed boys of the Boston Symphony call members—Messrs. Fiedler and Sanroma—made romantic accompaniment at times blended with saxophone; that we like "Swanee River" in the Amfitheatrof minor and that when the siren shrieked through the tonal mass, it was grand.

A. C. R.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 26 1938

(141)

Snapshots of the Audience After a Happy Concert Program

A splendidly-turned-out group of music patrons responded heartily to the Ravel Memorial Program by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Here is a section of the audience departing. Mrs. Frederick S. Peck may be seen in the doorway (left) talking it over with another concertgoer. In the photograph at right, Mrs. Arthur Ingraham, Jr., appears (centre) in the white-collared wrap.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Boston Orchestra

By G. Y. Loveridge

A program in memory of Maurice Ravel, the first in the country, was played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre last night, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

The only other composer represented was Brahms, but he was represented in very solid fashion, by his concerto, in D major, for violin. Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the orchestra, was soloist.

This department does not remember any recent concert by the orchestra that has pleased the audience so well. Mr. Burgin was applauded after every movement of the concerto and called back several times at the end. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra received such sustained approval that all the players had to rise twice and the maestro was as much worn out from perambulating the platform as from guiding his unsurpassed orchestra through a strenuous evening.

The program provided as much contrast as a meal contrived of fine pastry, a liverwurst sandwich and a stein of beer. But it all went together surprisingly well. The orchestra was in superlative form. Mr. Burgin attacked the concerto with vigorous artistry, and Dr. Koussevitzky presided with his customary elan.

The Ravel suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin", which opened the evening, is one of those fragile concoctions that does not stick to the intellectual ribs, but it is so elegantly remote from the world of today that it fascinates, particularly when performed by a polished band like that from Boston.

The Brahms concerto stood forth with solid, earthy qualities beside the brittle and wistful music of the later master. It gives the soloist numberless opportunities to err, but in Mr. Burgin we had an artist able to cope with it, technically and spiritually. It might be said that there were moments in the allegro that were not entirely lucid and that more fire and poetry would not have been amiss in the adagio, but in all it was a splendid performance, revealing (what we all knew beforehand) that Mr. Burgin is uncommonly gifted.

He gave true breadth and depth to the work, singing with beautiful tone and phrasing sensitively.. The allegro giocoso, so exigent in its demands, was played with perfect technical resource, and Mr. Burgin seemed to find the bluff, muscular rhythms to his liking. Audience, orchestra and conductor evinced their admiration for the performance. As though he hadn't done an evening's work already, Mr. Burgin returned to concertmastering for the rest of the program. A genuine musician and artist.

The second part of the concert was the suite "Mother Goose" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite, both by Ravel. The delicate fairy tale pictures were interesting, but it was the ballet music that held the listener, with its beautiful descriptive utterances and the brilliancy of the orchestra's performance. Dr. Koussevitzky painted with delicate tonal shades, displayed the band in all the perfection of its vast dynamic range, and left one enchanted by the sensuous beauty of sound itself.

The program:

Ravel .. . "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
- I. Prelude
- II. Forlane
- III. Menuet
- IV. Rigaudon

Brahms,
Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 77
- I. Allegro non troppo
- II. Adagio.
- III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace

Ravel
"Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose")
Five Children's Pieces
- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant (Pavane of Sleeping Beauty)
- II. Petit Poucet (Hop o' My Thumb)
- III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes (Laideronnete, Empress of the Pagodes)
- IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete (Beauty and the Beast Converse)
- V. Le Jardin Feerique (The Fairy Garden).

Ravel
"Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet: Orchestra Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour—Pantomime—Danse Generale

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES
JAN 30 1938

BRILLIANT MONTH IN MUSIC COMING

111 Major Events Scheduled to Be Heard in New York During February.

NEW YORK, Jan. 29 (AP).—All this In addition to its normal output of straight orchestra music, six world-known soloists will collaborate—Rudolf Serkin, the pianist; Joseph Schuster, the cellist; Kirsten Flagstad, the soprano; Guila Bustabo, the young violinist; Jascha Heifetz, the violinist, and the sensation of the opera season so far, Rosa Pauly, soprano, in a program of Richard Strauss' music.

Besides this, the Philadelphia orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, will play, and the Boston Symphony, under Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard in two programs, each in memory of Maurice Ravel.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 26 1938

Boston Symphony Honors Ravel in Superb Program

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, paid tribute to the memory of the French composer, Maurice Ravel, at the third concert of the season at Metropolitan Theatre last evening. The occasion was noteworthy, first for the brilliant and devoted interpretations of the three Ravel numbers and second for the excellent performance of Richard Burgin, violinist, who played the Concerto in D major, Opus 77 of Brahms.

Where to begin to discuss such a musical treat is the great difficulty. Mr. Burgin may as well receive his tribute first. He is the concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra and when he appears as soloist, he is assured of a superlative accompaniment to his playing. His fellow musicians outdid themselves in the Brahms which is at times so thick in the instrumentation as to nearly overpower the soloist. The solo part is bristling with difficulties and Mr. Burgin played with great beauty of tone, awless technique and delightful rhythmic balance. Immediately after the difficult cadenza, the solo violin repeats the opening phrase of the movement as given out by the orchestra. Here Mr. Burgin excelled in his singing tone. The Andante was interesting in the contrasts of color between the reeds and the solo instrument. The violin figures stood out in delicate relief. The jolly rhythm of the Allegro giocoso was brought out in a substantial German manner and the whole performance was most satisfactory. Mr. Burgin was recalled five times.

Ravel's Suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin" opened the program. The Prelude, with its rippling figures in thirds, had almost the quality of tone heard in the bagpipe. In the Forlane, the flute skipped about over an accompaniment of muted strings, with all the freshness of a May morning. The Menuet was charming in its instrumentation, especially in the little musette. The last curtsy was very convincing. The Rigaudon, played at a swift tempo, made a gay finish for the Suite in the ancient style and more than ever before, we were forcibly reminded that Koussevitsky has virtuoso musicians in every choir of his orchestra. They shone with extra brilliance last evening as they gave their exposition of the amazing contribution of Maurice Ravel to orchestration. Ravel's influence will long be felt in the world of composition. His precision and uncanny facility for leaving the smallest number of notes to produce a given effect are the marks of his genius. Even in a climax, his fullest toned chord is not merely a mass of sound but retains its contour throughout.

In the delicate miniature, "Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose), Koussevitsky so completely transported the audience to the land of make-believe that they were reluctant to applaud when the suite was flinished. The five pictures, Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty, Hop o' My Thumb, Laiderronnette, Empress of the Pagodas, The Conversation Between the Beauty and the Beast, and The Fairy Garden were most descriptive. High points were the gay Chinese tune of the Pagodas and the ingratiating waltz theme of the Beautqy.

Ravel's music for the ballet, "Dalphnis and Chloe," the second suite which includes Lever du Jour, Pantomime and Danse Generale, closed this interesting program and here the orchestra played magnificently. The composition is rated one of Ravel's most successful efforts and this is easy to understand when one can hear it played as it was last evening. The shimmer of sound before daybreak, with delicate bird notes, and then the glory of the sunlight as the brass choir burst forth, were very realistic. The Danse has the same air of repressed excitement which Ravel built so obviously into the Bolero. Here in the ballet it is more subtle but nevertheless present. The audience was most enthusiastic in its appreciation of this number.

Ravel's memory was notably honored and his music is safely enshrined when given such a splendid interpretation as this. He will be remembered as the modernist, who with refinement of taste and precision of workmanship, wrote music which will be a model for succeeding generations.

R. T.

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO RAVEL

B. Post
Jan. 29/38

Composer's Important Works at Pair of Concerts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

There was no mistaking the warmth of the applause which yesterday welcomed Dr. Koussevitzky back to the active leadership of the Symphony Orchestra. Obviously refreshed by his mid-winter vacation, the conductor led his forces through superb performances of the music of Maurice Ravel, to whose memory the present pair of concerts is dedicated.

TWO DIFFERENT GROUPS

In order to do as much justice as possible to the French composer, whose recent passing was such a severe loss to the world of music, Dr. Koussevitzky will play this evening a wholly different group of his compositions. The two programmes cover all of Ravel's more important orchestral music with the exception of "La Valse." It is a pity, then, that this engaging work could not have been substituted for the so-called "Prague" Symphony of Mozart, which somewhat superfluously began yesterday's proceedings. Albeit, in a performance no less finished than those which followed.

These last, to come finally to the point, consisted of the Piano Concerto, in which Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist; the "Mother Goose" Suite and the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe." The two suites are familiar matter; the concerto had been played in Symphony Hall but once before, in the spring of 1932. At the first of that pair of concerts, which fell on April 22, the concerto was played both in Boston and in Philadelphia for the first time in America. Here Mr. Sanroma was the soloist; there, Sylvain Levin.

As one sees them today—and the future may change the picture—Ravel's later compositions seem less distinctively individual than the earlier ones; possibly because so many of the younger composers have aped his styled and adopted certain of his mannerisms. In any event, this piano concerto is a charming work and, again to express a point of view which may be subject to later revision, decidedly superior to the Concerto for the Left Hand, already played here by Paul Wittgenstein, for whom it was written, and, more recently, by Jacques Fevrier.

One might wish that Ravel, in the finale of this "two-hand" concerto, had not succumbed to the temptation to add a few jazzy touches. Already that element in symphonic music sounds tiresomely out of date. But these cheapening embellishings aside, the third movement is witty and brilliant; while the other two are rich in musical substance. Not only the lyric Adagio assai of continuous cantilena, but the opening Allegramente, as well, yield a songful beauty that is all too rare in contemporary music.

Applause for Mr. Sanroma

That this concerto is scored with consummate mastery is something which in the case of Ravel is to be taken for granted. The no less effective piano part received from Mr. Sanroma exactly the sort of performance that it requires. No visiting pianist has quite the flair for modern music that this unassuming Bostonian exhibits. Mr. Sanroma was stormily applauded yesterday, and the ovation was well deserved.

Hearing Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play this second "Daphnis and Chole" suite in Carnegie Hall, New York, Ravel, himself was moved to declare that the performance far transcended any he had ever experienced. Had he been in Symphony Hall yesterday he might have felt that with this conductor and orchestra even the best can be bettered. The very different "Ma Mere l' Oye" was played yesterday with rare delicacy and discernment.

This evening the current tribute to Ravel will conclude with "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the "Rapsodie Espagnole," the three "Sheherazade" songs, sung by Olga Averino, and "Bolero." Schumann's Fourth Symphony will also be played.

(142)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

JAN 30 1938

VISITING MUSICIAN
Mlle. Nadia Boulanger

MUSIC PRECEDENTS JOLTED BY WOMAN

Mlle. Boulanger's Visit Marks Innovations for the Boston Orchestra and Harvard

TO APPEAR AS CONDUCTOR

Noted Lecturer Also Will Give Radcliffe Seminar Which Men May Attend

Two traditions long observed in music and education in this country are due to be disrupted following the arrival here on Tuesday of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, visiting lecturer in music from the Ecole Normal in Paris. The first woman to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London last year, Mlle. Boulanger will continue to set her own precedents on her third visit to this country.

At Radcliffe College, where she will give two courses in music for the second term, her seminar in composition will be open to Harvard students as well as to the college women. While Radcliffe women are permitted to take special courses at Harvard, this will be the first time the rules have been reversed for the benefit of the university men. Her lecture course will be a comparative study of early and modern music.

Next month the French woman will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a p[redacted], like the one in London, unique in the organization's history. For the occasion she has chosen the "Requiem" by Gabriel Fauré, with whom she studied composition as a young woman at the Paris Conservatory, where her father and grandfather were both Professors of Music. Later she abandoned composition for the teaching of music, and has given courses at the American Conservatory in Fontainebleau and at the Ecole Normal, in composition, harmony, counterpoint, piano accompaniment and the history of music.

Through the students under her guidance, Mlle. Boulanger has influenced musical composition in this country. Among them are numbered some of the most prominent of American composers today, including Virgil Thomson, composer of "Four Saints in Three Acts," an operetta by Gertrude Stein. Others were Aaron Copland, Professor Walter Piston of Harvard University, Ross Lee Finney, Professor Douglas Moore of Columbia University and Roy Harris of the faculty of the Westminster Choir School. A number of her former students are instructors in leading colleges and universities in the country.

Continuing her interest in choral music, for which she has developed special programs among Parisian groups, she will direct a joint concert of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the Spring.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

JAN 29 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Critics Prefer to Thank Heaven for a Flagstad

Favorable Notices Are More Erudite Than Those Which Have to Be Adverse

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

That maligned and misunderstood creature, the music critic, delights above all else in appreciation. Absurdly enough musicians fear him, though some profess to be indifferent to his judgments, believing that these judgments are conditioned by ignorance or sadism, favoritism, or merely a desire to appear precious, or hard-boiled, witty or erudite. He may not be much read by the public, but his column is closely scanned by the performers and the creators who attempt to woo the general ear. I have heard of one virtuoso who has carried in his pocketbook, and still carries, an adverse notice of a concert he had given ten or twelve years ago. At a certain point in his perpetual castigation of the unfortunate scribe the virtuoso never fails to pull out the offending critique and offer it as an incontestable proof of the ignorance and malice of our professional musical appraisers.

Yet the presses of the country bring forth yearly books by music critics which are almost hysterically appreciative of music and its interpreters. If some of the writing boys occasionally take a swipe at contemporary composers their disaffection is more than offset by such a volume as Mr. David Ewen's "Composers of Today," which speaks of every living person who sets pen to music paper in terms applicable to bona fide poets of sound. The music critic's holiday is the time that he steals from his regular duties to indite hosannas in book form. He then is closer to his own gentle nature, for nothing is less true than that he finds his satisfaction in admonition or correction. When he is constrained to tell his readers that he sometimes finds Mr. Barbirolli's adventures in the symphony juvenile, or that the Metropolitan's casts of Italian operas are less than ideal, it hurts him, take it from me, more than it does Mr. Barbirolli or the Metropolitan's casts.

I am sure that what is called "constructive" criticism in our town outweighs the opposing kind. It is true, of course, that critics can neither make or unmake artists. Yet they can whet the appetite of music-lovers for the good and the beautiful. No doubt Mme. Flagstad would have eventually triumphed, though every critic had denied her merits. The public is stubborn and knows what it likes, even though it takes time to make up its mind. What the critics did was to spread the good news at once that a Wagnerian star of the first magnitude was in our midst and so start a march to the Metropolitan box-office forthwith.

The critics' idea of heaven is a season of music which would draw only on the superlatives in their vocabularies, because encomiums are easier to set down than detractions, and the conveying of enthusiasm is more pleasant and takes less time than the recording of displeasure. The critic is never so happy as when he asks his readers to share his predilections and, one might add, never so readable. That is why Mr. Gilman is at his most eloquent when he is discussing Wagner and Mme. Flagstad and Mr. Downes is most impressive when he analyzes Sibelius or the interpretations of Dr. Koussevitzky.

If there is any ~~fault~~ to be found with critics it is, perhaps, that in their abhorrence of stricture they tend too much towards leniency. For this they will undoubtedly be blamed by the succeeding generation of music-lovers which will read our opinions in back files of newspapers, and marvel at the low estate of music criticism in the time of their fathers.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of the concerts in memory of Ravel and equally the second in the 14th regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Olga Averino, soprano. The program was as follows:

Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
Schumann Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120
Ravel.................. Rapsodie Espagnole
Ravel, "Sheherazade," Three Poems for voice and orchestra to the verses of Tristan Klingsor
Ravel.................................. "Bolero"

Ravel's subtle, alluring and individual art has been accorded a very just appraisal in these two concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged. There were times when Ravel wrote imitative and inferior music, in the sense that he had little to say. The notorious Bolero is an example of a superbly contrived stunt, which still can awaken enthusiasm but might be better left to serve as a demonstration of how the instruments in the orchestra sound individually. In all decency to Ravel's memory Dr. Koussevitzky could have ended these concerts just as brilliantly with "La Valse."

At the same time we should be grateful that he presented "Le Tombeau de Couperin," one of the most delicate and harmonically interesting of all Ravel's works. It was played beautifully last night, for the wood-winds of the Boston symphony are unsurpassed in all probability. Furthermore Ravel's music makes demands on the wood-winds that only virtuoso players can meet.

Enough has been written about Ravel in the last month, to make it unnecessary to say anything more in this notice of general information and assessment. The "Sheherazade" poems of Tristan Klingsor are decadent stuff, as was some of the poetry that Debussy chose to set. Like Debussy, however, Ravel has succeeded in raising these minor literary works above themselves and sublimating them through the art of music. In addition, Mme. Averino is a singer of such skill and taste that we were doubly ensured against the thin emotional quality of the poems. They were admirably spoken and sung last night. Finally the magnificent symphony of Schumann, a masterpiece unconditionally, was a first rate choice for contrast and magnificently played into the bargain.

RAVEL AGAIN GIVEN PLACE

Dr. Koussevitzky Continues Tribute to Him

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of last evening Dr. Koussevitzky continued his tribute to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel, adding to the Piano Concerto, the "Mother Goose" Suite and the "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts of Friday afternoon "The Tomb of Couperin," the "Spanish Rhapsody," the three songs collectively entitled "Sheherazade" and "Bolero."

On neither programme did Dr. Koussevitzky permit Ravel to have the field to himself. As Friday's concert began with the "Prague" Symphony of Mozart, so did that of last evening include the Fourth Symphony of Schumann, set between "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the "Rapsodie Espagnole." Accepting for the moment the necessity of the presence of another composer, it must be admitted that Mozart and Ravel make a most satisfactory pair. Both were stylists, both tended to be slightly artificial, both were past masters of their art.

On the other hand, Schumann and Ravel were oddly mated. The German was personal and subjective; the Frenchman, objective and impersonal. Ravel was one of the most adroit and resourceful of orchestrators; Schumann, next to Chopin, was the most inept scorer among all composers of genius. Possibly they will still be playing Schumann's D minor Symphony when the name of Ravel has disappeared from programmes altogether. Yet, as your "rough diamond" may seem inferior in polite and polished society, so did Schumann's music seem last night a little gauche and awkward. This, however, is a purely personal opinion. Last evening's audience applauded the sympathetic performance of the Symphony with unmistakable enthusiasm.

As on the occasion of the previous performance at Symphony Hall, the "Sheherazade" Songs were sung by Olga Averino, who again brought to them the imagination and artistry, if not quite the vocal opulence which the first song, "Asie," requires. Deprived of the type of voice which would match its rich orchestral dress, "Asie" tends to seem a little futile, as though the composer in setting these highly pictorial lines, had attempted the impossible.

"Le Tombeau de Couperin" is one of Ravel's most delightful, most astonishing achievements. It and the less noteworthy "Spanish Rhapsody" were beautifully played. In the latter the orchestra achieved as much as it might of the brilliance which it had brought to the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite Friday.

In closing, this reviewer will once more express his regret that neither of these interesting programmes contained "La Valse"; for him it would have made an excellent substitute for "Bolero," which he will hear only when he is chained to his seat. It may be assumed that the audience received it rapturously.

Cont.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

JAN 29 1938

Records by Gieseking On Piano Are Featured

By Robert C. Bagar.

Columbia's February list of records honors Walter Gieseking, the noted pianist, with a special display. He performs the Grieg concerto in A minor together with the Berlin State Opera House Orchestra under the direction of Hans Rosbaud, and he appears in a second album containing some of Debussy's most popular compositions.

Besides these releases, the output includes excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" (parts of act I and act III), as delivered by soloists and chorus of the Royal Opera House and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, with Sir Thomas Beecham conducting; the Brahms "Zigeunerlieder," sung by the Madrigal Singers, directed by Lehman Engel; two operatic selections by Tino Rossi, tenor, and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," offered by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris, Selmar Meyrowitz at the head.

The Norwegian composer, up to the time of writing this concerto, had never turned out an orchestral work, and the fact is all the more remarkable in that his feeling and undeniable gift for expressing himself through the means of a symphonic creation is as evident in this as in any other orchestral product of his.

That Mr. Gieseking should have been chosen to play the piano solo part attests to superior judgment on the part of those responsible, for the artist is felicitously at home in just such a composition. Here he revels in the infinite coloring of phrases, something at which he is a past master, in the countless opportunities afforded him to weave a magic spell of arabesques around melodic passages for the strings, in the sensuousness of divinely tuned measures allotted to the piano.

The performance, taking piano and orchestra together in the consideration, possesses its less successful moments when the co-operative affinity between soloist and accompanying body is a point or two to the left of Olympian, and also its too successful moments when that fellowship reaches a point or two to the right, making it therefore co-operation for co-operation's sake, with a consequent neglect of the essential message. Nevertheless, this is a fine recording, despite the infinitesimal objections, and one that should find a ready response among the gramophile intelligentsia.

There are few pianists appearing before the public today who can match, let alone surpass, Mr. Gieseking's understanding and performing excellence of the music of Debussy. Is it any wonder, then, that the artist turns in as communicative and finished a job as his readings of "La Cathedrale Engloutie," the "Children's Corner" suite, the suite "Bergamasque," "Reflets dans l'eau" and "Soiree dans Granade?"

Thanks to Sir Thomas Beecham's adroit ministerings the "Prize Song" and "Wach'auf, es nahet gen den Tag" (act III) and "Da zu dur der Heiland kam" (act I) from "Die Meistersinger" are projected with musicianly accuracy and fluency. The voices are equal to the demands and the orchestra fits into the picture appropriately.

The Brahms' "Zigeunerlieder" (one to eleven, inclusive) are given sympathetic and expert treatment by the Madrigal Singers. Mr. Engel has done a skilful piece of work in whipping this organization into shape, something to which the readings of the Brahms numbers is eloquent testimony. The able accompanying pianist is D. Everett Roudebush.

Tino Rossi, tenor, sings "Vainement, ma bien aimee," from "Le Roi d'Ys," and "Le reve," from "Manon," with taste and a good deal of style, as well as in a pleasing voice. He is assisted by an orchestra.

The Weekly Record

Top sellers for the week, according to reports from G. Schirmer, Center Music Stores and Wurlitzer:—

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra (Victor).

Brahms's "Mainacht"—Marian Anderson, contralto (Victor).

Sibelius's Fifth Symphony — Robert Kajanus and the London Philharmonic Orchestra (Victor).

Tschaikowsky's Overture - Fantasy "Romeo and Juliet"—Serge [redacted] and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor).

Symphony Pays Tribute to Ravel

Jan. 30/38

By RUTH MARSTERS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned from his mid-winter vacation to open the second half of the Boston Symphony season with a pair of programs in memory of Maurice Ravel.

The audience at yesterday afternoon's concert filled Symphony Hall to its utmost and greeted the conductor with an apparent warmth which really indicated a deep sense of felicitousness in having him back again.

The program opened with a somewhat too careful but nevertheless plausible performance of the Mozart Symphony in D major (K. No. 504) otherwise known as the "Prague" Symphony because it was there it was given its first performance and subsequently enjoyed its first popularity. (It is still popular among symphonies though relegated by musicologists to the outskirts of Mozart's greatest symphonies which are numbered at three.)

* * *

But to return to Ravel who occupied the remainder of the program it is necessary to talk about Sanroma who appeared as soloist in the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. And it is necessary to talk about the soloist in this case simply because he did such a very good job.

We all know the soloist who arrives labeled as "distinguished" and about whose head an aura of infallibility is seen by the more imaginative—and sometimes less appreciative.

Sanroma has been with the orchestra for a long time. It is not necessary to herald his appearances with interviews concerned either with his appetites or his travels. He is probably one of the few virtuoso pianists extant who would not resent being identified as "competent." Competent he is. hich means, in this case, that he performed with brilliance, accuracy, and a regard for the orchestral ensemble.

The Concerto was one of the last works of one of the most interesting of twentieth century composers. It is a scintillating work—contains a modernistic system of harmonics and a classic detachment of spirit that has its results in genuine comedy though easily understood by all.

The program was further embellished by a sensitive performance of the exquisitely delicate "Mother Goose" Suite and concluded with excerpts from the romantic "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet, commissioned by Diaghileff. (The music has attained an importance of its own aside from its origin.)

This evening's program will include Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Op. 120, and Ravel's Works "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; "Rapsodie Espagnole"; "Sheherazade," Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra to the Verses of Tristan Klingsor (Olgar Averino, soloist); and the Bolero.

(142)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
JAN 30 1938

VISITING MUSICIAN
Mlle. Nadia Boulanger

MUSIC PRECEDENTS JOLTED BY WOMAN

Mlle. Boulanger's Visit Marks Innovations for the Boston Orchestra and Harvard

TO APPEAR AS CONDUCTOR

Noted Lecturer Also Will Give Radcliffe Seminar Which Men May Attend

Two traditions long observed in music and education in this country are due to be disrupted following the arrival here on Tuesday of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, visiting lecturer in music from the Ecole Normal in Paris. The first woman to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London last year, Mlle. Boulanger will continue to set her own precedents on her third visit to this country.

At Radcliffe College, where she will give two courses in music for the second term, her seminar in composition will be open to Harvard students as well as to the college women. While Radcliffe women are permitted to take special courses at Harvard, this will be the first time the rules have been reversed for the benefit of the university men. Her lecture course will be a comparative study of early and modern music.

Next month the French woman will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a p[redacted]like the one in London, unique in the organization's history. For the occasion she has chosen the "Requiem" by Gabriel Fauré, with whom she studied composition as a young woman at the Paris Conservatory, where her father and grandfather were both Professors of Music. Later she abandoned composition for the teaching of music, and has given courses at the American Conservatory in Fontainebleau and at the Ecole Normal, in composition, harmony, counterpoint, piano accompaniment and the history of music.

Through the students under her guidance, Mlle. Boulanger has influenced musical composition in this country. Among them are numbered some of the most prominent of American composers today, including Virgil Thomson, composer of "Four Saints in Three Acts," an operetta by Gertrude Stein. Others were Aaron Copland, Professor Walter Piston of Harvard University, Ross Lee Finney, Professor Douglas Moore of Columbia University and Roy Harris of the faculty of the Westminster Choir School. A number of her former students are instructors in leading colleges and universities in the country.

Continuing her interest in choral music, for which she has developed special programs among Parisian groups, she will direct a joint concert of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, during the Spring.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
JAN 29 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Critics Prefer to Thank Heaven for a Flagstad

Favorable Notices Are More Erudite Than Those Which Have to Be Adverse

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

That maligned and misunderstood creature, the music critic, delights above all else in appreciation. Absurdly enough musicians fear him, though some profess to be indifferent to his judgments, believing that these judgments are conditioned by ignorance or sadism, favoritism, or merely a desire to appear precious, or hard-boiled, witty or erudite. He may not be much read by the public, but his column is closely scanned by the performers and the creators who attempt to woo the general ear. I have heard of one virtuoso who has carried in his pocketbook, and still carries, an adverse notice of a concert he had given ten or twelve years ago. At a certain point in his perpetual castigation of the unfortunate scribe the virtuoso never fails to pull out the offending critique and offer it as an incontestable proof of the ignorance and malice of our professional musical appraisers.

Yet the presses of the country bring forth yearly books by music critics which are almost hysterically appreciative of music and its interpreters. If some of the writing boys occasionally take a swipe at contemporary composers their disaffection is more than offset by such a volume as Mr. David Ewen's "Composers of Today," which speaks of every living person who sets pen to music paper in terms applicable to bona fide poets of sound. The music critic's holiday is the time that he steals from his regular duties to indite hosannas in book form. He then is closer to his own gentle nature, for nothing is less true than that he finds his satisfaction in admonition or correction. When he is constrained to tell his readers that he sometimes finds Mr. Barbirolli's adventures in the symphony juvenile, or that the Metropolitan's casts of Italian operas are less than ideal, it hurts him, take it from me, more than it does Mr. Barbirolli or the Metropolitan's casts.

I am sure that what is called "constructive" criticism in our town outweighs the opposing kind. It is true, of course, that critics can neither make or unmake artists. Yet they can whet the appetite of music-lovers for the good and the beautiful. No doubt Mme. Flagstad would have eventually triumphed, though every critic had denied her merits. The public is stubborn and knows what it likes, even though it takes time to make up its mind. What the critics did was to spread the good news at once that a Wagnerian star of the first magnitude was in our midst and so start a march to the Metropolitan box-office forthwith.

The critics' idea of heaven is a season of music which would draw only on the superlatives in their vocabularies, because encomiums are easier to set down than detractions, and the conveying of enthusiasm is more pleasant and takes less time than the recording of displeasure. The critic is never so happy as when he asks his readers to share his predilections and, one might add, never so readable. That is why Mr. Gilman is at his most eloquent when he is discussing Wagner and Mme. Flagstad and Mr. Downes is most impressive when he analyzes Sibelius or the interpretations of Dr. Koussevitzky.

If there is any ~~fault~~ to be found with critics it is, perhaps, that in their abhorrence of stricture they tend too much towards leniency. For this they will undoubtedly be blamed by the succeeding generation of music-lovers which will read our opinions in back files of newspapers, and marvel at the low estate of music criticism in the time of their fathers.

MUSIC

30·I·38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of the concerts in memory of Ravel and equally the second in the 14th regular series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Olga Averino, soprano. The program was as follows:

Ravel: "Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
Schumann: Symphony No. 4 in D minor, Op. 120
Ravel .... Rapsodie Espagnole
Ravel .. "Sheherazade," Three Poems for voice and orchestra to the verses of Tristan Klingsor
Ravel .... "Bolero"

Ravel's subtle, alluring and individual art has been accorded a very just appraisal in these two concerts that Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged. There were times when Ravel wrote imitative and inferior music, in the sense that he had little to say. The notorious Bolero is an example of a superbly contrived stunt, which still can awaken enthusiasm but might be better left to serve as a demonstration of how the instruments in the orchestra sound individually. In all decency to Ravel's memory Dr. Koussevitzky could have ended these concerts just as brilliantly with "La Valse."

At the same time we should be grateful that he presented "Le Tombeau de Couperin," one of the most delicate and harmonically interesting of all Ravel's works. It was played beautifully last night, for the wood-winds of the Boston symphony are unsurpassed in all probability. Furthermore Ravel's music makes demands on the wood-winds that only virtuoso players can meet.

Enough has been written about Ravel in the last month, to make it unnecessary to say anything more in this notice of general information and assessment. The "Sheherazade" poems of Tristan Klingsor are decadent stuff, as was some of the poetry that Debussy chose to set. Like Debussy, however, Ravel has succeeded in raising these minor literary works above themselves and sublimating them through the art of music. In addition, Mme. Averino is a singer of such skill and taste that we were doubly ensured against the thin emotional quality of the poems. They were admirably spoken and sung last night. Finally the magnificent symphony of Schumann, a masterpiece unconditionally, was a first rate choice for contrast and magnificently played into the bargain.

RAVEL AGAIN GIVEN PLACE

Dr. Koussevitzky Continues Tribute to Him

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At the Symphony Concert of last evening Dr. Koussevitzky continued his tribute to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel, adding to the Piano Concerto, the "Mother Goose" Suite and the "Daphnis and Chloe" excerpts of Friday afternoon "The Tomb of Couperin," the "Spanish Rhapsody," the three songs collectively entitled "Sheherazade" and "Bolero."

On neither programme did Dr. Koussevitzky permit Ravel to have the field to himself. As Friday's concert began with the "Prague" Symphony of Mozart, so did that of last evening include the Fourth Symphony of Schumann, set between "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and the "Rapsodie Espagnole." Accepting for the moment the necessity of the presence of another composer, it must be admitted that Mozart and Ravel make a most satisfactory pair. Both were stylists, both tended to be slightly artificial, both were past masters of their art.

On the other hand, Schumann and Ravel were oddly mated. The German was personal and subjective; the Frenchman, objective and impersonal. Ravel was one of the most adroit and resourceful of orchestrators; Schumann, next to Chopin, was the most inept scorer among all composers of genius. Possibly they will still be playing Schumann's D minor Symphony when the name of Ravel has disappeared from programmes altogether. Yet, as your "rough diamond" may seem inferior in polite and polished society, so did Schumann's music seem last night a little gauche and awkward. This, however, is a purely personal opinion. Last evening's audience applauded the sympathetic performance of the Symphony with unmistakable enthusiasm.

As on the occasion of the previous performance at Symphony Hall, the "Sheherazade" Songs were sung by Olga Averino, who again brought to them the imagination and artistry, if not quite the vocal opulence which the first song, "Asie," requires. Deprived of the type of voice which would match its rich orchestral dress, "Asie" tends to seem a little futile, as though the composer in setting these highly pictorial lines, had attempted the impossible.

"Le Tombeau de Couperin" is one of Ravel's most delightful, most astonishing achievements. It and the less noteworthy "Spanish Rhapsody" were beautifully played. In the latter the orchestra achieved as much as it might of the brilliance which it had brought to the "Daphnis and Chloe" Suite Friday.

In closing, this reviewer will once more express his regret that neither of these interesting programmes contained "La Valse"; for him it would have made an excellent substitute for "Bolero," which he will hear only when he is chained to his seat. It may be assumed that the audience received it rapturously.

Cont. 1

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
JAN 29 1938

Records by Gieseking On Piano Are Featured

By Robert C. Bagar.

Columbia's February list of records honors Walter Gieseking, the noted pianist, with a special display. He performs the Grieg concerto in A minor together with the Berlin State Opera House Orchestra under the direction of Hans Rosbaud, and he appears in a second album containing some of Debussy's most popular compositions.

Besides these releases, the output includes excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" (parts of act I and act III), as delivered by soloists and chorus of the Royal Opera House and the London Philharmonic Orchestra, with Sir Thomas Beecham conducting; the Brahms "Zigeunerlieder," sung by the Madrigal Singers, directed by Lehman Engel; two operatic selections by Tino Rossi, tenor, and Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," offered by the Orchestra Symphonique de Paris, Selmar Meyrowitz at the head.

The Norwegian composer, up to the time of writing this concerto, had never turned out an orchestral work, and the fact is all the more remarkable in that his feeling and undeniable gift for expressing himself through the means of a symphonic creation is as evident in this as in any other orchestral product of his.

That Mr. Gieseking should have been chosen to play the piano solo part attests to superior judgment on the part of those responsible, for the artist is felicitously at home in just such a composition. Here he revels in the infinite coloring of phrases, something at which he is a past master, in the countless opportunities afforded him to weave a magic spell of arabesques around melodic passages for the strings, in the sensuousness of divinely tuneful measures allotted to the piano.

The performance, taking piano and orchestra together in the consideration, possesses its less successful moments when the co-operative affinity between soloist and accompanying body is a point or two to the left of Olympian, and also its too successful moments when that fellowship reaches a point or two to the right, making it therefore co-operation for co-operation's sake, with a consequent neglect of the essential message. Nevertheless, this is a fine recording, despite the infinitesimal objections, and one that should find a ready response among the gramophile intelligentsia.

There are few pianists appearing before the public today who can match, let alone surpass, Mr. Gieseking's understanding and performing excellence of the music of Debussy. Is it any wonder, then, that the artist turns in as communicative and finished a job as his readings of "La Cathedrale Engloutie," the "Children's Corner" suite, the suite "Bergamasque," "Reflets dans l'eau" and "Soiree dans Granade?"

Thanks to Sir Thomas Beecham's adroit ministerings the "Prize Song" and "Wach'auf, es nahet gen den Tag" (act III) and "Da zu dur der Heiland kam" (act I) from "Die Meistersinger" are projected with musicianly accuracy and fluency. The voices are equal to the demands and the orchestra fits into the picture appropriately.

The Brahms' "Zigeunerlieder" (one to eleven, inclusive) are given sympathetic and expert treatment by the Madrigal Singers. Mr. Engel has done a skilful piece of work in whipping this organization into shape, something to which the readings of the Brahms numbers is eloquent testimony. The able accompanying pianist is D. Everett Roudebush.

Tino Rossi, tenor, sings "Vainement, ma bien aimee," from "Le Roi d'Ys," and "Le reve," from "Manon," with taste and a good deal of style, as well as in a pleasing voice. He is assisted by an orchestra.

The Weekly Record

Top sellers for the week, according to reports from G. Schirmer, Center Music Stores and Wurlitzer:—

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony — Arturo Toscanini and the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra (Victor).

Brahms's "Mainacht"—Marian Anderson, contralto (Victor).

Sibelius's Fifth Symphony — Robert Kajanus and the London Philharmonic Orchestra (Victor).

Tschaikowsky's Overture - Fantasy "Romeo and Juliet"—Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ and the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Victor).

Symphony Pays Tribute to Ravel

Jan. 30/38

By RUTH MARSTERS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned from his mid-winter vacation to open the second half of the Boston Symphony season with a pair of programs in memory of Maurice Ravel.

The audience at yesterday afternoon's concert filled Symphony Hall to its utmost and greeted the conductor with an apparent warmth which really indicated a deep sense of felicitousness in having him back again.

The program opened with a somewhat too careful but nevertheless plausible performance of the Mozart Symphony in D major (K. No. 504) otherwise known as the "Prague" Symphony because it was there it was given its first performance and subsequently enjoyed its first popularity. (It is still popular among symphonies though relegated by musicologists to the outskirts of Mozart's greatest symphonies which are numbered at three.)

* * *

But to return to Ravel who occupied the remainder of the program it is necessary to talk about Sanroma who appeared as soloist in the Ravel Concerto for Piano and Orchestra. And it is necessary to talk about the soloist in this case simply because he did such a very good job.

We all know the soloist who arrives labeled as "distinguished" and about whose head an aura of infallibility is seen by the more imaginative—and sometimes less appreciative.

Sanroma has been with the orchestra for a long time. It is not necessary to herald his appearances with interviews concerned either with his appetites or his travels. He is probably one of the few virtuoso pianists extant who would not resent being identified as "competent." Competent he is. hich means, in this case, that he performed with brilliance, accuracy, and a regard for the orchestral ensemble.

The Concerto was one of the last works of one of the most interesting of twentieth century composers. It is a scintillating work—contains a modernistic system of harmonics and a classic detachment of spirit that has its results in genuine comedy though easily understood by all.

The program was further embellished by a sensitive performance of the exquisitely delicate "Mother Goose" Suite and concluded with excerpts from the romantic "Daphnis and Chloe" Ballet commissioned by Diaghileff. (The music has attained an importance of its own aside from its origin.)

This evening's program will include Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor, Op. 120, and Ravel's Works "Le Tombeau de Couperin"; "Rapsodie Espagnole"; "Sheherazade," Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra to the Verses of Tristan Klingsor (Olgar Averino, soloist); and the Bolero.

MENUHIN TO PLAY RARE PIECE

Post - Jan. 30/38

News and Notes About Music Matters Here and Elsewhere

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE most talked-of musical novelty of 1937, and probably the most important, was not from one of the contemporary "S's," who now include Strauss, Sibelius, Schoenberg, Stravinsky and Shostakovich, but from one of those who have departed this life, Schumann. The piece in question, it is no doubt unnecessary to say, is the Concerto for violin and orchestra.

Written toward the end of Schumann's life, actually between Sept. 21 and Oct. 3, 1853, and shortly before the final insanity descended upon him, the music passed into the hands of Joseph Joachim, for whom it was composed and by whom it was performed, but only in private. According to the strange provisions of Joachim's will, it was not to be published or publicly played until 1956, 100 years after Schumann's death. When Joachim died in 1907 the Concerto was entombed in the State Library in Berlin.

Thanks to the efforts of Wilhelm Strecher, head of the publishing house of B. Schott and Sons, the Concerto was rescued from the library archives; permission to break the will was obtained from both Joachim's and Schumann's heirs, and a photographed copy was sent to Yehudi Menuhin in the expectation that he would be the first to play it. Here the present German government stepped in, and the actual premiere took place on Nov. 26 last, at a concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, with Wilhelm Kulenkampff as soloist.

It had also been announced that Jelly d'Aranyi, the Hungarian violinist and grandniece of Joachim, would give the first performance at London, with the B. B. C. Orchestra, on Oct. 20. Although the existence of the Concerto and its whereabouts had long been known, Miss d'Aranyi spread the story that in 1933 she had received spirit messages from Schumann and Joachim informing her that there was such a concerto and urging her to find the manuscript and perform it.

All this is by way of preface to the announcement that Yehudi Menuhin, who has already played the Concerto in New York and elsewhere, both with and without orchestral accompaniment, will introduce it to Boston at the Symphony concerts of this week. Early in the fall it was stated that when Mr. Menuhin played the concerto he would also play that of Brahms, but Dr. Koussevitzky, having heard the Concerto played in private, decided that the two pieces were too much alike, and that some other companion piece had better be found. The choice has now fallen on the Concerto of Mendelssohn. Brahms, it seems, heard Joachim play Schumann's Concerto and imitated certain features of it in his own.

Critical opinion of the Concerto, on the basis of Mr. Menuhin's performances, would seem to place its value midway between the violinist's assertion that it could be ranked with Schumann's greatest works and Joachim's flat statement that it could by no means aspire to such position. The slow division was most admired, the Finale least. Now, however, Boston can hear and judge for itself.

Besides the two concertos the programme for this week's Symphony Concerts will include the Second Symphony of Malipiero, also new last year, and Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." And

---

Menuhin with Symphony; Schnabel R

147

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Globe - Jan. 30/38

Metropolitan Opera; Schumann's "Lost" Concerto

The repertory to be presented in Boston by the Metropolitan Opera Association from next March 24 to April 2 is perhaps the most varied to be offered Bostonians in several years. Though Wagner's "Ring" will not be vouchsafed a second consecutive year, there will be five operas done rarely here of late years.

The first will be "Otello," which has been selected for the opening night at the Boston Opera House, Thursday, March 24. Although Verdi's masterpiece was given many times here in the past, the last first-rank performance was by the late Chicago Civic Opera in 1931. Mme. Rethberg as Desdemona, Mr. Martinelli as Otello and Mr. Tibbett as Iago will be heard for the first time in Boston in these roles.

Richard Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier" has had but five local performances and was with us most recently in 1930. It was revived by the Metropolitan in New York this season. Although Lotte Lehmann has long been admired in opera here, her Marschallin von Werdenberg is not familiar to Boston opera-goers save those who have heard it elsewhere.

"Parsifal," despite its stature as a work of art, has been given here only a few times, and not at all since 1932. "Don Giovanni," one of the world's great musical masterpieces, was last given a first-rank performance here in 1931. Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet" has been heard at the Boston Opera House within five years, but it is necessary to go back 10 years to find a production by a top-notch company.

The Violin Concerto by Robert Schumann, which will be given first performance here at the Boston Symphony concerts this week with Yehudi Menuhin as soloist, has had an amazing history. The essential facts are here condensed as much as possible.

Schumann wrote the Concerto between Sept. 21 and Oct. 3, 1853. His good friend, the great violinist Joachim studied the score and played it privately to Schumann a short time later. Joachim evidently did not consider the Concerto worthy of public performance, and never played it in the concert hall.

By the following February, Schumann had become insane. In 1856 he died. Joachim kept the manuscript score, and upon his death in 1907 bequeathed it to the Prussian State Library in Berlin, stipulating that it must not be published or performed until 100 years after Schumann's death.

Here comes the most fantastic part of the tale. In 1933 Yelly D'Aranyi, the violinist and a grand-niece of Joachim, is said to have received spirit messages from Schumann and Joachim urging her to locate the manuscript and perform the Concerto. Now the Concerto certainly had not been "lost" at all, as careless statements have said, but little or nothing about it has until recently been known by the musical public.

A photostat of the manuscript was shown to Yehudi Menuhin by an influential German publisher, and upon Menuhin's earnest request the publisher set about to secure the necessary permission from heirs of Schumann and Joachim to set aside the terms of Joachim's will. This having been accomplished, Menuhin was to have given first American performance of the Concerto last Fall, and the first performance in Europe was to have been at the hands of Yelly D'Aranyi in London. The Nazi Government intervened, however, and the initial public hearing took place in Berlin last November.

There are the usual three movements in the Concerto, the markings of which may be approximately translated as follows: "In strong but not too fast tempo"; "Slowly," and "Lively, but not too fast."

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 2:30 Friday and 8:15 Saturday. Fifteenth program. Yehudi Menuhin will be soloist in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, and in the first Boston performance of the Schumann Violin Concerto, to which extended reference is made above in this column. The purely orchestral numbers will be the Second Symphony of Malipiero, new to Bosehudi Menuhin, violinist, shown here with the score of Schumann's iolin concerto which he will play for the first time in Boston at the riday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Encomiums For Ravel

Am - Jan. 30/38

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

RETURNED from his mid-season vacation to conduct the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts this week-end, Serge Koussevitzky was greeted with warm cordiality by audiences both distinguished and of capacity size.

Dr. Koussevitzky departed from his usual custom by presenting two entirely different programs, alike only in that both were dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel.

The result was a fairly representative assortment of the work of one who, during the last quarter of a century at least, has managed to hold the attention of his contemporaries by delighting, amusing, and astonishing them in turn.

The scintillating performances given his music on these occasions were sufficient reminder that as a poet, a wit, and a superior craftsman, Ravel will continue to live.

* * *

FRIDAY'S program opened with the Mozart Symphony in D major,—the performance of which did nothing to detract from a very real appreciation of Ravel's own genius for writing music of transparent texture.

Of the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra which followed, it was the composer's opinion that "in this he had expressed himself most completely, and that he had pored his thought into the exact mold he had dreamed." (We quote from Mr. Burke's program notes.)

To one who in seeking new molds had embraced impressionism, neoclassicism, and polytonality variously throughout his career, the above might have been a temporary estimation. At any rate it was his final one, for there were to be no further stages in his development. The Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, published in 1932 was the last but one before the accident which put an end to his creative endeavor.

* * *

THE CONCERTO is, at all events, an effervescent work.

In its performance by the orchestra and soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, its intricacies of tonality and rhythm were dealt with in virtuoso manner. Mr. Sanroma's playing, effortless as it appeared, was authoritative, distinguished always by clarity, and rhythmic incisiveness.

The "Mother Goose" Suite followed. Music of the utmost fragility, it was exquisitely performed.

Friday's program was completed with excerpts from the Ballet, "Daphnis of Chloe." One of Ravel's most successful works, it is also the one perhaps most thoroughly steeped in impressionism.

In contrast to this, it was "Le Tombeau de Couperin," strongly entrenched in neoclassicism which opened Saturday evening's program.

The Spanish strain was adequately represented with "Rapsodie Espagnole," and that Pops favorite, "Bolero."

Famed Schumann Concerto Heard Feb. 4, 5

The violin concerto of Robert Schumann, which had its first public performances in the present season, will be heard in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Yehudi Menuhin appears as soloist. The violinist will also be heard with the orchestra in the concerto of Mendelssohn. Another score of special interest announced for this program will be the second symphony of Malipiero, which had its first European performance in the season past. The concluding number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The history of Schumann's concerto is now familiar. Composed for his young friend, Joseph Joachim, a few months before Schumann was confined by his last illness, the concerto was not played by the virtuoso. It remained in his possession through his long and brilliant career. On his death in 1907, the manuscript score was bequeathed to the Prussian State Library in Berlin, where it remained for many more years, the stipulation having been placed upon it that it should not be published or performed until 100 years had passed after the composer's death. In 1933 Yelly d'Aranyi, the violinist, received, according to her own statements, spirit messages from Robert Schumann, and Joseph Joachim, her grand-uncle, urging her to find the manuscript and perform it.

The manuscript came to the attention of the head of the music publishing firm of Schott, at Mainz and was submitted to Yehudi Menuhin who at once became enthusiastic and eager to play it. The necessary permission having been obtained, the concerto was published in the present season. The first performance was given at Berlin, Nov. 26, Georg Kulenkampf, soloist. Yehudi Menuhin has given it first performances in this country, playing the work with piano accompaniment in New York on Dec. 6, and repeating it with orchestra at St. Louis, Dec. 23, Philadelphia, Jan. 21, and New York, Jan. 27.

Amusements

MENUHIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

The violin concerto of Robert Schumann, which had its first public performance in the present season, will be heard in Boston at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Yehudi Menuhin appears as soloist. The violinist will also be heard with the orchestra in the Concerto of Mendelssohn. Another score of special interest for this program will be the Second Symphony of Malipiero, which had its first European performance in the season past. The concluding number will be Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

The history of Schumann's Concerto is now familiar. Composed for his young friend, Joseph Joachim, a few months before Schumann was confined by his last illness, the Concerto was not played by the virtuoso. It remained in his possession through his long and brilliant career. On his death in 1907, the manuscript score was bequeathed to the Prussian state library in Berlin, where it remained for many years, the stipulation having been placed upon it that it should not be published or performed until 100 years had passed after its composer's death. In 1933, Yelly d'Aranyi, the violinist, received according to her own statements, spirit messages from Robert Schumann, and Joseph Joachim, her grand-uncle, urging her to find the manuscript and perform it. The manuscript came to the attention of the head of the music publishing firm of Schott, at Mainz, and was submitted to Yehudi Menuhin who at once became enthusiastic and eager to play it. The necessary permission having been obtained, the Concerto was published in the present season. The first performance was given at Berlin, Nov. 26, Georg Kulenkampf, soloist. Yehudi Menuhin has given it first performances in this country, playing the work with piano accompaniment in New York on Dec. 6, and repeating it with orchestra at St. Louis, Dec. 23, Philadelphia, Jan. 21, and New York, Jan. 27.

CONCERT AND OPERA ASIDES

Times - Jan. 16/38

THIS is a story that is still in the nebulous region between fancy and fact, with enough leaning to the latter to be discerned in its larger outlines. It seems that the air-conditioning of Carnegie Hall is being seriously considered. Plans have been drawn up, approved by the proper authorities; the whole matter hangs on the word "Go!"

That word seems on the tip of the collective tongue of the National Broadcasting Company, which is reported to be interested in a series of Summer indoor concerts for its new NBC Symphony Orchestra. If the project materializes, the series will take as its prototype the long-famed "pop" concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall. That is, the music will be attended by an audience seated at intimate tables sipping drinks—light, at least—and smoking to their hearts' content.

The air-conditioning of Carnegie Hall is a subject upon which some thought has been given from time to time. The consummation of the plan has been retarded, of course, because of the relatively little business the hall does in the warm months. Hall officials decided that unless they could be assured of some seventy or more bookings for each of two consecutive seasons, Carnegie Hall would have to content itself with Nature's own Summer zephyrs.

They were not forgetting the World's Fair; that was over a year in the future, but the authorities of the exposition were already making plans.

Now there is also the NBC Summer project. The idea at present seems to be to give concerts in May and June, which will give Carnegie Hall some sixty concerts, and, very probably, its cool, machine-made atmosphere.

Taking place in these months, these concerts will not conflict with the Philharmonic-Symphony's season in Lewisohn Stadium. Some may be broadcast, possibly by a commercial sponsor.

144

Large Throng Welcomes Dr. Koussevitzky After Month's Absence

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1938

Society Enjoys Ravel Concert At Symphony

Memorial Program Draws Many Members of Boston Society

By PAULINE WARREN

Friday afternoons during the winter season find nearly every one of importance in Boston society attending the Symphony concerts, and yesterday was no exception to the rule. Dr. Koussevitzky, who made his first Boston appearance in over a month, was greeted with tumultuous applause when he stepped on to the platform. Incidentally, he was the guest of honor at a dinner given for the orchestra at the Harvard Club last evening, as partial recognition of their artistic contribution to Harvard's recent tercentenary celebration.

The program yesterday afternoon was in memory of Maurice Ravel, and although it opened with Mozart's Symphony in D major, to satisfy those who are not wholly drawn to Ravel's overwhelming style, all the other selections were by Ravel, and judging by the wild applause, there were very few present who were not deeply moved by the haunting strains. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist for the Concerto for piano and orchestra, which was one of Ravel's last works of orchestral proportions. The five children's pieces from "Mother Goose" were received enthusiastically, and the concert concluded with the brilliant ballet from "Daphnis and Chloe."

One of the distinguished members of the audience was Mr. Joseph Szigeti, well-known violinist, who sat in one of the front rows. Also way down in front in their usual seats, were Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, who wore a sable coat with her black ensemble, and her sister, Mrs. Horace Soule, wearing a mink coat with her wine red gown and hat. Nearby, were Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, all in black, and Mrs. Edwin S. Webster, who topped her black frock with a smart boxy fur jacket.

With Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson was her niece, Mrs. Malcolm Bradlee, and Mrs. Roland Nickerson was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Mrs. Charles Sumner Bird, Jr., was in fashion's favorite all-black, and her sister, Mrs. Oliver Wolcott, was also present. With her beige frock, Mrs. Frederick Cameron Church, Jr., wore a cunning brown peaked hat, and touches of white were furnished by her pearls and white gloves.

There were many debutantes in the audience, as they are just as thrilled about the concerts as their elders. Miss Lucy Cochrane wore one of the "chubby" fur jackets with her black frock, which accentuated her blonde coloring. With her was her mother, Mrs. Dudley L. Pickman, Jr., also in all-black. Chatting with them was Miss Katharine Putnam, in a coat of gray lamb, who attended with her mother, Mrs. George Putnam. Another debutante was Miss Virginia Prout, who was with her mother, Mrs. Henry Prout, and Miss Jean Quast Clark, a chinchilla jacket topping her platinum gray frock with its pleated skirt, arrived with her mother, Mrs. Paul Foster Clark, a cluster of gorgeous speckled orchids fastened on her mink coat. Still another attractive debutante was Miss Elizabeth Osborne, who was discussing the concert enthusiastically with a group of friends.

Mrs. Christian Herter, all in gray, was strolling about in the lobby during the intermission. Chatting there with friends, was Mrs. Albert M. Kales, who was enjoying a cigarette. We also glimpsed Mrs. Carleton Pike, her black costume brightened by touches of scarlet, Mrs. Richard King Thorndike, wearing three strands of pearls with her black frock, and Mrs. Robert Morris, wrapped in a mink coat.

Mrs. Francis H. Cummings refused to be daunted by her recent skiing accident at Jackson, N. H., and attended on crutches. Miss Charlotte M. Rantoul, in a slim tailleur of tiny black and white pin checks, was vivaciously greeting Miss Josephine Emery, who wore a jonquil yellow sweater with her green suit. Miss Constance Turner was very pretty in a frock of blue-gray wool, and Miss Jane Megrew was all in black. Miss Elizabeth Watson wore a becoming coat of beige caracul.

Sitting in the very first row, was Miss Lucy Linder Pope, in a mink coat, her coronet of braids tucked under a mink-trimmed turban. Banded with mink, was the black coat that Mrs. Allan Forbes wore with her black frock, and wearing a mink coat, was Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike., Jr., Mrs. Amor Hollingsworth (Eleanor Gibson) wore a garnet red hat and frock with her coat of Persian lamb.

Many members of the audience went up to the first balcony gallery to admire the new sculptured head of Maurice Ravel, completed by Madame Koussevitsky in time for this memorial concert. Viewing it with much interest, was Miss Jeannie Robinson. Mrs. Alexander Steinert was accompanied by her daughter, Mrs. Samuel J. Newman, and with Mrs. Frank W. Stewart was her daughter, Mrs. Lawrence Black.

Still others present were Mrs. William Adams Copeland, Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Mrs. Robert Belknap, Miss Alice Stackpole, Miss Jeannie Dupee, Mrs. Robert Cushman, Miss Dorothy Coffin, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Miss Aimee Lamb, Mrs. Stearns Poor, Mrs. Lewis

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

3 Noted Artists Please Woman's Club Audience

Jean Bedetti, Cellist, Clara Shear, Soprano, and Leo Litwin, Pianist, Appear

By TYRA LUNDBERG FULLER

Three artists of merit were presented at the Worcester Woman's Club yesterday afternoon, in the annual program sponsored by the music department of the club, Mrs. Hubbard M. Loudon, chairman, and Tuckerman Hall was filled to near-capacity by club members and their guests.

The program, ideally arranged, was given by Jean Bedetti, 'cellist, Clara Shear, dramatic soprano, and Leo Litwin, pianist. In addition to his solo contribution to the afternoon's entertainment, Mr. Litwin accompanied his fellow artists on the piano in a manner that completely won his audience. Through his long connection with the Boston Symphony—pianist for the ~~Boston Symphony~~ "Pops," too, for seven years—Mr. Litwin already had many friends and acquaintances in the audience who were happy to welcome him here.

Bedetti Excels

It was a delight to listen to the playing of Mr. Bedetti, a truly accomplished master of the 'cello, who since 1919 has been solo 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. So exquisite were the tones he evoked from his instrument, so flawless his technique and musicianship that his few mannerisms, a certain flair for showmanship, seemed to bring him only closer to his audience.

It was particularly interesting to learn that the "Elegie," which he played in his final group instead of for his opening number as scheduled on the program, was written in his honor by the composer, Paul Tortelier.

Miss Shear, formerly of the Chicago Civic Opera Company, has many of the qualities which make for a stage success. Chic and attractive, her dramatic manner of singing interested her listeners. She has a powerful voice of good range, as she demonstrated in her first selection, "O Liebliche Wangen (O Lovely Cheeks)," Brahms, but we were a little disappointed in the rendering of Tedesco's "Ninna Nanna," which was scheduled as a lullaby, but which seemed to present none of the restful, soothing quality associated with that type of a slumber song. Miss Shear's second group included "Love Has Eyes," a roguish chansonette by Bishop, Leslie Smith's "Canterbury Air" (after the English manner) and "The Street Fair," Manning, an impressionistic picture of gay Paree. She was recalled and sang an impish little number, "Arithmetic," Mana-Zucca, which may have startled some of the more conservative in her audience. But then again, there were others who loved it.

Mr. Bedetti opened the program with a group of three selections, inserting a Bach "Arioso," which like the Weber "Adagio and Rondo" that followed brought out the lovely, deep, rich tones of the 'cello. "Russian Dance," Liadoff, completed the group.

In addition to the "Elegie," Mr. Bedetti played Delune's bizarre but fascinating "Dragon Fly," a composition that requires the utmost technique and mastery of the 'cello. He followed this with Papper's "Tarentelle," and then in response to extended plaudits he returned to play the "Allegro" movement from "Sonate," Francoeur, brilliant, playful, with yet more demands on the maestro's ability. And he met them all.

Mr. Litwin's contribution to the program was scheduled an all-Chopin group, but he played two, the interesting "Etude in F Minor," and the lovely, more familiar "Prelude in D Flat Major," then announced that for his third selection he would play Schumann's "Soaring." In response to an insistent demand for an encore he returned with a glittering, sparkling Chopin "Mazurka."

Yesterday's concert was the first of two programs scheduled under direction of the music department, the second to be on the Spring calendar.

HARVARD CLUB PAYS KOUSSEVITZKY HONOR

B. Globe

Orchestra Also Attends—Angell Is Speaker

Jan. 29/38

For the first time in its history, the Harvard Club of Boston entertained the conductor and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at dinner last night in Harvard Hall of the club.

The speakers were Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony and the evening's guest of honor; Dr. James Rowland Angell, president emeritus of Yale University and present educational adviser to the National Broadcasting Company, and Bentley W. Warren, president of the Boston Symphony's board of trustees. Edward A. Taft, president of the Harvard Club of Boston and a trustee of the orchestra, presided.

In the remarks of each of the three speakers, the close bond between Harvard and the orchestra—which has existed since the foundation of the orchestra—was emphasized. Dr. Koussevitzky, among other observations, spoke of the importance to the orchestra of the annual series of concerts given in Sanders Theatre, and spoke feelingly of the honor tendered to him and the orchestra when it bestowed upon him, a few years ago, the honorary degree of Doctor of Laws.

Mr. Warren voiced the appreciation of the orchestra's trustees both for the hospitality extended by the Harvard Club, and for the support, as subscribers and in other ways, of a large number of club members.

Dr. Angell's speech emphasized the future which he believes to exist for culture in general, and specifically music, by means of radio broadcasts and possibly television. The former president of Yale dwelt at length upon the enormous benefit to the common man of the transmission by radio of great world literature and music.

Not the least feature of the evening was the humorous combined dinner list and program, bound in the familiar pinkish-brown of the regular Boston Symphony program books, and arranged after the typographical fashion of the orchestra's program.

A "Moment Musical" proved to be new records of Prokofieff's "Lieut Kije" suite, which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra introduced to Boston last Fall.

The list of distinguished guests included George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra; Ernest B. Dane, M. A. De Wolfe Howe and Roger I. Lee, trustees of the orchestra, and Edward Kennard Rand, '94, who read a poem by Mr. Howe written for the occasion. The evening ended with singing of "Fair Harvard."

Charles H. Katkins, '09, was chairman of the dinner committee, which included James F. Dwinell, '02; Seth T. Gano, '07; Alden H. MacIntyre, '21; J. Stewart Rooney, '25; Hervey L. Smith Jr., '35, and Arthur Willis Jr., '35.

HARVARD MEN HAIL MUSICIANS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Members Guests At Banquet

B. Her

GREAT TRIBUTE FOR KOUSSEVITZKY

Jan. 29/38

The importance of musical art in the life of the community became the keynote of one of the most remarkable tributes ever accorded a musical group as Harvard men last nigh tfeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a dinner at the Harvard Club. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was the guest of honor.

Dr. Koussevitzky responded with a tribute to Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, whose grandson was in the audience last night. The conductor also bespoke the close relationship between the orchestra and Harvard University; the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, and Harvard composers.

On behalf of Harvard and Boston, Mark A. DeWolfe Howe, Boston historian, read an epic poem especially written for the occasion. Edward A. Taft, president of the Harvard Club, spoke for 437 members of the club who are regular subscribers of the Symphony season. Bentley W. Warren, president of the trustees of the orchestra, epressed the praise of his associates for the quality of the ensemble.

But it was in introducing Dr. James Rowland Angell, president emeritus of Yale University, that Mr. Warren found opportunity to extend the blessings of the orchestra beyond the Harvard Yard.

DR. ANGELL REPLIES

"As trustes of the symphony orchestra," Mr. Warren told the 300 guests of the dinner, "we are expected to know nothing about education and now we know nothing about music. But we do know that Pres. Angell of Yale found his work there a little easier because of the culture brought to New Haven by Maj. Higginson and the Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Dr. Angell responded by remarking that he was bound to look upon the fact that the orchestra gave but one concert a year at New Haven as apparently adequate to maintain the cultural level at Yale, while one hundred and ten were required in a year in Boston.

The guests heard a surprise playing of a new recording by the Symphony Orchestra of Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije," a suite that Dr. Koussevitzky and other members of the orchestra heard with evident approbation.

LEADER GRATIFIED

Dr. Angell, who is now educational adviser to a radio network summed the progress of modern culture with the statement that music had become the greatest achievement of the present age, and that in our own generation, music had gone on to victories that no other art had ever known.

Dr. Koussevitzky, expressing apperication of the close relationship between Harvard and the orchestra, said the concord was "only natural, as both institutions are essentially alike in the course they follow; science and art have the same vision and aim. But science, from its very outcome, is regarded as an indispensible cultural element, whereas musical art, too often, is entertainment.

"Therefore, the reception given us tonight by the Harvard Club of Boston has the special significance that it proves a profound understanding of the importance of musical art in the life of our community."

B. Herald

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA HONORED

Jan. 29/38

Head table guests at the dinner in the Harvard Club last night were, fro m left to right: Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor; E. A. Taft, president of the Harvard Club; Dr. James R. Angell, president-emeritus of Yale U niversity, and Bentley W. Warren, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Heard in Ravel Memorial Boston Symphony

145

MUSIC

Gl. 29/38

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky fittingly dedicated the Boston Symphony concerts this week to the memory of Maurice Ravel, the distinguished French composer, who died Dec. 28. Not only is a preponderance of Ravel's music to be heard but different programs were chosen for the concert yesterday afternoon and that of tonight.

Dr. Koussevitzky, returned from his customary mid-season respite, was greeted most cordially yesterday by both orchestra and audience. His various returns to the Symphony Hall stage, whether they occur at the outset or the middle of a season, have long since taken on the aspect of a genuine homecoming. It was good yesterday to hear Boston's magnificent orchestra again under the guiding hand of the man who has raised it to its present extraordinary stature.

Whatever the future may determine the rank of Ravel to have been as a creative artist, of this much we may now be certain: he was perhaps the most resourceful and gifted writer for orchestra after Rimsky-Korsakoff, and his considerable number of orchestral compositions are among the brightest pages of modern music. He was a fastidious craftsman, but not one whose output was limited by protracted labor. On the contrary, his total number of pieces for orchestra would require—even if the most representative were chosen—more than a single program. No doubt this is the reason Dr. Koussevitzky decided that this week's programs must differ.

If any thought that so much Ravel at a single sitting might be too much of a good thing those fears must have been dispelled after such superb performances as were achieved of the Piano Concerto, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist; the "Mother Goose" Suite, and the second Suite from the "Daphnis and Chloe" music—some of the most gorgeous pages ever conceived.

Ravel's Concerto, brilliant to the point of stunning—if also brittle and of secondary value—provides Mr. Sanroma with music in whose performance he is perhaps unexcelled. It is not a matter alone of getting in all the notes or of mastering the tricky rhythms: there is a definite spirit of modernity that must be assimilated if a pianist is really to triumph. Yesterday Mr. Sanroma, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra assuredly did triumph, as the unusually enthusiastic reception by the audience proved.

With the "Mother Goose" Suite, likewise, there is an atmosphere of sophisticated fancy that must be present in a first-rate interpretation. To indicate the innumerable passages where Dr. Koussevitzky brings out this atmosphere to the full is unnecessary; his personal command of the Ravellian style is proverbial hereabouts.

So it was with the "Daphnis and Chloe," whose fervid "Danse Generale" brought a superb afternoon to a climactic end. Even more than usually conductor and orchestra were in the vein. The concert began with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony, given a notably crisp and precise reading.

One thing it is to honor a dead composer by performing his music; it is yet more to recreate his music as magnificently as on this occasion. Tonight Dr. Koussevitzky will perform "Le Tombeau de Couperin;" the "Rhapsodie Espagnole;" the songs with orchestra, "Scheherazade," with Olga Averino as soloist, and the "Bolero." For added variety there will be Schumann's D minor Symphony.

There is a special exhibit of Raveliana in the first balcony gallery this week-end. The exhibit includes a sculptured head of Ravel by Mme. Koussevitzky. C. W. D.

Her. Jan. 29/38

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 14th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, was the soloist. The program, "in memory of Maurice Ravel" who died on Dec. 28, 1937, was as follows:

Mozart....Symphony in D major (K. 504)
Ravel....Concerto for piano and orchestra
Ravel...................."Ma Mere l'Oye"
Ravel...."Daphnis et Chloe," Second Suite

The concert given recently in Chicago in memory of Ravel chose a curious way to do him honor. Mr. Stock elected to play, of all things, Strauss's Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," for this purpose. This process of reasoning, if applied to the hypothetical death of President Roosevelt, would mean that Mr. Hoover would be asked to pronounce the eulogy! Ravel's art was so utterly different from that of Strauss that the notion of such a commemorative act as that in Chicago would have caused Ravel, we may surmise, acute annoyance, if it could have been brought to his notice. At any rate his shade should now be pacified, for a more beautiful concert than yesterday's would be hard to imagine.

To begin with, the Mozart Symphony was a happy choice and one that Ravel would have appreciated. The so-called Prague Symphony is one of Mozart's most original creations, a work of surprising effects and rare beauty. The slow introduction, the harmonic dissonances in the andante, the amazingly volatile finale, are only three of its remarkable qualities. We have long suspected that this finale, though it cannot be proved right now, was the inspiration and model for Prokofieff in his Classical Symphony. Its tightness of form, the use of the wood-winds and the vivacious spirits of this particular movement provide logical grounds for such a belief. Dr. Koussevitzky, who was warmly welcomed at his return to the stage of Symphony Hall from his vacation, is an especially fine interpreter of Mozart. The performance yesterday was a miracle of clarity.

Since the tragic death of Ravel in December there have been any number of estimates concerning the immortality of his work. This question is not, perhaps, as important as critics like to think. Ravel was a superb master of orchestration, a consummate craftsman with a delicate ear for tonal combinations and sonorities. Undoubtedly there is more of manner than of matter in his music; and the Piano Concerto is a good example of that characteristic, whether you consider it a fault or a virtue. There must be all kinds of artists, so that we may be thankful that Ravel was neither the sort of composer from whom festival oratorios are commissioned nor the inventor of abstruse systems which beget a solemn school of disciples.

Actually the Piano Concerto is a work of great brilliance, with the exception of the slow movement. His admirers have discovered a likeness to Bach in this adagio. Is not a somewhat austere resemblance to the Chopin of the nocturnes more plausible? The piano has a long cantilena in the rhythm of a very slow waltz and then the other instruments, especially the English horn, enter and show the piano how a cantilena should sound. Ravel was shrewd in treating the piano as he did in this movement.

In the other two movements we get a whiff of jazz, a ghost, a real French "revenant," who gets short shrift before Ravel is through with it. The Concerto is a display piece for the entire orchestra, with emphasis on the piano. Mr. Sanroma did a splendid job as soloist, for his playing had brilliance, precision and authority. When a percussive accentuation was needed, it appeared. When a singing tone was required, it too was there. The orchestral performance was excellent.

So too were the performances of "Ma Mere l'Oye" and Daphin et Chloe." These familiar works were naturally expected at such a concert. The audience was exceptionally keen and expressed great enthusiasm for Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Sanroma, the orchestra and, through them, Ravel's music.

The program will be completely altered at tonight's concert, as listed elsewhere on this page. Next week Yehudi Menuhin will be soloist in the much discussed Violin Concer of Schumann.

SEMINOLE, OKLA.
PRODUCER

JAN 6 - 1938

Audience Etiquet

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number, because late-comers were bustling in to the seats while the music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goers would be much pleasanter.—NORMAN TRANSCRIPT.

MERCED, CAL.
SUN-STAR

JAN 4 - 1938

AUDIENCE ETIQUET

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt the other day when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

Two Soloists With Chamber Orchestra

The Arts in Boston

Bernard Zighera continues to contrive interesting programs for his Chamber Orchestra concerts. The second of them, given last night in Jordan Hall, introduced two soloists and the American première of a Concertino for piano and orchestra by Jean Françaís. Mr. Zighera himself was the soloist in this work. The other was Joseph Szigeti, who played Corelli's "La Folia" Variations and Mozart's Concerto No. 4 in D major. The concert opened with Johann Christian Bach's Sinfonia in D major, op. 18, No. 4, and the closing number was Hugo Wolf's Italian Serenade for chamber orchestra. Richard Burgin acted as conductor of the orchestra in the concertino.

Jean Françaís is one of the younger generation of French composers, who carries on deftly the Parisian tradition. His Concertino is a gay, witty bit of music, consisting of a lively Presto, a nostalgic slow movement, a pleasing Allegretto and a brilliant Rondo. It's all over in a few minutes, but it leaves an agreeable impression of neat workmanship, rhythmic ingenuity and sophisticated charm. It was played by Mr. Zighera with complete understanding of its nature and form, and Mr. Burgin provided an appropriate accompaniment.

There was much pleasure in listening to the more ancient items of the program. J. C. Bach's Sinfonia, though it lacks outstanding individuality, is an accomplished exercise in the musical practices of the period. Mr. Szigeti brought to the interpretation of the "La Folia" and the Mozart concerto a highly developed left-hand technique and a meticulous sense of style. His tone is rather thin, his bowing is not invariably secure, his intonation is not always above suspicion, and his phrasing, especially in the Mozart, inclined to stiffness, but the integrity of his artistic approach was impressive and he was applauded warmly and long.

L. A. S.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

The Hands of J. M. Sanromá

Which Will Execute the Piano Part in Ravel's Concerto in the Memorial Program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tomorrow who has an eye for detail as well as large architectural patterns. Her pictures serve descriptive as well as pictorial ends, and for this purpose she has a closer, more detailed style than is common amongst water colorists.

Fogg Art Museum

Three landscapes by Ruisdael, Dutch master of painting of nature, have been placed in the main gallery of the Fogg Art Museum, Cambridge. One landscape is lent by Miss Helen Clay Frick, while the other two come from the Museum's collection. Since the Dutch School has been a particular favorite in this vicinity, these Ruisdaels should prove of special interest. Landscape painting as we have come to think of it today commenced in Holland, where the artists showed a frank interest and concentration upon their environment and made no attempt to improve or idealize it.

Still to be seen at Fogg are the drawings of Old Masters, and the fortnightly displays of Japanese prints.

D. A.

Second Concert Honors Ravel at Symphony

B. Trans

Schumann Work Rounds Out Program Played Under Dr. Koussevitzky

Jan. 31/38

The second concert of what constituted a two-day festival dedicated to the memory of Ravel by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky on Friday and Saturday was not quite so thrilling an affair as the first. But although the playing on Saturday sometimes lacked quite the razor-keen edge of virtuosity to be observed on Friday afternoon and the program, at least for one listener, did not have quite the same sustained interest, the second concert, judged by the usual standards, was still a most enjoyable occasion.

It was in the music of Schumann, as a matter of fact, in which the splendors of the orchestra and its conductor were most brilliantly disclosed. Along with four numbers by Ravel, Dr. Koussevitzky had included on the program the Schumann D minor Symphony for reasons which were considered if not determined in this space the other day. The result at least was most gratifying. The Bostonian strings have seemingly never sounded better. The conductor presided over a presentation so warm, genial, romantic and sympathetic as must have pleased the most exacting devotees of Schumann.

The concert, otherwise concerned with the music of Ravel, began with "Le Tombeau de Couperin." Here was most admirably displayed Ravel the miniaturist; also Ravel the orchestral transcriber, whether of his own or another's work (the composition in question was originally written by Ravel for piano solo). The performance enlisted the finest qualities of Koussevitzky the interpreter and of his virtuoso assistants. For special mention, salute to the oboist, Fernand Gillet.

On the "Rhapsodie Espagnole" players and conductor again lavished their finest abilities. But somehow the thing did not quite come off. The trouble was not with the performers nor (it is to be hoped, perhaps presumptuously) with the listener, but with the composer. The typical Ravel inhibitions, which are well enough in their place and even constitute to a certain extent the essence of his style, do not seem to belong here. Not only "tourist" composers but the Spanish themselves have led us to expect a more opulent, passionate voice than Ravel causes to sound. His ironic understatements make a good joke for a while, but they get to be annoying when they persist through perhaps three-quarters of the "Rhapsodie."

In "Scheherazade" everyone concerned was fortunate that the soloist was Olga Averino, the Bostonian soprano, mistress of the text, atmosphere and Ravelian inflection, not to mention the lovely quality sustained by the voice throughout. So persuasive was her singing, with the accompanying orchestra perfectly attuned (salute, again, to the flutist, Georges Laurent), that one scarcely had need of the text in the program book, an item that was at a premium on Saturday night, when perhaps the management was caught unawares by an audience that filled the hall.

It was a pity that "Bolero," not the finer-grained, more engrossing "Valse," ended the program. But after a mildly uncertain beginning, Dr. Koussevitzky and his instrumentalists delivered the repetitious measures so tellingly and with such tremendous verve that one who has come to hate the piece ended by almost being convinced. The audience, untroubled by such speculations for the most part, applauded here, as earlier in the concert, much more warmly and excitedly than had the company assembled on the matinee.

M. S.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 31

◆ ◆ ◆

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening at the Metropolitan Theatre, where it presented the third concert of its season here.

Yehudi Menuhin and the Rediscovered Schum

B. Traus.
Jan. 29/38

Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct a Remarkably Played Ravel Memorial Program

By Moses Smith

A list of the seven wonders of the twentieth century must include a performance of the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. To hear it, as did an audience that crowded Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, is an unparalleled experience, which miraculously repeats itself on each occasion when the work is played under the same auspices.

Whether a composition, relying so much for effect upon the virtuosity of the instrumentalists, will soon lose its compelling power only a prohpet would undertake to say. But as the gorgeous panorama of tone unfolded at the close of yesterday's concert there was no indication that such an eventuality is impending. The same considerations affect two other works of Ravel, the Piano Concerto and "Ma mere l'oye," which, with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony in D major, rounded out yesterday's concert.

The program, which will not, by exception, be repeated tonight, was part of the memorial tribute to the distinguished French composer who died a month ago. The rest of the tribute will be contained in tonight's program, consisting of the Schumann Symphony in D minor and, by Ravel, "Le tombeau de Couperin," "Rhapsodie Espagnole," "Scheherazade" and "Bolero."

Exactly why there should be two different programs this week has not been made clear; nor why other names than Ravel's should intrude on those which were made up. A plausible explanation would be that Dr. Koussevitzky wished to present at this time more of Ravel's music than might reasonably be played at a single concert; and that, on the other hand, music of other masters might be employed to avoid the risk of monotony. The pros and cons of the question, which have already been suggested by some of the most interested parties (the members of the two audiences), might profitably be treated on another occasion. For the present it must suffice to say that yesterday's program was admirably arranged.

* * *

It was remarkably played, too, even when one has taken account of the prevailingly high standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor's name is included advisedly, since the standard was not nearly so high during the two weeks' interregnum of a guest conductor just passed. Dr. Koussevitzy had hardly come on the stage to greet a rising orchestra than it was apparent that the audience not only was glad to welcome him back but also was prepared to resettle itself comfortably in anticipation of the kind of music-making that has come to be both familiar and expected.

No disappointment was apparent to ears which, according to an occasional correspondent, are excessively demanding. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully presented, with full grasp of its dramatic and highly emotional character. For this Symphony, like Mozart's "Big Three" and some of the operas, is not merely another "charming" work, of the type that is now almost synonymous with the eighteenth century. That century was rich in formalities, in furbelows that can still amuse, entertain and even engross us. It was the genius of Mozart that enabled him to see beneath and above the forms; to write music that reminds us that people were "real" beneath their rococo investiture.

How timeless was Mozart's expression, exemplified in this Symphony, will readily be apparent to those having an opportunity to hear the Schumann D minor Symphony so soon after the "Prague." They will hear, in the Scherzo of Schumann's work, a fairly elaborately developed sequence that seems to have been lifted bodily out of the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony in a major key. The melodic outline, even the imitation among several parts might have been written by the same man. Yet Schumann was a Romantic and Mozart a classic, two supposedly opposite poles.

* * *

A good deal has been made of the limits of Ravel's expression. But its variety, rather, was impressed on the hearer yesterday. Both in externals and in spirit a million miles separate the exquisite miniatures of "Mere l'oye" from the Piano Concerto. Both were given superlatively refined and understanding performance yesterday. Refinement predominated, as it should, of course, in the playing of the little pieces; and it was the greater pity that simultaneously much of the audience suffered an attack of that particular species of noise known as "coughing." For the other, the orchestra was brilliantly assisted by Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose mastery of the keyboard and of music of our time had its familiar virtues plus profundity, to the extent that the latter was required in Ravel's Concerto.

This is no mere salon glitter. The first movement, in particular, is of remarkable construction and content. Its employment of varied jazz expression makes it almost monumental—the finest thing of the sort done by a non-American that comes to mind at the moment. The slow movement and finale carry out all the promises made by Mr. Burk's program notes and quotations.

Mr. Sanroma deserved the long enthusiastic applause lavished upon him by a friendly audience. So, too, did the orchestra, to which the pianist transferred his gratitude collectively by a hand-shake with Mr. Burgin; and Dr. Koussevitzky, who stayed back-stage studiously while Mr. Sanroma returned several times.

In the performance of the music from "Dahpnis and Chloe," conductor and orchestra indicated, as brilliantly as ever before, the reason for their high estate generally and particularly in the music of Maurice Ravel. It is easy to write at great length and detail about a bad performance or even a good one, whereas a superlative accomplishment often leaves one speechless. Perhaps that is why the following applause was relatively light. But it is more likely that most of the auditors were simply employing their prerogative of escaping from the hall as soon as possible after the formal completion of the program. There ought to be a law . . .

Violin Concerto on the Immediate Horizon

To a Band of Artists

(For a dinner to the conductor and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Harvard Club of Boston last night)

When Orpheus, maestro of antiquity,
With lyre and song had charmed the roaring sea,
He stepped ashore, and lo! the trees and rocks,
The birds and beasts, in rapturous, silent flocks,
Gave ear and homage to his magic art;
And all were well, had not the gentler part
Of humankind—at least reputed so—
The women, changed from friend to furious foe,
Turning on Orpheus, torn him limb from limb.

Take warning, Koussevitzky, now from him!
Quit for a while the plaudits of "the sex,"
And for Regina substitute mere Rex!
Safer than Orpheus you have always been—
He played his hand alone, and you are seen
Companioned by a hundred valiant knights,
Fellows in art, no fumbling neophytes,
But masters in the realm of beauteous sound
Held in the leash till marvelously unbound
By motions of your magic wand. Now man
To man drum we the heart-beat's rataplan.

Harvard and Music—Art and Learning—all
Symphonious words that fit this festival!
Would that such skill in learning were the boast
Tonight of each half-tutored Harvard host
As every guest, skilled in his art, commands,
Bearing the boon of beauty in his hands!

For us, from much forgot, one saving grace
Remains—wherewith to save collegiate face:
We learned across the Charles to employ the test
Of good and better, but to love the best,
And kept enough of ancient Greek the while
To feel the meaning of "aristophile."
Loving the best, then, Maestro, masters each,
We love your music, and in plodding speech,
Rougher than music's universal tongue,
Proclaim your praises which were rightlier sung.
Praises—away with shy diminuendo!
Praises—and gratitude in full crescendo,
Blessing, fortissimo, this artist-band
That's blessed our town, our college, and our land!

M. A. DeWolfe Howe

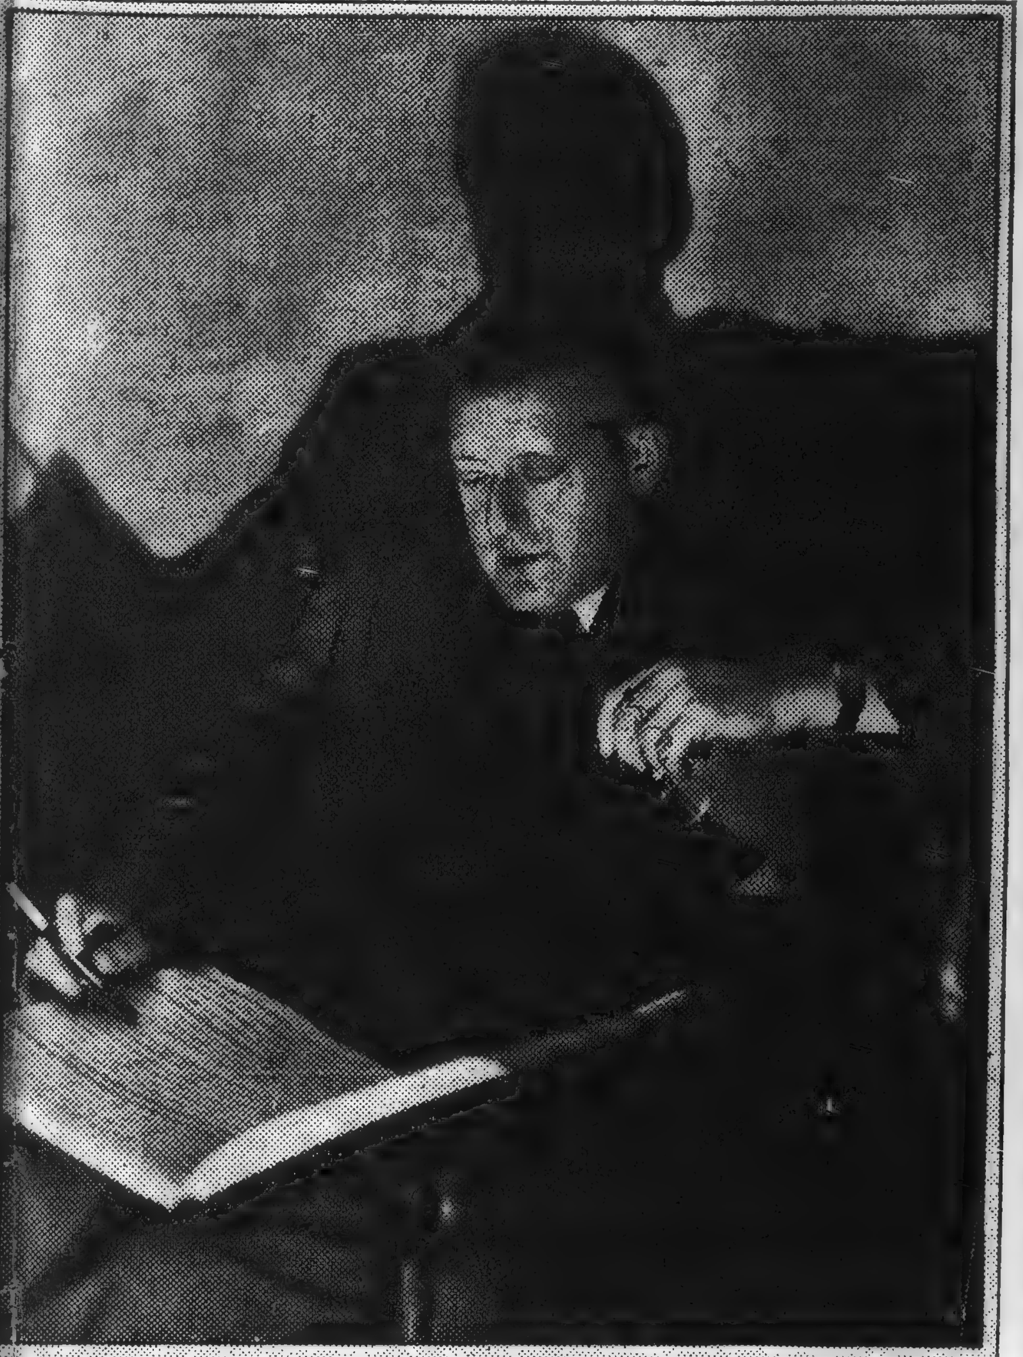
BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1938

he Rediscovered Schumann Violin Concerto on

Conductors at Ease: Pose and Repose

(Bachrach)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who returned after a fortnight's holiday for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening.



ARTUR RODZINSKI
Director of the Cleveland Orchestra, which will come to Boston for a single concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, February 10.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1938

l Musicians --- News of

Yehudi Menuhin to Play Schuman Concerto with Boston Symphony

By Moses Smith

The tale about Robert Schumann's Violin Concerto in D minor, which Yehudi Menuhin will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, is long and extraordinary. It has, however, been told and retold in recent months. For a practically unknown composition of sizable dimensions by a composer of Schumann's stature cannot be revealed to the world under startling attendant circumstances without engaging the attention of even those who "make up" the "front" page.

It will, therefore, suffice that one be reminded of the barest skeleton of facts concerning the present work and of the body of legend that has surrounded it. It was completed, including orchestration, not later than Oct. 3, 1853, according to Schumann's own entry into his diary. It soon became known to Schumann's inner circle of friends, including Brahms and Joseph Joachim, the violinist, for whom it was intended.

Within three years Schumann had left what had been, during these years, indeed a vale of tears, without hearing his Concerto in public. He died insane, it will be recalled; and some evidence of mental derangement as early as the spring of the year in which the Concerto was composed is noted by his biographer. Joachim never played the work in public, for reasons which themselves have been the subject of controversy; and eventually he gave up playing it in private. When he died in 1907 he bequeathed the manuscript to the Prussian State Library, with the stipulation that it was not to be published until 100 years after Schumann's death—that is, 1956.

At the intercession of the publishers, B. Schott's Soehne, Mainz, the custodians of the Library were persuaded to release the score for publication. Connected with that fact somehow is the remarkable tale of how Jelly d'Aranyi, violinist and grandniece of Joachim, is said to have discovered the existence of the Concerto by means of spirit messages from her granduncle. Meanwhile Menuhin had been interested in the work and was given, as the story runs, the rights of first performance by the publishers.

While an anxious world was wondering whether Menuhin would actually give the first performance with the St. Louis Orchestra under Vladimir Golschmann last November or whether Miss d'Aranyi would beat him to it in London, the Nazi authorities intervened, having determined that it was obviously out of the question for a German composition of such importance to be first presented to a breathless world by a non-Aryan, and outside of Germany to boot. Consequently the first performance took place at a broadcast concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, with Georg Kulenkampf as soloist, on Nov. 26, 1937. The first American performance, with Schumann's piano accompaniment, was given by Menuhin in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Dec. 6, 1937. He played it subsequently with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Golschmann on Dec. 23. On Jan. 21-22 he played it with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy; and on Jan. 27 and 28 with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Georges Enesco.

The Eagle
PITTSFIELD. MASSACHUSETTS
WEEKLY ESTABLISHED 1789
DAILY ESTABLISHED 1892
(Entered at the Post Office, Pittsfield Mass. as Second Class Mail Matter.)
TELEPHONE
Dial 7311 for all departments.
MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited to this paper and also the local news published herein.
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1938

Pittsfield Symphony

With musical Pittsfield rejoicing in the re-birth of the Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra, the efforts of Mr. Fred Little and Mr. Ulysse Buhler in this direction in years past seem all the more valiant in retrospect. Home grown symphony orchestras in a town the size of Pittsfield, even today present considerable difficulties owing to the limitation of population and the number of skilled and interested instrumentalists available. The founders of the movement also had to struggle against other obstacles which happily do not exist today. Hall rentals and the necessity of pulling in from the outside needed players to fill out the symphonic ensemble added considerable to the expense of maintaining the organization in spite of the fervid enthusiasm of the sponsors.

With the emergence last night of the re-born Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Jay Rosenfeld with the assistance of Mr. Alphonse Pelletier, however, the occasion is more propitious for a permanent and successful organization. With the sponsorship of the progressive and civic-minded Stanley Club, the orchestra fortunately has a rehearsal and concert hall offered to them gratus. The growth of the city has added needed instrumentalists. The radio has inculcated in the public a much keener interest in the symphonic form than existed before. And lastly, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has brought many Pittsfield people in contact with symphony music "in the flesh" who hitherto were not in a position to know or understand it.

The announcement that the orchestra plans another concert a few weeks hence with last night's receipts going toward the purchase of symphonic scores is good news indeed. With it being natural that precision and teamwork will improve as the orchestra continues, with it so evident from last night's audience that there is a genuine and spontaneous interest in the organization, and with a fine reservoir of young players to draw from in the future out of Mr. Pelletier's separate Stanley Club Junior Symphony Orchestra, signs are encouraging that the revived Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra has before it a glorious future.

146

Yehudi Menuhin and the Rediscovered Schumann Violin Concerto on the Immediate Horizon

B. Traus.

Jan. 29/38

Symphony Concert

Koussevitzky Returns to Conduct a Remarkably Played Ravel Memorial Program

By Moses Smith

A list of the seven wonders of the twentieth century must include a performance of the Second Suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. To hear it, as did an audience that crowded Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, is an unparalleled experience, which miraculously repeats itself on each occasion when the work is played under the same auspices.

Whether a composition, relying so much for effect upon the virtuosity of the instrumentalists, will soon lose its compelling power only a prohpet would undertake to say. But as the gorgeous panorama of tone unfolded at the close of yesterday's concert there was no indication that such an eventuality is impending. The same considerations affect two other works of Ravel, the Piano Concerto and "Ma mere l'oye," which, with Mozart's "Prague" Symphony in D major, rounded out yesterday's concert.

The program, which will not, by exception, be repeated tonight, was part of the memorial tribute to the distinguished French composer who died a month ago. The rest of the tribute will be contained in tonight's program, consisting of the Schumann Symphony in D minor and, by Ravel, "Le tombeau de Couperin," "Rhapsodie Espagnole," "Scheherazade" and "Bolero."

Exactly why there should be two different programs this week has not been made clear; nor why other names than Ravel's should intrude on those which were made up. A plausible explanation would be that Dr. Koussevitzky wished to present at this time more of Ravel's music than might reasonably be played at a single concert; and that, on the other hand, music of other masters might be employed to avoid the risk of monotony. The pros and cons of the question, which have already been suggested by some of the most interested parties (the members of the two audiences), might profitably be treated on another occasion. For the present it must suffice to say that yesterday's program was admirably arranged.

* * *

It was remarkably played, too, even when one has taken account of the prevailingly high standard of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. The conductor's name is included advisedly, since the standard was not nearly so high during the two weeks' interregnum of a guest conductor just passed. Dr. Koussevitzy had hardly come on the stage to greet a rising orchestra than it was apparent that the audience not only was glad to welcome him back but also was prepared to resettle itself comfortably in anticipation of the kind of music-making that has come to be both familiar and expected.

No disappointment was apparent to ears which, according to an occasional correspondent, are excessively demanding. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully presented, with full grasp of its dramatic and highly emotional character. For this Symphony, like Mozart's "Big Three" and some of the operas, is not merely another "charming" work, of the type that is now almost synonymous with the eighteenth century. That century was rich in formalities, in furbelows that can still amuse, entertain and even engross us. It was the genius of Mozart that enabled him to see beneath and above the forms; to write music that reminds us that people were "real" beneath their rococo investiture.

How timeless was Mozart's expression, exemplified in this Symphony, will readily be apparent to those having an opportunity to hear the Schumann D minor Symphony so soon after the "Prague." They will hear, in the Scherzo of Schumann's work, a fairly elaborately developed sequence that seems to have been lifted bodily out of the slow movement of Mozart's Symphony in a major key. The melodic outline, even the imitation among several parts might have been written by the same man. Yet Schumann was a Romantic and Mozart a classic, two supposedly opposite poles.

* * *

A good deal has been made of the limits of Ravel's expression. But its variety, rather, was impressed on the hearer yesterday. Both in externals and in spirit a million miles separate the exquisite miniatures of "Mere l'oye" from the Piano Concerto. Both were given superlatively refined and understanding performance yesterday. Refinement predominated, as it should, of course, in the playing of the little pieces; and it was the greater pity that simultaneously much of the audience suffered an attack of that particular species of noise known as "coughing." For the other, the orchestra was brilliantly assisted by Jesus Maria Sanroma, whose mastery of the keyboard and of music of our time had its familiar virtues plus profundity, to the extent that the latter was required in Ravel's Concerto.

This is no mere salon glitter. The first movement, in particular, is of remarkable construction and content. Its employment of varied jazz expression makes it almost monumental—the finest thing of the sort done by a non-American that comes to mind at the moment. The slow movement and finale carry out all the promises made by Mr. Burk's program notes and quotations.

Mr. Sanroma deserved the long enthusiastic applause lavished upon him by a friendly audience. So, too, did the orchestra, to which the pianist transferred his gratitude collectively by a hand-shake with Mr. Burgin; and Dr. Koussevitzky, who stayed back-stage studiously while Mr. Sanroma returned several times.

In the performance of the music from "Dahpnis and Chloe," conductor and orchestra indicated, as brilliantly as ever before, the reason for their high estate generally and particularly in the music of Maurice Ravel. It is easy to write at great length and detail about a bad performance or even a good one, whereas a superlative accomplishment often leaves one speechless. Perhaps that is why the following applause was relatively light. But it is more likely that most of the auditors were simply employing their prerogative of escaping from the hall as soon as possible after the formal completion of the program. There ought to be a law . . .

To a Band of Artists

(For a dinner to the conductor and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Harvard Club of Boston last night)

When Orpheus, maestro of antiquity,
With lyre and song had charmed the roaring sea,
He stepped ashore, and lo! the trees and rocks,
The birds and beasts, in rapturous, silent flocks,
Gave ear and homage to his magic art;
And all were well, had not the gentler part
Of humankind—at least reputed so—
The women, changed from friend to furious foe,
Turning on Orpheus, torn him limb from limb.

Take warning, Koussevitzky, now from him!
Quit for a while the plaudits of "the sex,"
And for Regina substitute mere Rex!
Safer than Orpheus you have always been—
He played his hand alone, and you are seen
Companioned by a hundred valiant knights,
Fellows in art, no fumbling neophytes,
But masters in the realm of beauteous sound
Held in the leash till marvelously unbound
By motions of your magic wand. Now man
To man drum we the heart-beat's rataplan.

Harvard and Music—Art and Learning—all
Symphonious words that fit this festival!
Would that such skill in learning were the boast
Tonight of each half-tutored Harvard host
As every guest, skilled in his art, commands,
Bearing the boon of beauty in his hands!

For us, from much forgot, one saving grace
Remains—wherewith to save collegiate face:
We learned across the Charles to employ the test
Of good and better, but to love the best,
And kept enough of ancient Greek the while
To feel the meaning of "aristophile."
Loving the best, then, Maestro, masters each,
We love your music, and in plodding speech,
Rougher than music's universal tongue,
Proclaim your praises which were rightlier sung.
Praises—away with shy diminuendo!
Praises—and gratitude in full crescendo,
Blessing, fortissimo, this artist-band
That's blessed our town, our college, and our land!

M. A. DeWolfe Howe

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1938

l Musicians --- News of

Yehudi Menuhin to Play Schuman Concerto with Boston Symphony

By Moses Smith

The tale about Robert Schumann's Violin Concerto in D minor, which Yehudi Menuhin will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, is long and extraordinary. It has, however, been told and retold in recent months. For a practically unknown composition of sizable dimensions by a composer of Schumann's stature cannot be revealed to the world under startling attendant circumstances without engaging the attention of even those who "make up" the "front" page.

It will, therefore, suffice that one be reminded of the barest skeleton of facts concerning the present work and of the body of legend that has surrounded it. It was completed, including orchestration, not later than Oct. 3, 1853, according to Schumann's own entry into his diary. It soon became known to Schumann's inner circle of friends, including Brahms and Joseph Joachim, the violinist, for whom it was intended.

Within three years Schumann had left what had been, during these years, indeed a vale of tears, without hearing his Concerto in public. He died insane, it will be recalled; and some evidence of mental derangement as early as the spring of the year in which the Concerto was composed is noted by his biographer. Joachim never played the work in public, for reasons which themselves have been the subject of controversy; and eventually he gave up playing it in private. When he died in 1907 he bequeathed the manuscript to the Prussian State Library, with the stipulation that it was not to be published until 100 years after Schumann's death—that is, 1956.

At the intercession of the publishers, B. Schott's Soehne, Mainz, the custodians of the Library were persuaded to release the score for publication. Connected with that fact somehow is the remarkable tale of how Jelly d'Aranyi, violinist and grandniece of Joachim, is said to have discovered the existence of the Concerto by means of spirit messages from her granduncle. Meanwhile Menuhin had been interested in the work and was given, as the story runs, the rights of first performance by the publishers.

While an anxious world was wondering whether Menuhin would actually give the first performance with the St. Louis Orchestra under Vladimir Golschmann last November or whether Miss d'Aranyi would beat him to it in London, the Nazi authorities intervened, having determined that it was obviously out of the question for a German composition of such importance to be first presented to a breathless world by a non-Aryan, and outside of Germany to boot. Consequently the first performance took place at a broadcast concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, with Georg Kulenkampf as soloist, on Nov. 26, 1937. The first American performance, with Schumann's piano accompaniment, was given by Menuhin in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Dec. 6, 1937. He played it subsequently with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra under Golschmann on Dec. 23. On Jan. 21-22 he played it with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy; and on Jan. 27 and 28 with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society under Georges Enesco.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1938

Priest's Will Gives $146,000 Bequests

Two wills drawn by Father Antanasius Gannam, Syrian Ro man Catholic priest who ha $67,000 in securities concealed i his vestments when he died, wer filed for probate in the Suffol
Probate registry.

The first will was dated 192
The second, made in 1930, pro vides for bequests totaling $146
000, of which one was for $20,00
the Society for the Propaga of the Faith in Rome.

list Wil Tell n Diseases

the series o at the Faulk
eld tomor ck wit pecia
tal

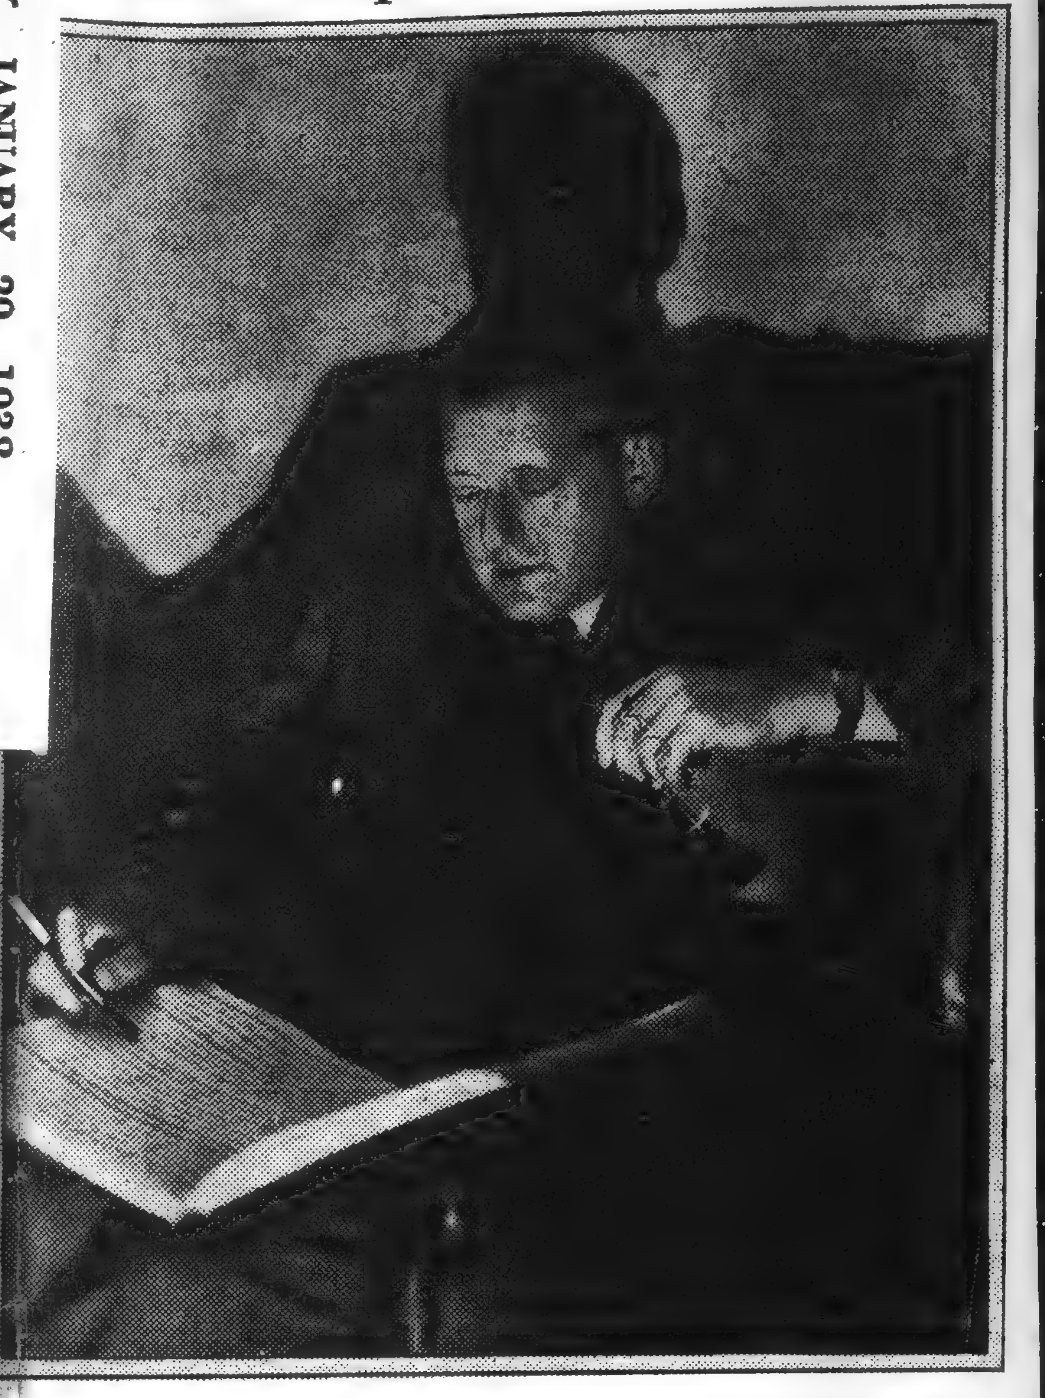
SATURDAY, JANUARY 29, 1938

n Violin Concerto on

Pose and Repose

(Bachrach)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who returned after a fortnight's holiday for the concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening.



ARTUR RODZINSKI
Director of the Cleveland Orchestra, which will come to Boston for a single concert in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, February 10.

The Eagle
PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS
WEEKLY ESTABLISHED 1789
DAILY ESTABLISHED 1893
(Entered at the Post Office, Pittsfield Mass. as Second Class Mail Matter.)
TELEPHONE
Dial 7311 for all departments.
MEMBER OF THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
The Associated Press is exclusively entitled to the use for republication of all news dispatches credited to it or not otherwise credited to this paper and also the local news published herein.
THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1938

Pittsfield Symphony

With musical Pittsfield rejoicing in the re-birth of the Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra, the efforts of Mr. Fred Little and Mr. Ulysse Buhler in this direction in years past seem all the more valiant in retrospect. Home grown symphony orchestras in a town the size of Pittsfield, even today present considerable difficulties owing to the limitation of population and the number of skilled and interested instrumentalists available. The founders of the movement also had to struggle against other obstacles which happily do not exist today. Hall rentals and the necessity of pulling in from the outside needed players to fill out the symphonic ensemble added considerable to the expense of maintaining the organization in spite of the fervid enthusiasm of the sponsors.

With the emergence last night of the re-born Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Jay Rosenfeld with the assistance of Mr. Alphonse Pelletier, however, the occasion is more propitious for a permanent and successful organization. With the sponsorship of the progressive and civic-minded Stanley Club, the orchestra fortunately has a rehearsal and concert hall offered to them gratus. The growth of the city has added needed instrumentalists. The radio has inculcated in the public a much keener interest in the symphonic form than existed before. And lastly, the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has brought many Pittsfield people in contact with symphony music "in the flesh" who hitherto were not in a position to know or understand it.

The announcement that the orchestra plans another concert a few weeks hence with last night's receipts going toward the purchase of symphonic scores is good news indeed. With it being natural that precision and teamwork will improve as the orchestra continues, with it so evident from last night's audience that there is a genuine and spontaneous interest in the organization, and with a fine reservoir of young players to draw from in the future out of Mr. Pelletier's separate Stanley Club Junior Symphony Orchestra, signs are encouraging that the revived Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra has before it a glorious future.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

141

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

JAN 16 1938

Themes and Variations On the Musical Scale

Mickey Mouse and Lieutenant Kije Approve Program Peeping Practice

By Linton Martin

When Mickey Mouse becomes "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" under Leopold Stokowski's direction for Walt Disney, film fans may learn more about the old legend of the commotion caused by a magician's mischievous assistant than some symphony subscribers know. That is, unless those concertgoers who happen to be uninformed resort to the deplored practice of program peeping while Paul Dukas' clever scherzo telling the tale in tone is being played. And not to know is to miss the point.

Which shows that, whatever potential value as an educational institution Mickey Mouse may have, program peeping has its points. This was definitely demonstrated at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert for the Forum here week before last. Not because there were program notes for peeping and perusal. But because there weren't.

Naturally, it did not matter a hoot in the Haydn and Brahms symphonies. It isn't vitally important to read "Presto!" in the program to be prepared to whiz 'round the tonal corner on two ears, or to see "Adagio" in order to relax for a comfortable nap.

But it is different in the case of a program piece to a definite story like Prokofieff's "Lieutenant Kije." Not to know the idea involved kept the audience in the dark. And while the subtitles of the separate sections of the suite held a hint, and the music itself was manifestly amusing, still it could not tell the satiric story of the mythical soldier born in the blundering brain of Czar Paul I and pounced upon by the contemporary Russian composer for a bit of spoofing at the old order when even a Czar's best "yes" men could not tell him if he made a mistake.

Making Music More Amusing

The symphonic fortunes and fate of "Lieutenant Kije" here just about reversed the process that presently will bring "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" to the films as a Mickey Mouse movie. For where the forthcoming Stokowski-Disney collaboration will transform a symphonic fragment into a film figure, Lieutenant Kije several years ago achieved celluloid celebrity as a Soviet cinema, and it was from the incidental music written by Prokofieff for the film that the orchestral suite was made.

Had the film been run off in the Academy before playing "Lieutenant Kije," the audience would have understood the little musical joke and its satiric implications, even without the prop of program notes. But that would be as reprehensibly revolutionary, as sacrilegious at a symphony concert as it would be for Stokowski to preface a performance of "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" at some future Philadelphia Orchestra concert by showing him as a Mickey Mouse movie.

And that would never do at all. Not only would it make the tale intelligible to members of the audience who can't or won't read, but the sheer novelty of the thing might lure film fans into buying those otherwise empty seats which have occasioned concern.

Cork, Rayon, Rag, Blotto!

Printed programs, and program notes, have often been viewed with vexation by conductors, as well as by many concert-goers. What sensitive symphony subscriber has not, on occasion, been distractingly annoyed by some program twiddler, unconsciously tapping time with the program booklet? Or—worse still and perhaps unconsciously—pawing the pages.

Such rustling sounds may seriously injure what Stokowski once referred to as "that surface of silence which is the canvas upon which the orchestra paints its pictures of tone." This nervous but annoying fingering and fumbling with programs has driven more than one desperate and maddened maestro and management to resort to various expedients and experiments to offset it, or reduce it to a minimum.

Some years ago, although the general public never knew it, Stokowski and the printers of the Philadelphia Orchestra programs held a huddle to hit upon some kind of limp paper that couldn't crackle even if a concert-goer tried to make it lay an egg. The rograms issued to the invited audiences at the concerts of the new million-dollar National Broadcasting Company Orchestra conducted by Toscanini have been, thus far printed on blotting paper, rayon, and most recently, on cork. It's all to cut out crackle, which is just so much studio static for the microphone's delicate diaphragm.

When Audiences Can't Read

Spoken program notes were used it may be recalled, when Paul Whiteman upset the sacrosanct serenity of the Philadelphia Orchestra season a year ago last fall. On that occasion Deems Taylor divertingly described what was to come, before the performance of each piece on the delirious program.

"I have attended some Philadelphia Orchestra concerts," said Mr. Taylor, "when the audience was so deep in program notes you could not tell whether it was a symphony performance or a rainy afternoon at the public library."

But that was not the reason jocosely given by Mr. Taylor for his spoken program notes. "This audience," he said, "includes Stokowski's audience and Ormandy's audience. But it also includes Whiteman's audience. And the Whiteman audience can't read." At which point Paul Whiteman leaned forward and whispered something into Mr. Taylor's nearest ear. Whereupon the commentator added, "Neither can Mr. Whiteman's musicians."

But Mr. Taylor's principal point was well made, and was sound in principle even if it could not be proved. Naturally, the concerts should be occasions of music-making and hearing, before literary exercises in a library. For anybody in the Orchestra audence able to read the program notes in a darkened auditorium of the Academy would have to be owl-eyed enough to merit a medal for uncanny eyesight.

Did Beethoven Begin It?

Back in the dear, dead days when Haydn and Mozart wrote their symphonies, and "pure" music was prevalent, there was no problem of program peeping. And for the simple reason that "program" music with a plot to present had not reared its horrid head. It was only needful to know that "the fast movement goes fast, and the slow movement goes slow"—as Stokowski once said in effect, in speaking his own program notes about some Mozart symphony over the radio.

Then along came Beethoven with his "Pastoral" Symphony and all the trouble began. It has not stopped since. And, in the case of most modern music, eyes as well as ears, intellect as well as emotion, are called upon for proper appreciation and understanding.

Without adequate program notes, some unsophisticated symphony subscriber might even mistake Darius Dinkelbaum's tone poem of "The Traveling Salesman and the Farmer's Daughter" for Mousekolinsky's sublime "Flight of Angels." Obviously, the program note is here to stay. It is not its legitimate use, but its abuse, that is to be berated.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

[illegible]

At the next concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday evening, March 1, Raya Garbousova, violoncellist, will appear as soloist. The Symphony's fifth and final Providence concert of the season is scheduled for Tuesday night, April 5.

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE

JAN 23 1938

Men of Boston Symphony Are Musicians Year 'Round

NEW YORK, Jan. 22.—(Associated Press.)—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year, has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston Symphony player who needs and wants the work can have 46 weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

When, Oct. 1 of each year, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk back doors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the summer doorstep.

Have Summer Jobs

They emerge from congenial summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready to work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-Symphony society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra he specifically pointed out that his men had a right to be cared for through the year. The orchestra was non-union then, of course; it still is, the only non-union first quality orchestra in the country.

The management began at once, according to present symphony officials, to plan for summer work which would employ those men who did not want to spend the summer in teaching, in private musical enterprises, or just loafing.

Begin Promenade Concerts

The plan begun in 1885 was a summer popular series—they called them "promenade concerts" then, and that was before the Queen's hall "promenades" in London. Technically, they remained promenade concerts for decades, although Boston quickly indicated that when it combined good music and good drink, it wanted to take both sitting down.

The public named this two-month spring series, when old Symphony hall emerges from the winter be-latticed and refurbished, the "pops." They have steadily grown more popular, and steadily better in a musical sense.

Before the war, (but in very few places now) many symphony men could spend their summers in high class ensembles, employed by equally high class hotels. Teaching then was also profitable. These things took the men through the hot months.

Will Play by River

Excepting for such old-time hotels as the Wentworth north of Boston; the Crawford up in New Hampshire and the Placid in the Adirondacks, these ensembles have been traded for dance bands.

So the esplanade concerts, given on the Charles river bank, were evolved in 1929. These will have, it is possible, a very handsome new home this summer. But in any case 50-60 symphony men will play for a month by the water as usual.

It works so—by May 1 the regular symphony season is done, for the orchestra does not bang around the country playing for spring festivals.

The pops begin after only a three-day rest, according to George E. Judd manager of the orchestra. These continue until July 4; Mr. Judd is, for those two months, a licensed "common victualler," which is Massachusetts' way of saying restaurant man with a liquor license.

The week after the pops end, the esplanade begins. This closes just in time for the orchestra (all of it this time) to entrain for its August home—"Tanglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshires, where there is building what many musicians have called potentially the most important music festival in the world.

This takes the orchestra through the middle of August and eventually will, it is believed, continue much longer.

Which is where Colonel Higginson's policy has led, after 57 years of development.

OAKLAND, CAL.
POST - ENQUIRER

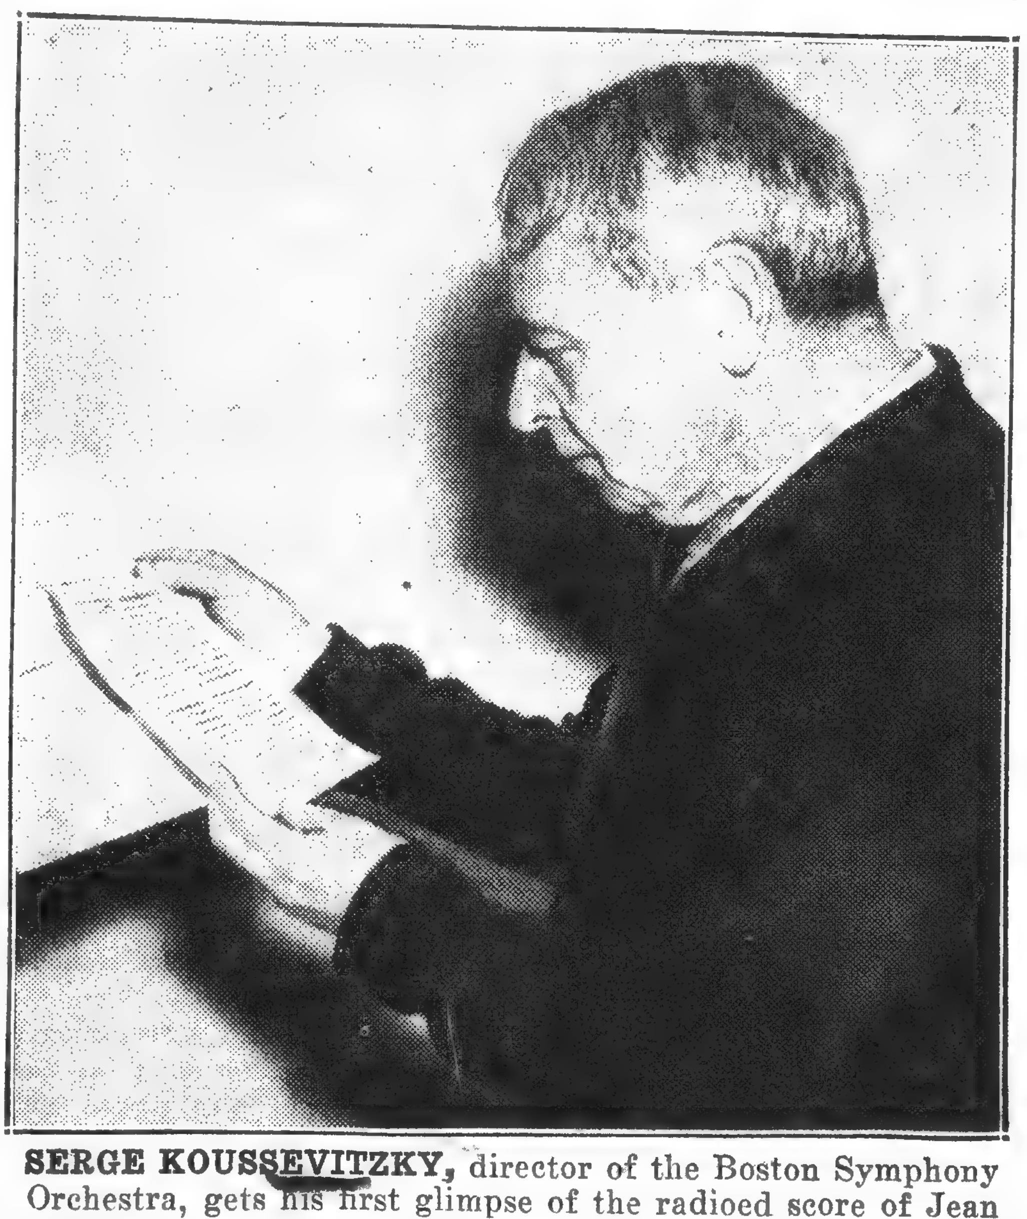
JAN 25 1938

GIRL ABOUT TOWN

Koussevitsky, the Boston maestro, brought his famous band to our Carnegie hall for a concert recently, and like to have burned to a crisp! Before the hall he found pickets with signs charging that the conductor supported the Reds! I asked the angry Serge why this was, and he said that not long ago he gave a concert for the benefit of the homeless children of Spain — political faith not specified. Well, all I can say is that if this is being Red, may we all go bright crimson!

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

Score Ready for Symphony



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets his first glimpse of the radioed score of Jean Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." Original score of the Finnish composer's little known work was lost in the mail en route to the United States from Germany, so that it was necessary to transmit the score by radio in time for the performance of the Helsinki University Chorus which was accompanied by the orchestra. Wide World Photo.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
TIMES

JAN 23 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY MEN RECEIVE STEADY WORK

NEW YORK, Jan. 22 (AP).—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year, has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston symphony player who needs and wants the work can have forty-six weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

When, Oct. 1 of each year, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk backdoors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the summer doorstep.

They emerge from congenial summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready for work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

JAN 26 1938

Boston Programs.

The programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week will be dedicated to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel and will consist chiefly of his compositions. The Friday afternoon program will include his Piano Concerto, with Sanroma as the soloist; the "Mother Goose" suite and the second suite from "Daphnis and Chloe" and will open with Mozart's Prague Symphony.

On Saturday evening the list will include "Tombeau de Couperin; "Rapsodie Espagnole"; "Schererezade," in which Olga Averino will be the soloist; the ever popular "Bolero" and Schumann's "Fourth Symphony."

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER - NEWS

JAN 29 1938

Boston Symphony To Give Concert At Rutgers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, announces a rich and varied program for its concert to be given in the gymnasium, Rutgers University, Tuesday, Feb. 8, 8:30 p. m. The opening number will be Mozart's Symphony in D-major, K. 504, known as the "Prague" Symphony because of having had its premiere performance in the Cech capital.

Music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer, who died last Dec. 28, will be represented by the Second Suite of his "Daphnis and Chloe." Conceived for a large orchestra and utilizing the utmost resources of modern orchestral coloring, this Suite is often described as Ravel's masterpiece.

Also on the program is the Second Symphony in D-major of the celebrated Suomialienen (Finnish) composer, Jean Sibelius. Full of mysterious intense qualities and haunting imaginative power, it is one of the most exciting, original, and extraordinary creations of the modern musical mind.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 30 1938

SYMPHONY HONORS RAVEL

Boston, Jan. 29.—(AP)—A brilliant performance of Maurice Ravel's famous, rhythm-packed Bolero tonight wound up an unusual two-day tribute to the composer by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Ravel, many of whose works were introduced by Koussevitzky, a close friend, died in Paris last month.

Funniest Experiences of Musicians Well Known to Hub Audiences

Rare Collection of True and Delightful Anecdotes About Happy and Distressing Moments in Lives of Opera, Concert and Radio Stars, Which They Still Chuckle Over

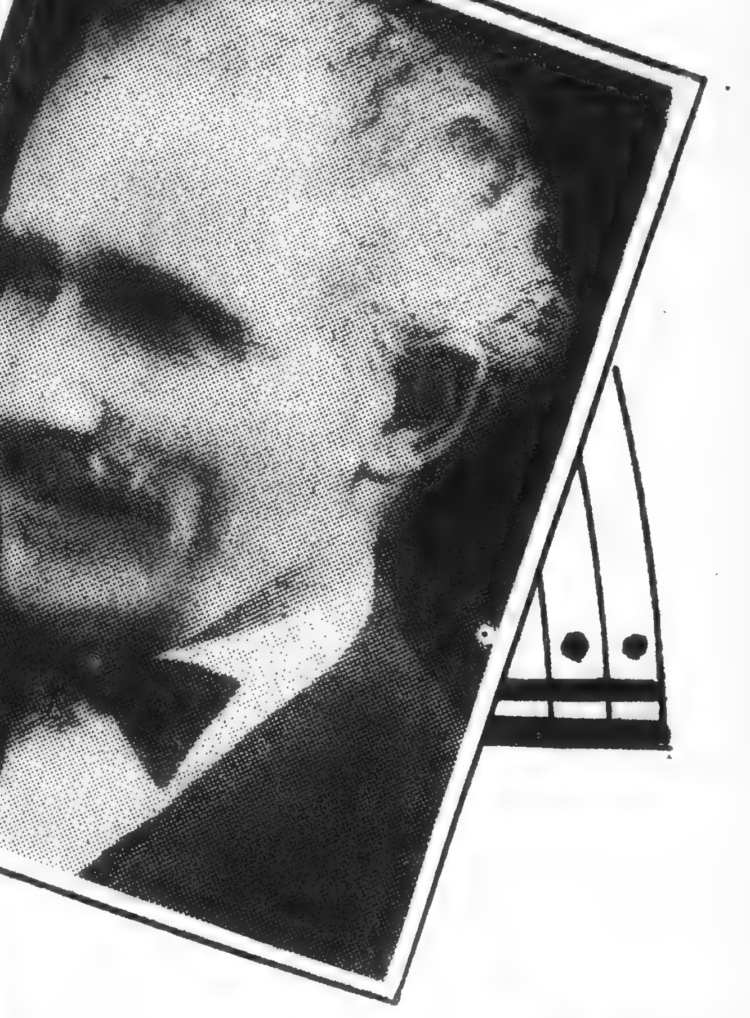
Proof That Many Great Musicians and Singers, Including Toscanini, Koussevitzky, Crooks, Tibbett and McCormack, of Course, Have Fine Sense of Humor

John McCormack, famous Irish tenor, shown here with his daughter, Guendolyn, once received thunderous applause for a note he had not uttered.

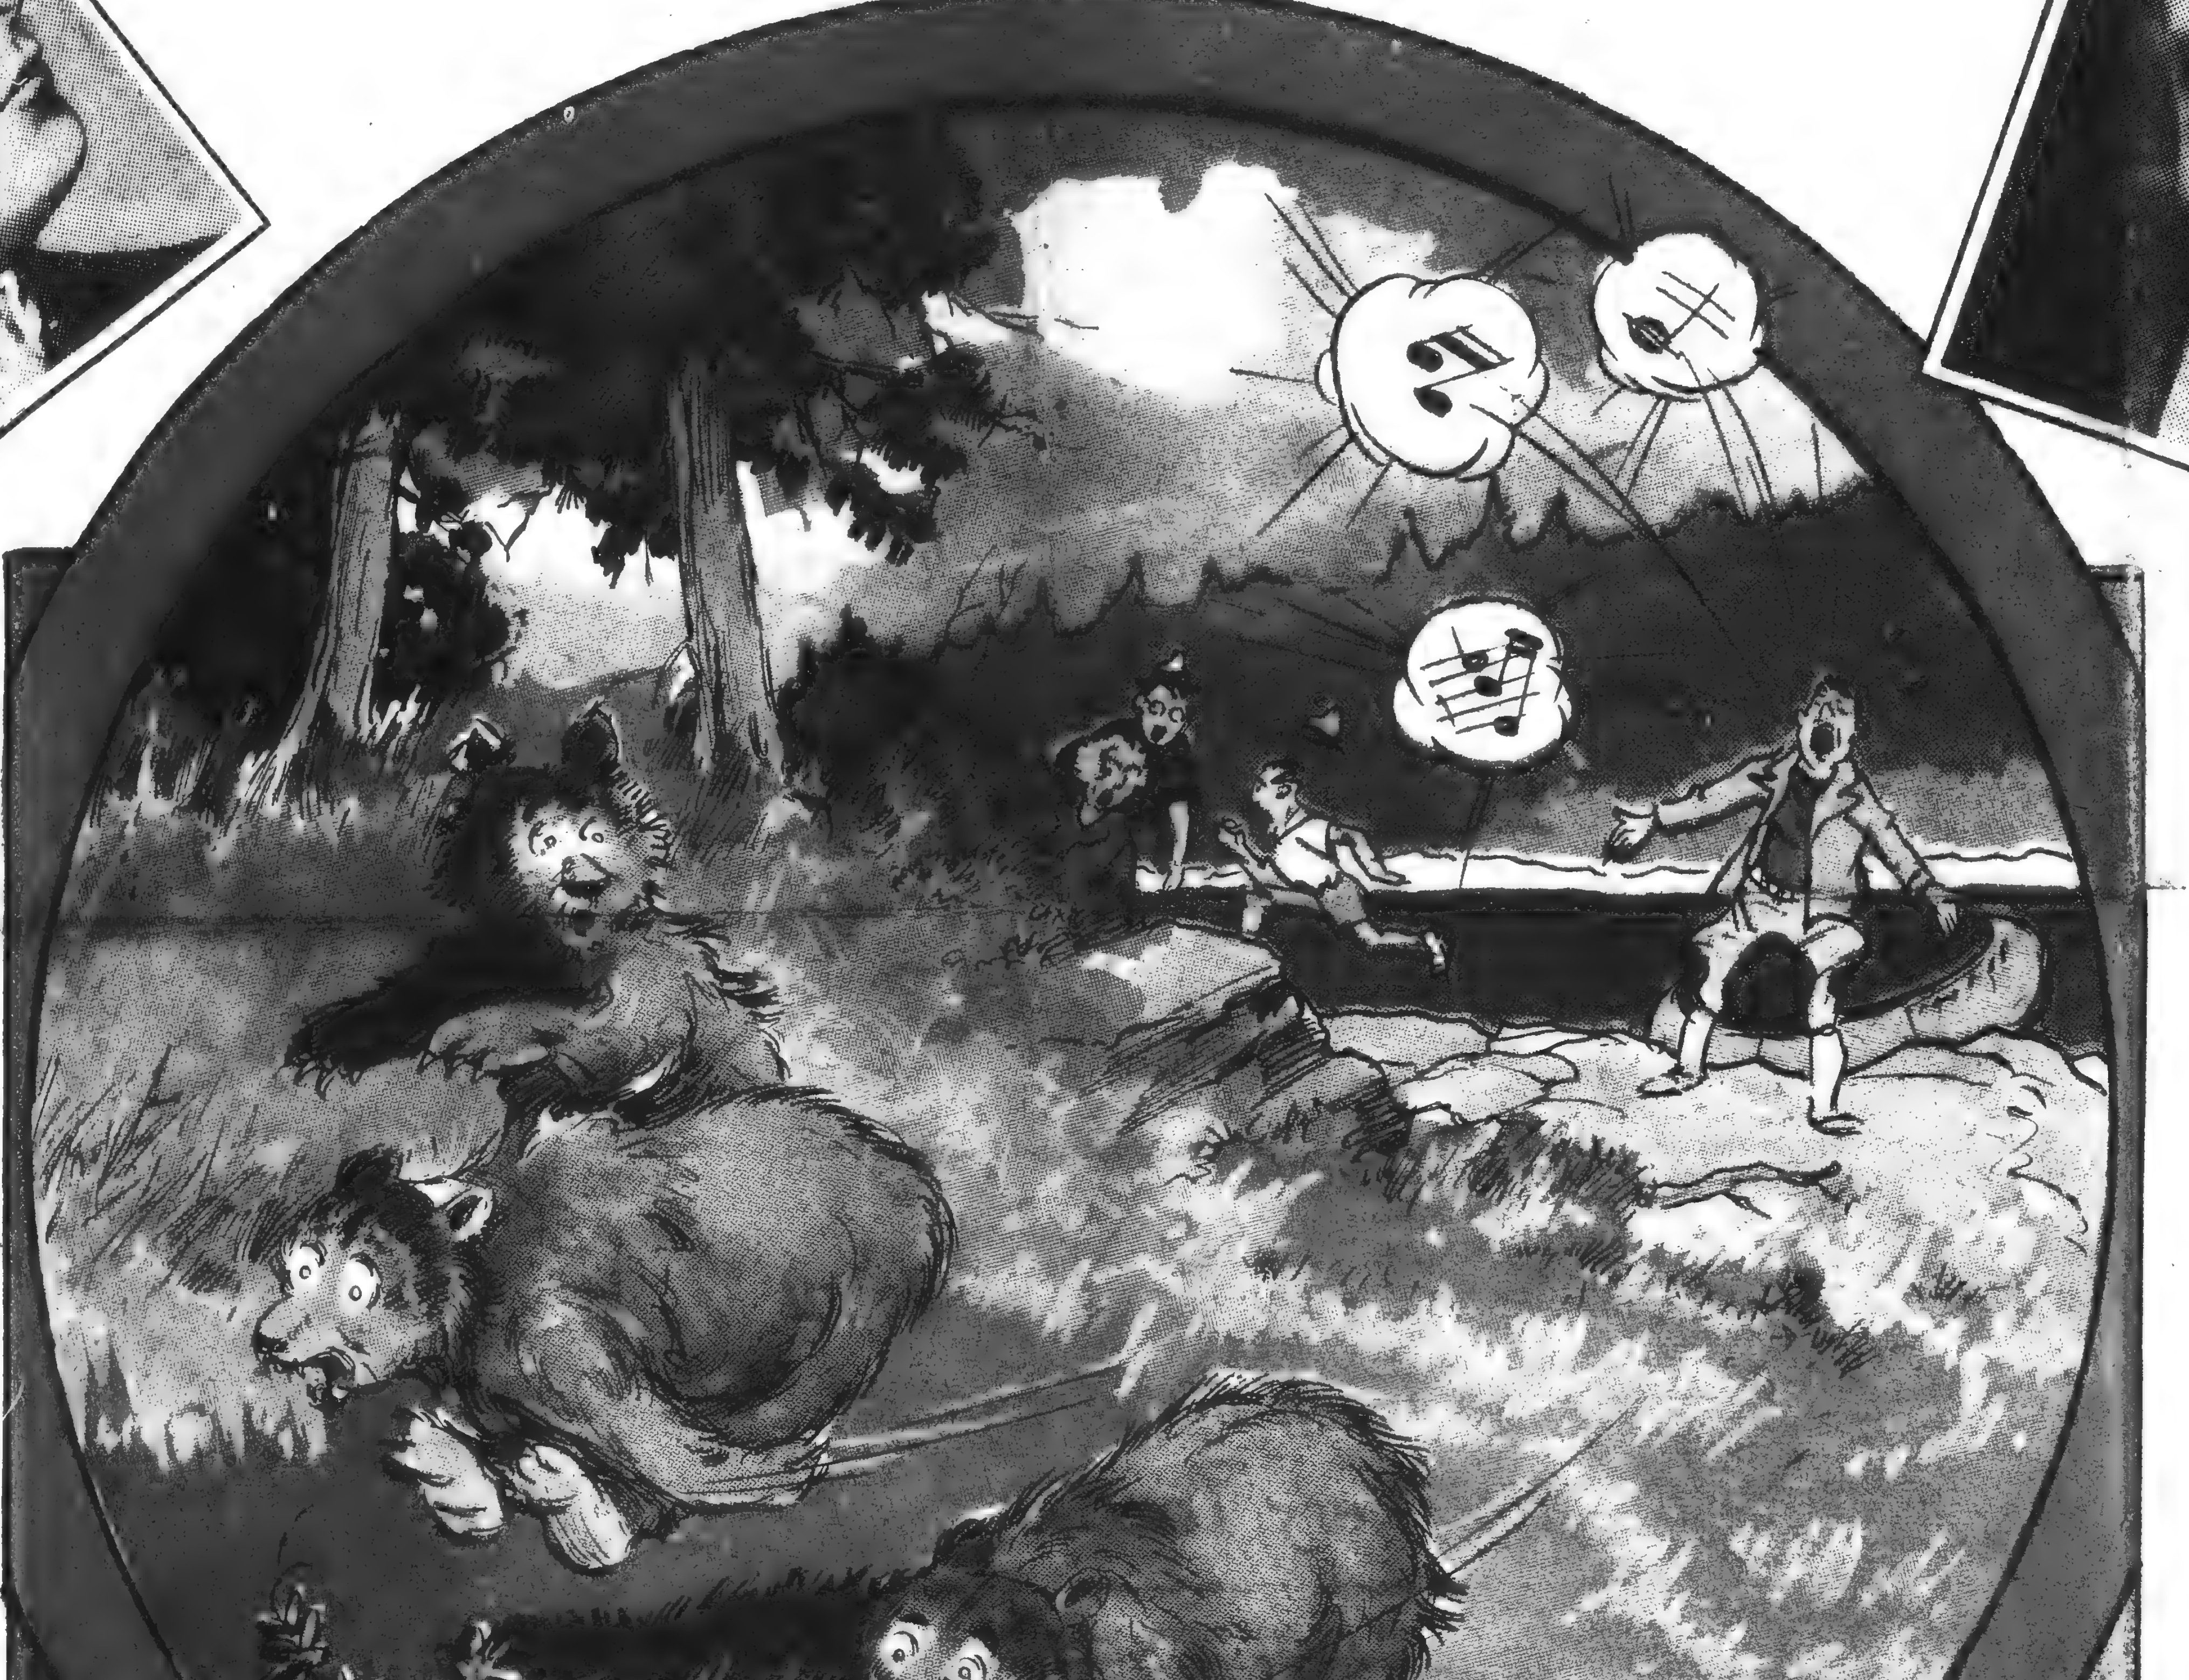
After tripping over a microphone cable and falling, Lawrence Tibbett remarked, "Tomorrow I'll be just another black and blues singer."

A stage cat and her four kittens caused Maria Kurenko, Russian coloratura soprano, well known in Boston, to suffer her most distressing moment.

Jascha Heifetz, the famous violinist, discovered in a Seattle hotel a waiter that was a good musical critic.



Arturo Toscanini, who once remarked: "Flowers are for a prima-donna or a corpse. I am neither." (AP Photo.)



Terrified by the approach of a family of bears in the Canadian wilderness, Richard Crooks rent the air with a "cross between a yell for help, a prayer of divine deliverance and an aria from Tosca" that scared the bears away.

BY ROBERT HUME

THE STATEMENT was made the other day by a lecturer that a happy person could not expect to be a great musician.

But plenty of evidence that great musicians of today and the recent past have taken part in funny episodes, and enjoy telling about these and jokes on others, has been assembled by a woman prominent in musical circles. She is Mrs. Frederick Nussbaum of St. Louis.

Under the title, "Mirth, Music and Memory," she has made a book mainly of happy moments in musicians' lives, which has just been published in Boston by Bruce Humphries, Inc. The following stories are quoted by permission of that firm, which holds the copyright.

Famous names of the opera house, radio, the concert stage, and the conductor's platform appear in such rich profusion in the advance proofs of the book that one hestitates just where to begin to offer examples. Suppose we start with two favorite opera stars of today — Tibbett and Crooks—then follow with two departed favorites—Caruso and Schumann-Heink, and their friend, John McCormack, who sang in opera early in his career.

In a radio rehearsal, Lawrence Tibbett stepped back from the microphone to avoid "jamming" it with a high note. He tripped over a rubber cable and fell to the floor. With the orchestra men and control room crew roaring, the great baritone picked himself up and remarked:

"Tomorrow I'll be just another black-and blues singer!"

Not at These Prices

Richard Crooks has a small son who also sings. The younger Crooks is Dickie, who is paid 50 cents a month for singing in a church choir. It is not a large salary, but it's steady.

An annual event in the church is "Silent Night," sung on Christmas Eve by the elder and more famous Crooks. This year Dickie was to sing the same carol next day at a young people's service.

"I hope," said the choirmaster to Dickie, "that you do as well as your father did."

"What!" answered the boy. "For 50 cents a month?"

Crooks and His Four Bears

With his wife and young Richard, Mr. Crooks was the guest of Frank LaForge, song composer and piano accompanist, at a Canadian camp.

Mr. Crooks was suddenly terrified to see, only 100 yards away, a family of four bears. The animals got the scent of the humans at once, sniffing excitedly and lumbering along toward the in-intruders.

There was no escape. Mr. LaForge whipped out a small pearl-handled knife. Mr. Crooks picked up a charred limb which fell to pieces as soon as he touched it. And the bears kept trotting along in their direction.

"Do something, Richard," cried the panic-stricken Mrs. LaForge. "Sing or something!"

Then the tenor rent the air of the Canadian wilderness with what Mr. Crooks described as a "cross between a yell for help, a prayer for divine deliverance and an aria from 'Tosca.' "

The outburst made the puzzled bears slow down to a walk, then stop. After staring a few moments, they finally scampered off into the underbrush.

"I never thought I'd see the day when an audience would make me happy by walking out," commented Crooks after he had regained his breath-control.

Caruso Not Invited

Caruso doted on beefsteak. The mere thought of his suggesting to someone else that it is not good for a singer to eat too much of it is funny in itself. But Schumann-Heink made it still funnier.

Once Caruso saw Schumann-Heink contemplating a huge steak. Starting out engratiatingly with the nickname of the great Ernestine, he remarked:

"Stena, you are not going to eat that alone?"

"No," the contralto said. "No, not alone. With potatoes!"

McCormack Pulls a Fast One

"I remember," says John McCormack, "when I was making my debut in opera as a mere boy in Turin. I had to take an upper C. I knew how accustomed these Italians were to robust high notes, so I determined not to let them down. I told the orchestra conductor to give me a chance when the note came along. And sure enough, he subdued the orchestra somewhat and I rang out the note.

"I really felt I had made a pretty good job of it," observes the Irish tenor, "but not a hand clapped!

"The following night I told the conductor when coming to this passage again to let his orchestra go in all its power and volume. He did. The volume filled the theatre. The rafters shook. And I flung my head back and opened my mouth wide and made a face of tremendous effort—but actually not a sound did I let pass my lips. I thought the roof would come off with the thunder of applause! All for a note I had not even begun to utter!"

No Insult Acknowledged

Clear as the language of music is to Arturo Toscanini, brilliant and bad-tempered conductor, English often is far from clear to him. As for slang, one may draw one's own conclusions of his understanding of it from the following.

During an orchestral rehearsal, Toscanini heaped infamies upon a trumpeter for making mistakes, then fired him. The trumpeter made no reply and walked from the room. Then he returned, placed his head inside the door and shouted:

"Nuts to you!"

Toscanini turned around and replied:

"Sorry—but it's too late for an apology!"

Flowers? Certainly Not!

When on the sending instead of the receiving end of a conversation in English, Toscanini is capable of appearing to good advantage. A perfect example was brought out at his farewell concert as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, in which 5000 struggled for standing room tickets. The absence of a perfectly justifiable display of flowers aroused questions.

"Flowers," Toscanini said, "are for a prima-donna or a corpse. I am neither."

Koussevitzky Gives "Scoop"

During a tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a cub reporter who was very eager to "scoop" the music cr~~itics,~~ swooped down on the orchestra's celebrated conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, far-famed for the introduction of new music.

"Can you tell me what the music of the future will be like?" the cub asked.

Koussevitzky watched him open up a heavy wad of note paper, and said with a curious little smile:

"I will tell you. You are all ready to fill those pages? Very well. The music of the future will be of two kinds. There will be bad music. There will be good music. Now you have the whole thing. Thank you. Goodby."

Fiedler Surprises Elman

A musical compliment far from the stereotyped pattern took shape in the apartment of Arthur Fiedler, most popular conductor of the Boston Pops, and idolized leader of the open-air Esplanade Concerts. Fiedler and half the Boston Symphony Orchestra had been rehearsing accompaniments for Mischa Elman for a programme of three concerti. After a strenuous session, Elman lunched at the apartment of Fiedler, where the kitchen is presided over by a German housekeeper who excels in international cookery. The violinist was lavish in praise of the meal. In leaving, he asked as a privilege to step into the kitchen and deliver a compliment in person.

"I want to tell you," he said to Louise, "that I have seldom enjoyed a meal more than this one."

"Oh, Mr. Elman," the flustered cook replied, "thank you so much. I—I—do you know—I want to tell you that I'm going to your concert tomorrow, and—I—hope I enjoy your playing as much as you did my cooking."

Catty Reception

A sublimely ridiculous operatic mishap occurred in a factory requisitioned as an opera house.

"This amusing incident," says Madame Maria Kurenko, Russian soprano, well known in Boston, "took place when I was singing in opera during the first years of the Russian Revolution.

"It was the desire of the Soviet government to bring culture to the peasant folk—to the villages, the factory towns, the country schools.

"Once I was sent to sing the part of Rosina in 'The Barber of Seville,' one of my favorite roles. The opera was presented in a cotton factory in a small town. As I made my appearance for my number, 'Una voce poco fa,' I was greeted by enthusiastic applause, as I was well-known to these people.

"But I was barely into the number when I detected that the audience was behaving rather strangely. Finally they commenced laughing, at first quietly, then louder and louder until it deepened to a roar.

"Only my years of discipline and training prevented me from rushing from the stage at once. As the din continued, I felt I could sing no longer. The place was in a pandemonium. Try as I would to continue, I could not. In tears I ran from the stage and sobbed out my grief in the privacy of my dressing room.

"Presently, however, the manager entered softly. 'What's the matter, my child,' he inquired anxiously. Still sobbing I begged him to tell me what had happened—was there something wrong about my gown—my personal appearance? Laughing, he kissed my hands, and explained all. It seems that a cat, the pet of the workers, and her four kittens had followed me upon the stage. Stepping gingerly behind me, single file, they had surrounded me as I stood in the centre of the stage. And they continued to look up at me as I sang. 'They seemed to enjoy your singing very much,' he added, smiling sympathetically.

"Of course I laughed, too, upon hearing this explanation and with a light heart I returned to the stage to sing my favorite aria again . . . this time without interruption, to a joyous throng of enthusiastic listeners."

The Waiter Decided

In Seattle before a performance Jascha Heifetz was in his hotel room. He had ordered a light dinner for Mrs. Heifetz and himself but the food was left to grow cold while the violinist tried out a number of endings for his solo transcription of the orchestral Prelude of Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

As he was experimenting, trying first high octaves, then low octaves, unable to make up his mind which was better, the waiter who had been hovering about the table spoke up:

"Pardon me, Mr. Heifetz, but may I say how nice it is to hear real music instead of jazz."

Heifetz smiled and went on playing. Finally he stopped and sat down to eat. In the intervals between courses he and Mrs. Heifetz discussed the two endings, finally decided the matter.

Dinner over, the violinist dressed for the concert, put on his hat and coat, and started to go out. On opening the door he saw a note lying underneath it. He opened it and read:

"Dear Mr. Heifetz: The lower ending is better. Respectfully, The Waiter."

Which was just what Heifetz himself had decided.

Melchior, Quick-Change Man

The subject of famous tenors who have sung in Boston calls to mind the name of the Danish star of the Metropolitan Opera, Lauritz Melchior. His appearances in Wagnerian roles at the Boston

(Continued on Page 7, This Section)

Funniest and Most Embarrassing Experiences of Musicians Well Known to Boston Audiences

(Continued From Page 4, This Section)

Opera House during the past few seasons have been a big factor in the success of the company's visits here.

A dress shirt, or rather the lack of one, nearly ruined an important evening for Melchior.

He was giving a joint recital with a friend in a small Danish town. The afternoon performance had been sold out and it was decided at the last moment to give an extra evening performance for those who had not been able to get in.

To do this, however, presented a problem. The evening performance necessitated that both artists wear full dress suits, but they found suddenly that they had but one stiff-bosomed shirt between them. Artists are resourceful, so when Melchior finished a group of songs he went quickly to the wings, and while the pianist played a short group he took off the valuable shirt and his friend donned it to appear before the footlights for his numbers.

They managed beautifully until the end of the concert when the clamoring audience insisted the artists appear together for the final bows. Again Melchior did some quick thinking. Neither of them wore the shirt, but seizing bathrobes, as if they had been caught in the act of changing to street clothes, they strode out onto the stage to receive a fresh outburst of acclaim heightened by this bit of informality.

The famous singers mentioned so far have been able to display brains as well as voice. Here is a yarn on the contrasting type of vocalist. It is told by the conductor, Bruno Walter.

While conducting opera in Munich, Walter was "breaking in" a new tenor.

The tenor, whose mental development had hardly kept pace with his vocal progress, usually missed his opening cue.

Walter, while patient, despaired after 10 days of rehearsing of ever teaching the young man to begin singing at the proper time.

So it was finally arranged that on the following day, at the opening of the performance, the singer was to keep his eye on the director, who, at the precise moment, would point a warning finger as an indication it was time to pick up the cue.

When the crucial moment arrived, Walter signalled with uplifted finger as arranged, but the tenor, more confused and bewildered than ever, queried, in a voice audible for several rows, "Who, me?"

Elliott Schenk and Walter Damrosch, while discussing singers and ego—which in this particular incident proved synonymous — were reminded of a former Metropolitan Opera diva who, when asked which opera was booked for the following Wednesday, answered icily:

"I don't know—I don't sing that night."

Ego can reach a very high point in an opera house, even far below the ranks of stars and their "supporting" singers.

A mere chorus singer at the Metropolitan, displaying his artistic temperament over the questionable honor of being singled out to carry a spear in one scene, declared majestically:

"I am too nervous to go on today! I think I shall go home."

One of the principals overheard this remark, raised a warning finger at the offender, and reminded him that "good operatic performers never disappoint their audience"—"that the show must go on!" The spear bearer gestured dramatically, acknowledged that this was right and decided to go through with it.

Musicians really can supply some of the finest examples of modesty. A case in point is a story told by Maurice Rosenfeld, Chicago pianist, about his teacher. This was August Hyllestad, famous pupil of Liszt.

In a concert, Hyllestad played the Schumann "Etudes Symphoniques."

George P. Upton, at that time the music critic of the Chicago Tribune, wrote a review of the concert and said about the performance of Hyllested that "since Anton Rubinstein played in Chicago, in 1872, no pianist has disclosed such genuine pianistic art and skill as did this young Danish pianist."

After a year or so Rosenfeld became one of Hyllested's favorite students. The pianist often invited the young man to visit him on Sunday mornings. "One Sunday," relates Rosenfeld, "as I was rounding the corner of the street to the house, I heard him practising, and he was busy working on the Schumann Etudes.

"When I reached his home I asked him: 'Are you still practising the Etudes?' 'Yes,' he said, 'I am trying to learn to play them as well as I can.'

" 'Well,' said I, with some wonderment, 'how did you play them when you made your debut here?'

"He said: 'I played them rotten!' "

And indeed Rosenfeld had to take his word for it, for Hyllested kept on working at them all the time.

A hilarious opera stage incident comes from Eugene Goosens, who has appeared as a guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and now leads that of Cincinnati. The episode took place while he was conducting a performance of Wagner's "Twilight of the Gods."

"The opera," Goosens relates, "had gone without a hitch until just after the episode of Brunhilde's immolation, when she plunges, mounted on her noble steed, Grane, into the flames of Siegfried's funeral pyre.

"At this point it was customary to darken the stage for two or three seconds in order to allow for the lowering of the necessary backcloth, depicting the destruction by fire of Valhalla and its inmates. Alas, on this particular occasion during the blackout which incidentally brings the opera to a close, an accident occurred which prevented the lowering of this backcloth. So, when the lights came up there was revealed to a surprised and amused audience only the crooked fragments of the backdrop, together with a large expanse of brick wall, upon which was painted, in enormous letters, the somewhat inappropriate legend, 'No Smoking.' "

The noted American operatic bass, Henri Scott, once "brought down the house" in a way he was least expecting.

"In Italy," he says, "I sang a short season at the Teatro Adriano. The first opera was 'Faust.' Now, the Italians are very much inclined to adhere to tradition, and especially is this true in regard to 'Faust.'

"For example: they required that, since it is generally believed that Mephistopheles dwells in the infernal regions, he must, in order to respond to Faust's fervid appeal, come up from below. So, in Act 1, I was obliged to make my appearance through a trapdoor, and in the last act I had to make my exit in the same way.

"One night as I stepped on the platform to sink below the stage, I inadvertently neglected to draw my sword close to my body in the process of descending with the result that when I had gotten about half way down, the protruding sword prevented further descent. It was then that a voice called out from the gallery:

" 'Look! Hell must be full; there is no more room even for the devil!'

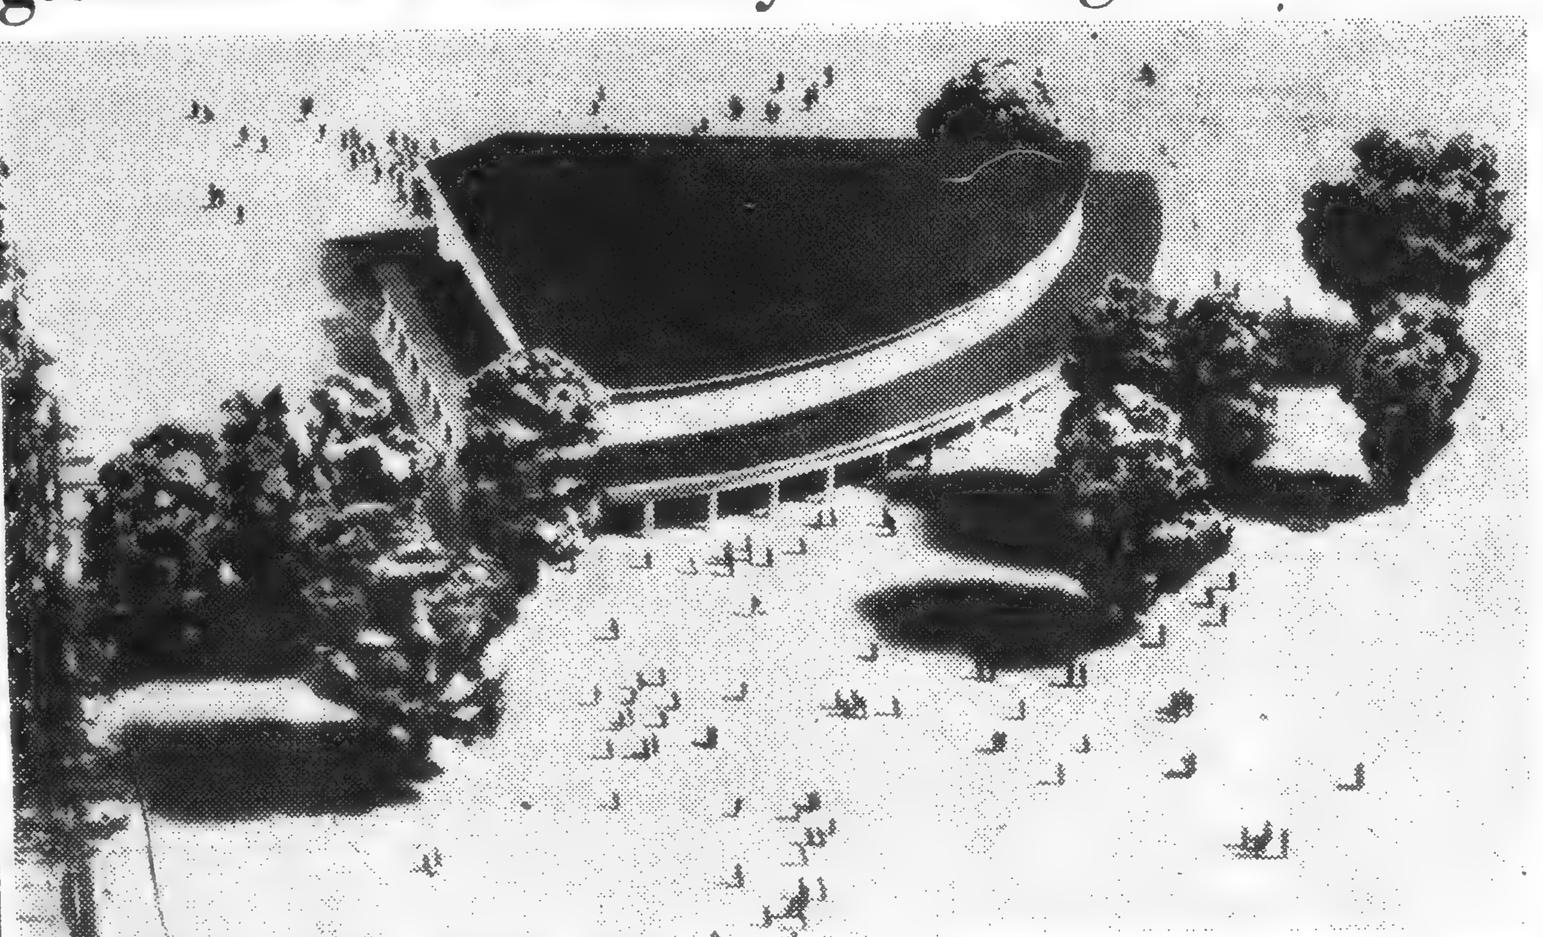
"And this," concludes Scott, "brought a roar from the audience and a very quick curtain."

142

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 28 1938

Berkshire Symphonic Festival's Music Shed at Tanglewood To Be Ready for August Concerts



This is what the Berkshire Symphonic Festival's Shed for the Boston Symphony Concerts at Tanglewood will look like. The photograph is made from a model built to scale by Joseph Franz, who is in charge of the construction. The building will cover an acre and a half in the open field across from the lovely gardens with the Hawthorne pines immediately to the north.

Koussevitzky and Boston Orchestra To Appear Aug. 4, 6, 7, 11, 13, 14

The six concerts of the fifth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting, will be given Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Aug. 11, 13 and 14, it was announced today by the Festival trustees.

Simultaneously the trustees announced they had launched what they hope will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portion of the shed for the concerts at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge on Route 183. Contributions "in any amount" will be welcome.

Letters Being Sent

Letters are being sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. The letter is in the nature of a report and suggests that contributors pass along the enclosed subscription blank and picture of the building to friends who might be interested in the cause.

Other letters are being sent hundreds of music lovers who not contributed asking if will now send a donation in amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board.

308 Tons of Steel

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework which will weigh 308 tons and which will be erected by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The building in the shape of a huge fan will be capable of carrying a load of 2500 tons, ample provision having been made for a minimum snow load in winter. The capacity of the building will be 5000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade, the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last row of seats in the shed, the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics under the direction of Professor Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology are scheduled tentatively for July 1.

An Acre and a Half

The huge shed which will cover an acre and a half will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

The closing paragraph of the letters addressed to music lovers who have not contributed reads:

It is obvious that $78,000 will not complete the shed though it will provide all the essentials, such as protection from storms, proper accommodations for the conductor and orchestra, cloak and dressing rooms for the public. Will you help complete the $100,000 building fund by sending us a check in any amount?"

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 29 1938

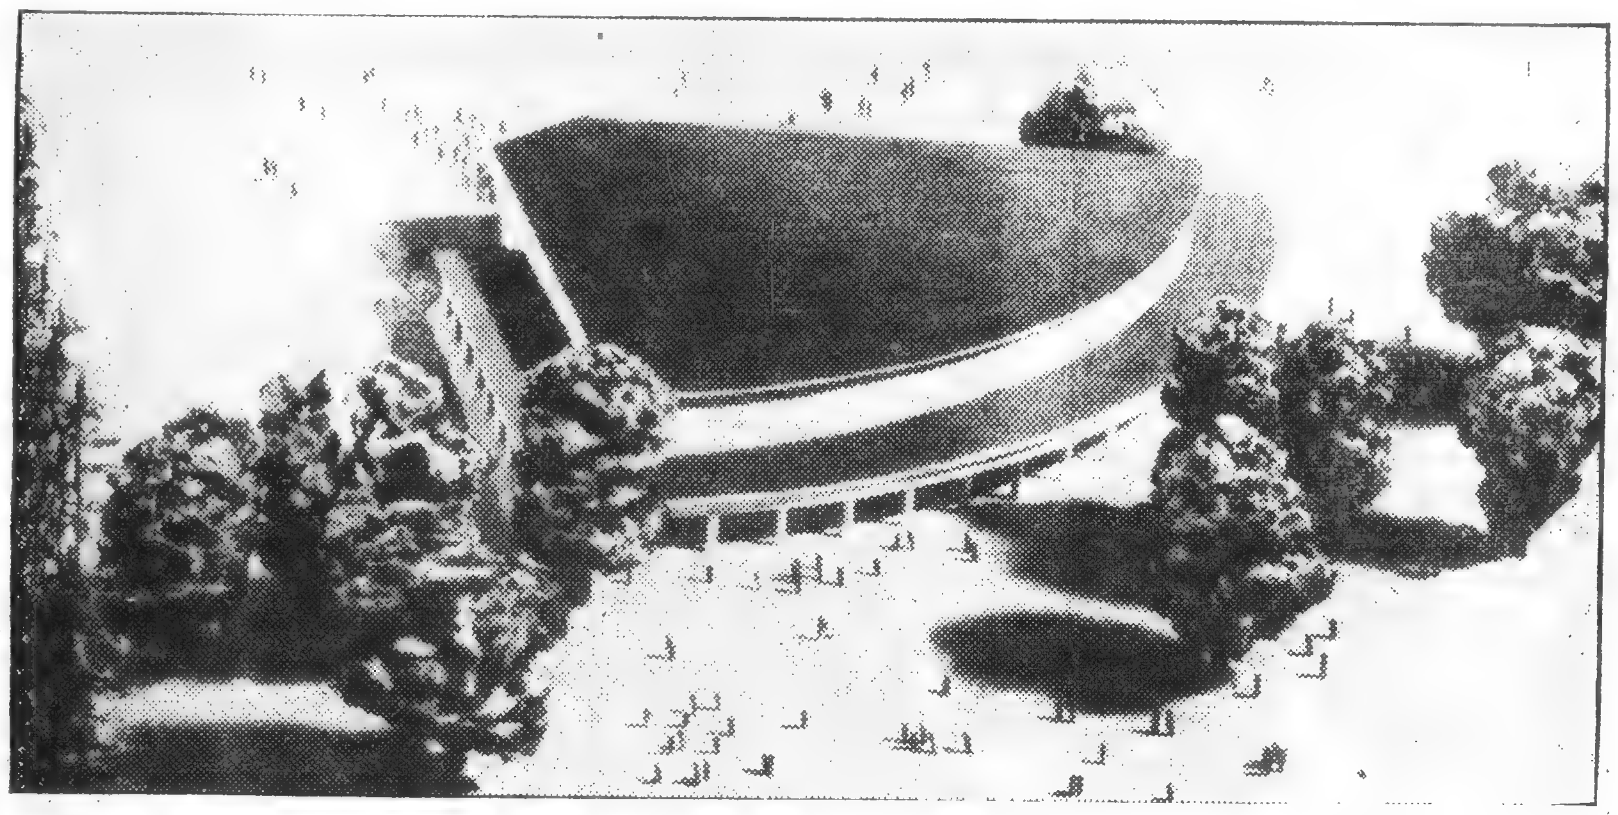
Orchestra Entertained

BOSTON, Jan. 29 (AP)—Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the first time since the orchestra was founded 57 years ago, last night were dinner guests of the Harvard Club of Boston. One member of the orchestra, however, could not attend because the dinner was a "stag" affair. Miss Louise Came, second harpist and only woman member of the orchestra, was sent flowers and was honored with a toast.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

JAN 28 1938

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Music Shed Needs $22,000 for Completion



An appeal for $22,000 to complete the $100,000 needed to build a music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox before the six concerts are to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August was mailed to the 750 subscribers to the fund and several hundred music lovers today by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Concrete foundations are being poured for the structure and as much as possible will be done with the funds in hand. The building is to be a fan-shaped structure and the proportions of the stage are to be similar to those of Symphony Hall, Boston. The shed is to be situated in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl across from the beautiful gardens at Tanglewood.

The appeal states that the $78,000 will not complete the shed, but that it will provide essentials such as protection from storms and proper protection for the orchestra. It it hoped, however, that the $22,000 can be raised so that a more complete structure can be erected.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

JAN 28 1938

Appeal Goes Out for Funds To Complete New Music Shed

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., today launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August.

Simultaneously the Festival announced the concert dates as Aug. 4, 6 and 7; Aug. 11, 13 and 14, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributed, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board of trustees.

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The building in the shape of a huge fan will seat 5,000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last seat in the shed the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics are scheduled tentatively July 1 under the direction of Prof. Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Cont.

The shed will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 29 1938

Seeking Funds For Music Shed

An appeal for $22,000 to complete the $100,000 needed to build a music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox before the six concerts are to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August was mailed to the 750 subscribers to the fund and several hundred music lovers yesterday by the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Concrete foundations are being poured for the structure and as much as possible will be done with the funds in hand. The building is to be a fan-shaped structure and the proportions of the stage are to be similar to those of Symphony Hall, Boston.

GREENWICH, CONN.
TIME

JAN 28 1938

Berkshire Fete Launches Drive For Shed Fund

Symphony Group Plans Several Concerts For Next Summer

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., today launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass. in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August.

Simultaneously the Festival announced the concert dates as Aug. 4, 6 and 7; August 11, 13 and 14, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributed, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board of trustees.

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The building in the shape of a huge fan will seat 5,000.

The shed will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

BERKSHIRE FESTIVAL STAGE BEING BUILT

Symphonic Reservations Received Six Months in Advance of Fete

Stockbridge, Mass., Jan. 30.—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorman Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1½ acres will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community co-operation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

(143)

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 28 1938

Will Give Six Concerts At Symphonic Festival

Trustees Announce Launching of What They Hope Will be Final Effort to Secure Balance of Funds Needed to Complete Major Portion of Huge Shed at Tanglewood to Accommodate 5000—Contributions "in Any Amount" Will be Welcome—308 Tons of Steel Will be Used in Framework of Fan-Shaped Building, Covering Acre and Half.

The six concerts of the fifth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be given Aug. 4, 6 and 7 and Aug. 11, 13 and 14, it was announced today by the festival trustees.

Simultaneously the trustees announced they had launched what they hope will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portion of the shed for the concerts at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge on Route 183. Contributions "in any amount" will be welcome.

Letters Being Sent

Letters are being sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. The letter is in the nature of a report and suggests that contributors pass along the enclose subscription blank and picture of the building to friends who might be interested in the cause.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributing, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board.

308 Tons of Steel

Concrete foundations are being being poured for the steel framework which will weigh 308 tons and which will be erected by the Bethlehem Steel company. The building in the shape of a huge fan will be capable of carrying a load of 2500 tons, ample provision having been made for a maximum snow load in winter. The capacity of the building will be 5000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade, the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last row of seats in the shed, the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics under the direction of Prof. Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology are scheduled tentatively for July 1.

An Acre and a Half

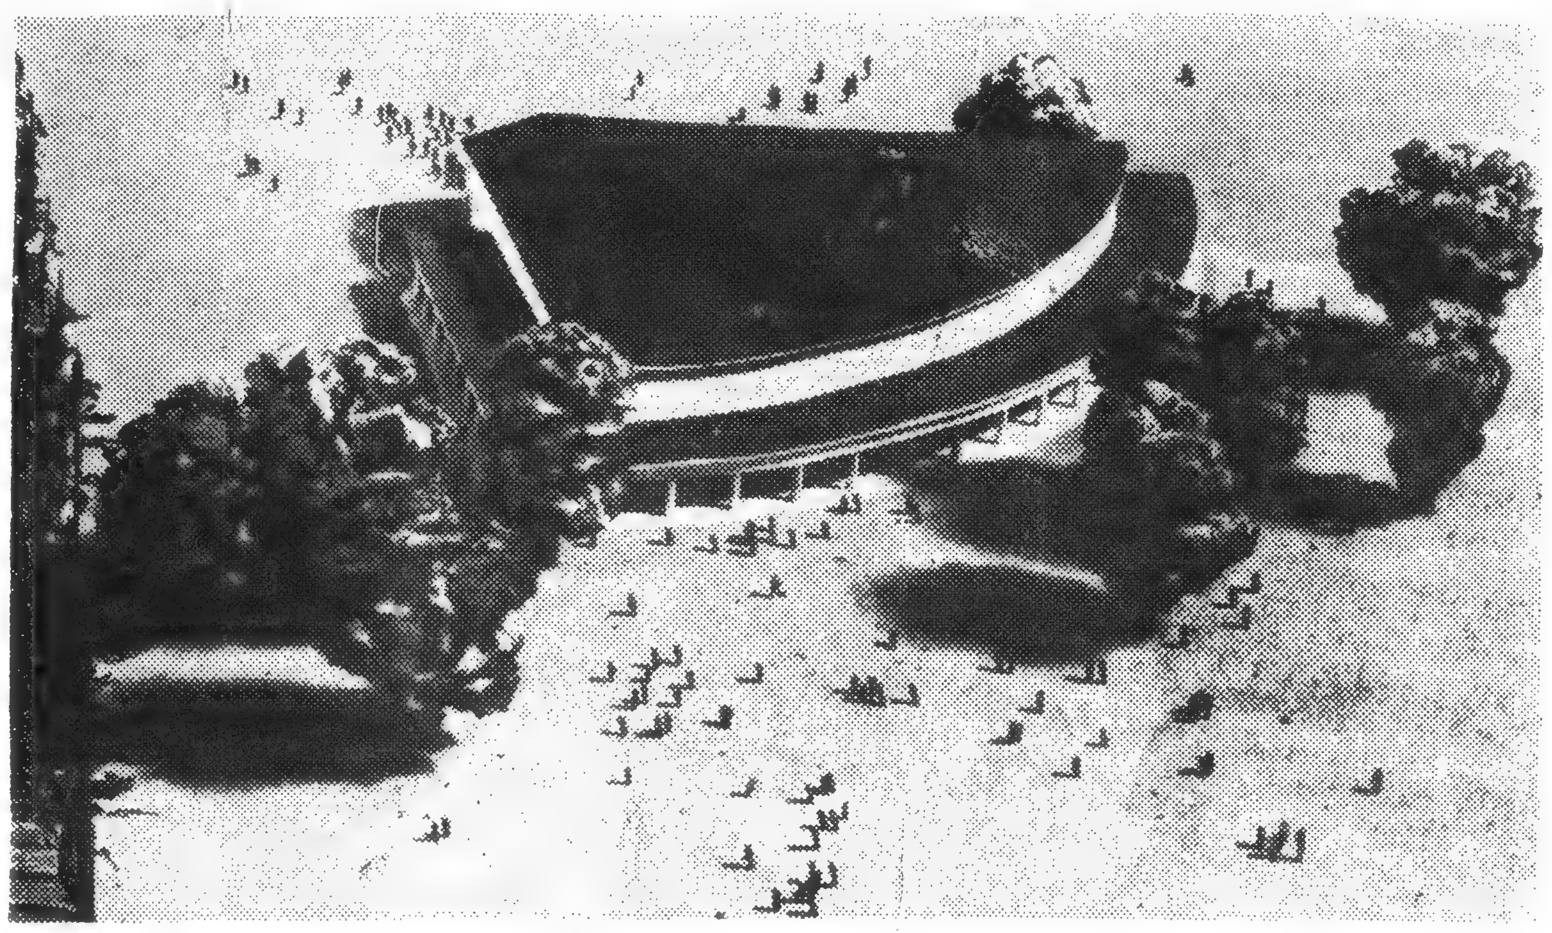
The huge shed which will cover an acre and a half will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

The closing paragraph of the letters addressed to music lovers who have not contributed reads:

"It is obvious that $78,000 will not complete the shed though it will provide all the essentials, such as protection from storms, proper accommodations for the conductor and orchestra, cloak and dressing rooms for the public. Will you help complete the $100,000 building fund by sending us a check in any amount?"

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

How Berkshire Symphonic Festival Home Will Look



Architect's drawing of huge music shed, to accommodate 5000 people, which is being built at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge and where fifth annual festival will be given in August by Boston Symphony orchestra. The building will be fan shape and cover an acre and a half.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

N 29 1938

Festival Seeks $22,000 More For Music Shed

BerkshireSymphonicGroup Presses On to Complete Work forAugustConcerts

Fund Totals $78,000

Foundations for Building Near Lenox, Mass., Laid

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced yesterday that it has opened a campaign to complete the $100,000 needed to assure the construction of the principal portions of the music shed on the Tanglewood estate, near Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next summer. ~~The dates are Thurs~~day, Saturday and Sunday evenings, August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13 and 14.

Thus far, 750 persons have subscribed to the building fund, which now is more than $78,000, and letters signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival board of trustees, are being sent to many music lovers who have not contributed, while previous contributors have been asked to interest their friends in this cause.

The building is to be in the shape of a fan, with seats for 5,000. Concrete foundations are already being poured for the 308-ton steel framework to be constructed by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The distance between the sides of the fan, within the colonnade, will be 325 feet, and that from the conductor's podium to the rearmost seat, 180 feet.

Inquiries about next summer's festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass. In her letter to prospective contributors, Miss Robinson Smith points out that the sum in hand will obviously not complete the music shed, although it will provide such essentials as protection from storms, accommodations for the conductor and orchestra and cloak and dressing rooms for the public.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

JAN 31 1938

FESTIVAL PLANS LAID IN ADVANCE

Hotels Reserved Almost To Capacity Months Ahead Of Event

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 30—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows of "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will, of course, be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately one and one-half acres, and will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

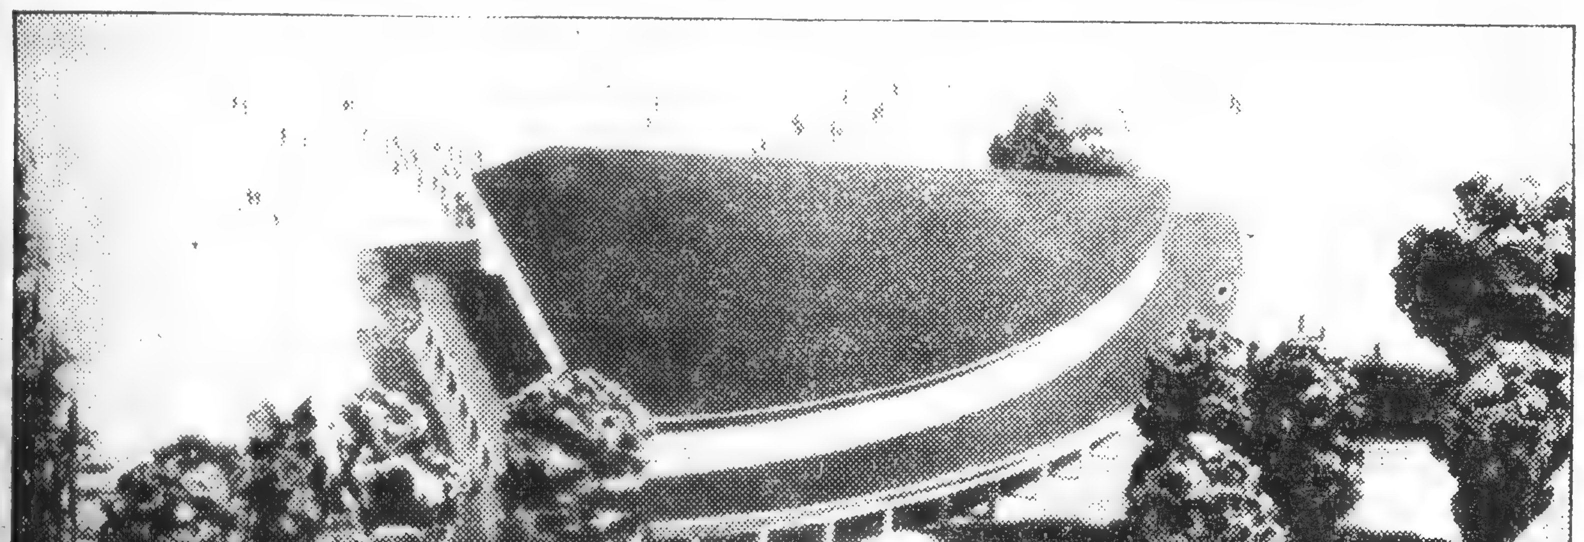
The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this Summer.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 29 1938

Music Shed for Berkshire Festival



Stockbridge, Jan. 28—The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., today launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in August.

Simultaneously the festival announced the concert dates as August 4, 6 and 7; August 11, 13 and 14, with Dr Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. The letter is in the nature of a report and suggests that contributors pass along the enclosed subscription blank and picture of the building to friends who might be interested in the cause.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributed, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board of the trustees.

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel company. The building, in the shape of a huge fan, will seat 5000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last seat in the shed the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics are scheduled tentatively July 1 under the direction of Prof Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The shed will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

The closing paragraph of the letters addressed to music subscribers who have not contributed reads:—

"It is obvious that $78,000 will not complete the shed though it will provide all the essentials, such as protection from storms, proper accommodations for the conductor and orchestra, cloak and dressing rooms for the public. Will you help complete the $100,0000 building fund by sending us a check for any amount?"

Inquiries concerning the 1938 festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 29 1938

Boston Symphony In Unity Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard February 9 at 8:30 P. M. in Montclair High School. The concert will be given under auspices of the Unity Institute Concert Course and is being offered as an extra event to the regular series this season.

This orchestra is considered by many critics the best in this country and its conductor is ranked high. Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Northern Russia and early made a name for himself with an orchestra which he organized in Moscow.

In 1920 Dr. Koussevitzky went to Paris where he organized the Koussevitzky Concerts, prominent in that city for four seasons. In London he was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and following the 1924-25 season came to this country to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony, a post he has held continuously to the present day.

M. A. DeWolf Howe in his recent book says of the orchestra "Now in its 56th year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate, not only in its conductor, but in a personnel which, as an accumulation of individual talent, is hardly to be matched in the present or past."

(1123)

N. ADAMS, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT

JAN 28 1938

Will Give Six Concerts At Symphonic Festival

Trustees Announce Launching of What They Hope Will be Final Effort to Secure Balance of Funds Needed to Complete Major Portion of Huge Shed at Tanglewood to Accommodate 5000—Contributions "in Any Amount" Will be Welcome—308 Tons of Steel Will be Used in Framework of Fan-Shaped Building, Covering Acre and Half.

The six concerts of the fifth annual Berkshire Symphonic Festival by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will be given Aug. 4, 6 and 7 and Aug. 11, 13 and 14, it was announced today by the festival trustees.

Simultaneously the trustees announced they had launched what they hope will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portion of the shed for the concerts at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge on Route 183. Contributions "in any amount" will be welcome.

Letters Being Sent

Letters are being sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. The letter is in the nature of a report and suggests that contributors pass along the enclose subscription blank and picture of the building to friends who might be interested in the cause.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributing, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board.

308 Tons of Steel

Concrete foundations are being being poured for the steel framework which will weigh 308 tons and which will be erected by the Bethlehem Steel company. The building in the shape of a huge fan will be capable of carrying a load of 2500 tons, ample provision having been made for a maximum snow load in winter. The capacity of the building will be 5000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade, the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last row of seats in the shed, the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics under the direction of Prof. Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology are scheduled tentatively for July 1.

An Acre and a Half

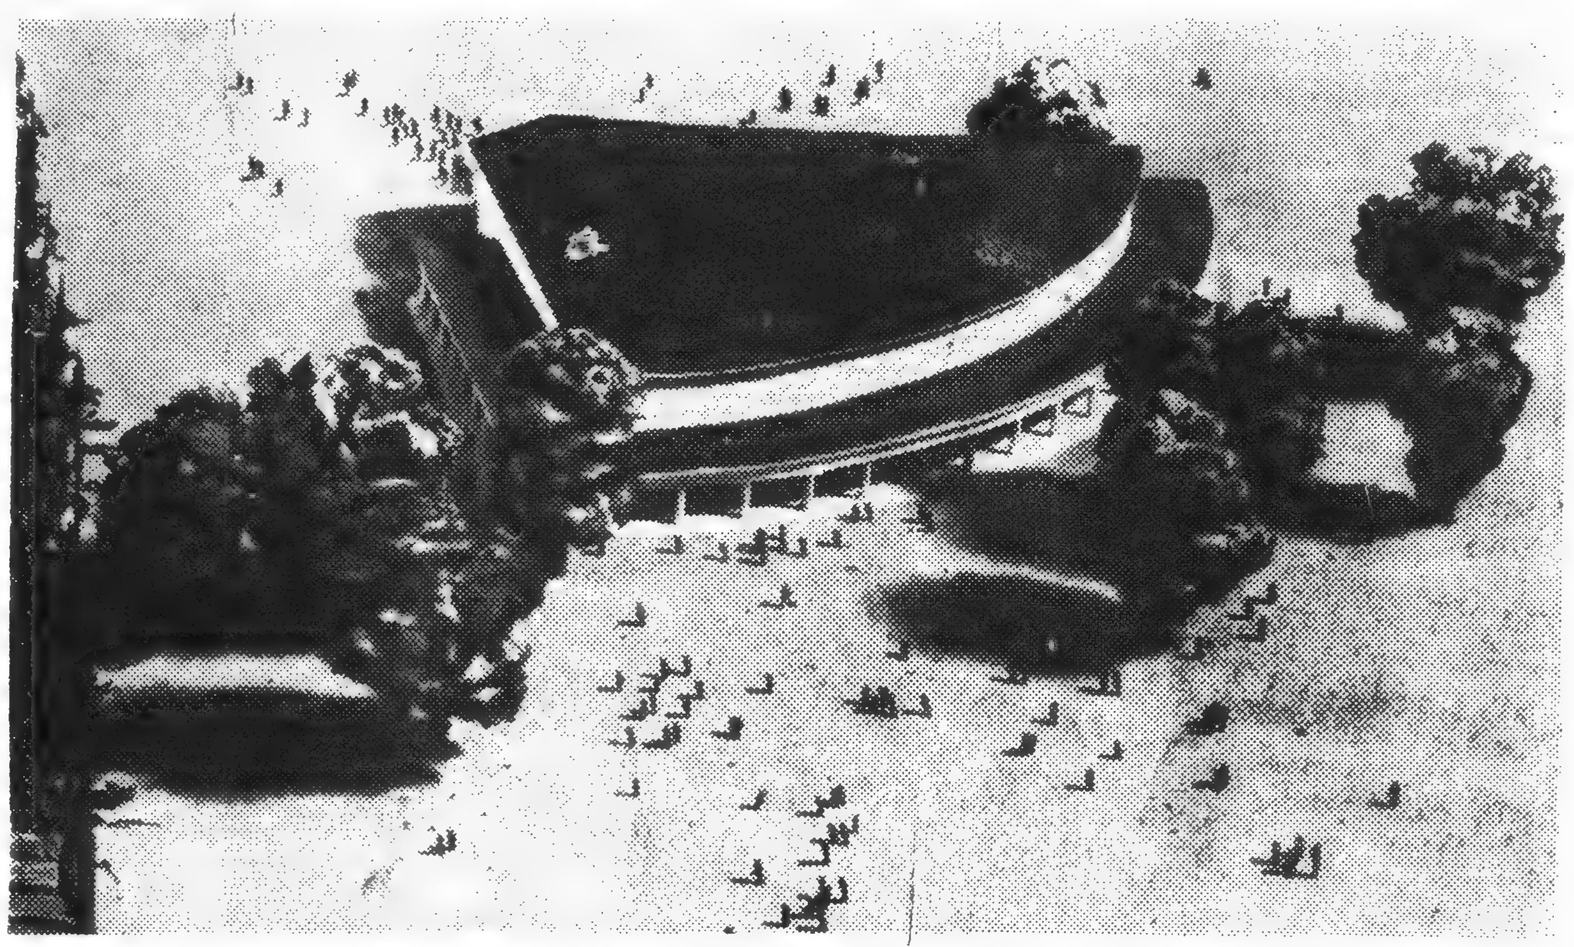
The huge shed which will cover an acre and a half will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge Bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

The closing paragraph of the letters addressed to music lovers who have not contributed reads:

"It is obvious that $78,000 will not complete the shed though it will provide all the essentials, such as protection from storms, proper accommodations for the conductor and orchestra, cloak and dressing rooms for the public. Will you help complete the $100,000 building fund by sending us a check in any amount?"

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., Stockbridge, Mass.

How Berkshire Symphonic Festival Home Will Look

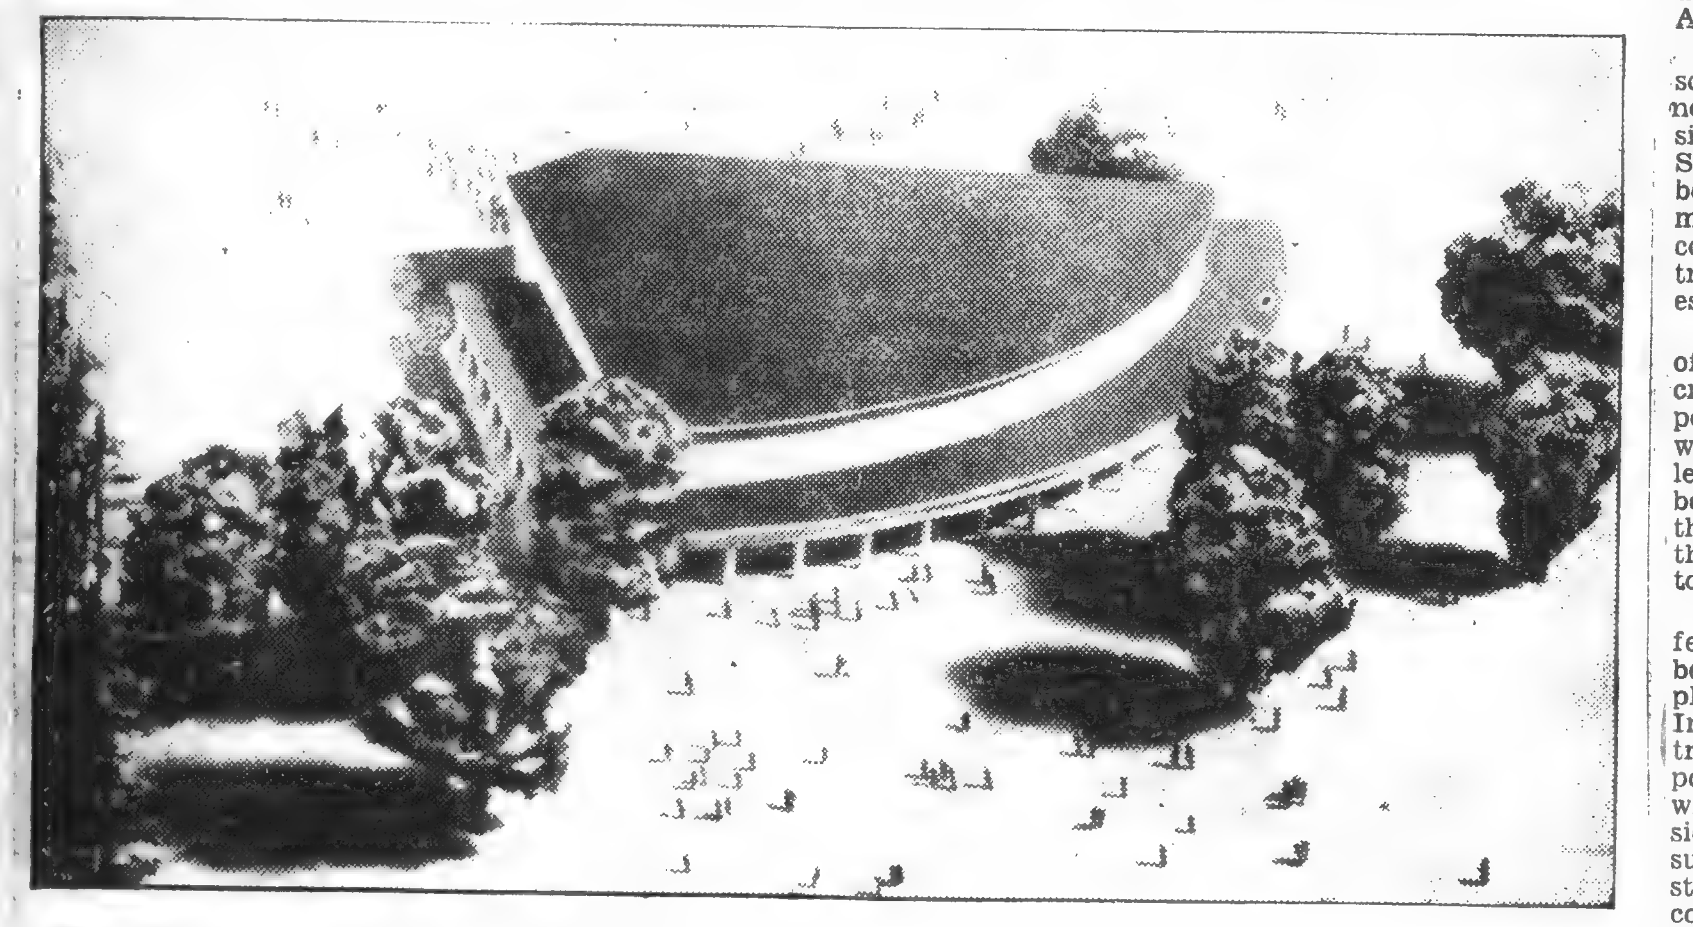


Architect's drawing of huge music shed, to accommodate 5000 people, which is being built at Tanglewood, between Lenox and Stockbridge and where fifth annual festival will be given in August by Boston Symphony orchestra. The building will be fan shape and cover an acre and a half.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

JAN 29 1938

Music Shed for Berkshire Festival



Stockbridge, Jan. 28—The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, inc., today launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in August.

Simultaneously the festival announced the concert dates as August 4, 6 and 7; August 11, 13 and 14, with Dr Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. The letter is in the nature of a report and suggests that contributors pass along the enclosed subscription blank and picture of the building to friends who might be interested in the cause.

Other letters are being sent to hundreds of music lovers who have not contributed, asking if they will now send a donation in any amount to help complete the fund of $100,000. The two letters are signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith as president of the board of the trustees.

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel company. The building, in the shape of a huge fan, will seat 5000.

From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonnade the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last seat in the shed the distance will be 160 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony hall in Boston and similar to those which produced remarkable acoustics at Tanglewood last summer. Final tests for acoustics are scheduled tentatively July 1 under the direction of Prof Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The shed will be in the field overlooking Stockbridge bowl and bounded on the north by the majestic Hawthorne pines and across from the lovely gardens.

The closing paragraph of the letters addressed to music subscribers who have not contributed reads:—

"It is obvious that $78,000 will not complete the shed though it will provide all the essentials, such as protection from storms, proper accommodations for the conductor and orchestra, cloak and dressing rooms for the public. Will you help complete the $100,0000 building fund by sending us a check for any amount?"

Inquiries concerning the 1938 festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

N 29 1938

Festival Seeks $22,000 More For Music Shed

BerkshireSymphonicGroup Presses On to Complete Work forAugustConcerts

Fund Totals $78,000

Foundations for Building Near Lenox, Mass., Laid

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced yesterday that it has opened a campaign to complete the $100,000 needed to assure the construction of the principal portions of the music shed on the Tanglewood estate, near Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next summer. ~~The dates are Thurs~~day, Saturday and Sunday evenings, August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13 and 14.

Thus far, 750 persons have subscribed to the building fund, which now is more than $78,000, and letters signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival board of trustees, are being sent to many music lovers who have not contributed, while previous contributors have been asked to interest their friends in this cause.

The building is to be in the shape of a fan, with seats for 5,000. Concrete foundations are already being poured for the 308-ton steel framework to be constructed by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The distance between the sides of the fan, within the colonnade, will be 325 feet, and that from the conductor's podium to the rearmost seat, 180 feet.

Inquiries about next summer's festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass. In her letter to prospective contributors, Miss Robinson Smith points out that the sum in hand will obviously not complete the music shed, although it will provide such essentials as protection from storms, accommodations for the conductor and orchestra and cloak and dressing rooms for the public.

BIRMINGHAM, ALA.
AGE HERALD

JAN 31 1938

FESTIVAL PLANS LAID IN ADVANCE

Hotels Reserved Almost To Capacity Months Ahead Of Event

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 30—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows of "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will, of course, be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately one and one-half acres, and will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this Summer.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 29 1938

Boston Symphony In Unity Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will be heard February 9 at 8:30 P. M. in Montclair High School. The concert will be given under auspices of the Unity Institute Concert Course and is being offered as an extra event to the regular series this season.

This orchestra is considered by many critics the best in this country and its conductor is ranked high. Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Northern Russia and early made a name for himself with an orchestra which he organized in Moscow.

In 1920 Dr. Koussevitzky went to Paris where he organized the Koussevitzky Concerts, prominent in that city for four seasons. In London he was guest conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra and following the 1924-25 season came to this country to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony, a post he has held continuously to the present day.

M. A. DeWolt Howe in his recent book says of the orchestra "Now in its 56th year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is fortunate, not only in its conductor, but in a personnel which as an accumulation of individual talent, is hardly to be matched in

WIDOR: As Recalled by Pupil and Friend

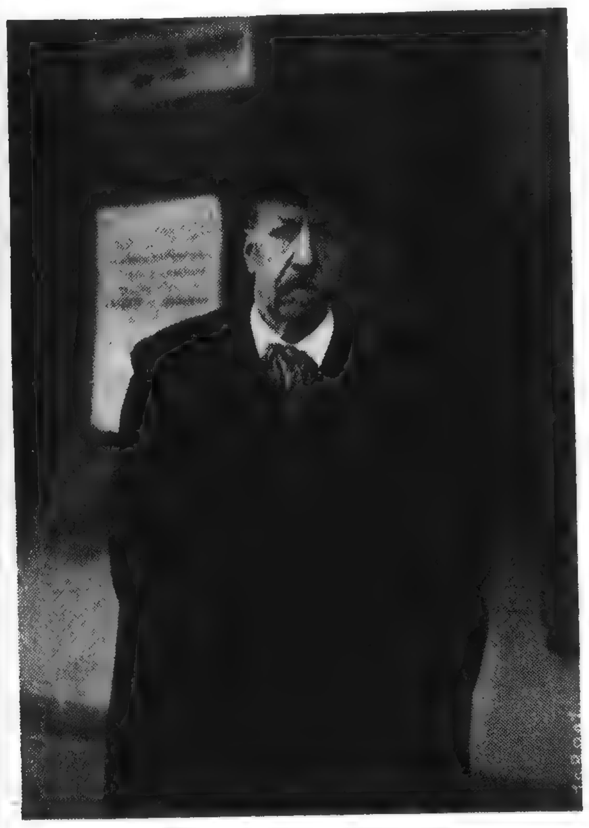
Memories of the Great French Organist and Composer—and of the Ruthless Blue Pencil



Charles Marie Widor

By Dr. Alexander Russell

CHARLES MARIE WIDOR, famous French organist, composer, teacher, conductor, secretary of the French Academy of Fine Arts, died in Paris on March 12 at the age of ninety-two. This "grand old man" of the organ world exerted perhaps the greatest influence on organ playing and composition of any individual in the past half century. Had he lived but a few years longer he might have celebrated his one hundredth anniversary in America. For years he had been urged to visit America.

I started my own campaign years ago, at first seriously then half in jest, and we kept it up as a sort of joke between us. The last time I teased him about it he patted me on the back and with the famous twinkle in his eye and his inimitable lisp, said, "Be patient. Don't hurry me, Russell. I promise to come to America when I am one hundred years old!" Marcel Dupré, his pupil (who succeeded Widor at St. Sulpice) told me that in the summer of 1933 he climbed the stairs to the organ loft with Widor one Sunday morning. Widor, who usually bounded up the stairs, progressed slowly, pausing frequently to rest. He turned to Dupré, "I am getting old. I must stop playing." "No, Master," replied Dupré, "you can't do that! Remember you promised Russell to go to America when you were one hundred."

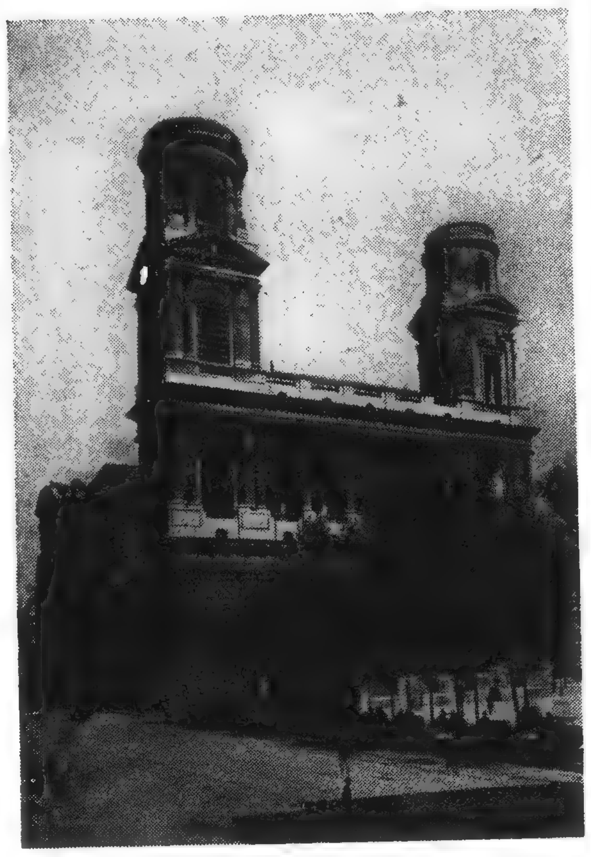
"So I did!" exclaimed Widor, and started up the stairs again.

The Storied Stairs

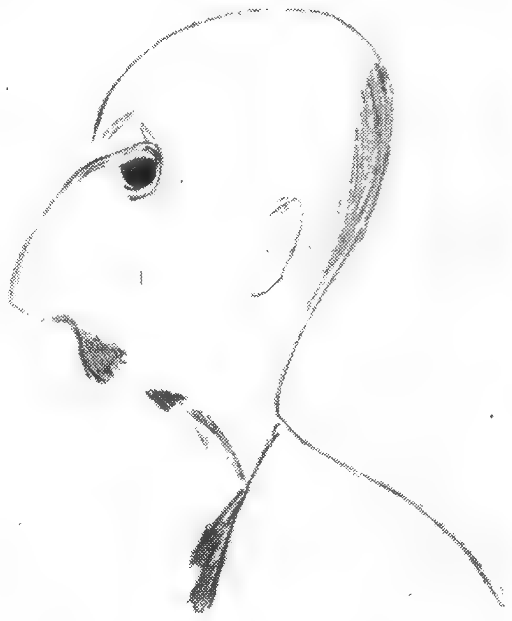
Those stairs at Sulpice will always be a precious memory to Widor's many pupils and admirers. They were a symbol; not merely a means of ascending to the organ loft. A symbol of rising to something fine and inspiring. For Sunday morning in St. Sulpice's organ loft when Widor was at the keyboard was an unforgettable experience. Here crowded friends and pupils who gathered to hear him play Bach, his own compositions and improvisations. The most thrilling experience was to hear him improvise, which he always did during the mass, and often for the sortie. For Widor's improvisations were perfect in form, architectural in structure, and majestic in harmony.

I shall never forget my introduction to him in the spring of 1907, when I arrived in Paris after a year's study in Berlin, and secured permission to visit the organ loft on Sunday morning to make arrangements to study with him.

I climbed the stairs, passed the place where men were walking up and down on the treadmill which worked the huge bellows (there was no organ motor in those days) and came out in the loft to find Widor seated at the console, surrounded by a crowd of men and women. He was in great form that day, improvising on the Gregorian tones of the mass being sung at the other end of the church, playing a Bach fugue at the offertory, and finally at the close of the service turning the full power of the organ loose in a brilliant toccata improvised on the phrases which we had just head from the choir. I had never before heard a master improvise. It seemed incredible at the time, and although I soon learned that improvisation had reached a high plane among French organists, Widor's feats, even now, still seem incredible, not because they were spectacular, but because they were such profoundly good music.

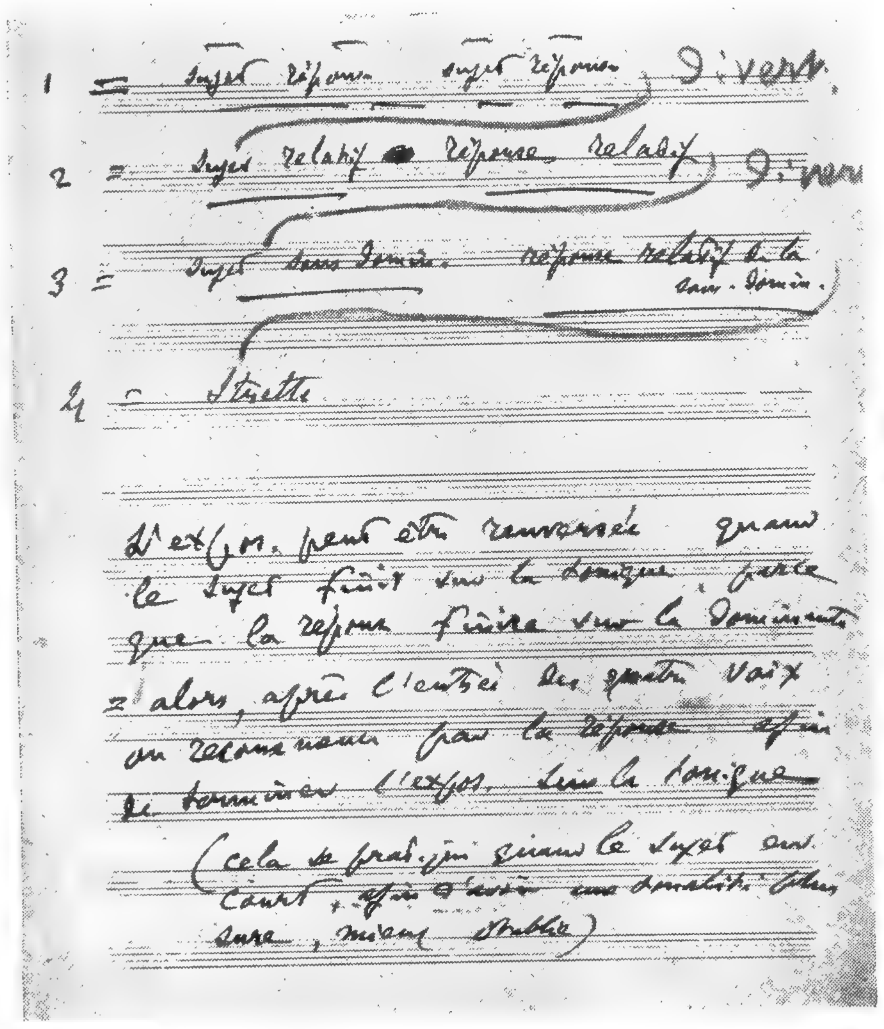


Church of Saint Sulpice, Where Widor Was Organist



A Caricature of Widor by Eduard Monet, Son of the Famous Painter

An Autograph Portrait—Before the Organ at Saint Sulpice



1 = Sujet réponse sujet réponse, Divert.

2 = Sujet relatif réponse relatif, Di:ver

3 = Sujet sous Domin. réponse relatif de la sous-Domin.

4 = Strette

L'expos. peut être renversée quand le sujet finit sur la tonique, parce que la réponse finira sur la dominante = alors, après l'entrée des quatre voix on recommence par la réponse afin de terminer l'expos. sur la tonique

(cela se pratique quand le sujet est court, afin d'avoir une tonalité plus sure, mieux établie)

A LESSON IN FUGUE

(Translation of Widor's Explanation of the Example—Note the Pencil Marks)

The exposition may be inverted when the subject ends on the tonic because the response will end on the dominant. Then, after the entrance of the four voices, you recommence with the response in order to end the exposition on the tonic.

(This is done when the subject demands it in order to have a more sure, better established tonality.)

Dr. Alexander Russell and a Manuscript from the Days of His Study with Widor

My French at that time was pretty bad, but I spoke German fairly well. Widor spoke practically no English, but he seemed to welcome the opportunity to air his German, which, by the way, was almost as poor as my French. But it sufficed for us to get along until I had reached a point where we could talk in French. "Come on Tuesday at ten o'clock in the morning to 7 Rue des St. Pierre and we will talk things over."

Widor's Dissecting Room

Tuesday morning found me ringing the bell at his door. His apartment was on the ground floor. He himself opened the door and ushered me into a little room facing the court through which I had just come. In front of the window looking on this court was a large flat table upon which were spread manuscripts. I was to learn to know that table well. Here were spread my orchestration, fugue and composition manuscripts every week, and here Widor performed his drastic surgical operations, using blue and red pencils instead of scalpels, but operating none the less. I used to call the room the hospital and begged for anesthetic one day when one of my brain children underwent an appendectomy.

Beyond this room was Widor's salon which looked out through French windows on a charming garden. In this room was the little two-manual Cavaille-Coll organ on which he gave his organ lessons, and a grand piano. I leave the discussion of Widor as an organ teacher to those who had more opportunity than I to study with him. But in my first

(Continued on page 65)

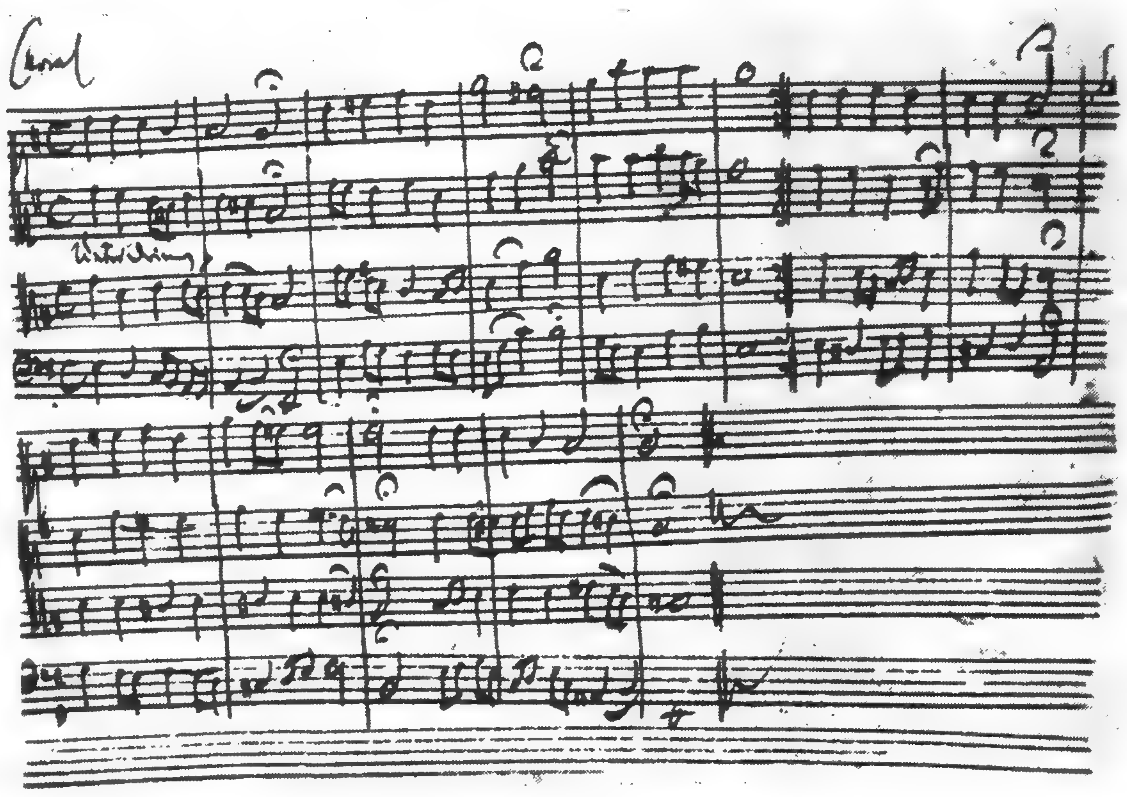
Composers' Character Read from Their Script

Graphological Study of Manuscripts Reveals Personality and Art Traits of Masters

By DR. WILLI REICH



Choral from Bach's Cantata, 'Jesus schläft'

"THE music of many composers resembles their handwriting: hard to read, strange to look at; when one has figured it out, however, it is as if it could not be otherwise; the handwriting belongs to the thought, the thought to the character."

These words, which Robert Schumann once wrote to a woman friend, really contain the complete program of a musical graphology; it is only surprising that almost a century had to pass before any one set to work to study the handwriting of the great musicians systematically. The progress in photographic technique probably gave the impetus for making collections of photostats of the manuscripts of the masters (one of the largest, probably, is the photostat archives of the Vienna National Library), yet these collections always served merely for the safekeeping of the texts and for other technical musical purposes; seldom has there been a thorough examination of the handwritings themselves.

After insignificant beginnings by L. M. Vauzanges and a few allusions in general works of graphology, the book of plates recently issued by the publishing house, Atlantis (Zürich-Berlin), 'Musicians' Handwritings', which was excellently annotated by Professor Georg Schünemann, the head of the music division of the Prussian State Library, probably represents the first comprehensive attempt to impart to a larger reading public some essential facts about the handwriting of the masters of music from Bach to Schumann. With ninety-six plates to work with, which show an unusually happy choice (two of the most interesting are reproduced here with the kind permission of the publishers), from the whole arrangement and animation of the handwriting of the score, from the force, slant and form of the script, and from many other indications, conclusions are drawn about the character and methods of work of the composers which coincide quite startlingly with the data which the biographies in general furnish us. A few of the ingenious characterizations given by Schünemann for individual masters are cited below:

Johann Sebastian Bach

The almost imcomprehensible assurance in the architectural and spatial shows itself also in the writing; everything is balanced, carefully weighed, well proportioned in its relationships. Even the smallest group of notes conforms to the law which has been set up and which is adhered to with logical consistency.

Georg Friedrich Handel

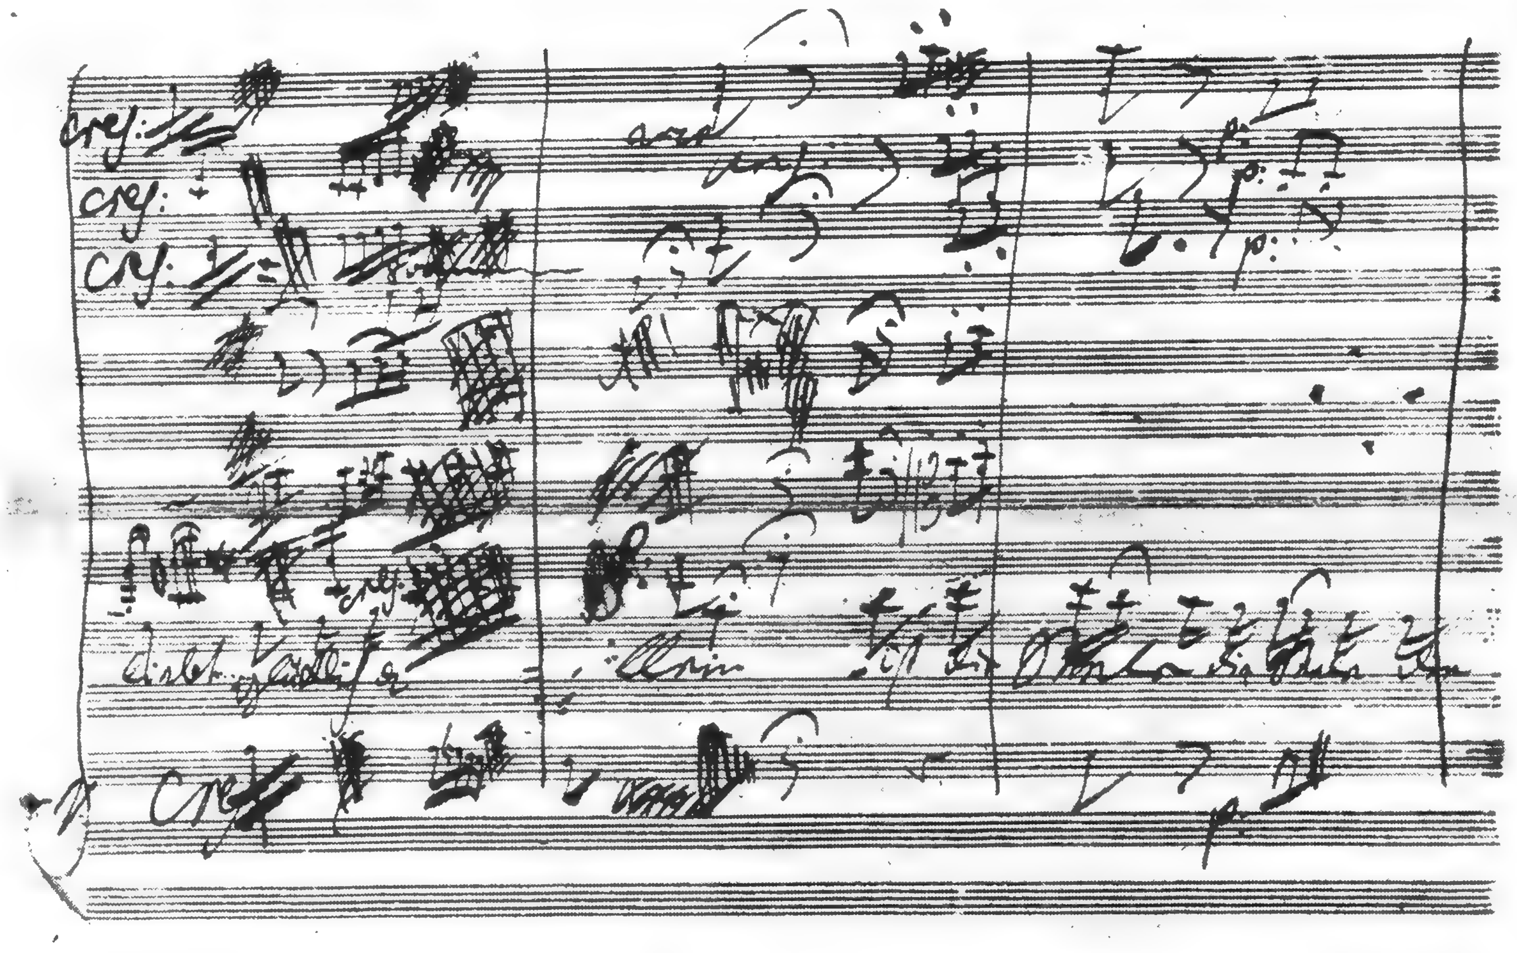
Just as a sketcher by a bold stroke often indicates more than he actually carries out, so the fantastically winding and self-supporting strokes of Handel reveal a truly elementary force and power. It is a picture of genius, subject to no law and following no pattern. Only the flights of thought control hand and script. . . . Here is revealed, more clearly than in biography and portrait, the elementary force of his music and the mighty energy of his deepest nature.

Joseph Haydn

The whole man, pious, modest, humble and naïve, painfully neat and endlessly diligent, speaks out of the dainty and beautiful handwriting. Just as he demanded of music that it should have flowing melody, connected ideas, no flourishes, nothing overdone, so his musical script likewise conforms to this ideal; it runs along and is joined together uniformly and knows no unnecessary extravagances and excesses. Little curlicues and lively flexibility in the control and treatment of details reveal everywhere his artistic versatility, his alert observation and his sense for cheerful thinking and fabulizing.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart

Mozart was accustomed from early childhood to pay attention to a clear and neat musical script. . . . In its main aspects he adhered to this basic principle all his life. . . . It is the picture of an unusually rich nature which speaks out of this handwriting, there is a musician behind it who finds his melodies and musical characters out of almost divine inspiration and who has handed them down to posterity in a wonderfully balanced, harmonious and yet multiform, highly animated script.



From Beethoven's 'Egmont' Music—'Glüchlich allein ist die Selle, die licht'

Ludwig van Beethoven

The written specimen is unusually rich, ever new and yet unmistakable—Beethoven's. No one else has these passionate features, this unruliness, this inner fire and vigor of the lines, no one else this serenity and aloofness from the world which speaks out of the written characters of the last works. There lives in the script the whole man with his titanic creations and ideas, with his mighty, indomitable will, with his defiance and his devotion to everything great, beautiful, eternal. "Go on," he wrote in 1812 to a young woman friend, "do not only practice art, but penetrate also into its soul; it deserves this, for art and science alone elevate man to the position of a god."

Franz Schubert

In his written characters, which harbor eternal sounds, in these beautiful curves and lines there is an overtone of a bit of Viennese life and Austrian nature, there lives in them, as Robert Schumann once wrote, "Vienna, with its cathedral of St. Stephan's, its beautiful women, its public pageantry, and, girdled by the countless ribbons of the Danube, as it stretches out into the blooming plain which gradually rises to higher and higher mountains, this Vienna with all its reminiscences of the great German masters. . . . Under the spell of the Schubert symphony, the bright, flourishing, romantic life in it, the city rises up before me again today more distinctly than ever, it once more becomes quite clear to me, how just in this environment such works can be written. . . ."

Robert Schumann

Out of Schumann's handwriting, too, there speaks the whole man with his poetizing and dreaming, his visions and ecstasies. There lives in it such an artistic power, such a richness and exuberance, that in the midst of the ingenious swing and sweep of these features one almost overlooks its frequently precipitate, unstable and flickering quality, indeed, there is an element of such greatness and such a youthful onrush in the Schumann we see, that in his early end we seem to perceive a law of nature.

Thus the detailed, strictly scientific graphological observations of Schünemann take us right into the midst of the creative world of our great composers. Their handwriting, like their works, is an object of reverent admiration for us. New, unexpected possibilities are opened up here for musical research.

Mozart Songs Discovered

Two songs composed by Mozart in 1791 and entitled 'Children at Play', and 'Springtime', of which all trace had been lost, were recently discovered in Vienna.

To Subscribers Desiring Change of Address

PLEASE REPORT change of address immediately. (Be sure to send your old address together with new address.) Copies that have been mailed to an old address will not be forwarded by the post office unless extra postage is sent to the post office by the subscriber. Avoid such expense, and make sure of getting your copies promptly by notifying MUSICAL AMERICA at least two weeks in advance.

(scrap-book)

"Atlantic Montly", February, 1938

LADIES WEAR GLOVES

BY SYLVIA G. DREYFUS

SHE was a tall, handsome young woman, cool and a little reserved. Her fur-trimmed costume, her chic hat, were perfect in style, but conservative. And her white gloves, though she had worn them all afternoon at the concert, were still spotless. Her manner, too, was perfect, and she talked easily, without effusiveness: she knew how to meet a celebrity.

'But I can't see why you thought the audience was cold,' she protested. 'They were really very enthusiastic, especially at the end of the concerto.'

Jascha Heifetz cocked his head on one side and raised his eyebrows in an expression of amused skepticism. 'So? That was enthusiasm? If, when they applaud, the ladies would take off their gloves,' he suggested dryly, pointing an accusing finger at the white doeskin gauntlets, 'the musician could tell better whether they liked his performance.'

I often recall Heifetz's remark when, surrounded by decorous neighbors at an afternoon concert in Carnegie or Symphony Hall, I gaze upon the typical, well-bred audience. These nice people listen with courteous attention; their training forbids a show of emotion and their faces betray none; their only sign of approval, a muted, gloved applause, conveys no indication of real feeling; and their only method of showing disapproval (since they are too well-mannered not to clap at all) is to go through the motions a bit more listlessly. Rebelling sometimes at this frozen restraint, I sigh for one good healthy hiss. That at least would clear the atmosphere of its heavy non-conductivity and open up the possibilities for a real interchange of reactions.

At the Berkshire Festival in August, I sat behind two middle-aged women, evidently people of means and refinement. I watched them, curious to see how they responded to the music. After the Beethoven programme they clapped briefly, gathered their wraps, and departed. Their faces showed neither pleasure nor disapproval. I tried to explain it to myself: 'It may be that they have heard the Beethoven Fifth Symphony too often. And perhaps the Sixth is too cool for their taste.'

The next night, after a brilliant performance of 'Daphnis and Chloe' and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, they again clapped in perfunctory fashion and went out. Possibly they did n't care for Ravel and Tchaikovsky: many people don't. But at the third concert neither Mozart nor Stravinsky nor César Franck brought a gleam to their calm features. I waited anxiously for the end of the Wagner programme to see what effect, if any, that would have; but they were very much concerned with the storm that evening, and, though they applauded politely after a glowing 'Tristan and Isolde,' the passionate music did not stir them.

With the fifth programme I began to give up hope. It had seemed as if the simple directness of the Haydn Symphony in G major must please them; or the nobility of the Sibelius Seventh; and surely they could not remain unmoved by the mad, pulsing rhythms of 'Scheherazade'! They were marble figures in evening dress.

The final concert was an all-Brahms programme, and I pinned my hopes for their æsthetic salvation to the First Symphony. 'It is n't possible,' I assured myself, 'that any woman who cares enough about music to sit through six symphony concerts can resist this composition.' The afternoon was perfect: blue skies, hot sunshine, the shadows of great pine trees, a marvelous setting for an outdoor concert. Beauty enveloped us in a cloak of color and melody. Koussevitzky conducted one of those performances which demand the adjective 'inspired.' Carried away by enthusiasm, the audience staged a good old-fashioned 'demonstration.' But the two women, their faces mask-like, adjusted their sable scarves and departed. . . .

The next time you go to a concert, watch the audience. Are they intent? Are they eager? Are they responsive? The young people may be. The foreign-born will be. Young or old, if they are not yet completely jelled in the rigid mould imposed by Anglo-Saxon ideas of correctness, they may still possess sufficient muscular elasticity — and enough simplicity of spirit — to show what they are thinking. The two women at the Berkshire concerts do represent a large group. It is possible that they were quite pleased with the Festival, that they enjoyed it, though no manifestations of enjoyment were discernible. Now I have no doubt that in friendly conversation over a cup of tea the expressions of these ladies show some variation, and it is to be supposed that they are not therefore accused of undue display of feeling. But put them in expensive seats at a concert and what happens? They don't look reasonably cheerful, however charming the music; they never smile at music which is jolly or frankly humorous. (The dancing measures of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony are happy; and who can refrain from laughter at the pranks of Till Eulenspiegel?) Why do they stiffen in resistance to music? And by what physiological trick are they able to restrain the revealing flush which creeps into the cheek of a person normally responsive to beauty or emotion?

To a certain extent I understand this extravagant reticence, though I have long since lost patience with it. I belong to a generation brought up on Platonic ideals of self-restraint. It has taken many years to shake my conviction that one lost caste when one felt or showed too plainly either delight or displeasure. To be sure, one found some slight relief in Aristotle and the convenient theory of katharsis which allowed one to weep at a tragedy or submit, momentarily, to sad music — allowed it only for the reason that the vicarious experience purged the soul and set one free for greater efforts of self-discipline. But to shout 'Bravo!', to demand an encore, to split the too-tight kid glove in an expression of excitement — well, it just was n't done. One left that to the galleries. No lady (and only a very rare gentleman) would be guilty of it.

What has changed my point of view in the intervening years I am not certain. Perhaps mine was simply an emotional, post-war revolt. Perhaps Sigmund Freud, responsible for so many metamorphoses, woke the Snow Maiden. Perhaps I was finally converted when I began to understand more thoroughly the artistic temperament and its intense need of appreciation and sympathy. It was then that I recognized the important rôle of the listener. Since the performing artist requires an audience — and in a sense he has no existence without one — my rôle, though subordinate, is essential to the fulfillment of his. I have no right to withhold or conceal my honest response.

Now applause, since it is a voluntary act, seldom reflex, may or may not be honest. And applause may indicate a variety of reactions, not necessarily an attitude of approval. There is the ami-

(over)

Mon. Feb 5

'Lost' Concerto Heard

The Arts in Boston

The now famous Violin Concerto of Schumann came to a rather belated Boston performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As soloist for the fifteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Yehudi Menuhin presented it, along with the Mendelssohn Concerto. Elsewhere, he has paired the Schumann with the Brahms Concerto, in order to permit listeners to judge for themselves how much Schumann's work influenced Brahms. But it is not necessary to hear them on the same program to realize that Brahms owed much less to Schumann for his Violin Concerto than Shakespeare owed to Painter for "Othello." Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky persuaded Mr. Menuhin that it would be kinder to Schumann to substitute the Mendelssohn for the Brahms.

Certainly the Mendelssohn sounded like great music, following the Schumann. We may as well face the fact that this "lost" concerto of Schumann's is poor stuff. Its interest depends upon the publicity that has been given it, and much of that has been misleading. The score was never lost, and those who have revived it have done a disservice to its composer. No doubt their intentions were of the best, but Joachim proved himself a better friend to Schumann when he tried to keep this concerto out of sight and hearing. It is a dull, tedious, garrulous and empty score.

Mr. Menhuin played it as if he believed in it, as indeed he must have done to revive it. He did all he could to make it acceptable, but in vain. He was fortunate in having the opportunity provided by the Mendelssohn Concerto for the better display of his talents. These talents are still impressive. When he returned to Boston recently, after two years of absence, to give a sonata recital with his sister, he did not appear to have profited from his retirement so much as we had expected. It seemed possible then that he was toning down his performance to match that of his young companion. But yesterday again he gave evidence of less growth than we had anticipated. He played the Mendelssohn well, but not well enough. Neither his tone nor his style had the necessary breadth. He played the music as one who had been taught well and who had learned his lesson well, but not with the freedom and expression of a great artist. Nevertheless he was accorded an ovation.

An item of the program that turned out to be of greater interest was the Symphony No. 2 ("Elegiaca") of Malipiero. The composer has been at some pains to clarify his title. It explains, he says in a program note, "how music that I wrote in the anxious and tragic months of the year 1936, a year which was full of sadness, yet remains outside of the events and has an elegiac character."

Fortunately the music is clearer than the explanation. It is pleasant music, built transparently on polyphonic lines. It is classical in style, with just enough harmonic seasoning to make it palatable. It poses no problems and makes no pretensions, but maintains a nostalgic mood with an air of restraint. It was beautifully played.

The program closed with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1938

MLLE. BOULANGER HERE

Vincent Sheean, Author, Also on the Champlain.

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of composition at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris and professor of harmony at the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, who will be the first woman ever to have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived today in the French liner Champlain.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin and is regarded as probably the greatest living woman organist, said that she was a little uncertain as to how the conservative Boston music lovers would receive a woman conductor.

She will lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley colleges during her visit and will study American educational methods on behalf of the French Government.

Also on board the liner, which carried 269 passengers, were Vincent Sheean, the author, his wife and their infant daughter, Linda. Mrs. Sheean is the former Diana Forbes-Robertson, youngest daughter of the late Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, actor. It is her first visit to America.

Mr. Sheean will confer with his publishers on his latest book, "The Day of Battle," a hist[illegible] novel concerned with the Battle of Fontenoy. The action of the story is confined within the single day of May 11, 1745, when the French Army under Marshal Saxe defeated the Anglo-Allied Army under the Duke of Cumberland at Fontenoy, a village near Tournai in Belgium.

Notes of Coming Concerts; New

Notable Choral Program to Be Prese
Nadia Boulanger; Items of the

Tran. Feb 5

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger will conduct the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a varied program at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evening, March 3. Assisted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloists whom Mlle. Boulanger is bringing from Paris, the singing societies will perform Bach's cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; "Hodie Christus natus est," by Palestrina; Four Motets by Leo Preger, written for the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Poulenc's, "Litanies a la vierge noire"; "Iste Confessor" (XIII century); "O nata lux de lumine," by Tallis; Hindemith's "O Herr, gib jedem seinen eignen Tod"; Stravinsky's "Ave Maria"; Palestrina's "Hosanna-Gloria," and scenes from "King Arthur," by Purcell.

At the Festival of College Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 25, an ensemble of 850 voices, representing fourteen glee clubs, will sing Brahms' "Chorus of Homage," Tshesnokov's "Mother of Moscow," Handel's "May no rash intruder," from "Solomon," and Bach's "To Thee Alone Be Glory." The festival is under the supervision of the New England College Glee Club Association. Also on the program will be several groups of songs by the several participating choruses.

Music News and Comment

Nadia Boulanger, the eminent French musician, will be guest conductor and organist at the next concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 18 and 19. This week the orchestra is away on tour. Two weeks hence the program will appropriately consist of French music—the Requiem of Gabriel Faure, which Mlle. Boulanger will conduct, and the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens, the organ part of which Mlle. Boulanger will play. The chorus for the Requiem will be the Bach Cantanta Club; the soloists, Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct Saint-Saens' Symphony. Mlle. Boulanger was a pupil of Faure, whose Requiem she has conducted in England. The coming performance will be the first in Symphony Hall.

"Atlantic Montly", February, 1938

LADIES WEAR GLOVES

BY SYLVIA G. DREYFUS

SHE was a tall, handsome young woman, cool and a little reserved. Her fur-trimmed costume, her chic hat, were perfect in style, but conservative. And her white gloves, though she had worn them all afternoon at the concert, were still spotless. Her manner, too, was perfect, and she talked easily, without effusiveness: she knew how to meet a celebrity.

'But I can't see why you thought the audience was cold,' she protested. 'They were really very enthusiastic, especially at the end of the concerto.'

Jascha Heifetz cocked his head on one side and raised his eyebrows in an expression of amused skepticism. 'So? That was enthusiasm? If, when they applaud, the ladies would take off their gloves,' he suggested dryly, pointing an accusing finger at the white doeskin gauntlets, 'the musician could tell better whether they liked his performance.'

I often recall Heifetz's remark when, surrounded by decorous neighbors at an afternoon concert in Carnegie or Symphony Hall, I gaze upon the typical, well-bred audience. These nice people listen with courteous attention; their training forbids a show of emotion and their faces betray none; their only sign of approval, a muted, gloved applause, conveys no indication of real feeling; and their only method of showing disapproval (since they are too well-mannered not to clap at all) is to go through the motions a bit more listlessly. Rebelling sometimes at this frozen restraint, I sigh for one good healthy hiss. That at least would clear the atmosphere of its heavy non-conductivity and open up the possibilities for a real interchange of reactions.

At the Berkshire Festival in August, I sat behind two middle-aged women, evidently people of means and refinement. I watched them, curious to see how they responded to the music. After the Beethoven programme they clapped briefly, gathered their wraps, and departed. Their faces showed neither pleasure nor disapproval. I tried to explain it to myself: 'It may be that they have heard the Beethoven Fifth Symphony too often. And perhaps the Sixth is too cool for their taste.'

The next night, after a brilliant performance of 'Daphnis and Chloe' and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, they again clapped in perfunctory fashion and went out. Possibly they did n't care for Ravel and Tchaikovsky: many people don't. But at the third concert neither Mozart nor Stravinsky nor César Franck brought a gleam to their calm features. I waited anxiously for the end of the Wagner programme to see what effect, if any, that would have; but they were very much concerned with the storm that evening, and, though they applauded politely after a glowing 'Tristan and Isolde,' the passionate music did not stir them.

With the fifth programme I began to give up hope. It had seemed as if the simple directness of the Haydn Symphony in G major must please them; or the nobility of the Sibelius Seventh; and surely they could not remain unmoved by the mad, pulsing rhythms of 'Scheherazade'! They were marble figures in evening dress.

The final concert was an all-Brahms programme, and I pinned my hopes for their æsthetic salvation to the First Symphony. 'It is n't possible,' I assured myself, 'that any woman who cares enough about music to sit through six symphony concerts can resist this composition.' The afternoon was perfect: blue skies, hot sunshine, the shadows of great pine trees, a marvelous setting for an outdoor concert. Beauty enveloped us in a cloak of color and melody. Koussevitzky conducted one of those performances which demand the adjective 'inspired.' Carried away by enthusiasm, the audience staged a good old-fashioned 'demonstration.' But the two women, their faces mask-like, adjusted their sable scarves and departed. . . .

The next time you go to a concert, watch the audience. Are they intent? Are they eager? Are they responsive? The young people may be. The foreign-born will be. Young or old, if they are not yet completely jelled in the rigid mould imposed by Anglo-Saxon ideas of correctness, they may still possess sufficient muscular elasticity — and enough simplicity of spirit — to show what they are thinking. The two women at the Berkshire concerts do represent a large group. It is possible that they were quite pleased with the Festival, that they enjoyed it, though no manifestations of enjoyment were discernible. Now I have no doubt that in friendly conversation over a cup of tea the expressions of these ladies show some variation, and it is to be supposed that they are not therefore accused of undue display of feeling. But put them in expensive seats at a concert and what happens? They don't look reasonably cheerful, however charming the music; they never smile at music which is jolly or frankly humorous. (The dancing measures of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony are happy; and who can refrain from laughter at the pranks of Till Eulenspiegel?) Why do they stiffen in resistance to music? And by what physiological trick are they able to restrain the revealing flush which creeps into the cheek of a person normally responsive to beauty or emotion?

To a certain extent I understand this extravagant reticence, though I have long since lost patience with it. I belong to a generation brought up on Platonic ideals of self-restraint. It has taken many years to shake my conviction that one lost caste when one felt or showed too plainly either delight or displeasure. To be sure, one found some slight relief in Aristotle and the convenient theory of katharsis which allowed one to weep at a tragedy or submit, momentarily, to sad music — allowed it only for the reason that the vicarious experience purged the soul and set one free for greater efforts of self-discipline. But to shout 'Bravo!', to demand an encore, to split the too-tight kid glove in an expression of excitement — well, it just was n't done. One left that to the galleries. No lady (and only a very rare gentleman) would be guilty of it.

What has changed my point of view in the intervening years I am not certain. Perhaps mine was simply an emotional, post-war revolt. Perhaps Sigmund Freud, responsible for so many metamorphoses, woke the Snow Maiden. Perhaps I was finally converted when I began to understand more thoroughly the artistic temperament and its intense need of appreciation and sympathy. It was then that I recognized the important rôle of the listener. Since the performing artist requires an audience — and in a sense he has no existence without one — my rôle, though subordinate, is essential to the fulfillment of his. I have no right to withhold or conceal my honest response.

Now applause, since it is a voluntary act, seldom reflex, may or may not be honest. And applause may indicate a variety of reactions, not necessarily an attitude of approval. There is the ami-

(over)

10 Monitor Feb 5 —Boston News—

'Lost' Concerto Heard

The Arts in Boston

The now famous Violin Concerto of Schumann came to a rather belated Boston performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As soloist for the fifteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Yehudi Menuhin presented it, along with the Mendelssohn Concerto. Elsewhere, he has paired the Schumann with the Brahms Concerto, in order to permit listeners to judge for themselves how much Schumann's work influenced Brahms. But it is not necessary to hear them on the same program to realize that Brahms owed much less to Schumann for his Violin Concerto than Shakespeare owed to Painter for "Othello." Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky persuaded Mr. Menuhin that it would be kinder to Schumann to substitute the Mendelssohn for the Brahms.

Certainly the Mendelssohn sounded like great music, following the Schumann. We may as well face the fact that this "lost" concerto of Schumann's is poor stuff. Its interest depends upon the publicity that has been given it, and much of that has been misleading. The score was never lost, and those who have revived it have done a disservice to its composer. No doubt their intentions were of the best, but Joachim proved himself a better friend to Schumann when he tried to keep this concerto out of sight and hearing. It is a dull, tedious, garrulous and empty score.

Mr. Menhuin played it as if he believed in it, as indeed he must have done to revive it. He did all he could to make it acceptable, but in vain. He was fortunate in having the opportunity provided by the Mendelssohn Concerto for the better display of his talents. These talents are still impressive. When he returned to Boston recently, after two years of absence, to give a sonata recital with his sister, he did not appear to have profited from his retirement so much as we had expected. It seemed possible then that he was toning down his performance to match that of his young companion. But yesterday again he gave evidence of less growth than we had anticipated. He played the Mendelssohn well, but not well enough. Neither his tone nor his style had the necessary breadth. He played the music as one who had been taught well and who had learned his lesson well, but not with the freedom and expression of a great artist. Nevertheless he was accorded an ovation.

An item of the program that turned out to be of greater interest was the Symphony No. 2 ("Elegiaca") of Malipiero. The composer has been at some pains to clarify his title. It explains, he says in a program note, "how music that I wrote in the anxious and tragic months of the year 1936, a year which was full of sadness, yet remains outside of the events and has an elegiac character."

Fortunately the music is clearer than the explanation. It is pleasant music, built transparently on polyphonic lines. It is classical in style, with just enough harmonic seasoning to make it palatable. It poses no problems and makes no pretensions, but maintains a nostalgic mood with an air of restraint. It was beautifully played.

The program closed with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman." - L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1938

MLLE. BOULANGER HERE

Vincent Sheean, Author, Also on the Champlain.

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of composition at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris and professor of harmony at the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, who will be the first woman ever to have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived today in the French liner Champlain.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin and is regarded as probably the greatest living woman organist, said that she was a little uncertain as to how the conservative Boston music lovers would receive a woman conductor.

She will lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley colleges during her visit and will study American educational methods on behalf of the French Government.

Also on board the liner, which carried 269 passengers, were Vincent Sheean, the author, his wife and their infant daughter, Linda. Mrs. Sheean is the former Diana Forbes-Robertson, youngest daughter of the late Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, actor. It is her first visit to America.

Mr. Sheean will confer with his publishers on his latest book, "The Day of Battle," a historical novel concerned with the Battle of Fontenoy. The action of the story is confined within the single day of May 11, 1745, when the French Army under Marshal Saxe defeated the Anglo-Allied Army under the Duke of Cumberland at Fontenoy, a village near Tournai in Belgium.

Notes of Coming Concerts; New

Notable Choral Program to Be Prese
Nadia Boulanger; Items of the

Trans Feb 5

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger will conduct the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a varied program at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evening, March 3. Assisted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloists whom Mlle. Boulanger is bringing from Paris, the singing societies will perform Bach's cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; "Hodie Christus natus est," by Palestrina; Four Motets by Leo Preger, written for the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Poulenc's, "Litanies a la vierge noire"; "Iste Confessor" (XIII century); "O nata lux de lumine," by Tallis; Hindemith's "O Herr, gib jedem seinen eignen Tod"; Stravinsky's "Ave Maria"; Palestrina's "Hosanna-Gloria," and scenes from "King Arthur," by Purcell.

At the Festival of College Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 25, an ensemble of 850 voices, representing fourteen glee clubs, will sing Brahms' "Chorus of Homage," Tshesnokov's "Mother of Moscow," Handel's "May no rash intruder," from "Solomon," and Bach's "To Thee Alone Be Glory." The festival is under the supervision of the New England College Glee Club Association. Also on the program will be several groups of songs by the several participating choruses.

Music News and Comment

Feb 5

Nadia Boulanger, the eminent French musician, will be guest conductor and organist at the next concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 18 and 19. This week the orchestra is away on tour. Two weeks hence the program will appropriately consist of French music—the Requiem of Gabriel Faure, which Mlle. Boulanger will conduct, and the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens, the organ part of which Mlle. Boulanger will play. The chorus for the Requiem will be the Bach Cantanta Club; the soloists, Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct Saint-Saens' Symphony. Mlle. Boulanger was a pupil of Faure, whose Requiem she has conducted in England. The coming performance will be the first in Symphony Hall.

---

conductor, but in a personnel which as an accumulation of individual talent, is hardly to be matched in the present or past."

able, hearty handclapping that greets an unknown performer at his debut before he has shown himself worthy of praise; the tumultuous applause of welcome for a world-famous pianist, applause which is due to his renown and which will, presently, be repeated either because he has justified his reputation or because the audience thinks he has; the kindly, sympathetic applause for a performer who has made a slip and corrected it and is encouraged by the friendliness of his audience to vindicate himself; the unconvincing applause, at an orchestral concert, after a new composition whose merits are not at once apparent. (And who has forgotten the awkward moment when it is discovered that the luckless composer is present, has risen from his seat, and, torn between delight and embarrassment, is making his way to the platform to receive those uncertain plaudits? And when the audience, moved either by good manners or by a natural tendency to bestow public laurel wreaths, suddenly changes the tone of its handclapping to determined heartiness?)

There is, too, the reaction to a tremendously exciting piece of music when the audience can hardly wait for the final beat and almost breaks into the last measure in its eagerness. Such applause is hysterical in effect; it is high-pitched and shrill, like an excited voice. Indeed, I cherish a theory — endorsed, I must admit, by no musician — that it has a key of its own, a major key of many sharps. There is still another kind of applause, and this must be for the performer the most precious of all and the rarest. It is preceded by a moment of breathless silence when the audience, truly moved, seems unwilling to break the spell of the music and almost unable to take up the ordinary motions of living: a brief and magnificent moment, lost all too quickly in the conventional demonstrations of approval, but uplifting to every person who shares it.

You may, occasionally, find an artist who is honestly convinced that the attitude of the audience has little effect on his performance. I know of one. A great musician, he deliberately shuts himself off from his hearers, will not permit the thought of them to intrude on his playing, and scoffs at the idea that there is any contact between performer and listener. But I think he is the exception — and even he has been heard to comment on the coldness or sympathy of an audience! I could name six others, all of the first rank, who are quick to acknowledge that bond, who admit that they are extremely sensitive to it and can 'feel' the audience the moment they step across the stage.

One of them said to me once, 'I can, of course, give a perfectly good performance even when I realize that the audience is not "with" me. If necessary I can build a wall around myself and play for my own satisfaction inside that wall. But the spark is not there; I can't give a great performance without their response. And if, when I finish, they do not show by their applause that they like it, if they do not ask for encores, what am I to think? How can I tell that I have succeeded? Their applause, their enthusiasm, is my only means of knowing!'

I do not suggest that Americans should ape the easy exuberance of the Latin audience. That would be an affectation, alien to our habit and our nature. But I wish that we could break down the icy barrier of self-consciousness and learn to take our music with zest.

Montr Feb 5

10 —Boston News—

'Lost' Concerto Heard

The Arts in Boston

The now famous Violin Concerto of Schumann came to a rather belated Boston performance yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As soloist for the fifteenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Yehudi Menuhin presented it, along with the Mendelssohn Concerto. Elsewhere, he has paired the Schumann with the Brahms Concerto, in order to permit listeners to judge for themselves how much Schumann's work influenced Brahms. But it is not necessary to hear them on the same program to realize that Brahms owed much less to Schumann for his Violin Concerto than Shakespeare owed to Painter for "Othello." Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky persuaded Mr. Menuhin that it would be kinder to Schumann to substitute the Mendelssohn for the Brahms.

Certainly the Mendelssohn sounded like great music, following the Schumann. We may as well face the fact that this "lost" concerto of Schumann's is poor stuff. Its interest depends upon the publicity that has been given it, and much of that has been misleading. The score was never lost, and those who have revived it have done a disservice to its composer. No doubt their intentions were of the best, but Joachim proved himself a better friend to Schumann when he tried to keep this concerto out of sight and hearing. It is a dull, tedious, garrulous and empty score.

Mr. Menhuin played it as if he believed in it, as indeed he must have done to revive it. He did all he could to make it acceptable, but in vain. He was fortunate in having the opportunity provided by the Mendelssohn Concerto for the better display of his talents. These talents are still impressive. When he returned to Boston recently, after two years of absence, to give a sonata recital with his sister, he did not appear to have profited from his retirement so much as we had expected. It seemed possible then that he was toning down his performance to match that of his young companion. But yesterday again he gave evidence of less growth than we had anticipated. He played the Mendelssohn well, but not well enough. Neither his tone nor his style had the necessary breadth. He played the music as one who had been taught well and who had learned his lesson well, but not with the freedom and expression of a great artist. Nevertheless he was accorded an ovation.

An item of the program that turned out to be of greater interest was the Symphony No. 2 ("Elegiaca") of Malipiero. The composer has been at some pains to clarify his title. It explains, he says in a program note, "how music that I wrote in the anxious and tragic months of the year 1936, a year which was full of sadness, yet remains outside of the events and has an elegiac character."

Fortunately the music is clearer than the explanation. It is pleasant music, built transparently on polyphonic lines. It is classical in style, with just enough harmonic seasoning to make it palatable. It poses no problems and makes no pretensions, but maintains a nostalgic mood with an air of restraint. It was beautifully played.

The program closed with the Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

- L. A. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 2 - 1938

MLLE. BOULANGER HERE

Vincent Sheean, Author, Also on the Champlain.

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of composition at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris and professor of harmony at the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau, who will be the first woman ever to have conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived today in the French liner Champlain.

Mlle. Boulanger, who taught orchestration to the late George Gershwin and is regarded as probably the greatest living woman organist, said that she was a little uncertain as to how the conservative Boston music lovers would receive a woman conductor.

She will lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley colleges during her visit and will study American educational methods on behalf of the French Government.

Also on board the liner, which carried 269 passengers, were Vincent Sheean, the author, his wife and their infant daughter, Linda. Mrs. Sheean is the former Diana Forbes-Robertson, youngest daughter of the late Sir Johnston Forbes-Robertson, actor. It is her first visit to America.

Mr. Sheean will confer with his publishers on his latest book, "The Day of Battle," a historical novel concerned with the Battle of Fontenoy. The action of the story is confined within the single day of May 11, 1745, when the French Army under Marshal Saxe defeated the Anglo-Allied Army under the Duke of Cumberland at Fontenoy, a village near Tournai in Belgium.

Notes of Coming Concerts; New

Notable Choral Program to Be Prese

Nadia Boulanger; Items of the

Trans Feb 5

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger will conduct the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in a varied program at Sanders Theater, Harvard University, on Thursday evening, March 3. Assisted by members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and soloists whom Mlle. Boulanger is bringing from Paris, the singing societies will perform Bach's cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; "Hodie Christus natus est," by Palestrina; Four Motets by Leo Preger, written for the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Poulenc's, "Litanies a la vierge noire"; "Iste Confessor" (XIII century); "O nata lux de lumine," by Tallis; Hindemith's "O Herr, gib jedem seinen eignen Tod"; Stravinsky's "Ave Maria"; Palestrina's "Hosanna-Gloria," and scenes from "King Arthur," by Purcell.

At the Festival of College Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall on Friday evening, Feb. 25, an ensemble of 850 voices, representing fourteen glee clubs, will sing Brahms' "Chorus of Homage," Tshesnokov's "Mother of Moscow," Handel's "May no rash intruder," from "Solomon," and Bach's "To Thee Alone Be Glory." The festival is under the supervision of the New England College Glee Club Association. Also on the program will be several groups of songs by the several participating choruses.

Music News and Comment

Nadia Boulanger, the eminent French musician, will be guest conductor and organist at the next concerts here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Feb. 18 and 19. This week the orchestra is away on tour. Two weeks hence the program will appropriately consist of French music—the Requiem of Gabriel Faure, which Mlle. Boulanger will conduct, and the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens, the organ part of which Mlle. Boulanger will play. The chorus for the Requiem will be the Bach Cantanta Club; the soloists, Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone. Dr. Koussevitzky will, of course, conduct Saint-Saens' Symphony. Mlle. Boulanger was a pupil of Faure, whose Requiem she has conducted in England. The coming performance will be the first in Symphony Hall.

Feb Globe

Y 5, 1938

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The long-awaited Violin Concerto by Robert Schumann was played for the first time here at the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Yehudi Menuhin, who also performed with the orchestra Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began the concert with another score new to Boston—the Second Symphony of the contemporary Italian, Malipiero—and concluded with the Overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman."

No music in recent years has come before the public with such a fanfare of excited press-agentry as has Schumann's Concerto, the last major work which he wrote. Available details of the Concerto's amazing history have been printed in the Globe. The whole story evidently has yet to be told for John N. Burk sets forth in the program book some new facts. Mr. Burk has also done a sensible and scholarly piece of work concerning the reasons why the Concerto should have been brought out 84 years after Schumann composed it.

On the strength of brief acquaintance, Schumann's Concerto is full of lyrical beauty, well worth exhumation, though no masterpiece. In point of construction it probably does show that Schumann's mental powers had begun to fail by the Autumn of 1853, while its melodies are unquestionably lovely. Set in the conventional three movements, the Concerto begins with a broad, sweeping theme that suggests the style of Brahms, but there are no further similarities, thematic or otherwise, with the Violin Concerto of Brahms. A statement attributed to Yehudi Menuhin had stressed supposed resemblances between the two compositions.

The exquisitely songful slow movement is linked to the rhythmically buoyant finale. There are no cadenzas. Schumann's hand is plain in the solid orchestration. And the state of his mind is apparent in the fact that his music does not progress with the formal directness of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, an example of masterly construction. Although the contrast between solo violin and orchestra is regular enough in the first movement to satisfy the general requirements of the classic concerto form, the rest of the music is highly personal, almost in a fantasia style.

Joachim, for whom Schumann wrote the Concerto, touched the heart of the matter when he referred to the absence of that essential technical procedure known as "development." There is little "development," and that mainly in the solo part. The orchestra mostly repeats outstanding themes. A musician spoke to this reviewer of occasional ineffective writing of the solo part. That may be true, but these are purely technical matters and ought not to blind the average music-lover to the real beauties and merit of a composition which should receive immediate welcome.

Yehudi Menuhin was absolutely right when he insisted that the Concerto be published in its original condition, free from other persons' "improvements." And all admirers of Schumann may well thank Menuhin and the others who took part in the enterprise of securing permission for publication and performance.

Menuhin was at the top of his form yesterday, save for a little too much vibrato that now and again caused his tone to spread. His performance of Schumann and Mendelssohn will be a bright page in many a memory. So, too, except for a few unimportant shortcomings by the woodwind, was the orchestra at its best. Dr. Koussevitzky read the whole program with the devotion and skill so particularly his, and Wagner's Overture was downright exciting.

Malipiero's Second Symphony, bearing the qualification "Elegiac" though it is not programmatic and not related to sad days in the composer's life, reverts to the earlier, crabbed style of this independent, not to say unpredictable, Italian musician. The warmth of his "Four Seasons" Symphony is gone; in its place dwell the austerities of his repellent Violin Concerto. Yet the Second Symphony is neatly built. Here comes the familiar moral that no matter how skilled a composer may be, if he does not have something human and heart-warming to say, the result is futile.

The Boston Symphony goes on tour next week, but we shall have plenty of symphonic music in Symphony Hall. Thursday evening Dr. Artur Rodzinski will conduct the Cleveland Orchestra, and on Friday and Saturday there will be concerts by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

C. W. D.

Post

AY, FEBRUARY 5, 1

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Menuhin Soloist in Schumann's Last Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In advance of yesterday's Symphony Concert interest centred in the novelties of the afternoon, Malipiero's Second Symphony and the recently "discovered" Violin Concerto of Schumann, to be played by Yehudi Menuhin. In actual hearing, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Wagner's no less familiar Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" eclipsed them both.

HAS MOMENTS OF BEAUTY

A casual spoken comment may sometimes say more than paragraphs of written criticism. The remark of a violinist-member of yesterday's audience that the Schumann Concerto was "not much of a piece" hit the nail so squarely on the head that any addition or elaboration of this verdict seems superflous. But in justice to Schumann it must be said, or rather repeated, that this product of his final clouded years has moments of beauty, such as the second theme of the first movement, the beginning of the slow movement, and, in the finale, flashes of brilliance.

Whether when the to-do about the piece has passed, violinists will continue to play it remains to be seen. To reveal it to the world or to a particular audience is a satisfaction in itself, but from the virtuoso's standpoint the Concerto is not especially rewarding.

Mendelsshon's Masterpiece

How different was the impression yesterday when, following the intermission, violinst and orchestra lent themselves to music which paid generous dividends on the effort invested. Where Schumann faltered, Mendelssohn went straight to the goal; where the one wobbled the other firmly held his ground. Indeed Schnmann did his friend good service: the Mendelssohn Concerto does not generally sound so impressive.

The applause which greeted both concertos suggested that, so far as the audience was concerned, there was nothing to choose in either piece or performance. But the way of an audience with a soloist is something to which we all became accustomed long ago. Actually, Mr. Menuhin, freed of the burdens of sponsorship and busied with more grateful music, was heard to far better advantage upon his second appearance. A more effective performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto would be something to hear, but one is not likely to hear it.

Malipiero's Symphony

If Schumann's Concerto which, according to the provisions of the violinist, Joachim's will was not supposed to be "relased" until 1856, proved to be no great shakes, neither did the piece which yesterday preceded it, the symphony to which Malipiero gave the somewhat misleading title "Elegiaca." Decidedly brief for a modern work in its form—its length is almost Haydnesque—this Second Symphony of the Italian modernist is agreeable enough, but the stamp of importance is not upon it. Carl Van Vechten once wrote pointedly on the subject of "Music and Supermusic." If Malipiero's Symphony does not come under the latter head, Wagner's youthful Overture, with its later revisions, most certainly does. Yesterday it was accorded a superb performance.

Like Mendelssohn, Wagner knew exactly what he was about, and conductor and orchestra seemed to share and to rejoice in that security.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

FEB 6 - 1938

"Programme Notes."

For the past 50 years Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Programme Notes" has been considered an influence in American musical history. Humorous musical criticisms are rare; particularly when musically sound. These Programme Notes are frequently epigrammatic as well as informative. The chapter on each composer begins with a biography of the man followed by a comparison of his works with very complete annotations and a description of the circumstances in which they were written.

Herald

TURDAY, FEBRUARY 5,

ter' Open

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Malipiero....Symphony No. 2, "Elegiaca"
Schumann..Concerto for Violin in D minor
Mendelssohn......Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64
Wagner..........Overture to "Der fliegende Hollaender"

The value and the harmful nature of publicity have been clearly demonstrated in the history of the Schumann Violin Concerto. This involved story has been succinctly and impartially set forth by Mr. Burk in the program notes. His is, in fact, by far the best account that has come to our notice; and Messrs. Evans and Salter, Mr. Menuhin's managers, have outdone the United States government in their press releases. As we said at the outset, this deluge of publicity has certainly achieved its end in calling attention to a particular event, but it has worked harm in raising hopes which the music itself was unlikely to fulfill.

In New York the Concerto met with a very severe reception, as far as we read the reports. Actually it was much too condemnatory. The critics were especially put out by the theory that Schumann's work could have influenced the Brahms Viiolin Concerto, which followed it at the concert. Well, why not? Schumann's mind was original and inventive, and he may easily have given a hint in his use of the opening orchestral tutti that Brahms eventually worked out in masterly fashion. Nor is it likely that Brahms would have admitted owing anything to Schumann's experiments in this field, if this agreement between him, Clara Schumann and Joachim, about which Schumann's only surviving daughter wrote so pathetically to the London Times, were true. Schumann was in many ways an innovator, and it is in no way impossible to believe that Brahms picked up a suggestion here and there for his own splendid works in concerto form.

The concerto is curious and uneven. It would be pointless to deny that there are weaknesses, as Joachim knew, in the developments, that it is not one of Schumann's first flights of genius, that it does not compare in effectiveness with the brilliant piano concerto. Yet with what beautiful lyric invention are the slow movement and the finale filled! The concerto suffers from monotony of mood, and the first movement, with the exception of the treatment of the opening, is uninteresting. Schumann neglected to supply the dramatic contrasts which abound in the piano concerto. He seemed to rely on the continuous cadenza-like nature of the solo part as sufficient for contrast with the orchestral tuttis and the otherwise very simple accompaniment. Still, there are not many violin concertos, and this of Schumann is preferable to many which are generally played. When it is handled as superbly as in Mr. Menuhin's performance, it ought not to fade from the repertoire after its too spectacular launching.

Malipiero's austere music has a sincerity which compels our admiration even if it does not excite us. His Second Symphony is not meant to be exciting music. On the contrary it is an example of a rare musical intelligence working with forms and employing an idiom that is the reverse of lush. Very possibly its interest is largely intellectual. Its mood, as the composer truly stated, was one of melancholy varied by a feeling of wild despair in the first and third movements. It is unlikely that this symphony will ever be popular; but there is a nobility of thought in it that makes it remarkable. This work and the Schumann concerto were heard for the first time in Boston yesterday.

Mr. Menuhin, having acquitted himself so well, in the unfamiliar Schumann, proceeded to do equally as well by Mendelssohn. This is the third time this season that he has played in Boston, and our supply of adjectives in his praise is wearing out. Let it be said simply that there could be no question of the excellence and vitality of his interpretations. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided accompaniments in the best taste and presented a sympathetic performance of the Malipiero.

Next week the Boston Symphony will be out of town. In its place Boston and Symphony Hall will be visited by the Cleveland orchestra, Artur Rodzinski, conductor, on Thursday evening and the Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Here is an interesting opportunity for comparison.

Feb 4

BOSTON EVENING AMERIC

Menuhin's Playing Is Superb

Mendelssohn Work Features His Solos With Symphony

By RUTH MARSTERS

An audience, copious and curious, filled Symphony Hall even to the aisles yesterday afternoon for the obvious purpose of applauding Yehudi Menuhin in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1934.

It was rewarded with a superb performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, and further indulged with a first hearing here of the lately resurrected and fabulously publicized violin concerto which was Schumann's last major work and is in the key of D minor.

The latter work is unique in that, 85 years after its composition, it is still the subject of controversial disputes.

Was Schumann possessed of his full mental faculties when he wrote it, or had the madness which was so soon after to cause his death already taken its toll?

That was the question asked by Clara Schumann in 1853. Her answer lies in the decision, abetted by both Joachim and Brahms that in loyalty to Robert it should never be published.

* * *

Of how it was subsequently willed by Joachim's heir to the State Library in Berlin with a stipulation prohibiting its publication for a century after the composer's death, of how it was apparently forgotten and then brought to mind by "spirit messages" from both Schumann and Joachim direct to the grandneices of the latter—all this has been duly reported.

But the fundamental question is not as yet satisfactorily answered. Was the devoted Clara right or wrong?

Yehudi Menuhin at any rate believes ardently in the work. So ardently that yesterday afternoon's performance of it must have caused him other than unmitigated happiness.

The vigorous first movement in which elaborate violin passages are accompanied sparsely by strings was accomplished only with considerable effort. The second movement, Langsan, sweetly songful, went off somewhat better as did the last altogether joyous movement. Its effectiveness, however, was somewhat forced throughout.

* * *

The Mendelssohn work, as has already been observed, went otherwise. Here the dazzling skill of the soloist, the warmth and sweetness of tone, the purity of line, together with the perfectly synchronized support of the orchestra resulted in a truly glowing performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with a first presentation here of Malipiero's Second Symphony. That it sounded a little odd to the audience at first may partially be accounted for by the fact that it also appeared a little strange to the orchestra. (Not wholly of course.) Malipiero's works usually require a tutored understanding. The most musical part of the work seemed to us to be found in the last movement where the elegiac quality predominates.

The program closed on a sonorous note with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

B. Adv.
Feb. 5/38

Concerto Makes Bow

By RUTH MARSTERS

Music Editor

THE appearance of Yehudi Menhuin as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening had a two-fold consequence which should provide everybody with something to talk about for days. (Practically everybody was in one audience or the other.)

We base this review on Friday's concert which was the occasion for the first performance of Schumann's lately resuscitated violin concerto in Boston, and what we believe to be one of the finest, most glowing performances ever given the Mendelssohn E minor concerto anywhere.

The amazing circumstances which have surrounded the unearthment of the Schumann work is vied with only by the number of conflicting reports as to the reasons for its interment.

* * *

Whether or not Clara Schumann was right in keeping Robert's last major work from publication on the grounds that it betrayed the encroachment of the malady which brought about his death will eventually be decided in subsequent hearings. Her decision was reached only after deliberation with both Brahms and Joachim, for whom it was written.

But why Joachim, into whose hands it was entrusted, should have guarded it so sedulously from the public during his life and then left it lying about is not so easily solved. Nor why the son and heir to the Joachim estate should present it to a library (the Staatsbibliothek in Berlin) with the stipulation that it should not be published until the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death.

It is also odd, as Mr. Burke so succinctly points out, that the grandnieces of Joachim should have heard nothing at all about the whole thing until informed through "spirit messages" from both Schumann and Joachim directing them to go and hunt it up.

The subsequent performance of the work by Menhuin have not as yet gone very far in clearing things up, for the simple reason that not every one is agreed as to whether the resurrection of the work is a good thing or not. (Its performance now could scarcely do Schumann's reputation any harm it is true. It can only be a question as to the good of the audience in this case.)

* * *

While it would seem to us doubtful whether or not to place it among the great violin concertos, we do not at the same time feel qualifide to judge, after a single hearing.

It is undeniably true that the work contains many passages of beauty and freshness. The second movement in particular is possessed of that quality of tenderness and sweetness for which Philip Hale couold find no better term than "inig," and which was so peculiarly Schumann's own as to be known generally as "Schumannesque."

On first hearing thework did appear to us to lack continuity. But Joachim's criticism of the weakness of development sections does not necessarily indicate the mental disintegration of the composer. Schumann was never a symphonist in the architoctonic sense. His claim to greatness was not his inventiveness in the development of idea, but in the inspired creation of the ideas themselves.

The concerto calls upon all the powers of virtuosity any violinist may be reasonably expected to possess. Menhuin's mastery of it was apparent, but the performance as a whole was more deliberatetha n flowing on this occasion.

The surpassing excellence of the performance given the Mendelssohn concerto has already been cited. To go any further on the subject one would have to call upon the full stock of superlatives at hand and then bemoan their inadequacy.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

JAN 30 1938

News of great interest to gramophiles is the announcement that the long-awaited recording of Bach's "Passion of Our Lord According to St. Matthew" will be released in February. The colossal work will be issued in three albums and the performing artists include Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, in addition to noted soloists.

The first album will be issued next month and it is planned to have the remaining albums in circulation before Easter. The recording of this work is a splendid contribution to the repertoire of the phonograph. Some years ago, an abridged version of the "St. Matthew Passion" was issued, but Dr. Koussevitzky's performance of the work will be the first complete edition ever issued on records.

While on the subject of records, we would like to recommend Sir Thomas Beecham's reading of Brahms' "Tragic Overture," recently issued. The odd side of the two-record set is devoted to the overture to "Figaro," which is played with delightful crispness and dispatch.

Feb Globe

Y 5, 1938

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The long-awaited Violin Concerto by Robert Schumann was played for the first time here at the Boston Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Yehudi Menuhin, who also performed with the orchestra Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky began the concert with another score new to Boston—the Second Symphony of the contemporary Italian, Malipiero—and concluded with the Overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman."

No music in recent years has come before the public with such a fanfare of excited press-agentry as has Schumann's Concerto, the last major work which he wrote. Available details of the Concerto's amazing history have been printed in the Globe. The whole story evidently has yet to be told for John N. Burk sets forth in the program book some new facts. Mr. Burk has also done a sensible and scholarly piece of work concerning the reasons why the Concerto should have been brought out 84 years after Schumann composed it.

On the strength of brief acquaintance, Schumann's Concerto is full of lyrical beauty, well worth exhumation, though no masterpiece. In point of construction it probably does show that Schumann's mental powers had begun to fail by the Autumn of 1853, while its melodies are unquestionably lovely. Set in the conventional three movements, the Concerto begins with a broad, sweeping theme that suggests the style of Brahms, but there are no further similarities, thematic or otherwise, with the Violin Concerto of Brahms. A statement attributed to Yehudi Menuhin had stressed supposed resemblances between the two compositions.

The exquisitely songful slow movement is linked to the rhythmically buoyant finale. There are no cadenzas. Schumann's hand is plain in the solid orchestration. And the state of his mind is apparent in the fact that his music does not progress with the formal directness of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, an example of masterly construction. Although the contrast between solo violin and orchestra is regular enough in the first movement to satisfy the general requirements of the classic concerto form, the rest of the music is highly personal, almost in a fantasia style.

Joachim, for whom Schumann wrote the Concerto, touched the heart of the matter when he referred to the absence of that essential technical procedure known as "development." There is little "development," and that mainly in the solo part. The orchestra mostly repeats outstanding themes. A musician spoke to this reviewer of occasional ineffective writing of the solo part. That may be true, but these are purely technical matters and ought not to blind the average music-lover to the real beauties and merit of a composition which should receive immediate welcome.

Yehudi Menuhin was absolutely right when he insisted that the Concerto be published in its original condition, free from other persons' "improvements." And all admirers of Schumann may well thank Menuhin and the others who took part in the enterprise of securing permission for publication and performance.

Menuhin was at the top of his form yesterday, save for a little too much vibrato that now and again caused his tone to spread. His performance of Schumann and Mendelssohn will be a bright page in many a memory. So, too, except for a few unimportant shortcomings by the woodwind, was the orchestra at its best. Dr. Koussevitzky read the whole program with the devotion and skill so particularly his, and Wagner's Overture was downright exciting.

Malipiero's Second Symphony, bearing the qualification "Elegiac" though it is not programmatic and not related to sad days in the composer's life, reverts to the earlier, crabbed style of this independent, not to say unpredictable, Italian musician. The warmth of his "Four Seasons" Symphony is gone; in its place dwell the austerities of his repellent Violin Concerto. Yet the Second Symphony is neatly built. Here comes the familiar moral that no matter how skilled a composer may be, if he does not have something human and heart-warming to say, the result is futile.

The Boston Symphony goes on tour next week, but we shall have plenty of symphonic music in Symphony Hall. Thursday evening Dr. Artur Rodzinski will conduct the Cleveland Orchestra, and on Friday and Saturday there will be concerts by Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra.

C. W. D.

Post

DAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1

SYMPHONY PLAYS TWO NOVELTIES

Menuhin Soloist in Schumann's Last Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In advance of yesterday's Symphony Concert interest centred in the novelties of the afternoon, Malipiero's Second Symphony and the recently "discovered" Violin Concerto of Schumann, to be played by Yehudi Menuhin. In actual hearing, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Wagner's no less familiar Overture to "The Flying Dutchman" eclipsed them both.

HAS MOMENTS OF BEAUTY

A casual spoken comment may sometimes say more than paragraphs of written criticism. The remark of a violinist-member of yesterday's audience that the Schumann Concerto was "not much of a piece" hit the nail so squarely on the head that any addition or elaboration of this verdict seems superflous. But in justice to Schumann it must be said, or rather repeated, that this product of his final clouded years has moments of beauty, such as the second theme of the first movement, the beginning of the slow movement, and, in the finale, flashes of brilliance.

Whether when the to-do about the piece has passed, violinists will continue to play it remains to be seen. To reveal it to the world or to a particular audience is a satisfaction in itself, but from the virtuoso's standpoint the Concerto is not especially rewarding.

Mendelsshon's Masterpiece

How different was the impression yesterday when, following the intermission, violinst and orchestra lent themselves to music which paid generous dividends on the effort invested. Where Schumann faltered, Mendelssohn went straight to the goal; where the one wobbled the other firmly held his ground. Indeed Schnmann did his friend good service: the Mendelssohn Concerto does not generally sound so impressive.

The applause which greeted both concertos suggested that, so far as the audience was concerned, there was nothing to choose in either piece or performance. But the way of an audience with a soloist is something to which we all became accustomed long ago. Actually, Mr. Menuhin, freed of the burdens of sponsorship and busied with more grateful music, was heard to far better advantage upon his second appearance. A more effective performance of Mendelssohn's Concerto would be something to hear, but one is not likely to hear it.

Malipiero's Symphony

If Schumann's Concerto which, according to the provisions of the violinist, Joachim's will was not supposed to be "relased" until 1856, proved to be no great shakes, neither did the piece which yesterday preceded it, the symphony to which Malipiero gave the somewhat misleading title "Elegiaca." Decidedly brief for a modern work in its form—its length is almost Haydnesque—this Second Symphony of the Italian modernist is agreeable enough, but the stamp of importance is not upon it. Carl Van Vechten once wrote pointedly on the subject of "Music and Supermusic." If Malipiero's Symphony does not come under the latter head, Wagner's youthful Overture, with its later revisions, most certainly does. Yesterday it was accorded a superb performance.

Like Mendelssohn, Wagner knew exactly what he was about, and conductor and orchestra seemed to share and to rejoice in that security.

HOUSTON, TEX.
CHRONICLE

FEB 6 - 1938

"Programme Notes."

For the past 50 years Philip Hale's "Boston Symphony Programme Notes" ~~has~~ been considered an influence in American musical history. Humorous musical criticisms are rare; particularly when musically sound. These Programme Notes are frequently epigrammatic as well as informative. The chapter on each composer begins with a biography of the man followed by a comparison of his works with very complete annotations and a description of the circumstances in which they were written.

Herald

TURDAY, FEBRUARY 5,

ter' Open

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 15th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Malipiero....Symphony No. 2, "Elegiaca"
Schumann..Concerto for Violin in D minor
Mendelssohn......Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64
Wagner..........Overture to "Der fliegende Hollaender"

The value and the harmful nature of publicity have been clearly demonstrated in the history of the Schumann Violin Concerto. This involved story has been succinctly and impartially set forth by Mr. Burk in the program notes. His is, in fact, by far the best account that has come to our notice; and Messrs. Evans and Salter, Mr. Menuhin's managers, have outdone the United States government in their press releases. As we said at the outset, this deluge of publicity has certainly achieved its end in calling attention to a particular event, but it has worked harm in raising hopes which the music itself was unlikely to fulfill.

In New York the Concerto met with a very severe reception, as far as we read the reports. Actually it was much too condemnatory. The critics were especially put out by the theory that Schumann's work could have influenced the Brahms Viiolin Concerto, which followed it at the concert. Well, why not? Schumann's mind was original and inventive, and he may easily have given a hint in his use of the opening orchestral tutti that Brahms eventually worked out in masterly fashion. Nor is it likely that Brahms would have admitted owing anything to Schumann's experiments in this field, if this agreement between him, Clara Schumann and Joachim, about which Schumann's only surviving daughter wrote so pathetically to the London Times, were true. Schumann was in many ways an innovator, and it is in no way impossible to believe that Brahms picked up a suggestion here and there for his own splendid works in concerto form.

The concerto is curious and uneven. It would be pointless to deny that there are weaknesses, as Joachim knew, in the developments, that it is not one of Schumann's first flights of genius, that it does not compare in effectiveness with the brilliant piano concerto. Yet with what beautiful lyric invention are the slow movement and the finale filled! The concerto suffers from monotony of mood, and the first movement, with the exception of the treatment of the opening, is uninteresting. Schumann neglected to supply the dramatic contrasts which abound in the piano concerto. He seemed to rely on the continuous cadenza-like nature of the solo part as sufficient for contrast with the orchestral tuttis and the otherwise very simple accompaniment. Still, there are not many violin concertos, and this of Schumann is preferable to many which are generally played. When it is handled as superbly as in Mr. Menuhin's performance, it ought not to fade from the repertoire after its too spectacular launching.

Malipiero's austere music has a sincerity which compels our admiration even if it does not excite us. His Second Symphony is not meant to be exciting music. On the contrary it is an example of a rare musical intelligence working with forms and employing an idiom that is the reverse of lush. Very possibly its interest is largely intellectual. Its mood, as the composer truly stated, was one of melancholy varied by a feeling of wild despair in the first and third movements. It is unlikely that this symphony will ever be popular; but there is a nobility of thought in it that makes it remarkable. This work and the Schumann concerto were heard for the first time in Boston yesterday.

Mr. Menuhin, having acquitted himself so well, in the unfamiliar Schumann, proceeded to do equally as well by Mendelssohn. This is the third time this season that he has played in Boston, and our supply of adjectives in his praise is wearing out. Let it be said simply that there could be no question of the excellence and vitality of his interpretations. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided accompaniments in the best taste and presented a sympathetic performance of the Malipiero.

Next week the Boston Symphony will be out of town. In its place Boston and Symphony Hall will be visited by the Cleveland orchestra, Artur Rodzinski, conductor, on Thursday evening and the Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor, on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Here is an interesting opportunity for comparison.

Feb 4

BOSTON EVENING AMERIC

Menuhin's Playing Is Superb

Mendelssohn Work Features His Solos With Symphony

By RUTH MARSTERS

An audience, copious and curious, filled Symphony Hall even to the aisles yesterday afternoon for the obvious purpose of applauding Yehudi Menuhin in his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1934.

It was rewarded with a superb performance of the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, and further indulged with a first hearing here of the lately resurrected and fabulously publicized violin concerto which was Schumann's last major work and is in the key of D minor.

The latter work is unique in that, 85 years after its composition, it is still the subject of controversial disputes.

Was Schumann possessed of his full mental faculties when he wrote it, or had the madness which was so soon after to cause his death already taken its toll?

That was the question asked by Clara Schumann in 1853. Her answer lies in the decision, abetted by both Joachim and Brahms that in loyalty to Robert it should never be published.

* * *

Of how it was subsequently willed by Joachim's heir to the State Library in Berlin with a stipulation prohibiting its publication for a century after the composer's death, of how it was apparently forgotten and then brought to mind by "spirit messages" from both Schumann and Joachim direct to the grandneices of the latter—all this has been duly reported.

But the fundamental question is not as yet satisfactorily answered. Was the devoted Clara right or wrong?

Yehudi Menuhin at any rate believes ardently in the work. So ardently that yesterday afternoon's performance of it must have caused him other than unmitigated happiness.

The vigorous first movement in which elaborate violin passages are accompanied sparsely by strings was accomplished only with considerable effort. The second movement, Langsan, sweetly songful, went off somewhat better as did the last altogether joyous movement. Its effectiveness, however, was somewhat forced throughout.

* * *

The Mendelssohn work, as has already been observed, went otherwise. Here the dazzling skill of the soloist, the warmth and sweetness of tone, the purity of line, together with the perfectly synchronized support of the orchestra resulted in a truly glowing performance.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with a first presentation here of Malipiero's Second Symphony. That it sounded a little odd to the audience at first may partially be accounted for by the fact that it also appeared a little strange to the orchestra. (Not wholly of course.) Malipiero's works usually require a tutored understanding. The most musical part of the work seemed to us to be found in the last movement where the elegiac quality predominates.

The program closed on a sonorous note with Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

B. Adv.

Concerto Makes Bow

Feb. 5/38

By RUTH MARSTERS
Music Editor

THE appearance of Yehudi Menhuin as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening had a two-fold consequence which should provide everybody with something to talk about for days. (Practically everybody was in one audience or the other.)

We base this review on Friday's concert which was the occasion for the first performance of Schumann's lately resuscitated violin concerto in Boston, and what we believe to be one of the finest, most glowing performances ever given the Mendelssohn E minor concerto anywhere.

The amazing circumstances which have surrounded the unearthment of the Schumann work is vied with only by the number of conflicting reports as to the reasons for its interment.

* * *

Whether or not Clara Schumann was right in keeping Robert's last major work from publication on the grounds that it betrayed the encroachment of the malady which brought about his death will eventually be decided in subsequent hearings. Her decision was reached only after deliberation with both Brahms and Joachim, for whom it was written.

But why Joachim, into whose hands it was entrusted, should have guarded it so sedulously from the public during his life and then left it lying about is not so easily solved. Nor why the son and heir to the Joachim estate should present it to a library (the Staatsbibliothek in Berlin) with the stipulation that it should not be published until the hundredth anniversary of the composer's death.

It is also odd, as Mr. Burke so succinctly points out, that the grandnieces of Joachim should have heard nothing at all about the whole thing until informed through "spirit messages" from both Schumann and Joachim directing them to go and hunt it up.

The subsequent performance of the work by Menhuin have not as yet gone very far in clearing things up, for the simple reason that not every one is agreed as to whether the resurrection of the work is a good thing or not. (Its performance now could scarcely do Schumann's reputation any harm it is true. It can only be a question as to the good of the audience in this case.)

* * *

While it would seem to us doubtful whether or not to place it among the great violin concertos, we do not at the same time feel qualifide to judge, after a single hearing.

It is undeniably true that the work contains many passages of beauty and freshness. The second movement in particular is possessed of that quality of tenderness and sweetness for which Philip Hale couold find no better term than "inig," and which was so peculiarly Schumann's own as to be known generally as "Schumannesque."

On first hearing thework did appear to us to lack continuity. But Joachim's criticism of the weakness of development sections does not necessarily indicate the mental disintegration of the composer. Schumann was never a symphonist in the architoctonic sense. His claim to greatness was not his inventiveness in the development of idea, but in the inspired creation of the ideas themselves.

The concerto calls upon all the powers of virtuosity any violinist may be reasonably expected to possess. Menhuin's mastery of it was apparent, but the performance as a whole was more deliberatetha n flowing on this occasion.

The surpassing excellence of the performance given the Mendelssohn concerto has already been cited. To go any further on the subject one would have to call upon the full stock of superlatives at hand and then bemoan their inadequacy.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

JAN 30 1938

News of great interest to gramophiles is the announcement that the long-awaited recording of Bach's "Passion of Our Lord According to St. Matthew" will be released in February. The colossal work will be issued in three albums and the performing artists include Dr. Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, in addition to noted soloists.

The first album will be issued next month and it is planned to have the remaining albums in circulation before Easter. The recording of this work is a splendid contribution to the repertoire of the phonograph. Some years ago, an abridged version of the "St. Matthew Passion" was issued, but Dr. Kousevitsky's performance of the work will be the first complete edition ever issued on records.

While on the subject of records, we would like to recommend Sir Thomas Beecham's reading of Brahms' "Tragic Overture," recently issued. The odd side of the two-record set is devoted to the overture to "Figaro," which is played with delightful crispness and dispatch

(146)

huin as ny Or-at the Saturquence
y with (Prac-ence or concert perform-

d violin ve to be rmances concerto

ve sur-
n work nflicting
t,

right in publica-croachout his sequent y after him, for was en-ly from t lying the son esent it ) with blished poser's

y points d have until both go and ork by clearing t, every tion of

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1938

Yehudi Menuhin Plays the Rediscovered Schumann Violin Concerto at the Symphony Concert

"Novelty" from the Past In Revealing Performance

Mendelssohn Concerto, New Malipiero Symphony and Wagner Overture Round Out Program

By Moses Smith

Two concertos appear on this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played, with the assistance of Yehudi Menuhin and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and to be repeated this evening. The procedure of doubling up has enjoyed a certain vogue recently, not only here but elsewhere. In the present instance it was due at least partly to Menuhin's desire to show the close connection (as he contends) between the rediscovered Schumann Concerto and that of Brahms, both in the key of D minor. But after a private performance before Dr. Koussevitzky some weeks ago, it was decided that the Schumann Concerto was eloquent enough to be presented in its own right. And so the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor was substituted instead for the Boston concerts of yesterday and today.

Some observers, hearing the few recent performances of the Schumann Concerto in other American cities, have found few ties between it and Brahms's work. Nor has the Schumann composition commanded the enthusiastic praise lavished on it by the two principal protagonists of yesterday's performance. Making due allowances for the illusory nature of first impressions, I am inclined to agree with Menuhin and Koussevitzky in both matters.

As to the Brahmism overtones, there are striking resemblances. In the first movement, for example, there is a long, elaborate and fairly brilliant passage for solo violin, at the end of which one almost expects the orchestra to burst forth into the main theme of the last movement of the Brahms Concerto. There is furthermore a similarity between this theme and the principal theme of the last movement of the Schumann Concerto. It is not so much a matter of melodic outline or exact meter as of a certain rhythmic heaviness that characterizes both.

The music itself is of exceedingly uneven character. The mediocre success the Concerto has thus far achieved is due not only to this fact but also, very likely, to an almost total lack of surface brilliance and display. There is no cadenza. There are extremely difficult passages for the solo violinist, but few that sound conventionally difficult. Nor is the composition constructed along the symphonic lines of the earlier Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and the later one of Brahms. And so the listener who expects such a Concerto is likely to be let down.

But the name, after all, is not important. On the basis of yesterday's performance it seems better to regard the "new" work as not a concerto at all but as another Fantasy for violin and orchestra. In that light it takes on new meaning. Much of the thematic material sounds beautifully on the ear—like the second theme of the first movement, the main theme of the slow movement and several typically Schumannesque subsidiary themes in the last. The main trouble with the Concerto, in fact, seemed on first hearing to be the first theme of the opening movement, which gets nowhere at all.

Yesterday's performance of the work seemed exquisitely contrived by all concerned. Menuhin, who is now playing better than ever, revealed the solo section with a warmth and care and devotion that were in themselves touching. The difficulties, of which a good deal has been made, were not apparent; and the solo part came forth with admirable clarity. Much was due, naturally, to the almost equally devoted attention of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants.

The audience seemed to be very much moved, as attested by the prolonged and demonstrative applause at the end. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration after the more brilliant Mendelssohn Concerto. Here, too, all hands contributed to a performance extraordinarily persuasive and apt. At the beginning of the first movement and for a few moments in the third Menuhin's tone was conveyed with excessive vibrato, so that it even sounded sharp. But otherwise his presentation was marked by brilliance and virtuosity, warmth and dash and, when occasion demanded, by exceptional sensitivity to melodic contour.

It would have been easy for the orchestra to have been reduced, for the better part of yesterday's concert, to the role of mere accompanist. But that, fortunately, was not Dr. Koussevitzky's notion. In both Concertos there seemed to be an admirable spirit of co-operation between conductor and soloist. The Schumann Concerto, for all its virtues, demands much from the conductor and orchestra if a sympathetic presentation is to result, as it did yesterday. The Mendelssohn, on the other hand, can easily be made a solo display piece instead of the symphonic composition which, because of the superb fusion between solo and orchestral parts, emerged at yesterday's concert.

The program began with Malipiero's Second Symphony and ended with the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Symphony, new to Boston, has, like the Schumann Concerto, a "story" in back of it. But the reticent composer has vouchsafed no more illuminating information than the subtitle, "Elegiaca," and the statement ment that the music was written during a period of "anxious and tragic months" in 1936.

He insists that "this symphony is just music," and that one must not look for a "program." One may say, after yesterday's performance, that Malipiero has written not only "music" but also good music. There are four movements: a fast movement to begin, a slow movement in which the elegiac note begins to intrude, a scherzo that achieves a measure of boisterousness without, however, corresponding exuberance, and the finale, which begins slowly, has an excited middle section, and ends slowly and quietly in a retrospective vein.

The harmonic schemes are essentially tonal, though considerable recourse is made to the modes, and the composer does not shun dissonance. His prevailing method, especially noted in the first movement, is not symphonic in the nineteenth-century sense, but it resembles more closely that kind of insistent iteration of thematic fragments in which Bach frequently indulged. It is a dangerous procedure when the key-system is not maintained as strictly as it was in the case of Bach. But Malipiero brings it off successfully. His Symphony is certainly not pretentious, but it is a likeable work, engrossing at every turn and on several occasions rising to a dignified eloquence. It seemed yesterday to have been given a beautifully understanding performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

Times Change And Remain The Same

(In the years immediately following the Great War the new school of Italian modernist composers was still waging a struggle in behalf of tolerance and vitality and against smug prejudice. Of their number was Francesco Malipiero, now established composer, whose Second Symphony appears on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of yesterday afternoon and this evening. In 1920 he set down some of his thoughts and opinions in a monograph, "The Orchestra." From it Laning Humphrey has courteously culled and translated, for the benefit of the readers of the Transcript, the following notes. Much, it will be noted, is equally applicable today.)

It seems to me not too rash to state that it is still possible for Italy to give birth to a school of music entirely different from those which have prevailed until today—or, to be more specific, those which for a little more than a century have presented nothing but opera for export. . . .

The prejudice for melody, and the fanaticism over bel canto may be traced to Italy's abundant production of beautiful voices, and this prodigality is the cause of the atrophy of the musical sense, and of the uniformity of operatic standards. . . .

Causes extraneous to art have lulled but not destroyed the musicality of our country; and for the native land of Palestrina, Monteverdi, Frescobaldi, Scarlatti and other great composers, there is yet hope for the future.

Outside the theater, for some forty years, there has manifested itself in Italy an academic reflection of the "classic" music of Germany. Italian production derived from the German school is particularly boresome, and has made for developing idolatry, in that field, for Beethoven, Schumann and so on.

Richard Wagner stands midway between the theater and the symphony, and has brought among us an impulse which, in the first case, has offset the uniformity of "national" opera, and, in the second, has unburdened the symphony from the classic incubus. . . .

Everything has its limits, and to take no notice of inevitable adversaries certainly is a sign of superiority, but too much is too much! But it is quite necessary in this epoch (when intellectual effort should re-examine all the energies of the new Italy) to define the limits between calm and legitimate criticism and malicious libel.

Has there never entered the heads of the conscienceless destroyers the thought that they might be wrong, and has it ever occurred to them that through the young independents there might be a repetition of the Gluck-Beethoven-Wagner cases, for example? . . .

The important thing is to state that a new direction in (Italian) music is beginning to make itself felt to a widespread degree, despite enormous difficulties, and the orchestra is taking the position awaiting it. . . .

It seems to me of use to reaffirm the importance of the orchestra as the fountainhead of musical expression—all the more so, since that great mine of sound has its origins in Italy, both through the construction of instruments and through orchestral technique. The first germs of the symphony made their appearance in Italy; and the opera has been enabled to fascinate and dominate for an entire century only because of the special conditions of our country, created by political vicissitudes.

GEORGES LAURENT
Director of the Flute Players' Club, which will give their third concert of the season in the Hotel Vendome, tomorrow afternoon.

Proverbial Paper-Hanger

Rudolph Serkin was a busy pianist last week. On Monday night he gave a solo recital in New York; on Tuesday he played the last of three sonata recitals with his father-in-law, Adolph Busch, violinist, in Jordan Hall; on Wednesday he and Busch repeated their sonata recital in New York; and on Thursday and Friday he appeared as soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society Orchestra under Georges Enesco. For good measure he will again be soloist with the Philharmonic tomorrow.

Post 1.65

DRAMATIC PAGE

ILD'S

SYMPHONIES IN VISITS HERE

News and Notes About Music Matters Here and Elsewhere

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THIS week the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be away from home. But does that mean that we shall therefore be deprived of orchestral music? It does not. From Thursday through Saturday we shall hear three concerts from two visiting orchestras, a feast of out-of-town music which would seem to be without precedent. On Thursday evening the orchestra will be that of Cleveland, conducted by Arthur Rodzinski, and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, that of Philadelphia, under Eugene Ormandy.

As already announced in these columns, Rose Pauly will be the soloist with the Cleveland group and Jan Smeterlin with the Philadelphians. The Hungarian soprano, now singing the role of Elektra in New York, and generally considered to be the greatest living interpreter of Strauss' operatic music, will introduce to Boston the closing scene from his "Salome"; that in which the daughter of Herodias apostrophizes the severed head of John the Baptist, the scene which dramatically has made all the trouble, but which musically has invoked no less a comparison than that of the finale of Wagner's "Tristan." The other "scandalous" episode in a no longer scandalous opera, Salome's Dance of the Seven Veils, music which has often figured on the programmes of our orchestra, will also be played by Mr. Rodzinski's forces. Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D Minor, and the First Symphony of Shostakovich complete a most alluring programme. Mr. Rodzinski, by the way, is by no means unknown here to the owners of radio sets. Those who thus heard him last season conduct a concert version of "Elektra" with the New York Philharmonic Symphony and with Miss Pauly as one of the singers, still thrill at the recollection.

The placing of the Cleveland Orchestra first in this announcement is a matter of chronology. The prowess and prestige of the Philadelphia Orchestra need not be stressed; but though we have heard it, and more than once, we have yet to make other than a radio acquaintance of Mr. Ormandy, who now shares the conductorship with Stokowski. From the Philadelphians we will get more Strauss, the rarely played Burleske for piano and orchestra, a product of the composer's earlier years, when he still inclined toward absolute music. Mr. Smeterlin will play the Burleske on Saturday evening, while on Friday afternoon his piece will be Mozart's familiar Concerto in A major. A Philadelphia Orchestra programme without a transcription, either by Mr. Stokowski or by Lucien Cailliet of the orchestra, is almost unthinkable. On Friday we will hear the Bach-Cailliet Prelude and Fugue in B minor, and on Saturday, a Buxtehude-Cailliet Passacaglia. Brahms' C minor Symphony completes the first of these interesting lists and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the dances from De Fallia's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" complete the second.

NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, F

THE ORCHESTRAS

Feb. 4/38

Bostonians in Ravel Tribute

As already announced, Serge Koussevitzky's program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts next Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Friday night and Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall will be in the nature of a memorial tribute to Maurice Ravel, consisting of his music, except for Schumann's D minor symphony Thursday and Saturday and Mozart's "Prague" symphony on Friday. There will be no soloist in Brooklyn. On Friday night in Carnegie Hall Jesus Maria Sanroma will play Ravel's piano concerto and on Saturday afternoon Olga Averino will sing "Sheherazade," Ravel's settings of three poems by Tristan Klingsor.

Symphony Displays Old Music Scripts

One of the country's more valuable collections of books and manuscripts on music is displayed at Symphony Hall in connection with concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra today and tomorrow.

The exhibition, loaned by the New England Conservatory of Music, includes the 1769 first edition of Gluck's "Alceste" and "Ipheginie in Aulis," and "The Beggar's Opera" (1728), and the manuscript of the vocal score of Debussy's "Pelleas et Melisande."

MUSIC, THE DANCE AND THE STAGE

Tribute to Ravel. The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, February 10, is dedicated to the memory of the great French composer, Joseph Maurice Ravel (March 7, 1875 – December 28, 1937). Ravel once said, "In art nothing is left to chance." In his own art, meticulous, symmetrical and economic, there was little that was left to the moment. His "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with which Serge Koussevitzky will open the program, was first composed for the piano and later brilliantly orchestrated. Couperin, first master composer for the harpsicord, taught Bach and Scarlatti many excellent devices. And Ravel, who has been said to incarnate "the very spirit of the precise and ordered classicism of the eighteenth century," has written an enchanting score in his elegant "Le Tombeau." Schumann's Fourth Symphony will bring the first half of the program to an end.

Ravel once said of himself, "I try to create beautiful ideas in music and attempt to develop them to their logical, perhaps inevitable, end." Born in Ciboure, near the Spanish frontier, it is said that as a boy he discovered the major seventh cord which he so distinctively used. In 1901 he received the second grand prix de Rome for his cantata, "Myrrha." In spite of officialdom, his "Rapsodie Espagnole," mysterious, haunting music which the Boston Symphony will also play, established his growing authority. The following year, 1910, his "Mother Goose Melodies" ("Ma Mère L'Oye"), to be performed at this concert, was written for two small friends and played by pianists in pigtails and pinafores. There was a succession of triumphs culminating in the 1928 Paris début of his "Bolero." The shy, retired composer had built on this rather modest Spanish dance, by repetition of a simple theme, an excitement that becomes completely obsessive. With the performance of the "Bolero" the concert in homage to Ravel comes to a climatic end.

No more sympathetic conductor of Ravel's works could be found in America than Serge Koussevitzky. Acclaimed for his performance of the classical masters, Koussevitzky has also shown, clearly and consistently, that the masters of our own day are worth hearing, that they deserve the magnificent playing of a great orchestra, equally as much as their teachers and their teachers' teachers. And his audiences have grown with this beloved conductor to an intimate feeling for the richness of all music, be it past or present. What Koussevitzky has done for Sibelius to a most eminent degree, he has done for many another contemporary. No finer tribute to the memory of that quiet and earnest Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, could be offered than the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held on the evening of February 10.

Concert in Memory of Maurice Ravel

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Program

RAVEL	Suite: "Le Tombeau de Couperin"
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4 in D Minor
RAVEL	Rapsodie Espagnole
RAVEL	"Mother Goose" (Five Children's Pieces)
RAVEL	Bolero

THUSDAY EVENING FEBRUARY 10

AT 8:30 O'CLOCK

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

REMAINING TICKETS NOW ON SALE
EARLY RESERVATION IS ADVISABLE
$1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75. No Tax.

Yehudi Menuhin Plays

"Novelty" from the Past In Revealing Performance

B. Trans. Feb. 1938

Mendelssohn Concerto, New Malipiero Symphony and Wagner Overture Round Out Program

By Moses Smith

Two concertos appear on this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played, with the assistance of Yehudi Menuhin and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and to be repeated this evening. The procedure of doubling up has enjoyed a certain vogue recently, not only here but elsewhere. In the present instance it was due at least partly to Menuhin's desire to show the close connection (as he contends) between the rediscovered Schumann Concerto and that of Brahms, both in the key of D minor. But after a private performance before Dr. Koussevitzky some weeks ago, it was decided that the Schumann Concerto was eloquent enough to be presented in its own right. And so the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor was substituted instead for the Boston concerts of yesterday and today.

Some observers, hearing the few recent performances of the Schumann Concerto in other American cities, have found few ties between it and Brahms's work. Nor has the Schumann composition commanded the enthusiastic praise lavished on it by the two principal protagonists of yesterday's performance. Making due allowances for the illusory nature of first impressions, I am inclined to agree with Menuhin and Koussevitzky in both matters.

As to the Brahmism overtones, there are striking resemblances. In the first movement, for example, there is a long, elaborate and fairly brilliant passage for solo violin, at the end of which one almost expects the orchestra to burst forth into the main theme of the last movement of the Brahms Concerto. There is furthermore a similarity between this theme and the principal theme of the last movement of the Schumann Concerto. It is not so much a matter of melodic outline or exact meter as of a certain rhythmic heaviness that characterizes both.

The music itself is of exceedingly uneven character. The mediocre success the Concerto has thus far achieved is due not only to this fact but also, very likely, to an almost total lack of surface brilliance and display. There is no cadenza. There are extremely difficult passages for the solo violinist, but few that sound conventionally difficult. Nor is the composition constructed along the symphonic lines of the earlier Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and the later one of Brahms. And so the listener who expects such a Concerto is likely to be let down.

But the name, after all, is not important. On the basis of yesterday's performance it seems better to regard the "new" work as not a concerto at all but as another Fantasy for violin and orchestra. In that light it takes on new meaning. Much of the thematic material sounds beautifully on the ear—like the second theme of the first movement, the main theme of the slow movement and several typically Schumannesque subsidiary themes in the last. The main trouble with the Concerto, in fact, seemed on first hearing to be the first theme of the opening movement, which gets nowhere at all.

Yesterday's performance of the work seemed exquisitely contrived by all concerned. Menuhin, who is now playing better than ever, revealed the solo section with a warmth and care and devotion that were in themselves touching. The difficulties, of which a good deal has been made, were not apparent; and the solo part came forth with admirable clarity. Much was due, naturally, to the almost equally devoted attention of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants.

The audience seemed to be very much moved, as attested by the prolonged and demonstrative applause at the end. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration after the more brilliant Mendelssohn Concerto. Here, too, all hands contributed to a performance extraordinarily persuasive and apt. At the beginning of the first movement and for a few moments in the third Menuhin's tone was conveyed with excessive vibrato, so that it even sounded sharp. But otherwise his presentation was marked by brilliance and virtuosity, warmth and dash and, when occasion demanded, by exceptional sensitivity to melodic contour.

It would have been easy for the orchestra to have been reduced, for the better part of yesterday's concert, to the role of mere accompanist. But that, fortunately, was not Dr. Koussevitzky's notion. In both Concertos there seemed to be an admirable spirit of co-operation between conductor and soloist. The Schumann Concerto, for all its virtues, demands much from the conductor and orchestra if a sympathetic presentation is to result, as it did yesterday. The Mendelssohn, on the other hand, can easily be made a solo display piece instead of the symphonic composition which, because of the superb fusion between solo and orchestral parts, emerged at yesterday's concert.

The program began with Malipiero's Second Symphony and ended with the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Symphony, new to Boston, has, like the Schumann Concerto, a "story" in back of it. But the reticent composer has vouchsafed no more illuminating information than the subtitle, "Elegiaca," and the statement that the music was written during a period of "anxious and tragic months" in 1936.

He insists that "this symphony is just music," and that one must not look for a "program." One may say, after yesterday's performance, that Malipiero has written not only "music" but also good music. There are four movements: a fast movement to begin, a slow movement in which the elegiac note begins to intrude, a scherzo that achieves a measure of boisterousness without, however, corresponding exuberance, and the finale, which begins slowly, has an excited middle section, and ends slowly and quietly in a retrospective vein.

The harmonic schemes are essentially tonal, though considerable recourse is made to the modes, and the composer does not shun dissonance. His prevailing m in the f symphon century more clo ent itera ments in indulged cedure w not main was in t

Malipiero fully. H ly not p likeable every tu sions ris
quence.
have been given a beautifully understanding performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

in the week preceding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

New Brunswick, Feb. 4 — The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth appearance at Rutgers University next Tuesday evening in the fourth presentation of the University music department this season. The concert will begin at 8:30.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 4 1938

Prof. McKinney To Give Talk

The music to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here Tuesday evening will be played and explained by Prof. Howard D. McKinney, director of the Department of Music, this evening and Monday at 8 p. m., at the music house on College avenue.

Rutgers undergraduates and all others interested may attend the sessions, which are designed to enable concert-goers to appreciate the music more by becoming familiar with it before attending the concert. Professor McKinney will lecture on and play recordings of the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Sibelius, Mozart's D major symphony and parts of Ravel's 'Daphnis et Chloe."

147

MUSIC, THE DANCE AND THE STAGE

Tribute to Ravel. The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, February 10, is dedicated to the memory of the great French composer, Joseph Maurice Ravel (March 7, 1875 – December 28, 1937). Ravel once said, "In art nothing is left to chance." In his own art, meticulous, symmetrical and economic, there was little that was left to the moment. His "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with which Serge Koussevitzky will open the program, was first composed for the piano and later brilliantly orchestrated. Couperin, first master composer for the harpsicord, taught Bach and Scarlatti many excellent devices. And Ravel, who has been said to incarnate "the very spirit of the precise and ordered classicism of the eighteenth century," has written an enchanting score in his elegant "Le Tombeau." Schumann's Fourth Symphony will bring the first half of the program to an end.

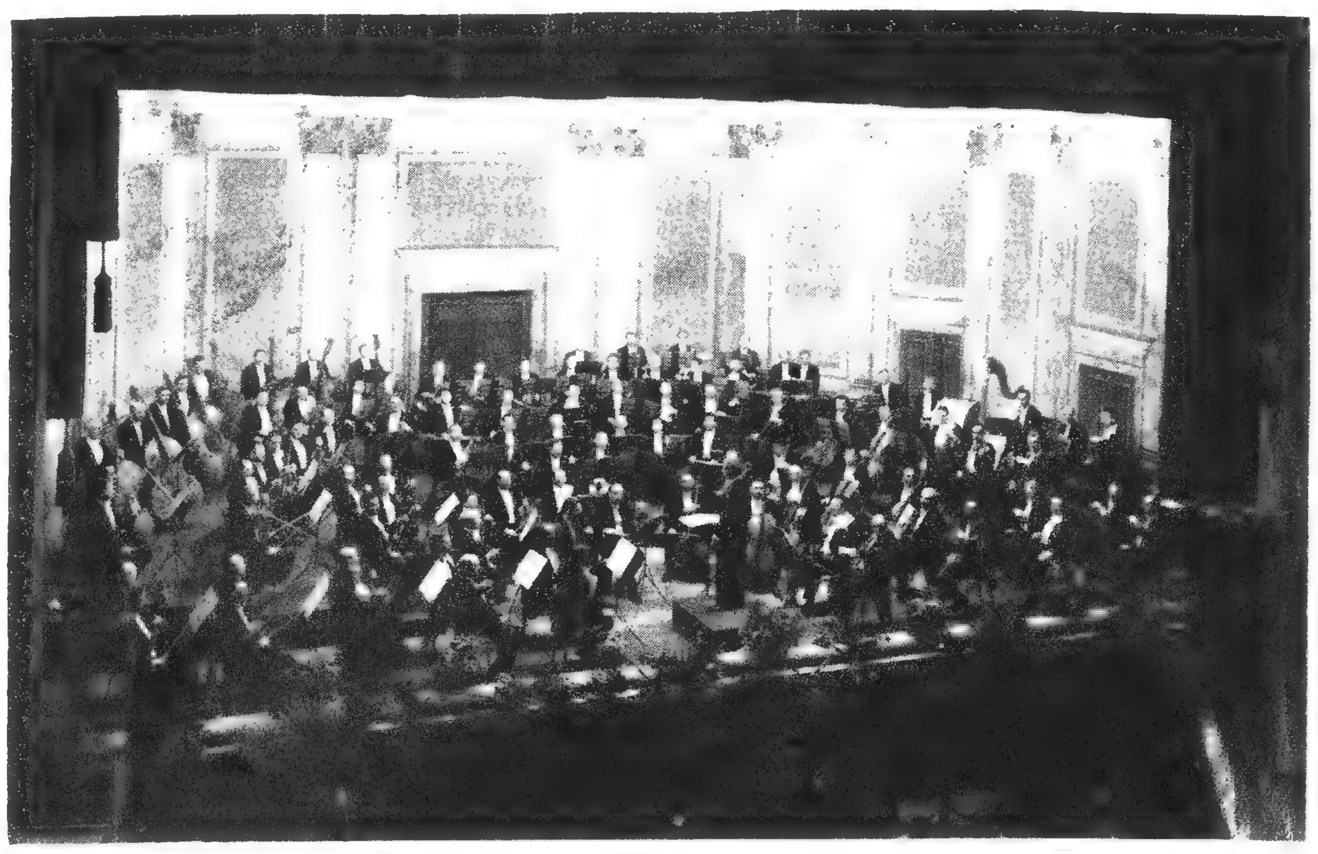
Ravel once said of himself, "I try to create beautiful ideas in music and attempt to develop them to their logical, perhaps inevitable, end." Born in Ciboure, near the Spanish frontier, it is said that as a boy he discovered the major seventh cord which he so distinctively used. In 1901 he received the second grand prix de Rome for his cantata, "Myrrha." In spite of officialdom, his "Rapsodie Espagnole," mysterious, haunting music which the Boston Symphony will also play, established his growing authority. The following year, 1910, his "Mother Goose Melodies" ("Ma Mère L'Oye"), to be performed at this concert, was written for two small friends and played by pianists in pigtails and pinafores. There was a succession of triumphs culminating in the 1928 Paris début of his "Bolero." The shy, retired composer had built on this rather modest Spanish dance, by repetition of a simple theme, an excitement that becomes completely obsessive. With the performance of the "Bolero" the concert in homage to Ravel comes to a climatic end.

No more sympathetic conductor of Ravel's works could be found in America than Serge Koussevitzky. Acclaimed for his performance of the classical masters, Koussevitzky has also shown, clearly and consistently, that the masters of our own day are worth hearing, that they deserve the magnificent playing of a great orchestra, equally as much as their teachers and their teachers' teachers. And his audiences have grown with this beloved conductor to an intimate feeling for the richness of all music, be it past or present. What Koussevitzky has done for Sibelius to a most eminent degree, he has done for many another contemporary. No finer tribute to the memory of that quiet and earnest Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, could be offered than the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held on the evening of February 10.

Concert in Memory of Maurice Ravel



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Program

RAVEL	Suite: "Le Tombeau de Couperin"
SCHUMANN	Symphony No. 4 in D Minor
RAVEL	Rapsodie Espagnole
RAVEL	"Mother Goose" (Five Children's Pieces)
RAVEL	Bolero

THURSDAY EVENING AT 8:30 O'CLOCK FEBRUARY 10

OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

REMAINING TICKETS NOW ON SALE

EARLY RESERVATION IS ADVISABLE

$1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75. No Tax.

Yehudi Menuhin Plays

"Novelty" from the Past In Revealing Performance

B. Trans. Feb. 1938

Mendelssohn Concerto, New Malipiero Symphony and Wagner Overture Round Out Program

By Moses Smith

Two concertos appear on this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played, with the assistance of Yehudi Menuhin and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and to be repeated this evening. The procedure of doubling up has enjoyed a certain vogue recently, not only here but elsewhere. In the present instance it was due at least partly to Menuhin's desire to show the close connection (as he contends) between the rediscovered Schumann Concerto and that of Brahms, both in the key of D minor. But after a private performance before Dr. Koussevitzky some weeks ago, it was decided that the Schumann Concerto was eloquent enough to be presented in its own right. And so the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor was substituted instead for the Boston concerts of yesterday and today.

Some observers, hearing the few recent performances of the Schumann Concerto in other American cities, have found few ties between it and Brahms's work. Nor has the Schumann composition commanded the enthusiastic praise lavished on it by the two principal protagonists of yesterday's performance. Making due allowances for the illusory nature of first impressions, I am inclined to agree with Menuhin and Koussevitzky in both matters.

As to the Brahmism overtones, there are striking resemblances. In the first movement, for example, there is a long, elaborate and fairly brilliant passage for solo violin, at the end of which one almost expects the orchestra to burst forth into the main theme of the last movement of the Brahms Concerto. There is furthermore a similarity between this theme and the principal theme of the last movement of the Schumann Concerto. It is not so much a matter of melodic outline or exact meter as of a certain rhythmic heaviness that characterizes both.

The music itself is of exceedingly uneven character. The mediocre success the Concerto has thus far achieved is due not only to this fact but also, very likely, to an almost total lack of surface brilliance and display. There is no cadenza. There are extremely difficult passages for the solo violinist, but few that sound conventionally difficult. Nor is the composition constructed along the symphonic lines of the earlier Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and the later one of Brahms. And so the listener who expects such a Concerto is likely to be let down.

But the name, after all, is not important. On the basis of yesterday's performance it seems better to regard the "new" work as not a concerto at all but as another Fantasy for violin and orchestra. In that light it takes on new meaning. Much of the thematic material sounds beautifully on the ear—like the second theme of the first movement, the main theme of the slow movement and several typically Schumannesque subsidiary themes in the last. The main trouble with the Concerto, in fact, seemed on first hearing to be the first theme of the opening movement, which gets nowhere at all.

Yesterday's performance of the work seemed exquisitely contrived by all concerned. Menuhin, who is now playing better than ever, revealed the solo section with a warmth and care and devotion that were in themselves touching. The difficulties, of which a good deal has been made, were not apparent; and the solo part came forth with admirable clarity. Much was due, naturally, to the almost equally devoted attention of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants.

The audience seemed to be very much moved, as attested by the prolonged and demonstrative applause at the end. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration after the more brilliant Mendelssohn Concerto. Here, too, all hands contributed to a performance extraordinarily persuasive and apt. At the beginning of the first movement and for a few moments in the third Menuhin's tone was conveyed with excessive vibrato, so that it even sounded sharp. But otherwise his presentation was marked by brilliance and virtuosity, warmth and dash and, when occasion demanded, by exceptional sensitivity to melodic contour.

It would have been easy for the orchestra to have been reduced, for the better part of yesterday's concert, to the role of mere accompanist. But that, fortunately, was not Dr. Koussevitzky's notion. In both Concertos there seemed to be an admirable spirit of co-operation between conductor and soloist. The Schumann Concerto, for all its virtues, demands much from the conductor and orchestra if a sympathetic presentation is to result, as it did yesterday. The Mendelssohn, on the other hand, can easily be made a solo display piece instead of the symphonic composition which, because of the superb fusion between solo and orchestral parts, emerged at yesterday's concert.

The program began with Malipiero's Second Symphony and ended with the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Symphony, new to Boston, has, like the Schumann Concerto, a "story" in back of it. But the reticent composer has vouchsafed no more illuminating information than the subtitle, "Elegiaca," and the statement ment that the music was written during a period of "anxious and tragic months" in 1936.

He insists that "this symphony is just music," and that one must not look for a "program." One may say, after yesterday's performance, that Malipiero has written not only "music" but also good music. There are four movements: a fast movement to begin, a slow movement in which the elegiac note begins to intrude, a scherzo that achieves a measure of boisterousness without, however, corresponding exuberance, and the finale, which begins slowly, has an excited middle section, and ends slowly and quietly in a retrospective vein.

The harmonic schemes are essentially tonal, though considerable recourse is made to the modes, and the composer does not shun dissonance. His prevailing method, especially in the first movement, is [illegible] symphonic in the nineteenth-century sense, but it resembles more closely that kind of insistent iteration of thematic fragments in which Bach frequently indulged. It is a dangerous procedure when the key-system is not maintained as strictly as it was in the case of Bach. But Malipiero brings it off successfully. His Symphony is certainly not pretentious, but it is a likeable work, engrossing at every turn and on several occasions rising to a dignified eloquence. It seemed yesterday to have been given a beautifully understanding performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

in the week preceding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

New Brunswick, Feb. 4 — The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth appearance at Rutgers University next Tuesday evening in the fourth presentation of the University music department this season. The concert will begin at 8:30.

[illegible] in Millrose

PRINCETON, Feb. 4. — Four Princeton track men will break the lull which has settled on Tiger sports activities because of exams when they travel to New York and compete in the Millrose games tomorrow night. They will make up a mile relay team and attempt to keep the crown which was won in this event by Princeton last year.

The men, in the order they will run, are Pete Bradley, Bob Thum, Phil Goold and Red Kirkland. Bradley, senior lead-

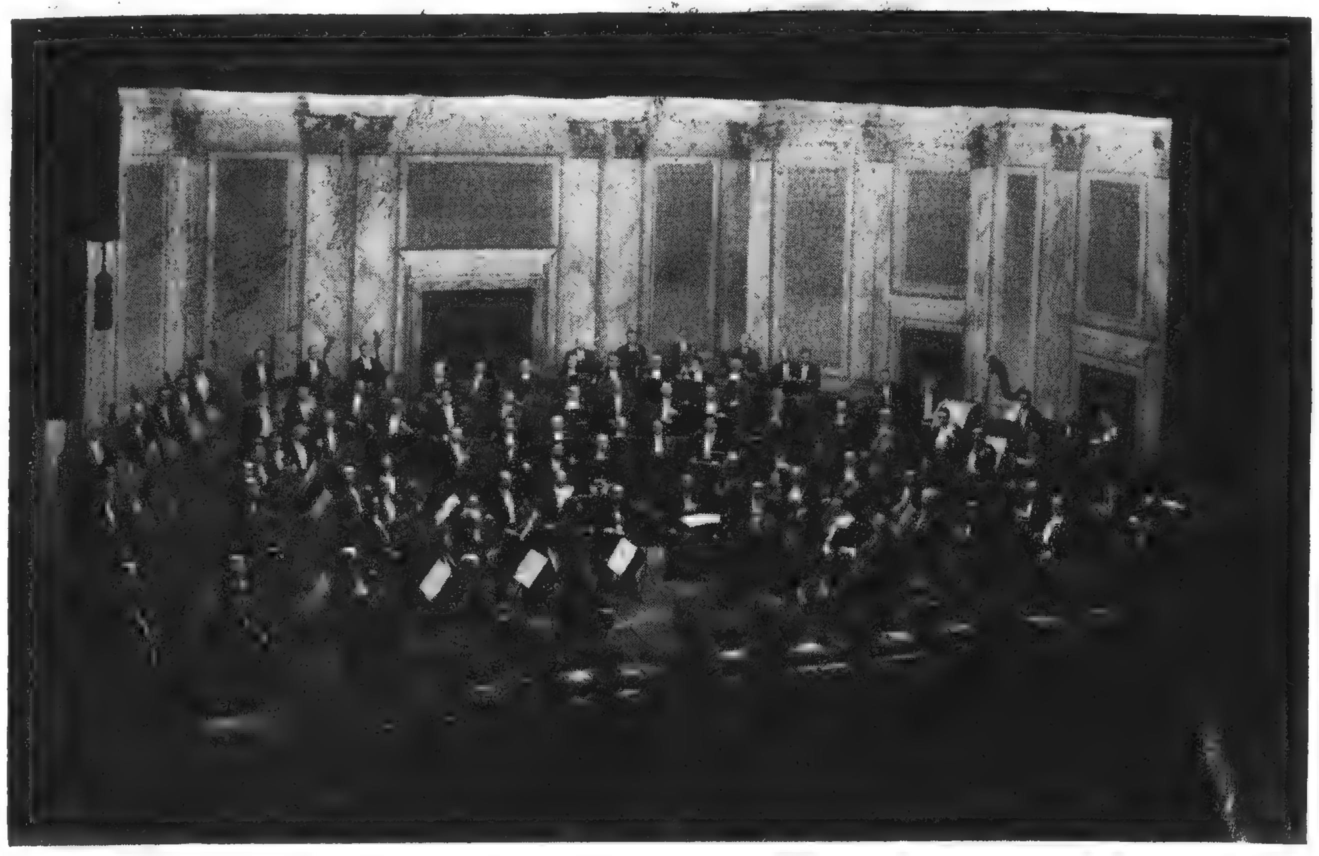
MUSIC, THE DANCE AND THE STAGE

Tribute to Ravel. The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, February 10, is dedicated to the memory of the great French composer, Joseph Maurice Ravel (March 7, 1875—December 28, 1937). Ravel once said, "In art nothing is left to chance." In his own art, meticulous, symmetrical and economic, there was little that was left to the moment. His "Le Tombeau de Couperin," with which Serge Koussevitzky will open the program, was first composed for the piano and later brilliantly orchestrated. Couperin, first master composer for the harpsicord, taught Bach and Scarlatti many excellent devices. And Ravel, who has been said to incarnate "the very spirit of the precise and ordered classicism of the eighteenth century," has written an enchanting score in his elegant "Le Tombeau." Schumann's Fourth Symphony will bring the first half of the program to an end.

Ravel once said of himself, "I try to create beautiful ideas in music and attempt to develop them to their logical, perhaps inevitable, end." Born in Ciboure, near the Spanish frontier, it is said that as a boy he discovered the major seventh cord which he so distinctively used. In 1901 he received the second grand prix de Rome for his cantata, "Myrrha." In spite of officialdom, his "Rapsodie Espagnole," mysterious, haunting music which the Boston Symphony will also play, established his growing authority. The following year, 1910, his "Mother Goose Melodies" ("Ma Mère L'Oye"), to be performed at this concert, was written for two small friends and played by pianists in pigtails and pinafores. There was a succession of triumphs culminating in the 1928 Paris début of his "Bolero." The shy, retired composer had built on this rather modest Spanish dance, by repetition of a simple theme, an excitement that becomes completely obsessive. With the performance of the "Bolero" the concert in homage to Ravel comes to a climatic end.

No more sympathetic conductor of Ravel's works could be found in America than Serge Koussevitzky. Acclaimed for his performance of the classical masters, Koussevitzky has also shown, clearly and consistently, that the masters of our own day are worth hearing, that they deserve the magnificent playing of a great orchestra, equally as much as their teachers and their teachers' teachers. And his audiences have grown with this beloved conductor to an intimate feeling for the richness of all music, be it past or present. What Koussevitzky has done for Sibelius to a most eminent degree, he has done for many another contemporary. No finer tribute to the memory of that quiet and earnest Frenchman, Maurice Ravel, could be offered than the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be held on the evening of February 10.

Concert in Memory of Maurice Ravel



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Program

RAVEL..Suite: "Le Tombeau de Couperin"
SCHUMANN..Symphony No. 4 in D Minor
RAVEL..Rapsodie Espagnole
RAVEL..................................."Mother Goose" (Five Children's Pieces)
RAVEL ....Bolero

THURSDAY EVENING FEBRUARY 10
AT 8:30 O'CLOCK
OPERA HOUSE ACADEMY OF MUSIC

REMAINING TICKETS NOW ON SALE
EARLY RESERVATION IS ADVISABLE
$1.25, $1.50, $1.75, $2.25, $2.75. No Tax.

Yehudi Menuhin Plays

"Novelty" from the Past In Revealing Performance

B. Trans. Feb. 1938

Mendelssohn Concerto, New Malipiero Symphony and Wagner Overture Round Out Program

By Moses Smith

Two concertos appear on this week's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played, with the assistance of Yehudi Menuhin and under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and to be repeated this evening. The procedure of doubling up has enjoyed a certain vogue recently, not only here but elsewhere. In the present instance it was due at least partly to Menuhin's desire to show the close connection (as he contends) between the rediscovered Schumann Concerto and that of Brahms, both in the key of D minor. But after a private performance before Dr. Koussevitzky some weeks ago, it was decided that the Schumann Concerto was eloquent enough to be presented in its own right. And so the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor was substituted instead for the Boston concerts of yesterday and today.

Some observers, hearing the few recent performances of the Schumann Concerto in other American cities, have found few ties between it and Brahms's work. Nor has the Schumann composition commanded the enthusiastic praise lavished on it by the two principal protagonists of yesterday's performance. Making due allowances for the illusory nature of first impressions, I am inclined to agree with Menuhin and Koussevitzky in both matters.

As to the Brahmism overtones, there are striking resemblances. In the first movement, for example, there is a long, elaborate and fairly brilliant passage for solo violin, at the end of which one almost expects the orchestra to burst forth into the main theme of the last movement of the Brahms Concerto. There is furthermore a similarity between this theme and the principal theme of the last movement of the Schumann Concerto. It is not so much a matter of melodic outline or exact meter as of a certain rhythmic heaviness that characterizes both.

The music itself is of exceedingly uneven character. The mediocre success the Concerto has thus far achieved is due not only to this fact but also, very likely, to an almost total lack of surface brilliance and display. There is no cadenza. There are extremely difficult passages for the solo violinist, but few that sound conventionally difficult. Nor is the composition constructed along the symphonic lines of the earlier Concertos of Beethoven and Mendelssohn and the later one of Brahms. And so the listener who expects such a Concerto is likely to be let down.

But the name, after all, is not important. On the basis of yesterday's performance it seems better to regard the "new" work as not a concerto at all but as another Fantasy for violin and orchestra. In that light it takes on new meaning. Much of the thematic material sounds beautifully on the ear—like the second theme of the first movement, the main theme of the slow movement and several typically Schumannesque subsidiary themes in the last. The main trouble with the Concerto, in fact, seemed on first hearing to be the first theme of the opening movement, which gets nowhere at all.

Yesterday's performance of the work seemed exquisitely contrived by all concerned. Menuhin, who is now playing better than ever, revealed the solo section with a warmth and care and devotion that were in themselves touching. The difficulties, of which a good deal has been made, were not apparent; and the solo part came forth with admirable clarity. Much was due, naturally, to the almost equally devoted attention of Dr. Koussevitzky and his assistants.

The audience seemed to be very much moved, as attested by the prolonged and demonstrative applause at the end. There was an even longer and noisier demonstration after the more brilliant Mendelssohn Concerto. Here, too, all hands contributed to a performance extraordinarily persuasive and apt. At the beginning of the first movement and for a few moments in the third Menuhin's tone was conveyed with excessive vibrato, so that it even sounded sharp. But otherwise his presentation was marked by brilliance and virtuosity, warmth and dash and, when occasion demanded, by exceptional sensitivity to melodic contour.

It would have been easy for the orchestra to have been reduced, for the better part of yesterday's concert, to the role of mere accompanist. But that, fortunately, was not Dr. Koussevitzky's notion. In both Concertos there seemed to be an admirable spirit of co-operation between conductor and soloist. The Schumann Concerto, for all its virtues, demands much from the conductor and orchestra if a sympathetic presentation is to result, as it did yesterday. The Mendelssohn, on the other hand, can easily be made a solo display piece instead of the symphonic composition which, because of the superb fusion between solo and orchestral parts, emerged at yesterday's concert.

The program began with Malipiero's Second Symphony and ended with the Overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman." The Symphony, new to Boston, has, like the Schumann Concerto, a "story" in back of it. But the reticent composer has vouchsafed no more illuminating information than the subtitle, "Elegiaca," and the statement ment that the music was written during a period of "anxious and tragic months" in 1936.

He insists that "this symphony is just music," and that one must not look for a "program." One may say, after yesterday's performance, that Malipiero has written not only "music" but also good music. There are four movements: a fast movement to begin, a slow movement in which the elegiac note begins to intrude, a scherzo that achieves a measure of boisterousness without, however, corresponding exuberance, and the finale, which begins slowly, has an excited middle section, and ends slowly and quietly in a retrospective vein.

The harmonic schemes are essentially tonal, though considerable recourse is made to the modes, and the composer does not shun dissonance. His prevailing method, especially in the first movement, is not symphonic in the nineteenth-century sense, but it resembles more closely that kind of insistent iteration of thematic fragments in which Bach frequently indulged. It is a dangerous procedure when the key-system is not maintained as strictly as it was in the case of Bach. But Malipiero brings it off successfully. His Symphony is certainly not pretentious, but it is a likeable work, engrossing at every turn and on several occasions rising to a dignified eloquence. It seemed yesterday to have been given a beautifully understanding performance by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

FEB 4 - 1938

in the week preceding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

New Brunswick, Feb. 4 — The world-famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth appearance at Rutgers University next Tuesday evening in the fourth presentation of the University music department this season. The concert will begin at 8:30.

---

in Millrose

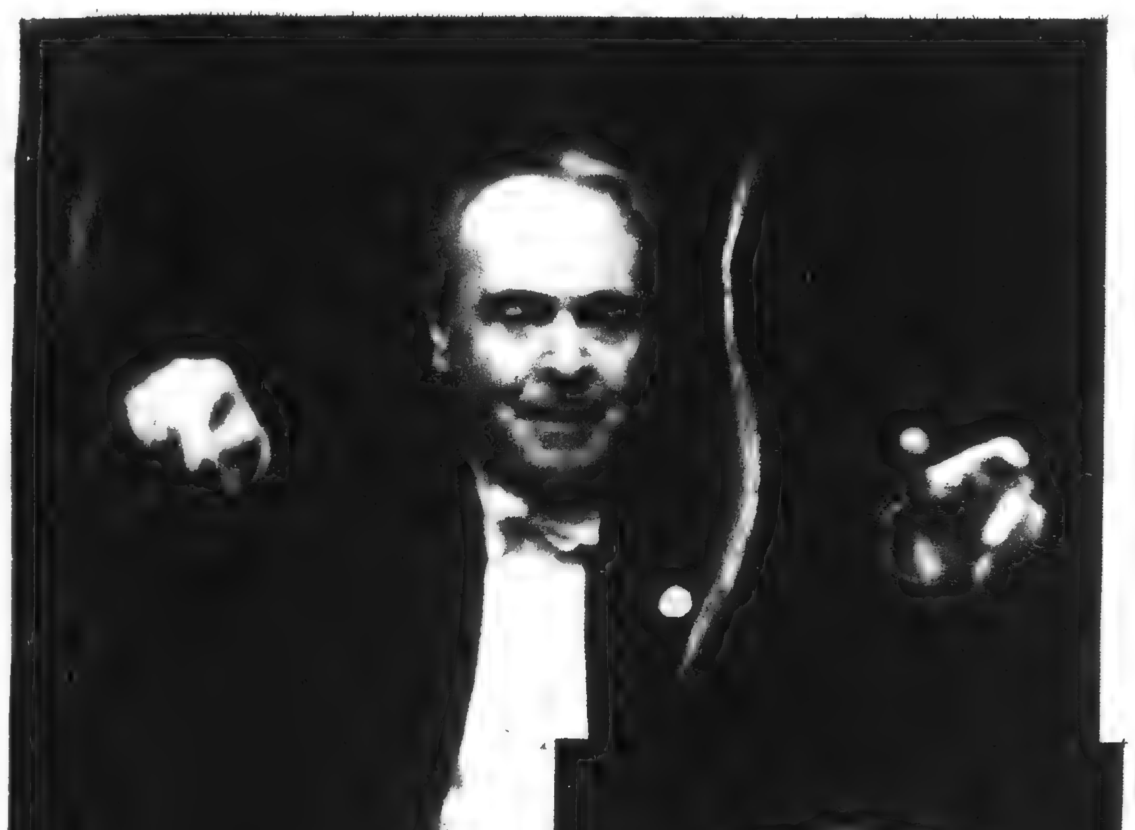
PRINCETON, Feb. 4 — Four Princeton track men will break the lull which has settled on Tiger sports activities because of exams when they travel to New York and compete in the Millrose games tomorrow night. They will make up a mile relay team and attempt to keep the crown which was won in this event by Princeton last year.

The men, in the order they will run, are Pete Bradley, Bob Thum, Phil Goold and Red Kirkland. Bradley, senior lead-

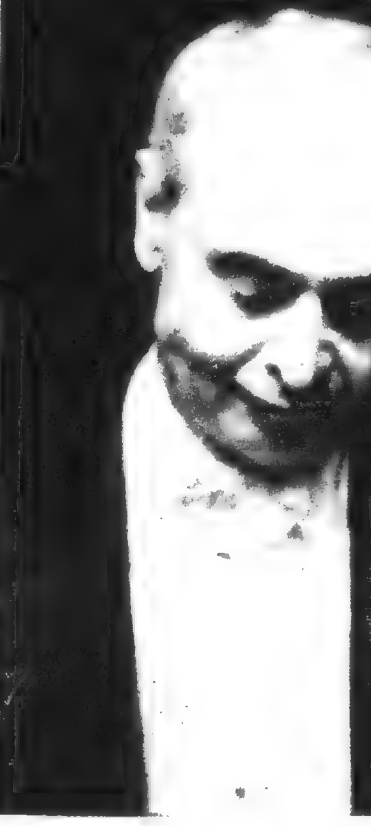
ROTOGRAVURE SECTION B. Herald Feb. 6/38 THE

Koussevitzkian Facial By-Play

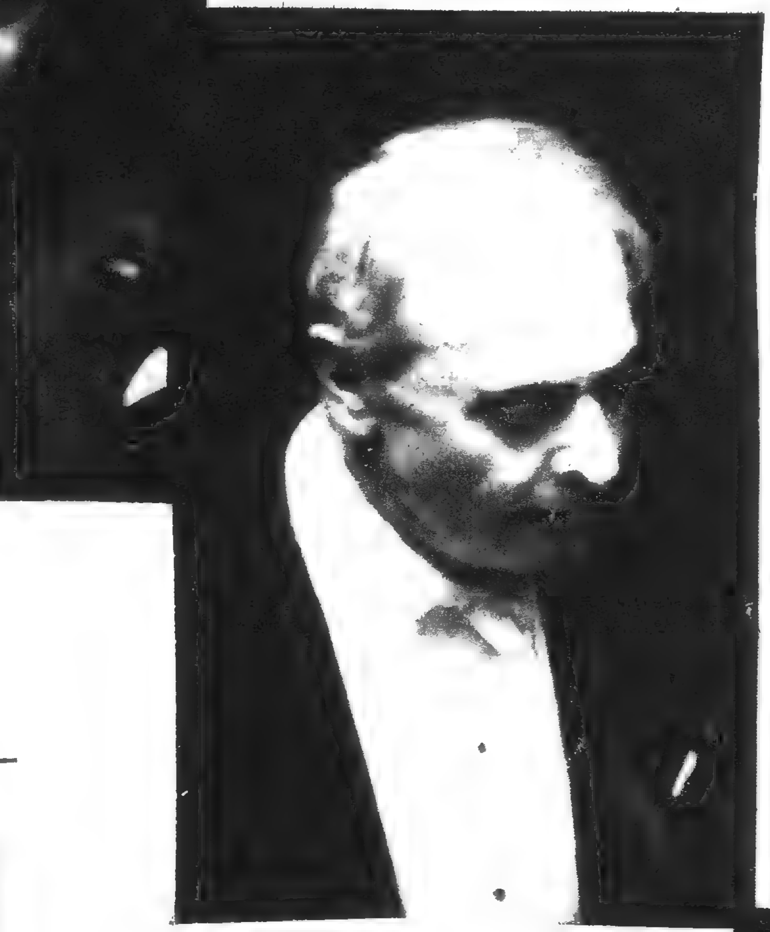
THESE EXTRAORDINARY STUDIES are Judkins-Wolff photographs taken with a telephoto lens from a concealed vantage point during an actual performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They show the remarkable variety of facial expressions which the musicians see as they take their directions from their great leader but which are never seen by audiences.



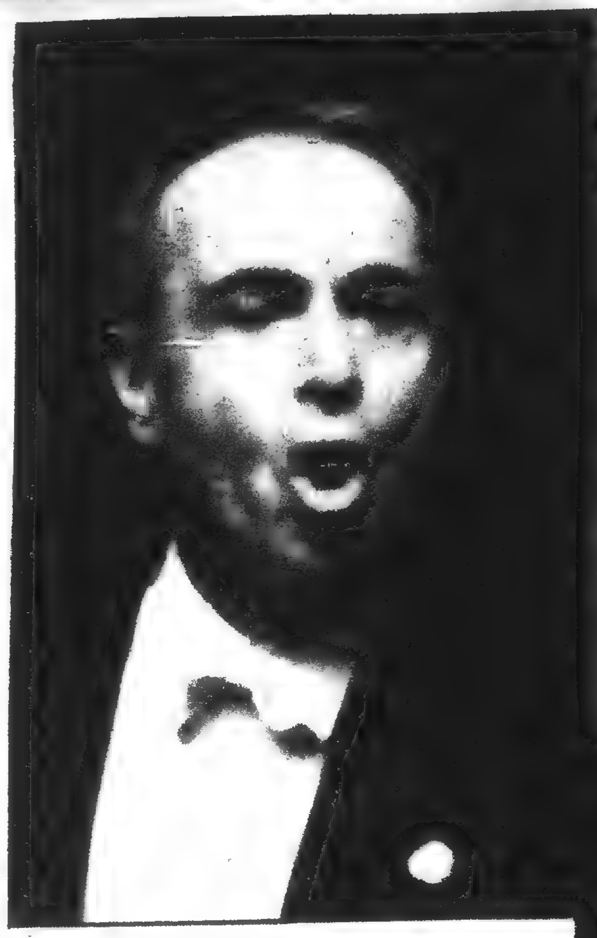
READY TO ATTACK! A study of the controlled nervous energy of Serge Koussevitzky—power in leash. No matter how complex may be the problems before leader and men, a glance at this face inspires the musicians' confidence of being under supreme powers of leadership.



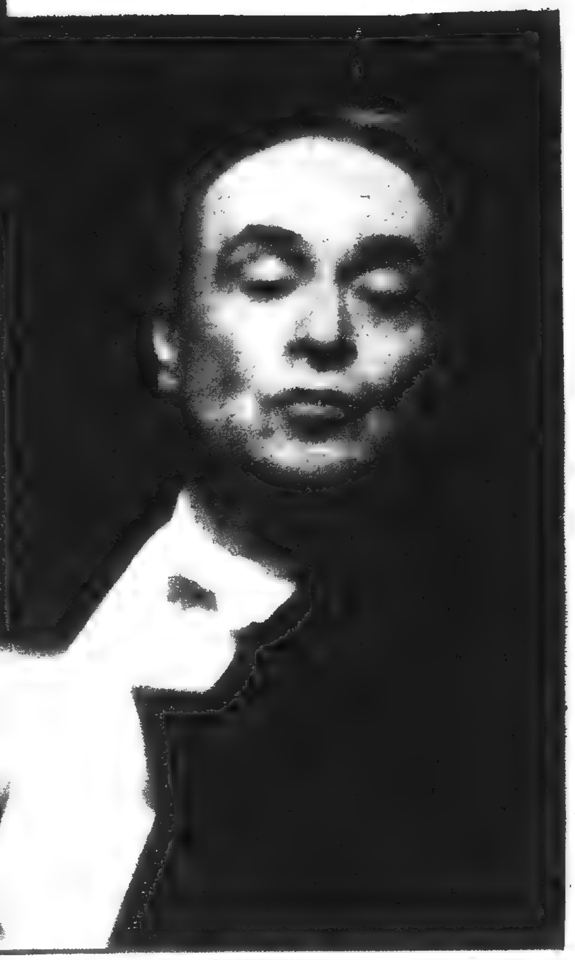
DOLCE. Koussevitzky asks that the playing be sweet—and his face registers that it is. No one in the audience ever enjoys the music more than Koussevitzky, when the performance is going to his liking and he is not involved in fast and furious action. At such moments, he will follow a smiling glance at the score by darting a look of appreciation and a pantomimed compliment at the orchestra.



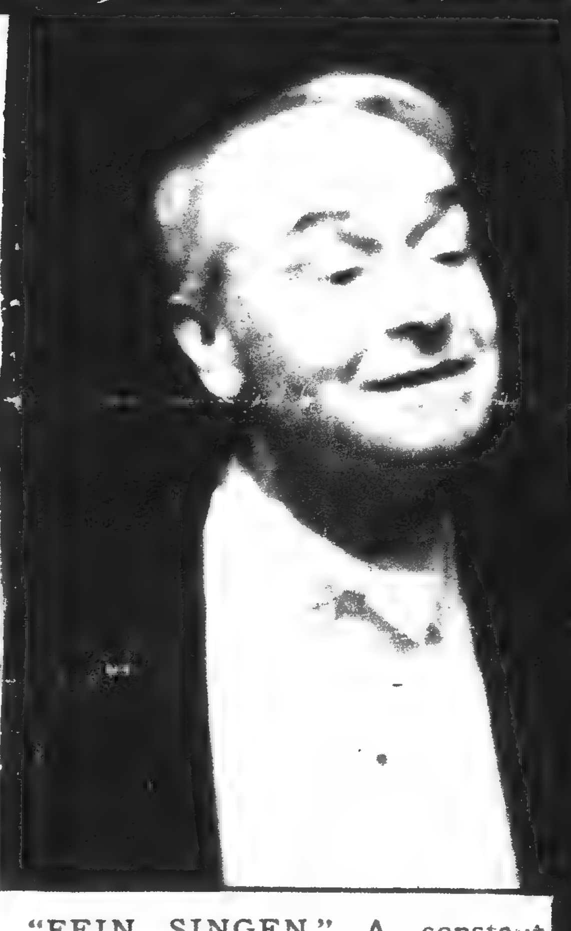
CON MOTO! Here a complex rhythmic pattern is being worked out. With pursed lips, the great leader keeps each unit of tonal design moving with mathematical precision yet, with esthetic variegation of prominence of the individual colors of the tonal strands.



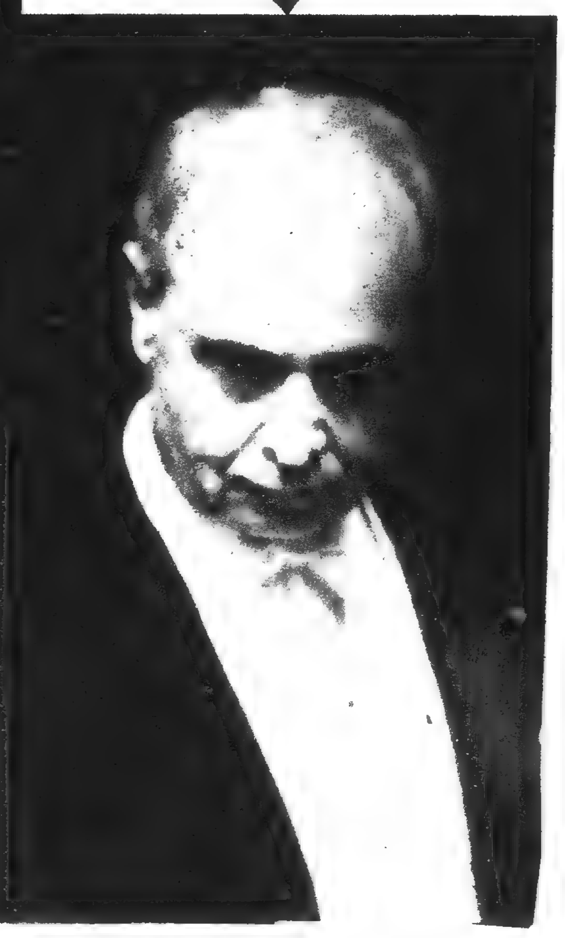
FORTE, TROMBONES! Eyes busy with the score, Koussevitzky bids the trombones deliver a strong tone, by shaping the sound, "Pom!" with his lips. "Pom!" is a favorite Koussevitzkian signal for big tones from the brasses.



TENUTO. With this suspension of Koussevitzky's lip and eyebrows, players know that they must not let the final beats of a tone fall off like the collapse of a toy balloon, but continue with firmness to the last split-second of the final beat.



ACCELERANDO! Now begins the ever-hastening march to the climax. But it must be a well-ordered march, and not a mad scramble. Koussevitzky maintains firm rein over 110 instrumentalists, calm, yet under the highest tension.



"FEIN SINGEN." A constant call of Koussevitzky to his instrumentalists, as well as vocalists on the stage, is a German phrase by which he means: "Let it be well sung!"

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

"Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play but rather of its thoroughness of expression."

—Sergei Koussevitzky.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

Conductor Who Keeps Orchestra Busy

Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton for ~~Boston Sym-~~phony, leads one of the oldest orchestras of the country.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

JAN 31 1938

Build Fan-Shaped Hall for Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 30.—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor, who will, of course, be Serge Koussevitzky, will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors.

The festival is an experiment in community co-operation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION - STAR

FEB 1 - 1938

Berkshire Group in Final Financial Drive

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., this week launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August. Simultaneously the Festival announced the concert dates as August 4, 6 and 7; August 11, 13 and 14, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

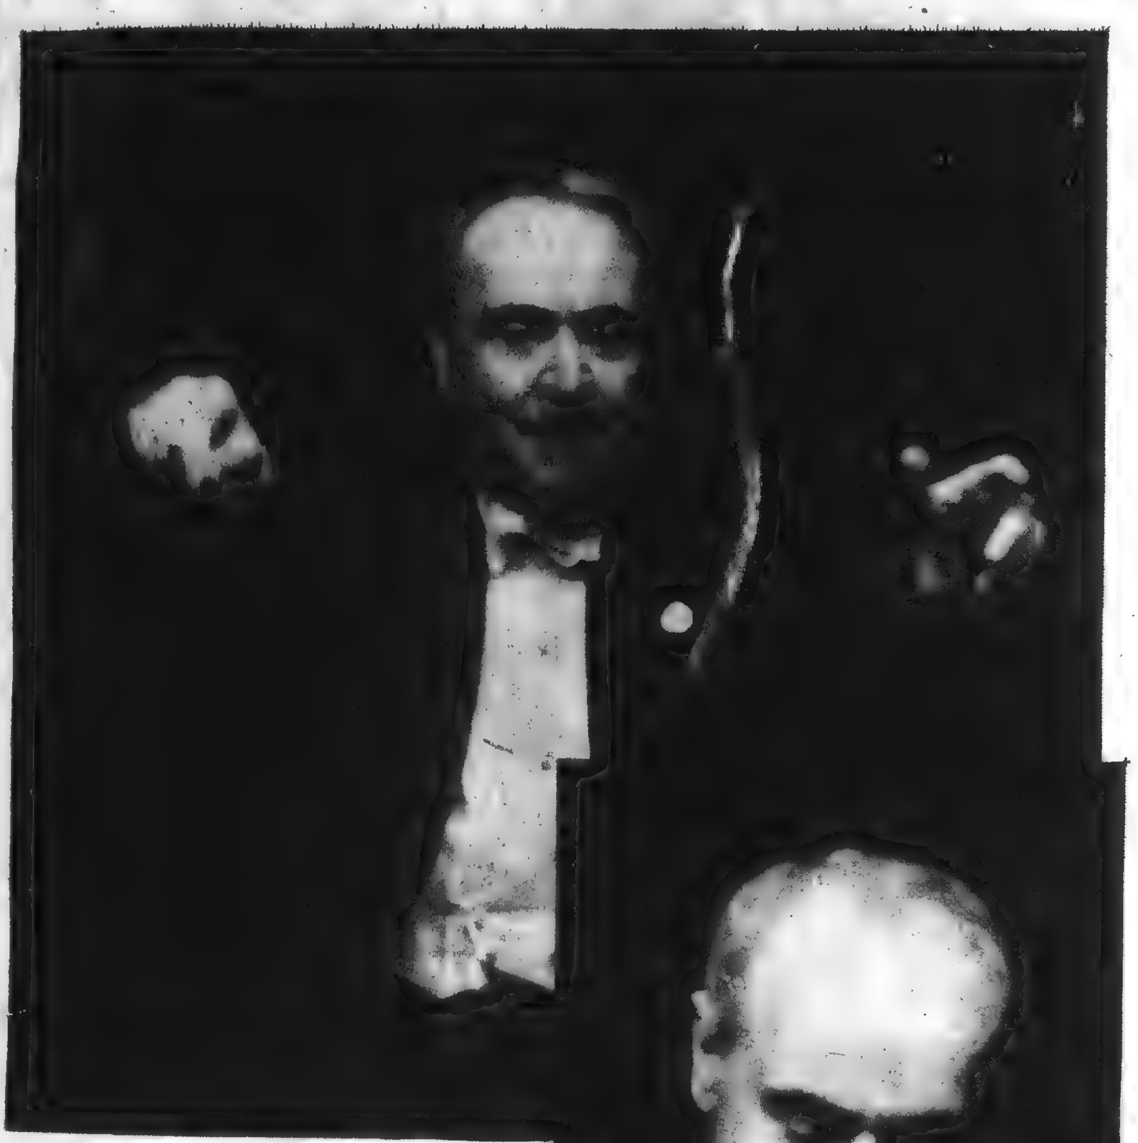
Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons, to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The building, in the shape of a huge fan, will seat 5,000. From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonade, the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last seat in the shed the distance will be 160 feet. The porportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston. Final tests for acoustics are scheduled tentatively for July 1, under the direction of Professor Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

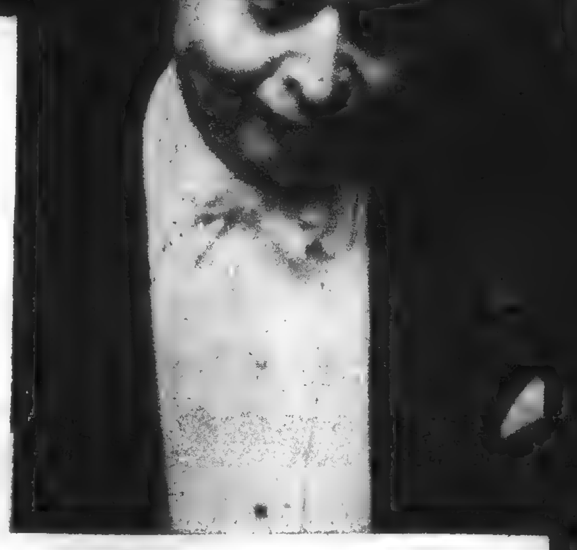
ROTOGRAVURE SECTION B. Herald Feb. 6/38 THE

Koussevitzkian Facial By-Play

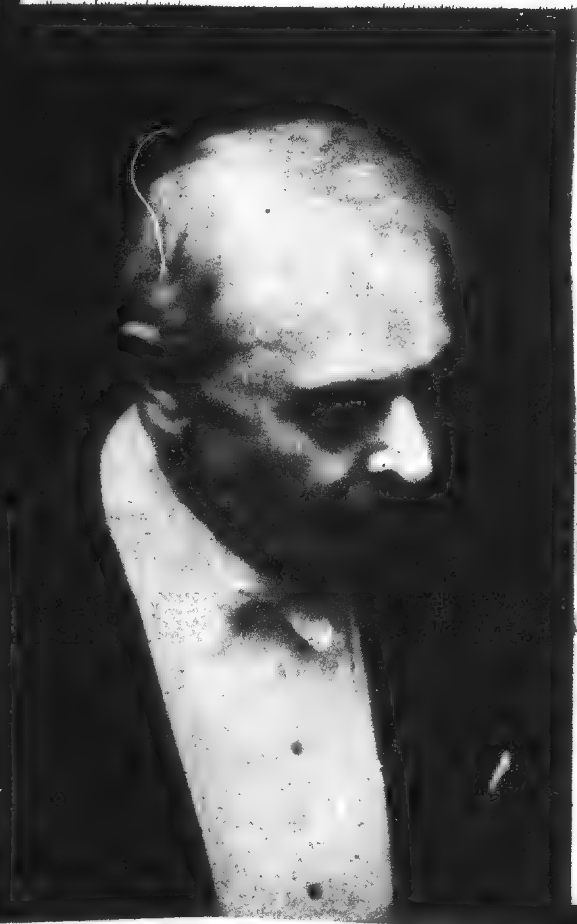
THESE EXTRAORDINARY STUDIES are Judkins-Wolff photographs taken with a telephoto lens from a concealed vantage point during an actual performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They show the remarkable variety of facial expressions which the musicians see as they take their directions from their great leader but which are never seen by audiences.



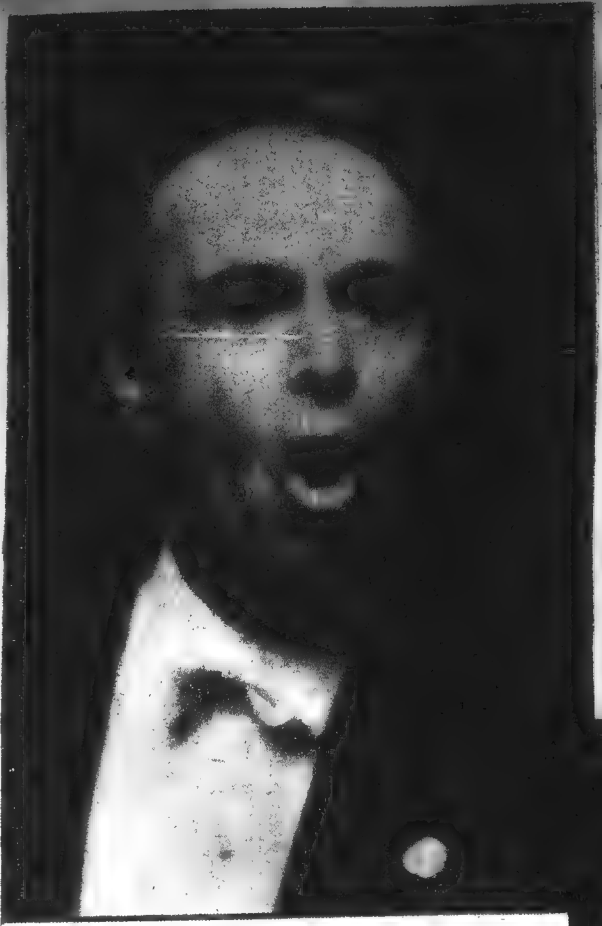
READY TO ATTACK! A study of the controlled nervous energy of Serge Koussevitzky—power in leash. No matter how complex may be the problems before leader and men, a glance at this face inspires the musicians' confidence of being under supreme powers of leadership.



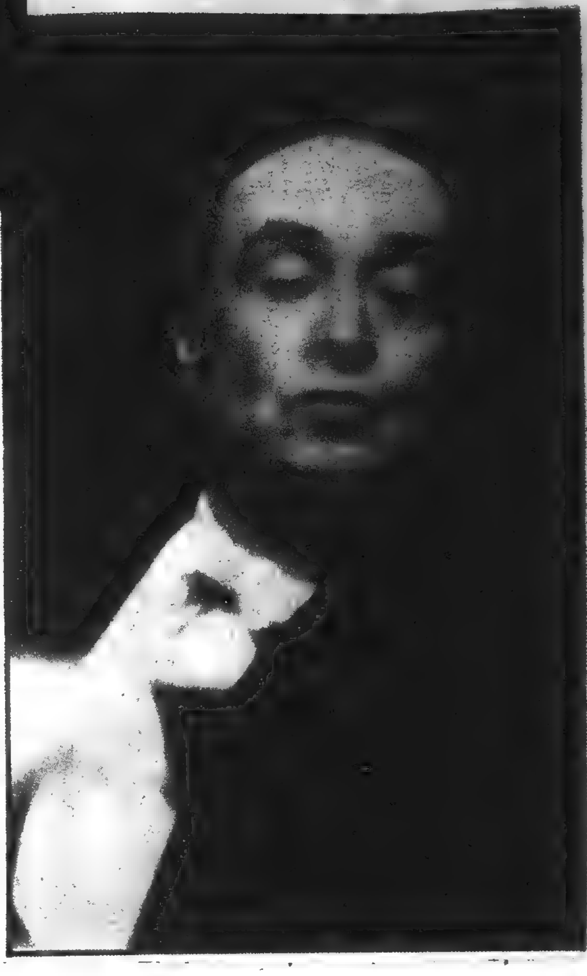
DOLCE. Koussevitzky asks that the playing be sweet—and his face registers that it is. No one in the audience ever enjoys the music more than Koussevitzky, when the performance is going to his liking and he is not involved in fast and furious action. At such moments, he will follow a smiling glance at the score by darting a look of appreciation and a pantomimed compliment at the orchestra.



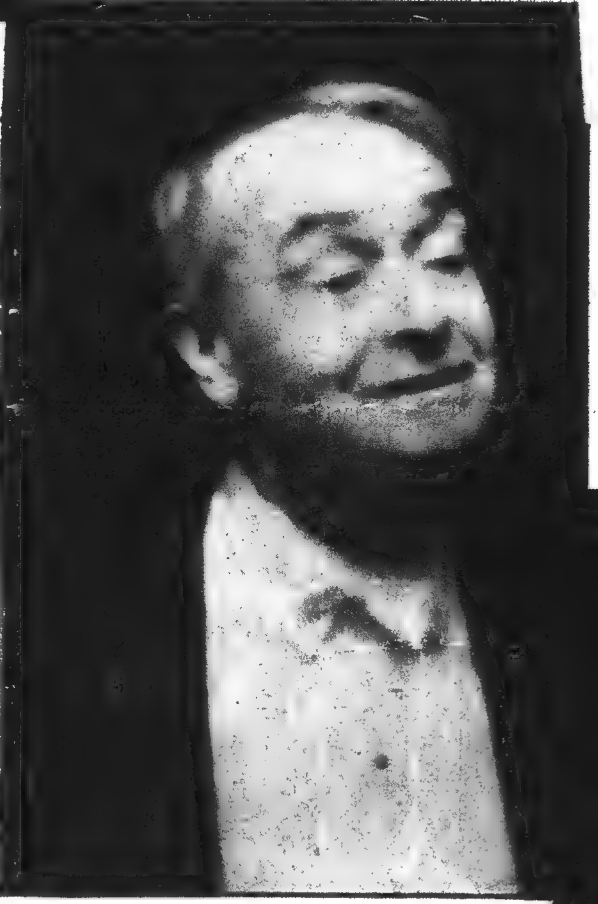
CON MOTO! Here a complex rhythmic pattern is being worked out. With pursed lips, the great leader keeps each unit of tonal design moving with mathematical precision yet, with esthetic variegation of prominence of the individual colors of the tonal strands.



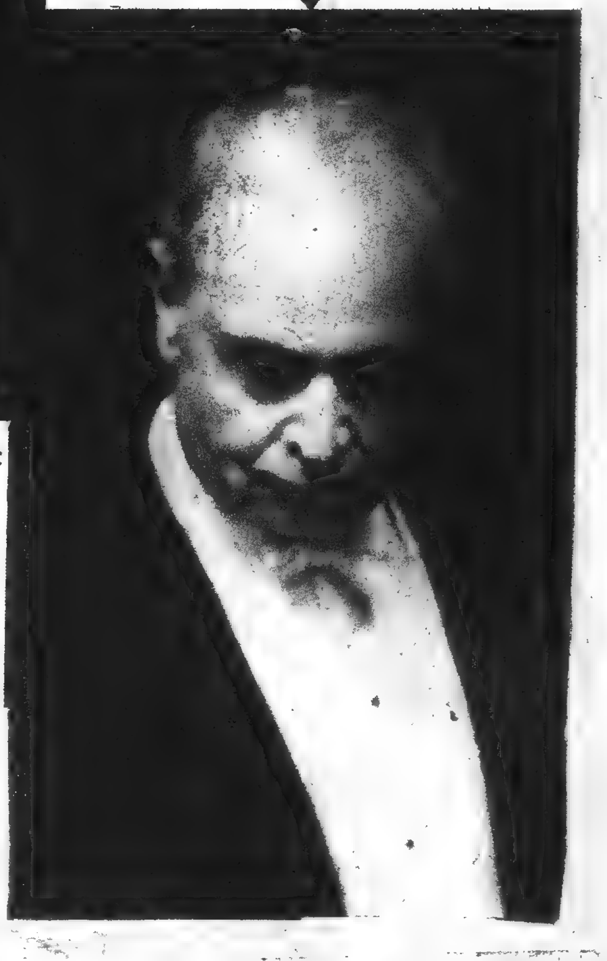
FORTE, TROMBONES! Eyes busy with the score, Koussevitzky bids the trombones deliver a strong tone, by shaping the sound, "Pom!" with his lips. "Pom!" is a favorite Koussevitzkian signal for big tones from the brasses.



TENUTO. With this suspension of Koussevitzky's lip and eyebrows, players know that they must not let the final beats of a tone fall off like the collapse of a toy balloon, but continue with firmness to the last split-second of the final beat.



ACCELERANDO! Now begins the ever-hastening march to the climax. But it must be a well-ordered march, and not a mad scramble. Koussevitzky maintains firm rein over 110 instrumentalists, calm, yet under the highest tension.



"FEIN SINGEN." A constant call of Koussevitzky to his instrumentalists, as well as vocalists on the stage, is a German phrase by which he means: "Let it be well sung!"

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

FEB 6 - 1938

"Music is not a matter of the length of time it takes to play but rather of its thoroughness of expression."

—Sergei Koussevitzky.

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH
UTAH TRIBUNE

JAN 2 3 1938

Conductor Who Keeps Orchestra Busy

Serge Koussevitzky, wielding the baton for Boston Symphony, leads one of the oldest orchestras of the country.

CLEVELAND, O.
PLAIN DEALER

JAN 3 1 1938

Build Fan-Shaped Hall for Symphony

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 30.—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor, who will, of course, be Serge Koussevitzky, will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors.

The festival is an experiment in community co-operation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August.

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
UNION - STAR

FEB 1 - 1938

Berkshire Group in Final Financial Drive

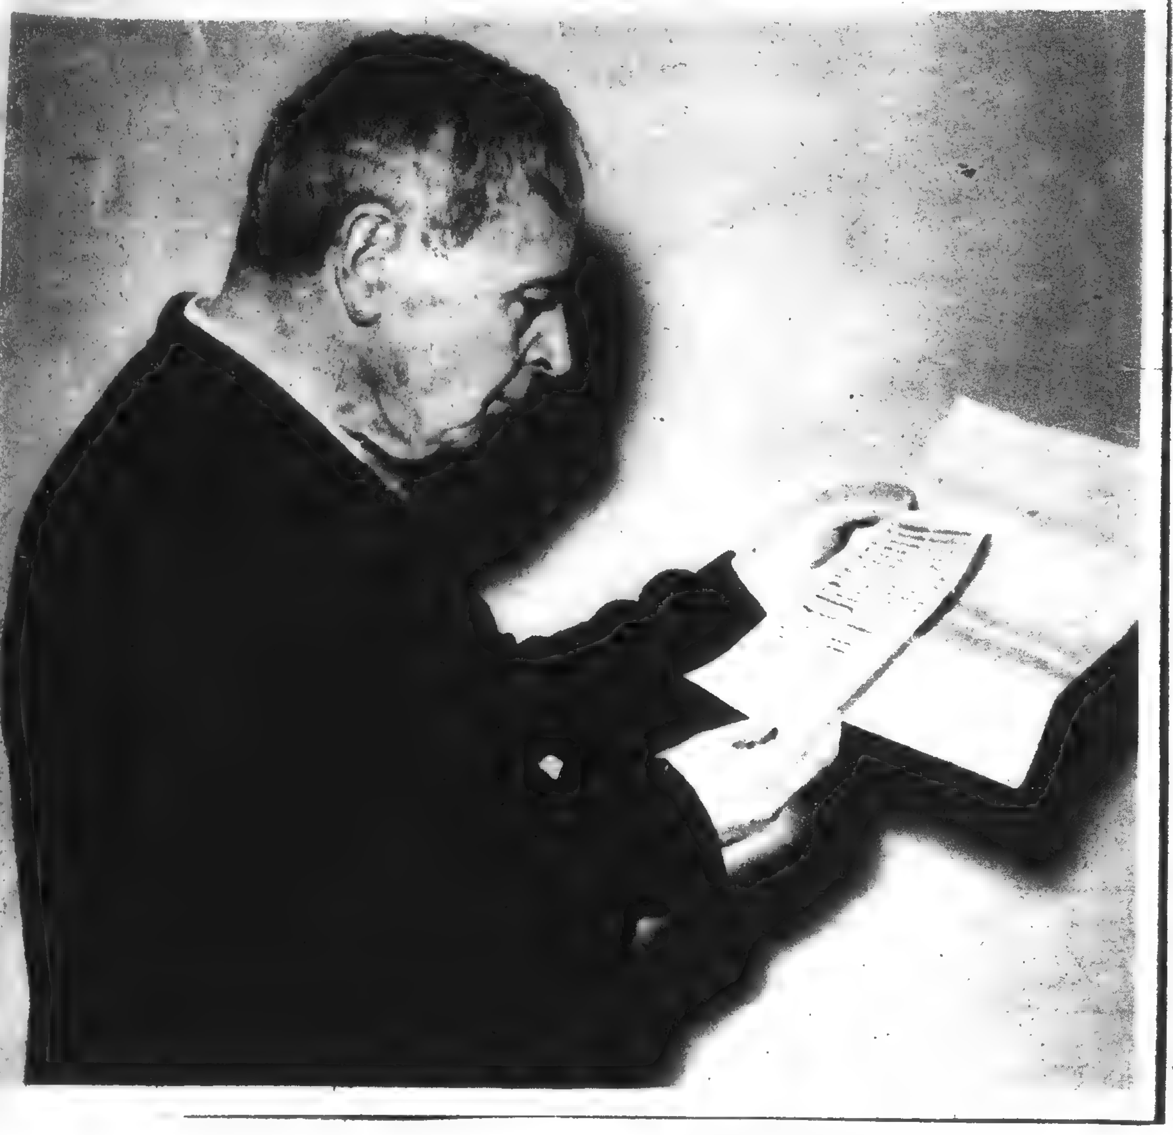
The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., this week launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood, between Stockbridge and Lenox, in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August. Simultaneously the Festival announced the concert dates as August 4, 6 and 7; August 11, 13 and 14, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky again conducting the orchestra.

Concrete foundations are being poured for the steel framework weighing 308 tons, to be erected by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The building, in the shape of a huge fan, will seat 5,000. From one side of the fan to the other, within the colonade, the distance will be 325 feet. From the podium on the stage to the last seat in the shed the distance will be 160 feet. The porportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston. Final tests for acoustics are scheduled tentatively for July 1, under the direction of Professor Richard Fay of Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1938



Symphony Score Sent by Radio

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is shown with the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." The original score of the Finnish composer's work was lost in the mail en route to the United States from Germany, so that it was necessary to transmit it by radio in time for the scheduled performance in Boston.

EAGLE

JAN 28 1938

ZIMALIST ON OLNEY SERIES

Noted Violinist Plays Feb. 4th

The first joint concert in this count by Efram Zimbalist and Raya Garbo sova will take place at the Westche ter County Center on Friday evenin February 4th. The celebrated violini and 'cellist are appearing as the fift event in Mrs. Julian Olney's conce series.

All the more celebrated violinists the present day except Zimbalist hav appeared on this Series in previo years. These include Menuhin, Kreis ler, Elman, and Heifetz. Not only a both artists new to the Series, b heretofore no solo 'cellist has been fea tured. They have previously playe joint concerts in their native Russi

Now a naturalized American, Zimbalist was born in 1889 at Rostov-on the-Don. His first teacher was hi father, who was an orchestra leade The boy showed such extraordinar gifts that when he was only nine year old he became first violinist in a gran opera orchestra. In 1903 he entered th Imperial Conservatory in Petrograd study ni ugnderProfessor Leopold Auer Graduating he was awarded the coveted gold medal and the Rubenstein scholarship of 12,000 rubles. He mad his Berlin debut at the age of eighteen appearing later in London and on th continent with great success.

His American debut was made on October 27, 1911, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On this occasion Zimbalist played the Glazounow Concerts in A Minor fo rthe first time in America. He was immediately hailed as an artist of unusual merit. In the twenty-six years that have passed since then, the name of Zimbalist has become synonymous with great violin music. He stands at the pinnacle of the musical ladder in both popularity and prestige. His art has been acclaimed on every continent. He has played in almost every large city in the world. Yet he remains the same unassuming extremely modest artist that he was when making his debut.

(Continued from Page Six)

The famous violin virtuoso's chief hobby is the collecting of first editions of leading English authors. In addition to his rare editions, Zimbalist also has fine collections of semi-precious stones, quaint Oriental vials, carved ivories and fine tapestries. Most of the items in these various collections have been gathered during his travels to many far corners of the world.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 31 1938

New Type Hall Going Up For Symphonic Festival

BY JOHN SELBY.

Stockbridge, Mass., January 30—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire symphonic festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor, who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky, will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1½ acres; will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 persons will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a twenty-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

PATERSON, N. J.
CALL

JAN 31 1938

Stockbridge Prepares For Annual Festival

New Building Will House Boston Symphony In July

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

Stockbridge, Mass., Jan. 30 (AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanet roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1 1-2 acres; will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community co-operation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

FEB 1 - 1938

The Berkshire Symphonic Festical has launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August. Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphony Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

JAN 28 1938

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky Is to Conduct

Boston Symphony Leader Will Bring Orchestra Here Feb. 9.

Serge Koussevitzky, a leader of rare magnetism and an artist of strong convictions, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Montclair High School Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, in the extra event of the Unity Concert Course series.

Born in Northern Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky's early career in that country was conspicuous. His Beethoven and Bach festivals in Moscow and Petrograd became famous. In 1920 he began work in Paris, making for himself an enviable place there and later in London.

In the season of 1924-1925 he came to this country. His success as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was impressive. For a period of fourteen years he has been conductor of the organization, serving with distinction.

A music critic comments: "This great conductor has a volcanic temperament, but it never runs away with him; on the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at the boiling point that his hand is steadiest and surest. As a musician he is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authenticity, a quenchless enthusiasm and a vigorous sweep to all that he does."

All who wish seats should not delay in making reservations, as there will be no tickets on the stage. Unity Institute Office is at 67 Church Street. The telephone number is Montclair 2-6770.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1938

FRENCH MUSICIAN HERE

Madia Boulanger Will Conduct Boston Orchestra Soon

Miss Madia Boulanger, French pianist and orchestra leader, arrived yesterday on the French liner Champlain to lecture and give concerts here. On Feb. 18 and 19 she will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first woman, it is said, ever to lead that group. Included in her concert tour will be appearances in Washington and New York, and she will lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley Colle

---

METUCHEN, N. J.
WEEKLY RECORDER

FEB 3 - 1938

Boston Symphony Will Appear Tuesday Nite For Rutgers Concer

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at

---

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

JAN 31 1938

MUSIC

We have heard that Arturo Toscanini consented to come to thi country and conduct a series of cor certs for the National Broadcastin company on three conditions: Tha he have all the money that h wanted, that he have all the musicians that he wanted, and that h have all the time he wanted. Whe we sit by our radios from 10 t approximately 11:30 o'clock ever Saturday night and listen to thes concerts by the NBC symphony orchestra under the master's exper direction, we think that he was justified in asking almost anything Yet, being Americans, we canno but wonder at the actual cost to th National Broadcasting company an what has prompted them to give t America this rare privilege.

It costs the company $250,000 for the 16 broadcasts. It costs them approximately $49,000 a night, of which $40,000 goes to Toscanini. The highest paid member of the odchestra gets $450 a week, the lowest paid gets $210.

And what does the National Broadcasting company get out of it? They have the privilege of presenting to the American people the finest concerts that they have been able to hear. These concerts have made the public conscious of the National Broadcasting company as a unit, instead of just a broadcasting company. And they have the use of the highly trained musicians in the symphony for their sustaining programs.

The NBC Symphony orchestra is made up of musicians drawn from all the symphonies of the world with the exception of the New York Philharmonic symphony, the Philadelphia symphony, and the Boston symphony. These symphonies are excepted because the members of the New York Philharmonic are under contract, the members of the Boston symphony are all non-union, and the Philadelphia symphony was so gracious in offering to lend their players that no members were taken from the organization.

The first string section is considered the best ever assembled anywhere. Most of these violinists came from quartets, and were so well trained that when the whole section played a Bach string quartet during their second concert, the effect was that of one quartet.

The horn section is considered second only to that of the Boston symphony, and the woodwind section is considered the weakest section if it is possible to call any of them weak.

It is interesting to note that the first trumpet man is also a hot jazz man, as is also the first trombone man. It is gratifying to know, also, that 39 per cent of the American people have heard of Toscanini and 71 per cent of that 39 per cent know that he is the world's foremost conductor.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1938

List Boston Group In Rutgers Concert

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at 8.30 in the fourth presentation of the current Rutgers Concert Series.

The world-famous symphonic group conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, has become one of the chief attractions of the series. Dr. Koussevitsky was awarded the honorary degree of doctor of music by Rutgers University at the conclusion of the concert last year and responded by departing from precedent to play an encore.

The program for next Tuesday's concert will include music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer who died last month, and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston concerts in Boston and New York

---

ADVOCATE

Plainfield, N. J.

FEB 3 1938

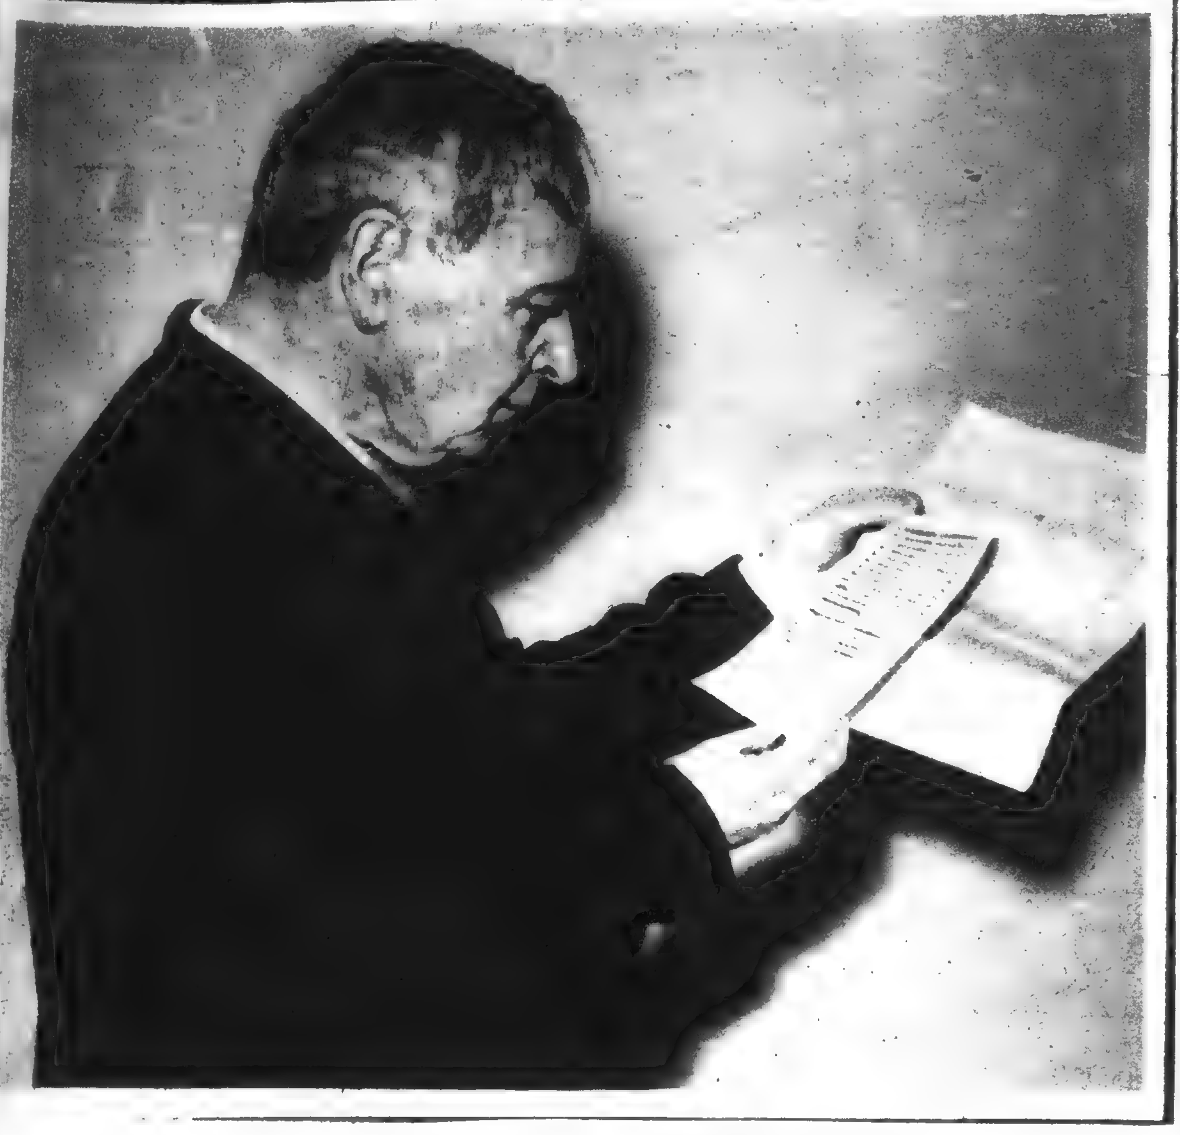
Boston Symphony To Appear In Rutgers Concerts

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New

149

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE

JAN 30 1938



Symphony Score Sent by Radio

Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra, is shown with the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." The original score of the Finnish composer's work was lost in the mail en route to the United States from Germany, so that it was necessary to transmit it by radio in time for the scheduled performance in Boston.

Montclair N. J.

JAN 28 1938

Conductor

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Koussevitzky Is to Conduct

Boston Symphony Leader Will Bring Orchestra Here Feb. 9.

Serge Koussevitzky, a leader of rare magnetism and an artist of strong convictions, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Montclair High School Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, in the extra event of the Unity Concert Course series.

Born in Northern Russia, Mr. Koussevitzky's early career in that country was conspicuous. His Beethoven and Bach festivals in Moscow and Petrograd became famous. In 1920 he began work in Paris, making for himself an enviable place there and later in London.

In the season of 1924-1925 he came to this country. His success as leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was impressive. For a period of fourteen years he has been conductor of the organization, serving with distinction.

A music critic comments: "This great conductor has a volcanic temperament, but it never runs away with him; on the contrary, it is precisely when his temperament is at the boiling point that his hand is steadiest and surest. As a musician he is endowed with a temperament that can on occasion sweep everything before it. There is an authenticity, a quenchless enthusiasm and a vigorous sweep to all that he does."

All who wish seats should not delay in making reservations, as there will be no tickets on the stage. Unity Institute Office is at 67 Church Street. The telephone number is Montclair 2-6770.

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

JAN 31 1938

MUSIC

We have heard that Arturo Toscanini consented to come to thi country and conduct a series of concerts for the National Broadcastin company on three conditions: Tha he have all the money that h wanted, that he have all the musicians that he wanted, and that h have all the time he wanted. Whe we sit by our radios from 10 t approximately 11:30 o'clock ever Saturday night and listen to thes concerts by the NBC symphony orchestra under the master's exper direction, we think that he was justified in asking almost anything Yet, being Americans, we canno but wonder at the actual cost to th National Broadcasting company and what has prompted them to give t America this rare privilege.

It costs the company $250,000 for the 16 broadcasts. It costs them approximately $49,000 a night, of which $40,000 goes to Toscanini. The highest paid member of the odchestra gets $450 a week, the lowest paid gets $210.

And what does the National Broadcasting company get out of it? They have the privilege of presenting to the American people the finest concerts that they have been able to hear. These concerts have made the public conscious of the National Broadcasting company as a unit, instead of just a broadcasting company. And they have the use of the highly trained musicians in the symphony for their sustaining programs.

The NBC Symphony orchestra is made up of musicians drawn from all the symphonies of the world with the exception of the New York Philharmonic symphony, the Philadelphia symphony, and the Boston symphony. These symphonies are excepted because the members of the New York Philharmonic are under contract, the members of the Boston symphony are all non-union, and the Philadelphia symphony was so gracious in offering to lend their players that no members were taken from the organization.

The first string section is considered the best ever assembled anywhere. Most of these violinists came from quartets, and were so well trained that when the whole section played a Bach string quartet during their second concert, the effect was that of one quartet.

The horn section is considered second only to that of the Boston symphony, and the woodwind section is considered the weakest section if it is possible to call any of them weak.

It is interesting to note that the first trumpet man is also a hot jazz man, as is also the first trombone man. It is gratifying to know, also, that 39 per cent of the American people have heard of Toscanini and 71 per cent of that 39 per cent know that he is the world's foremost conductor.

EAGLE

JAN 28 1938

ZIMALIST ON OLNEY SERIES

Noted Violinist Plays Feb. 4th

The first joint concert in this count by Efram Zimbalist and Raya Garbosova will take place at the Westchester County Center on Friday evenin February 4th. The celebrated violini and 'cellist are appearing as the fift event in Mrs. Julian Olney's conce series.

All the more celebrated violinists the present day except Zimbalist hav appeared on this Series in previou years. These include Menuhin, Kreis ler, Elman, and Heifetz. Not only a both artists new to the Series, b heretofore no solo 'cellist has been fea ured. They have previously playe joint concerts in their native Russi

Now a naturalized American, Zimbalist was born in 1889 at Rostov-on the-Don. His first teacher was hi father, who was an orchestra leade The boy showed such extraordinar gifts that when he was only nine year old he became first violinist in a gran opera orchestra. In 1903 he entered th Imperial Conservatory in Petrograd study ni ugnderProfessor Leopold Auer Graduating he was awarded the coveted gold medal and the Rubenstein scholarship of 12,000 rubles. He mad his Berlin debut at the age of eighteen appearing later in London and on th continent with great success.

His American debut was made on October 27, 1911, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. On this occasion Zimbalist played the Glazounow Concerts in A Minor fo rthe first time in America. He was immediately hailed as an artist of unusual merit. In the twenty-six years that have passed since then, the name of Zimbalist has become synonymous with great violin music. He stands at the pinnacle of the musical ladder in both popularity and prestige. His art has been acclaimed on every continent. He has played in almost every large city in the world. Yet he remains the same unassuming, extremely modest artist that he was when making his debut.

(Continued from Page Six)

The famous violin virtuoso's chief hobby is the collecting of first editions of leading English authors. In addition to his rare editions, Zimbalist also has fine collections of semi-precious stones, quaint Oriental vials, carved ivories and fine tapestries. Most of the items in these various collections have been gathered during his travels to many far corners of the world.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

JAN 31 1938

New Type Hall Going Up For Symphonic Festival

BY JOHN SELBY.

Stockbridge, Mass., January 30—(AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire symphonic festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor, who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky, will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1½ acres; will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 persons will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a twenty-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

PATERSON, N. J.
CALL

JAN 31 1938

Stockbridge Prepares For Annual Festival

New Building Will House Boston Symphony In July

By JOHN SELBY
Associated Press Arts Editor

Stockbridge, Mass., Jan. 30 (AP)—Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanet roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1 1-2 acres; will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community co-operation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD

FEB 1 - 1938

The Berkshire Symphonic Festical has launched what it hopes will be the final effort to secure the balance of funds needed to complete the major portions of the music shed at Tanglewood between Stockbridge and Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in August. Letters have been sent to the 750 subscribers to the building fund, which now exceeds $78,000, outlining to them the steps taken by the trustees in collaboration with the trustees of the orchestra. Inquiries concerning the 1938 Festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphony Festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1938

FRENCH MUSICIAN HERE

Madia Boulanger Will Conduct Boston Orchestra Soon

Miss Madia Boulanger, French pianist and orchestra leader, arrived yesterday on the French liner Champlain to lecture and give concerts here. On Feb. 18 and 19 she will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first woman, it is said, ever to lead that group. Included in her concert tour will be appearances in Washington and New York, and she will lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley Colleges.

As on her last visit a year ago, Miss Boulanger will make a study of American teaching methods under a commission of the French Government. She left for Boston soon after the ship docked.

For Rutgers Concert

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at

---

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1938

List Boston Group In Rutgers Concert

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at 8.30 in the fourth presentation of the current Rutgers Concert Series.

The world-famous symphonic group conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has become one of the chief attractions of the series. Dr. Koussevitsky was awarded the honorary degree of doctor of music by Rutgers University at the conclusion of the concert last year and responded by departing from precedent to play an encore.

The program for next Tuesday's concert will include music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer who died last month, and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston concerts in Boston and New York have been dedicated for the past two weeks. Dr. Koussevitsky will present the Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" which has often meen mentioned as Ravel's masterpiece.

Also on the program will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, which was recently called by Lawrence Gilman, critic "one of the most exciting and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind;" and Mozart's Symphony in D major, K 504, known as the "Prague Symphony."

15

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 3 - 1938

On the Sun Deck

The Children's Hour on the Champlain—Water Front Journal.

By ROBERT WILDER.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Vincent Sheean, who used to be a newspaper man himself, but who of late has turned to novels, arrived to "gallop about" and see about the publication of his latest book, "The Day of Battle." Mrs. Sheean, the former Diana Forbes-Robertson, accompanied him on her first visit to the United States, as did Linda, the twenty-month old baby. As a matter of record we must report that only Linda appeared to be impressed with all the journalistic attention which was showered upon her parents.

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French pianist and conductor, here to study American methods of teaching music, lecture at Radcliffe and Wellesley and conduct, as guest, the Boston Symphony. We told her that the sight of a woman on the podium would quite likely be a terrible shock to the Back Bay clans, but she seemed to think that nothing much would happen.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS
FEB 5 - 1938

Conductor

MLLE. NADIA COULANGER, noted French pianist and orchestra conductor, pictured as she arrived at New York City en route to Boston, where she will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. Later she will appear in concerts throughout the United States.—Acme Photo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
FEB 6 - 1938

Ravel Concert

The third appearance this year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Thursday at the Academy, will be dedicated to the late Maurice Ravel, French composer who died recently.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 3 - 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTOR

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

One of world's few women orchestra conductors arrives from her native France to lead Boston Symphony Orchestra

---

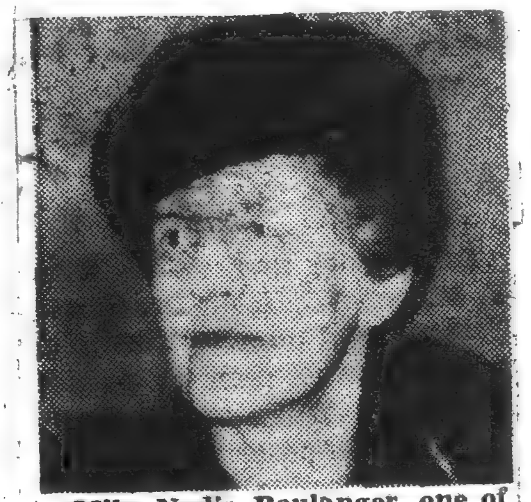
NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 3 - 1938

CONDUCTORS HERE FROM EUROPE

Associated Press Photo.

John Barbirolli, British musician, who returned on the Berengaria to conduct the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, is shown with Miss Nadia Boulanger, French pianist, who arrived on the Champlain. Miss Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 18 and 19. She is said to be the first woman ever selected to lead that orchestra.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
FEB 5 - 1938



Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, one of the few women symphony orchestra directors, arrives to guest conduct Boston's symphony.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Will Offer Ravel Program Here Thursday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special program in memory of the late Maurice Ravel, Thursday evening, Feb. 10. The concert, third in this season's Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will fatur the outstanding works in the various phases of Ravel's career. Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D Minor will also be played. The concert is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The Ravel works wil linclude "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite, which will open the program; "Rapsodie Espagnol," which will follow the Schumann Symphony; "Ma Mere l'Oye," (Mother Goose, five children's pieces) and wil lconclude with his popular "Bolero."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 5 - 1938

Jesus Maria Sanroma

Pianist, who will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next week.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 5 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO HONOR RAVEL

The memory of Maurice Ravel will be specially honored at the third pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall next Friday evening (instead of Thursday), February 11, and Saturday afternoon, February 12. The program for Friday's concert will include Ravel's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma soloist; the "Mother Goose" Suite, and the Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe." The program will open with Mozart's Symphony in D major, K-504, known as the "Prague" Symphony.

The Saturday afternoon program, February 12, will include Ravel's "Scheherazade," three poems for soprano and orchestra to the texts of Tristan Klingsor, suggested by the Arabian Nights. The soloist will be Olga Averino, who has appeared previously in this music with the orchestra. Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Rapsodie Espagnole" will also be played and the concert will end with his "Bolero." The Fourth Symphony of Schumann in D minor will be played in the first part of the program.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER - NEWS
FEB 5 - 1938

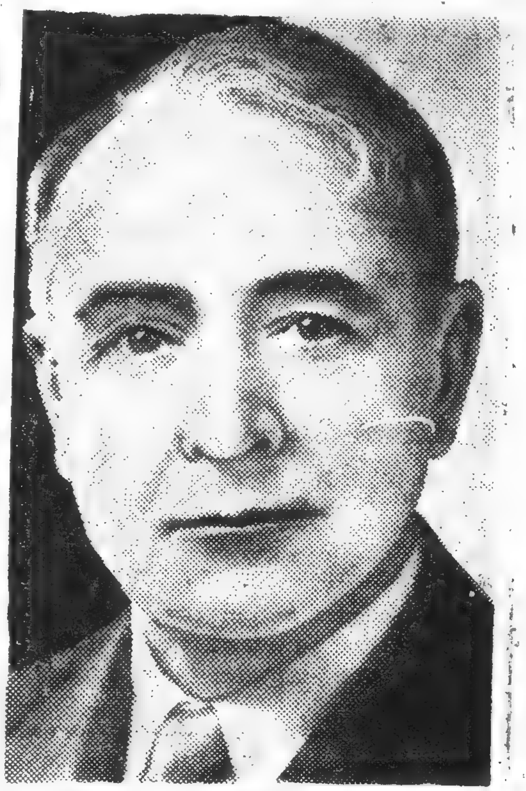
Boston Symphony Plays at Rutgers Tuesday Evening

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitsky will give its fourth annual concert in the Gymnasium of Rutgers University, New Brunswick, Tuesday evening, Feb. 8, at 8:30 o'clock. This magnificent organization is recognized as one of the world's greatest ensemble groups, playing as it has done for many years under one conductor, and maintaining the highest of musical ideals ever since its founding under Major Higginson in 1881.

Dr. Koussevitsky last year received the honorary degree of Doctor of Music at the conclusion of his annual concert at Rutgers. The Boston group then played an encore, the first departure from their normal procedure of never playing encores. The degree was given to the much-admired conductor in recognition of his eminence in the musical world and as a token of the high favor he has won by his annual appearance on the University's concert series.

The program Tuesday evening will include the Mozart "Prague" Symphony, the Second Symphony by Sibelius, and Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" suite.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 5 - 1938
BOSTON LEADER



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
Conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, February 11 and 12, at Carnegie Hall; also Thursday night, February 10, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, in programs dedicated to Maurice Ravel.

MUSIC EVENTS IN BROOKLYN

The week's presentations at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, include: Today, a young people's matinee performance of Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel," in English, and an evening performance of the Continental Ensemble, starring Victor Chenkin; Wednesday evening, February 9, ninth session of the "Layman's Music Course," under the supervision of Olga Samaroff Stokowski; Thursday evening, February 10, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting, in works of Ravel and Schumann; Friday evening, February 11, lecture-demonstration by John Martin, "The Renaissance, the Academic Ballet and the Reforms of Noverre"; Sunday evening, February 13, Verdi's "La Traviata," under the direction of Giuseppe Bamboschek, starring Pino Bontempi and Santa Biondo.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1938

CONCERT TO HONOR MEMORY OF RAVEL

Boston Orchestra to Pay Its Tribute Thursday at the Brooklyn Academy

MIZRACHI PROGRAM SET

Soloists to Join Performance Tonight—Ensemble Practice Course to Open Tomorrow

A special program in memory of the French composer, Maurice Ravel, will be offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. ~~Serge~~ Koussevitsky conducting, on Thursday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert, the third in this season's Brooklyn series, will include "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite; "Rhapsodie Espagnole"; "Ma Mère l'Oye" (Mother Goose); five children's pieces, and bolero. Schumann's Symphony 4 in D minor, Op. 120, will also be played.

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis will be hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee. The concert is under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn committee.

Box holders will include Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. James Maclay, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Henry R. Simmons and Miss Mary E. Mills.

Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

The fourth program will be presented on March 11 and the final concert on April 1.

(151)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Give Concert Thursday; Mrs. Francis to Be Hostess

AT THE third of the series of five concerts of the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening at the Academy of Music, Mrs. Lewis W. Francis will be hostess in the committee box. The concert will be devoted to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel, great French composer, who died Dec. 28 last.

The appearances in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is conductor, are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Dr. Koussevitsky will open the program with Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," music in which the French composer remembered his earlier countrymen in an approximation of the eighteenth century manner. The symphony of the evening will be the Fourth of Schumann in D minor, and the second half of the program will be devoted to the music of Ravel; the brilliant and colorful "Rapsodie Espagnole" will be played, likewise the "Mother Goose" Suite. The final number will be "Bolero."

Other boxholders of the third concert will be Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. James Maclay, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Henry R. Simmons and Miss Mary E. Mills.

Officers of the Brooklyn committee for the 1937-38 season in addition to Mr. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenport are Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Members of the Junior League committee include Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

The fourth concert will be presented Friday evening, March 11, and the final concert, Friday evening, April 1.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST
FEB 5 1938

Orchestra To Appear In 2 Boston Concerts, Ormandy Conducting

Plans Being Made for Elaborate Ballet Week With Monte Carlo Dancers

There will be no concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon, February 11, and Saturday evening, February 12, because of an engagement which will take the organization to Boston for two performances.

During an out-of-town booking by the Boston Symphony, the local musicians will give a Friday matinee and a Saturday evening concert to replace the events ordinarily given at those times by Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians.

The present engagement in Boston takes the Philadelphia Orchestra to that city for their first concert since 1936 when during the first transcontinental tour they gave a performance on April 14 with Leopold Stokowski conducting. Previous concerts in Boston were given by the orchestra during 1914 and 1904.

Jan Smeterlin, pianist, will be the soloist with the orchestra at the Boston concerts which Eugene Ormandy will conduct.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
FEB 6 - 1938

On the Records

By MICHAEL SHAW, JR.

"THE PASSION According to St. Matthew," Bach's last and greatest of five such oratorios, long has waited a discing consonant with its massive splendor.

An opportunity was granted and seized recently at a notable performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony, Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and seven noted soloists under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky.

The release of the first volume (Victor Set M-411; 20 sides) reveals the best recorded version to date, but technicians have left considerable to be desired in what is one of their most pretentious efforts.

The duet of Jeannette Vreeland, soprano, and Kathryn Meisle, contralto, followed by the great chorus, "Ye Lightnings, Ye Thunders," are among the most effective portions. Other high spots are the chorales "The Sorrows Thou Art Bearing;" "Acknowledge Me," beautifully sung but inexcusably interrupted and carried over on another side, and "Here Will I Stay Beside Thee."

The inclusion of instruments of Bach's day, such as the harpsichord and oboi d'amore, shows a care in presentation which makes the shortcomings of sound experts doubly unfortunate. Nor can blame be laid to the reproduction not having been done in a studio.

The labels list none of the soloists, but in addition to those mentioned above, there are John Triebe, tenor; Keith Falkner, baritone; Fritz Lechner, bass; Dr. Victor Ernst Wolff, harpsichord, and Carl Weinrich, organ.

The remaining two albums will be issued monthly and it is to be hoped, as the performance progressed, those at the controls lost their evident jitters in the face of the work's stupendous reputation and used some logic in capturing proper tonal texture.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 6 - 1938

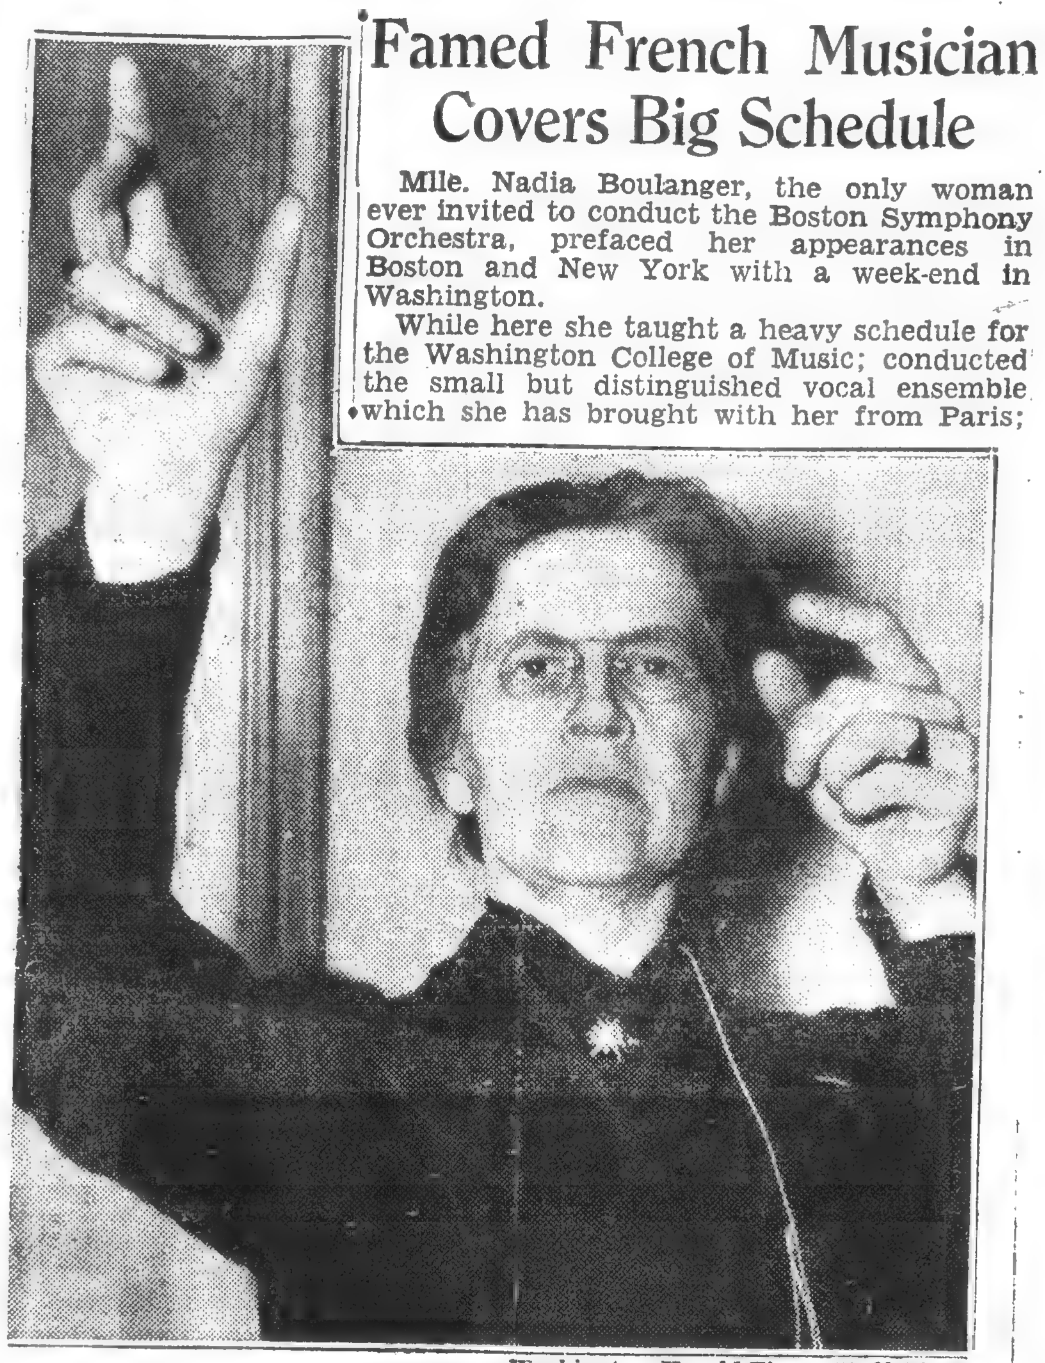
Boston Symphony In Ravel Memorial

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special program in memory of the late Maurice Ravel, Thursday evening, Feb. 10. The concert, third in this season's Brooklyn series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will feature the outstanding works in the various phases of Ravel's career. Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor will also be played. The concert is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1938

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger In Lecture Tour Here

Famed French Musician Covers Big Schedule



Washington Herald-Times Staff Photo

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER
Only Woman Ever Invited to Conduct Boston Symphony.

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, the only woman ever invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, prefaced her appearances in Boston and New York with a week-end in Washington.

While here she taught a heavy schedule for the Washington College of Music; conducted the small but distinguished vocal ensemble which she has brought with her from Paris; lectured on "Harmonic Structure of Certain Masterpieces," on "Early and Modern Music—A Comparative Study," on a highly original psychological approach to the problems of musical pedagogy.

She took time out from the lecture schedule to receive the degree Doctor of Music, conferred upon her last summer by the Washington College of Music and accepted then in her behalf by the French Ambassador.

Mlle. Boulanger already has had the Prix de Rome, most coveted honor within the gift of the Paris Conservatoire. She also has been made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. She is head of the department of composition at the Ecole Normale de Musique, Paris, and of the Montainebleau School of Music.

Because of these honors and achievements she commonly is referred to by her compatriots as the most gifted of women musicians.

PORTLAND, MAINE
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 6 - 1938

Bowdoin Glee Club To Give "Lightnin"

Modern Negro Spiritual Was Written By Brunswick Man In 1933

A modern Negro spiritual, "Lightnin'," with words by the Rev. Sheldon Christian of Brunswick, will be one of the leading numbers to be presented by the Bowdoin College Glee Club Feb. 17 in Memorial Hall, under the leadership of Prof. Frederic Tillotson, head of the department of music at Bowdoin.

The song had its inception in the Summer of 1933, while Mr. Christian was still in Massachusetts. Sitting in his study late at night, with the roar and flashes of a terrific thunderstorm outside of the windows, he exclaimed involuntarily "Lightnin', yo' keep out ob ma do'yard!" That was the germ of the text, and while the storm raged with increasing fury, he sat down at his typewriter and wrote out what is now the fourth stanza of the completed song:

"Lightnin', yo' keep out ob mah pasture!
Yo' keep out ob mah cabin,
Yo' keep out ob mah hencoop,
Yo' keep out of mah backyahd!"

Just here lightning actually struck nearby. All the electric lights in the vicinity went out, but Mr. Christian absorbed in the labor of composition, went on, typing by touch in the dark, until he had finished the first draft. Then he hunted up a candle, and by its feeble light worked on into the early morning hours revising and polishing his verses. The underlying theme, the suffering of a southern negro during a lightning storm, was developed with that blending of humor and sublimity which characterizes some of the better-known negro spirituals of African heritage.

Next day Mr. Christian took the song poem to Prof. Leo Rich Lewis of Tufts College, whose musical compositions have been played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The professor expressed his approval and promised to begin work at once on a glee club arrangement for it. This he did. The song had its first presentation by the noted Apollo Club chorus of Boston, and was later printed in the "Music of Tufts College" series.

Prof. Lewis told Mr. Christian that "Lightnin'" is the most difficult song to sing of which he knows. Its place on the program of the Bowdoin College Glee Club illustrates the ability of this organization to render difficult music.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 6 - 1938

I HOPE you are marking changes of date on your calendar, Jane. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, climax of the year's Civic Music concerts, will come to the Auditorium on Tuesday, April 12, instead of the 15th of April as originally announced. It is suggested that patrons change the date on tickets as well, as the concert is earlier than planned.

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL
FEB 6 - 1938

In the Realm of Music

'Rigoletto' Opens Series

Opera House... Elsa Moegle, New York harpist, will play at the seventh annual concert of Drew University Choir Thursday night on the campus. Henry Weston Smith is director. Boston Symphony Orchestra plays in the Unity Institute series Wednesday and at Rutgers Tuesday.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD
FEB 6 - 1938

Mlle. Boulanger Honor Guest At Henry Musicale

Jules Henry, charge d'affaires of France, gave a musicale last evening at the embassy, inviting about 100 guests for 10 o'clock to hear Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French pianist and conductor, who arrived in this country on Thursday.

Mlle. Boulanger will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 18 and 19, the first woman leader in the long history of the orchestra.

While in this country, Mlle. Boulanger will make a study of American methods of music teaching and has arranged to give special courses in music at the Washington College of Music and will lecture at Radcliffe and Smith Colleges.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 7 - 1938

Mrs. Francis to Be Box Hostess At Boston Symphony Concert; Program to Honor Ravel

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis will be the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee at the third of the series of five concerts comprising the fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, on Thursday evening, Feb. 10, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The concert will be devoted to the memory of the late Maurice Ravel, great French composer, who died on Dec. 28.

Other box holders will be: Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward, Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. James Maclay, Mrs. Robert E. Blum, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Henry R. Simmons and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The borough appearances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger heads a Junior League Committee for the series. The fourth concert will be presented Friday evening, Mar. 11, and the final concert on Friday evening, April 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 9

KOUSSEVITZKY IN BROOKLYN

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a special program dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel on Thursday evening, February 10, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. This concert, the third in the series sponsored by the Brooklyn Iustitute of Arts and Sciences, opens with Ravel's suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin."

Other Ravel compositions to be played are the "Rapsodie Espagnole," the Mother Goose suit of five children's pieces and the "Bolero," which has probably done more than any other work in making its composer generally known. Schumann's Symphony No. 4 in D minor will also be included in this program.

METUCHEN, N. J.
WEEKLY RECORDER

FEB [illegible] 1938

Boston Symphony Will Appear Tuesday Nite For Rutgers Concert

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the fourth presentation of the current Rutgers Concert Series.

The world famous symphonic group, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has become one of the chief attractions of the series. Dr. Koussevitzky was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Rutgers University at the conclusion of the concert last year and responded by departing from precedent to play an encore.

The program for next Tuesday's concert will include music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer who died last month, and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and New York have been dedicated for the past two weeks. Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" which has often been mentioned as Ravel's masterpiece.

Also on the program will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major, which was recently called by Lawrence Gilman, critic "one of the most exciting and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind;" and Mozart's Symphony in D Major, K 504, known as the "Prague Symphony."

The Boston Symphony, now recognized as one of the world's greatest musical organizations, is in its 57th season, having been founded in 1881 by Major Higginson.

The last concert in the Rutgers series for this season, on February 21, will feature a string trio composed of Harold Bauer, pianist, Albert Spalding violinist, and Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 9 - 1938

Fairchild Music to Be Heard at Concert

A committee of patrons of music will honor the memory of Blair Fairchild by presenting a program of his music in Town Hall on the afternoon of February 17. The program will be offered by Mme. Florence Easton, soprano; Mme. Marie Romaet-Rosanoff, cellist; Samuel Dushkin, violinist; Beveridge Webster, pianist, and the Schola Cantorum, directed by Hugh Ross.

Blair Fairchild was born in Belmont, Mass., on June 23, 1877, and died in Paris on April 23, 1933. His musical studies began as a child and he composed at an early age. His symphonic works were first introduced in America by Dr. Walter Damrosch, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Vladimir Golschmann.

The sponsoring committee includes Mrs. Blaine Beale, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Miss Helen Brice, Mrs. Winthrop Chanler, Dr. and Mrs. Walter Damrosch, Dr. and Mrs. Richard Derby, Miss Ruth Draper, Mme. Emma Eames, Mr. and Mrs. Leonard Elmhirst, Mrs. Reginald Fincke, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Harkness Flagler, Mrs. Walton Martin, Mrs. Walter E. Maynard, Mr. and Mrs. Francis Rogers, Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Schelling, the Misses Wetmore, Mrs. Stanford White, Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Grant White and Mrs. Egerton Winthrop.

CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

FEB 6 - 1938

Symphonic Fete

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., announces that the 1938 festival will take place at Tanglewood between Lenox and Stockbridge, Mass., on Aug. 4, 6, 7, 11, 13, and 14. A n'w music shed seating 5,000 is to be erected. Approximately $78,000 of the $100,000 needed for its construction has already been pledged. All six of the concerts will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. Inquiries concerning the festival may be directed to the Berkshire Symphonic festival, Stockbridge, Mass.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 7 - 1938

Dinner Party Will Precede Concert

Dr. and Mrs. Robert C. Clothier of College avenue will entertain a number of friends at dinner tomorrow night prior to the concert to be given in the gymnasium by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The list of guests includes Judge and Mrs. Richard Hartshorn of East Orange, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Coursen of New Rochelle, N. Y., Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Pfeiffer of Riverdale, N. Y., and Dr. and Mrs. Ralph G. Wright of Bishop place.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1938

SYMPHONY AT MONTCLAIR

Capacity Audience Greets Boston Orchestra's Return

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., Feb. 9.—Returning to Montclair after an absence of seven years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, gave a concert tonight before more than 1,200 persons, a capacity audience, in the Montclair High School auditorium.

The concert was arranged by the Unity Concert Course. The orchestra opened the program with Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88. Next came Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye." The program closed with Sibelius's Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43.

New venth ersity
mpus.
tor ays in esday

"American," Wed., Feb. 9/38

BOST

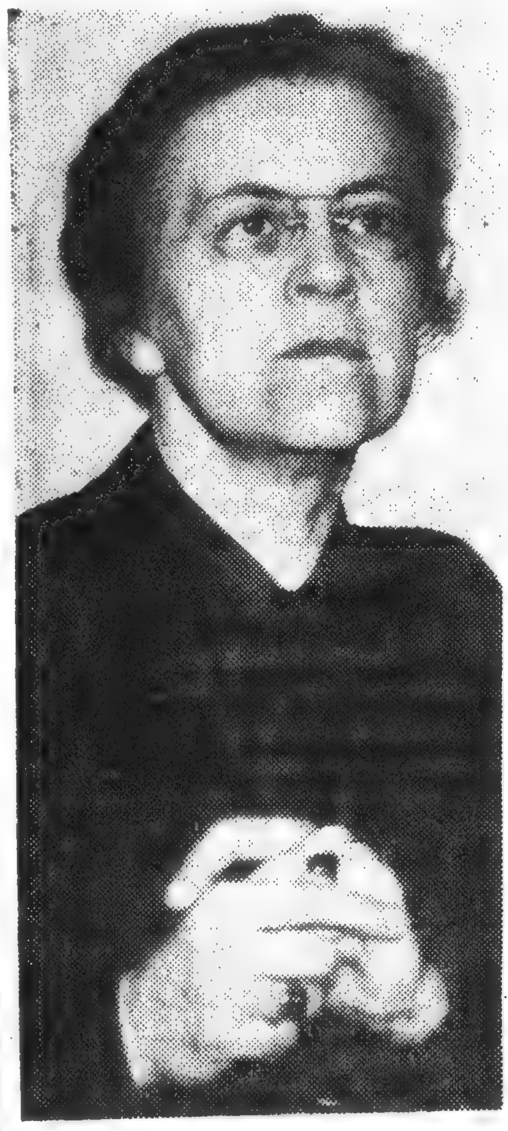
Aim in Life Told By Mlle. Boulanger

By RUTH MARSTERS

That in Nadia Boulanger there exists a personality unique in the annals of music past or present, is an incontrovertible fact.

Never before has any woman exercised such an enormous influence on the art of her epoch—and surely never before has anyone been found so reticent on the subject of her own achievements.

In the first interview of her long career as teacher, lecturer, conductor, and concert organist, Mlle. Boulanger talked with the press at Radcliffe College for a few moments prior to giving her first lecture to students of Radcliffe and Harvard on "Early and Modern Music."



Has Renowned Pupils
NADIA BOULANGER

KEEN SENSE OF HUMOR

But her sense of humor, which is keen and of a delightful variety, was a successful weapon in parrying all direct questions.

Typical was her response to the query, "What does it feel like to be the only woman conductor of an orchestra?"

(There have, to be sure, been other women conductors, but never one before to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Symphony Society, or for that matter the Boston Symphony. And Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a performance of Faure's Requiem at the concerts of February 18 and 19.)

What Mlle. Boulanger said, anyway, was:

"Well, I was born a woman, and it has long ceased to astonish me. In fact, when I am conducting an orchestra," here her voice rose on a crescendo, and then dropped to a whisper for the denoument, "I scarcely think about it."

What Mlle. Boulanger wants to do is "to teach people to understand more about music." In her current lecture course she will emphasize the correlation of the music of the 12th and 13th centuries and that of the present.

"The tendency today is back toward the early realization of music as essentially sound," she said.

The twelve tone scale was dismissed with "Well, after all, music should be simple." And the shrug which accompanied the remark was, as is often the case when Mlle. employes gesture, more effective than the words themselves.

Strauss is reported to have said on an occasion to Hindemith, "Why do you write atonally? You do not have to, you have talent." Which is much the same thing.

But though Mlle. Boulanger stresses simplicity, her pupils are notable for the esoteric methods they employ to attain it.

PUPILS GAIN RENOWN

The pupils who have known her influence form a stellar galaxy in which practically every European nationality is represented and from which most of our foremost American composers spring.

Among the latter category, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, and Walter Piston may be listed. Aside from Mr. Piston, head of the department of music at Harvard University, Mlle.'s pupils number on the faculty, three. Other talents of her fostering are engaged on the music faculty of Dartmouth, Smith, Vassar, Wellesley, Oberlin, Ohio State, Western Reserve and Columbia.

Among twentieth century composers whom Mlle. Boulanger did not teach was George Gershwin.

GERSHWIN INCIDENT TOLD

Mistaken reports to the contrary have been rife and Mlle. Boulanger's report of the incident which occasioned them is:

"Mr. Gershwin came to me with the idea in mind of studying, it is true. But after talking with him for ten minutes I persuaded him that he could learn from me nothing that would be of value to him. He had his own individual style. There would have been no benefit in attempting to change or modify it."

Mlle. Boulanger would not express any opinions as to the significance of any particular contemporary achievements in music. She emerged from her reticence concerning composers in general only on the occasion when Faure was mentioned.

"Those of us who knew him worshipped him . . ." And as she spoke of her "master" she became suddenly vibrant in the very real desire to transmit her enthusiasm to her listeners.

Hers is an infectious idealism, a compelling force which has made her the greatest teacher of her day.

It is small wonder that her working hours are eighteen out of every twenty-four.

Small wonder, too, that she has stimulated so many talents to development in real achievement.

OSSINING, N. Y.
CITIZEN - REGISTER

FEB 1 - 1938

Novel Recital Set at School

Painter and Pianist to Appear Tomorrow

"A Recital in Black and White," featured by a three-act ballet by the French composer, Debussy, will be presented by Robert Alden Reaser, portrait and landscape painter, and his wife, Bernice Dalziel, pianist, tomorrow at the 11:10 o'clock assembly program at Ossining Junior-Senior High School.

Each character will be drawn and explained by Mr. Reaser as the musical score is played. The synchronization of these two arts, originated by the Reasers, has been successfully presented before audiences so far removed culturally and geographically as the Town Hall Club, New York, an English girls' boarding school, an island in Bermuda and in upper Harlem.

Both performers, well-established artists in their own fields, find both fun and a practical means of travel in their joint recitals. Mr. Reaser, who has had several one-man showings in New York, concentrates on portraiture, while Mrs. Reaser, in addition to teaching piano has appeared in joint concerts in New York and on tour with such artists as Lisa Parnova, Russian dancer; Jean Lafranc, first viola of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; ~~and Sydney~~ Thompson, diseuse.

The two artists have recently moved to this vicinity, having established a Westchester studio in a cottage on the E. J. Leikert property, "Meadowbrook," north of Briarcliff on the Bronx River Parkway. Earlier this season they appeared at the Briarcliff and Tarrytown High Schools. They will appear Mar. 2 in Pleasantville. This week they will play in White Plains, Rye, at the Albany Institute of Arts and Sciences, and at the Greenwich Academy for Girls.

152

Mlle. Boulanger Ready to Conduct Symphony

Post Feb 9

TO LEAD BOSTON SYMPHONY
Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, shown after her arrival here yesterday.

The fact that Mlle. Nadia Boulanger will be the first woman to conduct the famed Boston Symphony Orchestra doesn't disturb her in the least—and, as a matter of fact, she doesn't consider herself as a woman at all, but as a person who happens to have a job to do.

Starting at Radcliffe College yesterday as a visiting lecturer in music, Mlle. Boulanger paused long enough in her brisk approach to her job to set her low-heeled, sensible black shoes down firmly and state that she, least of all, intended to give any ranking to composers. "What," demanded Mlle. Boulanger with a tremendous shrug, "is my right to say who is first and who is second? I have my prejudices, are you not?" Which will convey a vague idea of Mlle. Boulanger.

Anyone who remembers the slight, five-foot-four music teacher who used to come to the house late in the afternoon to give the hated piano lesson will recognize Mlle. Boulanger instantly. She wears the same black herring-bone broadcloth suit, the same pair of eyeglasses, and she even wags her finger like a metronome so that you can almost hear her counting one-two, one-two. Mlle. Boulanger is just like everybody's piano teacher, except that she doesn't rap you on the knuckles for breaking down in the middle of an enthusiastic but clumsy performance of the Burning of Rome.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra a week from Friday, and she will be a change from the dynamic, towering, powerfully-built conductors usually found on the podium. She is very slender, 50 and so frail that it would appear one of her vast shrugs would shake her shoulders off. But she has large, blue-veined hands that are probably the most expressive hands in the world.

She speaks English, but punctured by exclamations and shrugs, "How do you say it!" "My English," she inserted swiftly, "is what it can." But, even if she couldn't speak English she could get her meaning across with her hands.

Asked if she felt any apprehension about being the first woman to conduct Boston Symphony she said, "When I am making my job I do not consider that I am a woman. I was born so and it does not astonish me."

She is the head of the department of music at Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau. While she is in this country she will also teach at Wellesley College and the Longy School of Music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1938

MUSIC NOTES

Today's major events: Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.; "La Bohème," Metropolitan Opera House, evening; Pauline Pierce, mezzo-soprano, Town Hall, afternoon; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Brooklyn Academy of Music, in memory of the late Maurice Ravel, evening.

The National Opera Club of America will hold its February meeting today at 2:15 P. M. at the Waldorf-Astoria. The topic will be "The National Month for American Composers and Musicians."

"Five Tone Pictures," orchestral suite by Carl Mathes, blind composer of South Bend, Ind., will be played Tuesday evening at the Federal Music Theatre by the New York Civic Orchestra.

Jovita Fuentes, Filipino soprano, will be heard in recital tonight at the Master Theatre.

Sarat Lahiri will conduct a series of lecture-recitals on Indian music Thursdays and Tuesdays at 3 P. M. at 329 West Fifty-eighth Street, beginning today.

Emma Redell, soprano, formerly with the Chicago Civic Company, will be heard in the role of Elsa in "Lohengrin," in the production of the Civic Grand Opera of Philadelphia.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 10 1938

NEW JERSEY

Mrs. Earl Leroy Wood of Newark opened her home yesterday for a meeting of the Music Study Club of Newark and the Oranges.

Mrs. T. H. Bopp was hostess to a group from the Woman's Club of Bloomfield yesterday and Mrs. Ethel Sinteff entertained another group.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk of Montclair gave a dinner last night before the Boston Symphony Concert at Montclair High School.

Miss Mary Gene Larson of Glen Ridge and her fiance, C. Ellison Harkrader, whose wedding will take place on Feb. 19, were honored last night at a dinner given by Miss Lucille Niemeyer of New York.

Mrs. Frank L. Van Wie of Montclair gave a luncheon yesterday.

Mrs. John Ellison of South Orange will be hostess today to a luncheon-bridge club.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Carroll Barnes of Maplewood have gone to Clearwater, Fla.

The Rev. and Mrs. Walter Lowrie of Princeton have left for a visit to Miss Frances Whitehouse in Winter Park, Fla.

Mrs. William V. Lee of Trenton was hostess at a luncheon and bridge yesterday.

Mrs. James Ingham of Buffalo, regional director of the Association of Junior Leagues of America, was guest of the Junior League of Englewood yesterday.

Mrs. Lloyd A. Case of Trenton will give a bridge-tea this afternoon.

Feb. 9/38

Mlle. Boulanger, Composer, Here to Guide Students

Noted French Woman Will Help College Aspirants, Also Direct Symphony

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

Boston will be the residence until June of a famous composer, conductor and teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger. Straight from Paris Mlle. Boulanger arrived in Boston yesterday to conduct two performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18 and 19, to guide musical aspirants of Radcliffe and Harvard, Wellesley and the Longy School to express themselves as composers and to inform the public in a series of radio broadcasts of what's what in music.

Mlle. Boulanger is the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Many a time has she wielded the baton over orchestras in France, where her interest in composers and choral work has been the inspiration of many a student. Last year she became the first woman to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London.

When asked how it felt to be the first woman given such an honor Mlle. Boulanger replied.

"I forget that I am a woman. I am interested only in my job."

Until Mlle. Boulanger's arrival Harvard men were excluded from classes at Radcliffe. Radcliffe girls, heretofore, have been permitted to take courses at Harvard. Now the tables are turned and it took a French woman to do it.

Mlle. Boulanger, accompanied by Pres. Ada L. Comstock of Radcliffe and Prof. Walter Piston of the Music Departments of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges, was interviewed while she was seated behind a grand piano in her office at Fay House. She launched into the subject of modern music.

"People have a tendency to love what they are used to," she said. "They also have a great respect for sound. Music today may not have the sound that we are accustomed to, the sound of the music of Mozart, Wagner or Beethoven. It has far more similarity to the sound of the music in the 12th and 13th centuries.

"The great need in composing today," she continued, "is discipline. No," she replied in answer to a question, "I am not the teacher of all the contemporary American composers. I just do what I can, nothing more. I've taught 34 years. Enjoy teaching?" She shrugged her shoulders as only a Parisienne can. "Of course! If I did not, then my work, it is war!"

Asked her opinion of the jazz motifs used by such eminent composers as Artur Honneger and the late George Gershwin, Mlle. Boulanger quickly replied that it is always interesting to employ anything in music, if it is used in the right way.

Mlle Boulanger enunciated her quick phrases with the trace of an accent. She was dressed all in black, double-breasted suit, with a blouse tailored in masculine fashion, and a four-in-hand tie. On her feet were lisle stockings, with clocks, and low-heeled oxfords. The severity of this ensemble was relieved in the true French manner, with a jeweled sunburst, a silver watch chain and the scarlet Legion of Honor ribbon on the lapel of her jacket.

A strong face has Mlle. Boulanger with a prominent chin, nose and forehead. Her brown eyes shine with enthusiasm. Her facial expression is mobile, now earnest, now amused. Her large mouth has a kindly, generous expression. On meeting her one is drawn to a sympathetic nature.

This is Mlle. Boulanger's third visit to the United States. In 1925 she was here on concert tour. Last year she came over on an appointment from the French Government to study the teaching of music in American schools and colleges with a view to coordinating music teaching in both countries in order to aid American composers when they go to France for study.

Mlle. Boulanger studied at the Paris Conservatory, where her father and grandfather were professors of music. She is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale, in Paris, and professor of harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, where she has interested Igor Stravinsky in her promising pupils.

Among her students are some of the most prominent American composers, including Aaron Copeland, Ross Lee Finney, Prof. Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Prof. Douglas Moore of Columbia, and Virgil Thomson.

Speaking of one of the works in which she is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "Requiem" by Gabriel Faure, under whom she studied, Mlle. Boulanger said,

"Faure's work is of the first quality. People do not know him much because he never has been truly approached. We have been deceived by his simplicity. He is a pioneer in advanced development. Just let your heart go to him."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

JAN 30 1938

Duo Pianists to Make Bow Here Feb. 10

THE Russian duo pianists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, will give the next program in the Civic Concert association series Feb. 10 at the Auditorium.

Luboshutz was one of a family of three children who played together as a trio first privately at home and later on concert tours in their native Russia. Their grandfather was a well known opera singer, and their father an amateur violinist who operated a piano factory in Odessa.

At the age of 4, Pierre began to study violin with his father. But his sisters soon put an end to this. The older of them, Lea Luboshutz (now a concert artist), played the violin and the younger, Ana, the cello. The daughters decided there were enough stringed instrument players in the family without Pierre. They needed a pianist to accompany them. So they united their efforts to induce the father to switch their younger brother from violin to piano.

In 1912 Luboshutz made an auspicious debut in Moscow as guest soloist with the Koussevitzky orchestra—Koussevitzky himself conducting.

Luboshutz's attractive partner in his joint recitals, Genia Nemenoff, is Mrs. Luboshutz. Her mother was an accomplished pianist and her father was an opera singer. Her brother studied the cello and at 10 she was giving ensemble performances with him.

Eight years ago Pierre Luboshutz was conducting a master class in Paris, and Genia Nemenoff enrolled as his pupil. Two years later they were married.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 5 - 1938

MUSICAL MEANDERS

WHITMAN

ON Thursday the French liner Champlain carried a number of well-known musicians into New York harbor. Arriving in the United States for concert appearances was the most important of this group, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French pianist, teached and conductor. Mlle. Boulanger will go immediately to Boston where she will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. She is proud to be the first woman given such an honor. Besides her Boston appearance, Mlle. Boulanger will give concerts in Washington, and New York. She will also lecture to advanced music students in several schools and colleges in the East.

BOSTONIANS HONOR RAVEL'S MEMORY

N. Y. Sun

Sanroma Plays Concerto With Koussevitzky

Feb. 12/38

The first of two programs designed to honor the memory of Maurice Ravel was given in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto for piano and orchestra, which Ravel completed in 1931, just too late for it to figure with the specially commissioned compositions performed during the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary season.

Two other works by Ravel were heard in company with the concerto last night. These were "Ma Mere l'Oye," which in its piano-duet form dates from 1908, and the second of the suites extracted from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" of two years later. The concert was not an all-Ravel one, however, the Boston conductor choosing to open it with Mozart's so-called "Prague" symphony—that in D major, which is No. 504 of the Kochel catalogue. Its three movements were fastidiously played, with the famous strings of the orchestra justifying their reputation.

This is sometimes called "the symphony without a minuet," though there are others in the long list of Mozart symphonies to which the designation may be given quite as properly. This work might better be identified by reference to the noble introduction to the first movement, an extended adagio which presents much of kinship to certain pages of "Don Giovanni," composed shortly after the symphony and similarly brought out in Prague.

The concerto, like its companion for left hand alone, was among the last of Ravel's major orchestral works. No great headway has been made by it in this country since its introduction some six years ago, when Mr. Sanroma was the soloist in Boston and Sylvain Levin in Philadelphia and New York. As experienced again last night, it is a work of superficial brilliance, symptomatic of a time when jazz had invaded the ateliers of the Old World. It belongs to the era when the percussion section held new hopes for many composers. The in- chestral ery e is per- ting ssly co-ordinated. ond-ed whole heartedly and Mr. Sanroma had to bow repeatedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is something of specialist in surprisingly diverse types of symphonic music, but in none more than the music of Ravel. His performances of the coruscating "Daphnis and Chloe" suite have set a standard. On this occasion both this work and "Ma Mere l'Oye" were about as beautifully achieved as it is possible to conceive for them. The orchestra, like the conductor, was very much in the vein.

O. T.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Advocate Feb 11 '38

Menuhin and the Schumann Concerto

"Yesterday's Prodigy — Today's Genius":—this is what the placards shriek concerning the very well publicized violinist, Yehudi Menuhin. Yesterday's prodigy — well, quite likely; today's genius—it all depends what one means by that term, "genius." Today's Genius, last summer proclaimed to a suitably awed world that on first playing the more or less newly-discovered Schumann Violin Concerto he wept,—tears of emotion streamed down his face. After hearing Today's Genius perform this same Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, one entirely agrees with the violence of Menuhin's reaction: it is to weep.

Now before we go any further, a word regarding the manner in which this article is written might prove illuminating to the reader. This writer's views concerning both Menuhin and the Schumann Concerto are of such a decided character that we decided on this occasion not to trust our own judgment. We therefore called for an expression of opinion from a talented composer, two excellent violinists and a professor of music at an eastern college, famed for his musical knowledge and critical abilities. The amazing fact is that the views of all of these persons and of the writer coincide almost point by point. These opinions were given to us verbally, on the understanding that no names be used. The initials at the end of this article may or may not represent the first, middle or last names of these consultants. They will serve, however, as a thank-you.

To proceed: there is no great mystery, as far as we can see, why Schumann's wife and Joachim did not wish this work to be published. The concerto is distinctly inferior to the great majority of Schumann's writing. The first movement gets nowhere at all; it is pointless and rambling. An inane use of timpani coming at most inopportune times serves but to punctuate the rambling incoherence of the movement. The neutral second movement becomes acceptable only in contrast with what has gone before while the last movement is not far behind the first in general hopelessness. It is all too evident that Schumann's unfortunate malady had already begun to sap his powers at the time he composed this work. We can sympathize with the attitude of Schumann's wife and his friends in wishing to have the Concerto kept from the world. However, Schumann's place in music cannot seriously be impaired by the publication of a few inferior works, and even a great composer's decline has a melancholy interest for students, musicologists, cataloguers and psychiatrists.

But we violently protest against the cheap use made of this tragic phase in a great composer's life to excite popular interest for the purpose of enhancing anyone's box-office appeal. The so-called spirit messages concerning the work, the struggle over precedence in presenting it, the mysteryizing of what is no mystery, all this merely serves to disgust the true musician. A moment's thought must convince any reasonable person that had the work sufficient merit, Schumann's wife, certainly no enemy of her husband, would have seen to it that the Concerto was published.

As for Menuhin's capabilities, shown on this occasion via the Mendelssohn Concerto as well as the Schumann, but one conclusion seems to be possible. Divorce Menuhin from the glamor surrounding his name, disregard his early successes as a prodigy and then really listen to his playing. You will find, of course, a good violinist, but by no manner of means a violinistic genius. Examine his attributes, point by point: his technique is adequate but nothing particularly remarkable: his intonation is good but not perfect: his tone, while quite pleasant, can hardly be called rich or full or vibrant: his bowing, perhaps his best technical talking-point, is really good. As for his interpretation, it might be characterized as "very nice," but his interpretive powers are not particularly deep, nor is his emotion terrifically overwhelming, nor, it might be said, are his performances so remarkable for true originality.

If the objection is made that Menuhin is young and that he will develop as he matures, then stop ramming the word genius down our throats. Genius needs no extenuation or excuses. We are perfectly willing to accord to Menuhin his rightful place in the violinistic world as a fine performer, but if comparisons must be made, we can think off-hand of ten violinists, greater than Menuhin is at present or probably ever will be, who would think twice before allowing the use of the word "genius" in connection with their talents.

Dr. Koussevitsky led his orchestra in most sympathetic accompaniment to the Concerti. Malipiero's Symphony No. 2 (Elegiaca) and the Overture to The Flying Dutchman by Wagner, respectively opened and closed the program. On first hearing, the Malipiero, new to Boston, made a distinctively favorable impression. It is almost axiomatic to add that the orchestra did a good job.

—K.B.-H. G.

---

10 HARVARD MEN RADCLIFFE 'CO-EDS'

B. Trav. Feb 9/38

Ten Harvard men trooped over to Radcliffe today to sit with five Radcliffe girls in the first Radcliffe class to which Harvard boys were invited as "co-eds." Their study will be counterpoint, fugues and original composition and the lecturer will be Mme. Nadia Boulanger, composer and teacher of many noted composers.

Mlle. Boulanger, welcomed to Harvard and Radcliffe by Prof. Walter Piston, head of Harvard's music factulty and her own pupil and by Dr. Ada Comstock, president of Radcliffe, will be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will lead the orchestra in performances Feb. 18 and 19.

Music and The Drama

BERKSHIRE GROUP ASKS MORE FUNDS

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced last week that it has opened a campaign to complete the $100,000 needed to assure the construction of the principal portions of the music shed on the Tanglewood estate, near Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next summer. The dates are Thursday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13 and 14.

Thus far, 750 persons have subscribed to the building fund, which now is more than $78,000, and letters signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival board of trustees, are being sent to many music lovers who have not contributed, while previous contributors have been asked to interest their friends in this cause.

The building is to be in the shape of a fan, with seats for 5,000. Concrete foundations are already being poured for the 308-ton steel framework to be constructed by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The distance between the sides of the fan, within the colonnade, will be 325 feet, and that from the conductor's podium to the rearmost seat, 180 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston.

Final tests for acoustic conditions are to be made July 1 under the direction of Professor Richard Fay, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Inquiries about next summer's festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass. In her letter to prospective contributors, Miss Robinson Smith points out that the sum in hand will obviously not complete the music shed, although it will provide such essentials as protection from storms, accommodations for the conductor and orchestra and cloak and dressing rooms for the publi

Feb. 9/38

Mlle. Boulanger, Composer, Here to Guide Students

Noted French Woman Will Help College Aspirants, Also Direct Symphony

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

Boston will be the residence until June of a famous composer, conductor and teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger. Straight from Paris Mlle. Boulanger arrived in Boston yesterday to conduct two performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18 and 19, to guide musical aspirants of Radcliffe and Harvard, Wellesley and the Longy School to express themselves as composers and to inform the public in a series of radio broadcasts of what's what in music.

Mlle. Boulanger is the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Many a time has she wielded the baton over orchestras in France, where her interest in composers and choral work has been the inspiration of many a student. Last year she became the first woman to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London.

When asked how it felt to be the first woman given such an honor Mlle. Boulanger replied.

"I forget that I am a woman. I am interested only in my job."

Until Mlle. Boulanger's arrival Harvard men were excluded from classes at Radcliffe. Radcliffe girls, heretofore, have been permitted to take courses at Harvard. Now the tables are turned and it took a French woman to do it.

Mlle. Boulanger, accompanied by Pres. Ada L. Comstock of Radcliffe and Prof. Walter Piston of the Music Departments of Harvard and Radcliffe Colleges, was interviewed while she was seated behind a grand piano in her office at Fay House. She launched into the subject of modern music.

"People have a tendency to love what they are used to," she said. "They also have a great respect for sound. Music today may not have the sound that we are accustomed to, the sound of the music of Mozart, Wagner or Beethoven. It has far more similarity to the sound of the music in the 12th and 13th centuries.

"The great need in composing today," she continued, "is discipline. No," she replied in answer to a question, "I am not the teacher of all the contemporary American composers. I just do what I can, nothing more. I've taught 34 years. Enjoy teaching?" She shrugged her shoulders as only a Parisienne can. "Of course! If I did not, then my work, it is war!"

Asked her opinion of the jazz motifs used by such eminent composers as Artur Honneger and the late George Gershwin, Mlle. Boulanger quickly replied that it is always interesting to employ anything in music, if it is used in the right way.

Mlle Boulanger enunciated her quick phrases with the trace of an accent. She was dressed all in black, double-breasted suit, with a blouse tailored in masculine fashion, and a four-in-hand tie. On her feet were lisle stockings, with clocks, and low-heeled oxfords. The severity of this ensemble was relieved in the true French manner, with a jeweled sunburst, a silver watch chain and the scarlet Legion of Honor ribbon on the lapel of her jacket.

A strong face has Mlle. Boulanger with a prominent chin, nose and forehead. Her brown eyes shine with enthusiasm. Her facial expression is mobile, now earnest, now amused. Her large mouth has a kindly, generous expression. On meeting her one is drawn to a sympathetic nature.

This is Mlle. Boulanger's third visit to the United States. In 1925 she was here on concert tour. Last year she came over on an appointment from the French Government to study the teaching of music in American schools and colleges with a view to coordinating music teaching in both countries in order to aid American composers when they go to France for study.

Mlle. Boulanger studied at the Paris Conservatory, where her father and grandfather were professors of music. She is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale, in Paris, and professor of harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, where she has interested Igor Stravinsky in her promising pupils.

Among her students are some of the most prominent American composers, including Aaron Copeland, Ross Lee Finney, Prof. Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Prof. Douglas Moore of Columbia, and Virgil Thomson.

Speaking of one of the works in which she is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "Requiem" by Gabriel Faure, under whom she studied, Mlle. Boulanger said,

"Faure's work is of the first quality. People do not know him much because he never has been truly approached. We have been deceived by his simplicity. He is a pioneer in advanced development. Just let your heart go to him."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
JAN 30 1938

Duo Pianists to Make Bow Here Feb. 10

THE Russian duo pianists, Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Nemenoff, will give the next program in the Civic Concert association series Feb. 10 at the Auditorium.

Luboshutz was one of a family of three children who played together as a trio first privately at home and later on concert tours in their native Russia. Their grandfather was a well known opera singer, and their father an amateur violinist who operated a piano factory in Odessa.

At the age of 4, Pierre began to study violin with his father. But his sisters soon put an end to this. The older of them, Lea Luboshutz (now a concert artist), played the violin and the younger, Ana, the cello. The daughters decided there were enough stringed instrument players in the family without Pierre. They needed a pianist to accompany them. So they united their efforts to induce the father to switch their younger brother from violin to piano.

In 1912 Luboshutz made an auspicious debut in Moscow as guest soloist with the Koussevitzky orchestra —Koussevitzky himself conducting.

Luboshutz's attractive partner in his joint recitals, Genia Nemenoff, is Mrs. Luboshutz. Her mother was an accomplished pianist and her father was an opera singer. Her brother studied the cello and at 10 she was giving ensemble performances with him.

Eight years ago Pierre Luboshutz was conducting a master class in Paris, and Genia Nemenoff enrolled as his pupil. Two years later they were married.

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
GAZETTE
FEB 5 - 1938

...know. Christmas time, when went down to Charleston for a visi they were wishing for snow, for any thing except the rains that threat ened to change a comfortable Wes
Virginian city into a Venice of Ital

To my way of thinking, when of well-known musicians into New York harbor. Arriving in the United States for concert appearances was the most important of this group, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French pianist, teached and conductor. Mlle. Boulanger will go immediately to Boston where she will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. She is proud to be the first woman given such an honor. Besides her Boston appearance, Mlle. Boulanger will give concerts in Washington, and New York. She will also lecture to advanced music students in several schools and colleges in the East.

BOSTONIANS HONOR RAVEL'S MEMORY

N.Y. Sun

Sanroma Plays Concerto With Koussevitzky

Feb. 12/38

The first of two programs designed to honor the memory of Maurice Ravel was given in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto for piano and orchestra, which Ravel completed in 1931, just too late for it to figure with the specially commissioned compositions performed during the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary season.

Two other works by Ravel were heard in company with the concerto last night. These were "Ma Mere l'Oye," which in its piano-duet form dates from 1908, and the second of the suites extracted from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" of two years later. The concert was not an all-Ravel one, however, the Boston conductor choosing to open it with Mozart's so-called "Prague" symphony—that in D major, which is No. 504 of the Kocehel catalogue. Its three movements were fastidiously played, with the famous strings of the orchestra justifying their reputation.

This is sometimes called "the symphony without a minuet," though there are others in the long list of Mozart symphonies to which the designation may be given quite as properly. This work might better be identified by reference to the noble introduction to the first movement, an extended adagio which presents much of kinship to certain pages of "Don Giovanni," composed shortly after the symphony and similarly brought out in Prague.

The concerto, like its companion for left hand alone, was among the last of Ravel's major orchestral works. No great headway has been made by it in this country since its introduction some six years ago, when Mr. Sanroma was the soloist in Boston and Sylvain Levin in Philadelphia and New York. As experienced again last night, it is a work of superficial brilliance, symptomatic of a time when jazz had invaded the ateliers of the Old World. It belongs to the era when the percussion section held new hopes for many composers. The ingenuity of a virtuoso in orchestral writing is discoverable on every page. But the musical substance is pretty thin. Mr. Sanroma's performance was one of captivating dash, with the orchestra flawlessly co-ordinated. The audience responded whole heartedly and Mr. Sanroma had to bow repeatedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is something of specialist in surprisingly diverse types of symphonic music, but in none more than the music of Ravel. His performances of the coruscating "Daphnis and Chloe" suite have set a standard. On this occasion both this work and "Ma Mere l'Oye" were about as beautifully achieved as it is possible to conceive for them. The orchestra, like the conductor, was very much in the vein.

O. T.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Advocate Feb 11 '38

Menuhin and the Schumann Concerto

"Yesterday's Prodigy — Today's Genius":—this is what the placards shriek concerning the very well publicized violinist, Yehudi Menuhin. Yesterday's prodigy — well, quite likely; today's genius—it all depends what one means by that term, "genius." Today's Genius, last summer proclaimed to a suitably awed world that on first playing the more or less newly-discovered Schumann Violin Concerto he wept,—tears of emotion streamed down his face. After hearing Today's Genius perform this same Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, one entirely agrees with the violence of Menuhin's reaction: it is to weep.

Now before we go any further, a word regarding the manner in which this article is written might prove illuminating to the reader. This writer's views concerning both Menuhin and the Schumann Concerto are of such a decided character that we decided on this occasion not to trust our own judgment. We therefore called for an expression of opinion from a talented composer, two excellent violinists and a professor of music at an eastern college, famed for his musical knowledge and critical abilities. The amazing fact is that the views of all of these persons and of the writer coincide almost point by point. These opinions were given to us verbally, on the understanding that no names be used. The initials at the end of this article may or may not represent the first, middle or last names of these consultants. They will serve, however, as a thank-you.

To proceed: there is no great mystery, as far as we can see, why Schumann's wife and Joachim did not wish this work to be published. The concerto is distinctly inferior to the great majority of Schumann's writing. The first movement gets nowhere at all; it is pointless and rambling. An inane use of timpani coming at most inopportune times serves but to punctuate the rambling incoherence of the movement. The neutral second movement becomes acceptable only in contrast with what has gone before while the last movement is not far behind the first in general hopelessness. It is all too evident that Schumann's unfortunate malady had already begun to sap his powers at the time he composed this work. We can sympathize with the attitude of Schumann's wife and his friends in wishing to have the Concerto kept from the world. However, Schumann's place in music cannot seriously be impaired by the publication of a few inferior works, and even a great composer's decline has a melancholy interest for students, musicologists, cataloguers and psychiatrists.

But we violently protest against the cheap use made of this tragic phase in a great composer's life to excite popular interest for the purpose of enhancing anyone's box-office appeal. The so-called spirit messages concerning the work, the struggle over precedence in presenting it, the mysteryizing of what is no mystery, all this merely serves to disgust the true musician. A moment's thought must convince any reasonable person that had the work sufficient merit, Schumann's wife, certainly no enemy of her husband, would have seen to it that the Concerto was published.

As for Menuhin's capabilities, shown on this occasion via the Mendelssohn Concerto as well as the Schumann, but one conclusion seems to be possible. Divorce Menuhin from the glamor surrounding his name, disregard his early successes as a prodigy and then really listen to his playing. You will find, of course, a good violinist, but by no manner of means a violinistic genius. Examine his attributes, point by point: his technique is adequate but nothing particularly remarkable: his intonation is good but not perfect: his tone, while quite pleasant, can hardly be called rich or full or vibrant: his bowing, perhaps his best technical talking-point, is really good. As for his interpretation, it might be characterized as "very nice," but his interpretive powers are not particularly deep, nor is his emotion terrifically overwhelming, nor, it might be said, are his performances so remarkable for true originality.

If the objection is made that Menuhin is young and that he will develop as he matures, then stop ramming the word genius down our throats. Genius needs no extenuation or excuses. We are perfectly willing to accord to Menuhin his rightful place in the violinistic world as a fine performer, but if comparisons must be made, we can think off-hand of ten violinists, greater than Menuhin is at present or probably ever will be, who would think twice before allowing the use of the word "genius" in connection with their talents.

Dr. Koussevitsky led his orchestra in most sympathetic accompaniment to the Concerti. Malipiero's Symphony No. 2 (Elegiaca) and the Overture to The Flying Dutchman by Wagner, respectively opened and closed the program. On first hearing, the Malipiero, new to Boston, made a distinctively favorable impression. It is almost axiomatic to add that the orchestra did a good job.

—K.B.-H. G.

---

10 HARVARD MEN RADCLIFFE 'CO-EDS'

B. Trav. Feb 9/38

Ten Harvard men trooped over to Radcliffe today to sit with five Radcliffe girls in the first Radcliffe class to which Harvard boys were invited as "co-eds." Their study will be counterpoint, fugues and original composition, and the instructor will be Mme. Nadia Boulanger, composer and teacher of many noted composers.

Mlle. Boulanger, welcomed to Harvard and Radcliffe by Prof. Walter Fiston, head of Harvard's music factulty and her own pupil and by Dr. Ada Comstock, president of Radcliffe, will be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She will lead the orchestra in performances Feb. 18 and 19.

Music and The Drama

BERKSHIRE GROUP ASKS MORE FUNDS

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival announced last week that it has opened a campaign to complete the $100,000 needed to assure the construction of the principal portions of the music shed on the Tanglewood estate, near Lenox, Mass., in time for the six concerts to be given there by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky next summer. The dates are Thursday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, August 4, 6, 7, 11, 13 and 14.

Thus far, 750 persons have subscribed to the building fund, which now is more than $78,000, and letters signed by Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith, president of the festival board of trustees, are being sent to many music lovers who have not contributed, while previous contributors have been asked to interest their friends in this cause.

The building is to be in the shape of a fan, with seats for 5,000. Concrete foundations are already being poured for the 308-ton steel framework to be constructed by the Bethlehem Steel Company. The distance between the sides of the fan, within the colonnade, will be 325 feet, and that from the conductor's podium to the rearmost seat, 180 feet. The proportions of the stage will be similar to those of Symphony Hall in Boston.

Final tests for acoustic conditions are to be made July 1 under the direction of Professor Richard Fay, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

Inquiries about next summer's festival and the building fund may be addressed to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Stockbridge, Mass. In her letter to prospective contributors, Miss Robinson Smith points out that the sum in hand will obviously not complete the music shed, although it will provide such essentials as protection from storms, accommodations for the conductor and orchestra and cloak and dressing rooms for the publ

154

-- Prospects in Concert

Portrait of an Artist at Work

B. Trans. Feb. 12/38

Nadia Boulanger Reflected By Her Conducting and Teaching

"It is a privilege to teach," said Nadia Boulanger, eminent teacher who has had many eminent pupils. "I have been teaching for thirty-four years. And if I did not love it, it would be a bore, is it not?"

Mlle. Boulanger was about to begin a course at Radcliffe College earlier in the week—her principal reason for being here now. In a group interview with the press she must have surprised some of the reporters by the directness and unhesitancy of her answers. She was unwilling, for example, to sit in judgment on contemporary music and musicians or to make sweeping generalizations on the various modern schools. "Each does what he can and must," she said. "The use of any form in music is always interesting."

When she was asked about the Requiem of Faure, which she has conducted in London during the past two seasons and which she is to present at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week, she grew fairly eloquent in praise of her late compatriot. Faure's work, she maintained, has not been properly appreciated, and its apparent simplicity is the result of misunderstanding. The successful performances of the Requiem in London were among the most gratifying experiences in her life.

Adjourning abruptly to the class-room Mlle. Boulanger faced a group of Harvard as well as Radcliffe students who quite filled all the available space in the Radcliffe music-room. They listened with attentive admiration for an hour and a half to a handsome woman with a fine head, dressed completely in black, save for the red ribbon of the Legion d'honneur in her button-hole; a woman who won the immediate attention and respect of her pupils by her understanding and sense of humor, her broad culture and tremendous vitality.

Her first lecture was concerned first of all with the proper approach to the study of music—the necessity of a sincere, sound, unprejudiced attitude towards the music itself. Her first request from the class was that each member indicate what he wanted from the study of music. Above all she stressed the need for having, in her own words, "the methods of music absolutely free;" a complete mastery of the technique of the science, however difficult the task might be. Talent is a commonplace. Real ability to work, love of the subject and a genuine interest, combined with self-confident judgment based on thorough knowledge, is what makes genius.

No less remarkable had been Mlle. Boulanger's first rehearsal of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which she will conduct in a program of choral music in Sanders Theater on March 3. Mlle. Boulanger dispelled popular notion about a woman conductor. With her vigorous beat and eloquently expressed directions and explanations of the nature of the music and the effects to be sought, she won the confidence of the chorus at once. Her frequent allusions to literature, famous persons and vignettes of composers like Stravinsky, whose works will find place on the program, were a revelation of what is surely one of the most arresting personalities of our time. J. E.

Prokofieff Hails Life of Artist in Soviet; With 4 Incomes, He Is Here for Concerts

N.Y. Feb. 7/38

Composers, like other mortals, have stomachs, and the Soviet government amply recognizes that fact, Serge Prokofieff said yesterday afternoon in an interview. The eminent Russian composer arrived on Thursday for a three-week concert tour of this country as pianist and conductor.

The conservative business attire, the sharp eyes behind the tortoise shell glasses, the cool and pleasantly untemperamental manner of address bespoke the industrial executive rather than the creator of music. There was nothing even faintly suggestive of the ivory tower. Mr. Prokofieff seemed, in fact, an embodiment of a new social attitude toward the arts and the artist. He comes to this country as an unofficial representative of that attitude.

An important part of that attitude is the belief that to composers must be assured a decent livelihood and the leisure to create. They do not want to be objects of charity, but desire to be remunerated for services rendered to society.

According to Mr. Prokofieff, there are four sources of income available to composers in Russia.

"First," he said, "they have 'author's rights' to the performances of their works. Since the government is encouraging the growth of orchestras and a native repertory, a single good composition can bring in a tidy sum through the many performances throughout the Soviet.

"Contributory to that income is the governmental publication of music known as the Musical State Edition. The money made in the sale of this music is directed wholly to the composer, with the exception of the printing expenses. At present a large press is being constructed for the publication of the lengthening list of native compositions.

"The third source of income is the commission from the theatre, the opera or the moving pictures, for which the composer receives a flat sum plus royalties.

"One of the most important aids to the composer," said Mr. Prokofieff, "is the Union of Composers. To this organization the composer can apply for financial aid during the time he will be engaged on a projected work. That aid will be modest but adequate. If the completed work has merit, it will be published and performed under governmental auspices, and what fees will accrue go to the composer. The union has been most successful.

"Thus, with these recognized sources of income, the composer takes his proper place in a society to which he contributes his services."

MUSIC

N.Y. Her. Tribune Feb. 12/38

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Honors the Memory of Maurice Ravel

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Mozart............Symphony in D Major (Koechel No. 504)

Intermission

Ravel..."Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose") Five children's pieces.
- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant
- II. Petit Poucet
- III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes
- IV. Les Entretiens de la Belle et de la Bete
- V. Le Jardin Feerique.

Ravel.."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet; Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the greater part of its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall to music performed in memory of Maurice Ravel. There was a prefatory symphony (the "Prague") by Mozart; the remaining numbers were by Ravel.

This was an admirable act of aesthetic piety on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. The two musicians—conductor and composer—had stood in a closely reciprocal relationship for years. Ravel had written music especially for performance by Koussevitzky, and Koussevitzky had long been one of the most loyal and eloquent of Ravel's exponents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership has become, indeed, almost Ravel's official mouthpiece in America. It was fitting that this tribute should have been paid to the memory of a gifted creative spirit by one of the great orchestras of the world.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky elected to begin his memorial exercises with the piano concerto, one of the last works of major dimensions composed by Ravel. It was Ravel's intention, he said, to write "a brilliant work, aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the virtuosity of the pianist." It is a pity that he has not been taken at his word. He accomplished precisely what he set out to do. Despite the cheerfully blasphemous assertion of that admirable French savant, Monsieur Henry Prunières, that the slow movement of this concerto is "analogous with certain arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite," the concerto remains no more than an extremely brilliant, amusing, and immensely effective jeu d'esprit, wholly engaging and wholly inconsequential.

It is surefire with any audience, when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreasonable to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which the final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved.

* * *

The clou of the concert was not, for some of us, the gorgeous and dazzling music of "Daphnis et Chloé," which ended the program, but that perfect example of Ravel in one of his most characteristic incarnations, Ravel the miniaturist, the Lilliputian of genius. This was the performance—a consummate one—of "Ma Mère l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from fairy tales of Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two fortunate children, Mimie and Jean Godebski.

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducting the Boston Orchestra's Ravel concert

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis et Chloé," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

For the finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew beyond his title. We can only listen with innocent ears and remember a line from Poe: "Ah. bear in mind this garden is enchanted!" The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its scrupulous reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained. And it is all most dexterously held to scale. This is an infinitesimal world, and all its marvels are in proportion to its miniature fragility. Even in the radiant climax of "The Fairy Garden," the jubilation is remote and delicate, muted with the pathos of frailness and distance.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is always at his best when he gives us Ravel. All the memorializing music was beautifully played last night; and the resplendent music from "Daphnis et Chloé" provided the inevitable ending for a just and moving act of piety and affection.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RAVEL MEMORIAL

Festival of Music of French Composer Marks Program at Carnegie Hall

N.Y. Times Feb. 12/38

MISS AVERINO IS HEARD

Sings the Three Songs of Cycle 'Scheherazade' With Effect —Koussevitzky Directs

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall what amounted almost to a festival of the music of the late Maurice Ravel. The exception to a complete program of his works was the glowing and romantic interpretation of Schumann's D minor Symphony, one that haunts the ear and memory hours after the music has ceased to sound. But Ravel was the center of this concert, as of the one given by the same orchestra the preceding evening.

It seems that only the Boston orchestra and its leader, in this city, have thought fit so to remember one of the most distinguished musicians of his era, which is a little strange—its stranger for the remarkable variety and the unique style of each separate score thus unfolded.

For Ravel never repeated himself. Sometimes Debussy did. Almost every great composer has. One searches the memory for a score of Ravel, large or small, which merely echoes the pattern and the musical contexts of one of his other scores. Each work that he turned out was fashioned fastidiously and with the utmost care, with the cunning of a wizard, and by degree of taste and style which in themselves, and aside from all other characteristics of beauty, would bestow upon these compositions a special character and rank.

French Classic Spirit

The program of yesterday began with that evocation of the French classic spirit, and remarkable modern transformation of old idioms, the suite known as "Le Tom beau de Couperin." This is in no sense imitative Couperin.

There is no thought of a recent composer, at loss for some new idea, tampering with and endeavoring to imitate in a deceptive manner old music. No! This suite is a modern composer looking back with deep knowledge and racial instinct and the traditions of centuries of art upon him to Rameau's time; expetiating upon that time and that aristocratic old music in a very personal and fascinating way of his own.

As we are enabled to gain a clearer perspective of Ravel's art, this suite, so delicate and unpretentious, emerges as one of his most original creations.

Miss Olga Averino, a singer of the most exceptional intelligence and sensitivity, sang the three songs of the cycle, "Sheherazade," that Ravel wrote to the exotic-tinted poems of Tristan Klingsor. It is many colored, lapidary verse, a mosaic of subtle tints and images, evocaive of imaginings and moods of far-off lands.

Two things make "Schéhérazade" somewhat caviar in the big concert room. One is what after all stands as an introspective rather than directly emotional response to the imaginary scenes. The other is the arrangement of the three songs. For concert purposes the first one, "Asie," with the great outbursts of glowing orchestral tone and the declamatory and rhapsodic manner of the singer, would come best at the end.

Ravel is far more distinguished. "L'Indifferent" is the most intimate and paradoxically expressive of them all, and it is the one that has the fewest big brush-strokes or effects calculated to seize the uninitiated listener. On the other hand, Ravel never wore his coat on his sleeve; even in his music he refuses to forget that as an artist he is an aristocrat. And some would say, that underneath his very cultivated elegance there is, as a matter of fact, exceedingly intense and sensuous feeling. At any rate, this is one of the compositions in which Ravel asks the most sympathy of his most sympathetic listeners.

A Dramatic Effect

Had it been another conductor and another singer the music might have escaped the audience. But as it was Mme. Averin sang with such understanding, eloquence, and dramatic effect, and colored her tones so skillfully, and observed so admirably the faintest nuance of the text, that as a recital of poetry this would have been consummate.

In the meantitme, the picture painted by the orchestra was as gorgeous as the peacocks and the perfumes of the magical east of the fables. The orchestra alone provided a tone-poem, a mosaic, a tapestry, and the modern colorist of the baton matched his art with that of the composer. We are not sure that ever again will we hear the "Sheherazade" cycyle performed as beautifully and leoquently as yesterday.

Finally, as if to balance this piece for the sophisticates, the orchestra played the most popular piece that Ravel wrote—need we say, the "Bolero"? It piled up to an overwhelming climax, and it did not sound old, hackeneyed, or self-conscious. A slight technical slip of a wind instrument was the accident that happens now and again in the best of orchestras. The performance as a whole was a crash and a scintillation.

On all counts, from his most fanciful to his most realistic, from his most esoteric to his most obvious, Ravel had triumphed, as had the superb leader and the magnificent players who carried out his wishes. Ravel was not only remembered, but revealed, by these performances.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

FEB 3 - 1938

Good Radio Music

By JAMES THRASHER

Dr. Howard Hanson, the noted American composer, directs the Eastman School of Music's symphony orchestra as well as the school itself. And tonight he is to conduct a 45-minute concert which will be sent from station WHAM, Rochester, to the NBC-Blue network at 7:45 o'clock.

The program is to include Locatelli's Concerto Grosso for two string orchestras; a Symphony by Christian Cannabich, and a composition by Gabrielli which I rather hesitate to set down here as NBC sent it. According to network publicity it is "Piano Forte for Two Brass Choirs."

Now it is quite possible that the "piano" and "forte" in the title have the original Italian meaning, and that one brass choir is going to play softly, and the other with considerable gusto. But the combination of piano and forte, as applied to our modern keyboard instrument, makes one wonder.

cont. left

Gabrielli was a 17th Century Italian opera composer and cellist. His only instrumental compositions listed by Grove's are a collection of dance tunes for two violins, cello and "basso continuo."

Cannabich, who was born at Mannheim in 1731, was more noted as a violinist than as a composer. But his chief claim to fame rests upon his conducting—which just goes to prove that nothing's new under the sun, not even expressive orchestra playing.

Mozart, in letters to his father, spoke frequently of the perfect ensemble of Cannabich's Mannheim orchestra, and called him the best conductor he had ever met. A writer named Schubart wrote of one of these orchestra performances in the following effusive phrases:

"Here the forte is a thunder, the crescendo a cataract, the diminuendo a crystal streamlet babbling away into the far distance, the piano a breeze of spring."

Of course Herr Schubart never saw a Toscanini nor heard a Boston Symphony. But he was an accepted writer and doubtless knew something about his subject. Perhaps, despite the imperfect brasses and woodwinds, vibrato-less strings, lack of rehearsals and so on, there may have been moments of orchestral beauty before the days of von Buelow and Richter.

-- Prospects in Concert

Portrait of an Artist at Work

B. Trans. Feb. 12/38

Nadia Boulanger Reflected By Her Conducting and Teaching

"It is a privilege to teach," said Nadia Boulanger, eminent teacher who has had many eminent pupils. "I have been teaching for thirty-four years. And if I did not love it, it would be a bore, is it not?"

Mlle. Boulanger was about to begin a course at Radcliffe College earlier in the week—her principal reason for being here now. In a group interview with the press she must have surprised some of the reporters by the directness and unhesitancy of her answers. She was unwilling, for example, to sit in judgment on contemporary music and musicians or to make sweeping generalizations on the various modern schools. "Each does what he can and must," she said. "The use of any form in music is always interesting."

When she was asked about the Requiem of Faure, which she has conducted in London during the past two seasons and which she is to present at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week, she grew fairly eloquent in praise of her late compatriot. Faure's work, she maintained, has not been properly appreciated, and its apparent simplicity is the result of misunderstanding. The successful performances of the Requiem in London were among the most gratifying experiences in her life.

Adjourning abruptly to the class-room Mlle. Boulanger faced a group of Harvard as well as Radcliffe students who quite filled all the available space in the Radcliffe music-room. They listened with attentive admiration for an hour and a half to a handsome woman with a fine head, dressed completely in black, save for the red ribbon of the Legion d'honneur in her button-hole; a woman who won the immediate attention and respect of her pupils by her understanding and sense of humor, her broad culture and tremendous vitality.

Her first lecture was concerned first of all with the proper approach to the study of music—the necessity of a sincere, sound, unprejudiced attitude towards the music itself. Her first request from the class was that each member indicate what he wanted from the study of music. Above all she stressed the need for having, in her own words, "the methods of music absolutely free;" a complete mastery of the technique of the science, however difficult the task might be. Talent is a commonplace. Real ability to work, love of the subject and a genuine interest, combined with self-confident judgment based on thorough knowledge, is what makes genius.

No less remarkable had been Mlle. Boulanger's first rehearsal of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, which she will conduct in a program of choral music in Sanders Theater on March 3. Mlle. Boulanger dispelled popular notion about a woman conductor. With her vigorous beat and eloquently expressed directions and explanations of the nature of the music and the effects to be sought, she won the confidence of the chorus at once. Her frequent allusions to literature, famous persons and vignettes of composers like Stravinsky, whose works will find place on the program, were a revelation of what is surely one of the most arresting personalities of our time. J. E.

Prokofieff Hails Life of Artist in Soviet; With 4 Incomes, He Is Here for Concerts

N. Y. 9 Feb. 7/38

Composers, like other mortals, have stomachs, and the Soviet government amply recognizes that fact, Serge Prokofieff said yesterday afternoon in an interview. The eminent Russian composer arrived on Thursday for a three-week concert tour of this country as pianist and conductor.

The conservative business attire, the sharp eyes behind the tortoise shell glasses, the cool and pleasantly untemperamental manner of address bespoke the industrial executive rather than the creator of music. There was nothing even faintly suggestive of the ivory tower. Mr. Prokofieff seemed, in fact, an embodiment of a new social attitude toward the arts and the artist. He comes to this country as an unofficial representative of that attitude.

An important part of that attitude is the belief that to composers must be assured a decent livelihood and the leisure to create. They do not want to be objects of charity, but desire to be remunerated for services rendered to society.

According to Mr. Prokofieff, there are four sources of income available to composers in Russia.

"First," he said, "they have 'author's rights' to the performances of their works. Since the government is encouraging the growth of orchestras and a native repertory, a single good composition can bring in a tidy sum through the many performances throughout the Soviet.

"Contributory to that income is the governmental publication of music known as the Musical State Edition. The money made in the sale of this music is directed wholly to the composer, with the exception of the printing expenses. At present a large press is being constructed for the publication of the lengthening list of native compositions.

"The third source of income is the commission from the theatre, the opera or the moving pictures, for which the composer receives a flat sum plus royalties.

"One of the most important aids to the composer," said Mr. Prokofieff, "is the Union of Composers. To this organization the composer can apply for financial aid during the time he will be engaged on a projected work. That aid will be modest but adequate. If the completed work has merit, it will be published and performed under governmental auspices, and what fees will accrue go to the composer. The union has been most successful.

"Thus, with these recognized sources of income, the composer takes his proper place in a society to which he contributes his services."

MUSIC

N.Y. Her. Tribune Feb. 12/38

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Honors the Memory of Maurice Ravel

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Mozart............Symphony in D Major (Koechel No. 504)

Intermission

Ravel..."Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose") Five children's pieces.
- I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant
- II. Petit Poucet
- III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes
- IV. Les Entretiens de da Belle et de la Bete
- V. Le Jardin Feerique.

Ravel.."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet; Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.

Serge Koussevitzky

Conducting the Boston Orchestra's Ravel concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the greater part of its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall to music performed in memory of Maurice Ravel. There was a prefatory symphony (the "Prague") by Mozart; the remaining numbers were by Ravel.

This was an admirable act of aesthetic piety on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. The two musicians—conductor and composer—had stood in a closely reciprocal relationship for years. Ravel had written music especially for performance by Koussevitzky, and Koussevitzky had long been one of the most loyal and eloquent of Ravel's exponents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership has become, indeed, almost Ravel's official mouthpiece in America. It was fitting that this tribute should have been paid to the memory of a gifted creative spirit by one of the great orchestras of the world.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky elected to begin his memorial exercises with the piano concerto, one of the last works of major dimensions composed by Ravel. It was Ravel's intention, he said, to write "a brilliant work, aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the virtuosity of the pianist." It is a pity that he has not been taken at his word. He accomplished precisely what he set out to do. Despite the cheerfully blasphemous assertion of that admirable French savant, Monsieur Henry Prunières, that the slow movement of this concerto is "analogous with certain arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite," the concerto remains no more than an extremely brilliant, amusing, and immensely effective jeu d'esprit, wholly engaging and wholly inconsequential.

It is surefire with any audience, when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreasonable to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which the final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved.

* * *

The clou of the concert was not, for some of us, the gorgeous and dazzling music of "Daphnis et Chloé," which ended the program, but that perfect example of Ravel in one of his most characteristic incarnations, Ravel the miniaturist, the Lilliputian of genius. This was the performance—a consummate one—of "Ma Mèr l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from fairy tales of Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two fortunate children, Mimie and Jean Godebski.

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis et Chloé," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

For the finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew beyond his title. We can only listen with innocent ears and remember a line from Poe: "Ah, bear in mind this garden is enchanted!" The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its scrupulous reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained. And it is all most dexterously held to scale. This is an infinitesimal world, and all its marvels are in proportion to its miniature fragility. Even in the radiant climax of "The Fairy Garden," the jubilation is remote and delicate, muted with the pathos of frailness and distance.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is always at his best when he gives us Ravel. All the memorializing music was beautifully played last night; and the resplendent music from "Daphnis et Chloé" provided the inevitable ending for a just and moving act of piety and affection.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
FEB 3 - 1938

Good Radio Music

By JAMES THRASHER

Dr. Howard Hanson, the noted American composer, directs the Eastman School of Music's symphony orchestra as well as the school itself. And tonight he is to conduct a 45-minute concert which will be sent from station WHAM, Rochester, to the NBC-Blue network at 7:45 o'clock.

The program is to include Locatelli's Concerto Grosso for two string orchestras; a Symphony by Christian Cannabich, and a composition by Gabrielli which I rather hesitate to set down here as NBC sent it. According to network publicity it is "Piano Forte for Two Brass Choirs."

Now it is quite possible that the "piano" and "forte" in the title have the original Italian meaning, and that one brass choir is going to play softly, and the other with considerable gusto. But the combination of piano and forte, as applied to our modern keyboard instrument, makes one wonder.

Gabrielli was a 17th Century Italian opera composer and cellist. His only instrumental compositions listed by Grove's are a collection of dance tunes for two violins, cello and "basso continuo."

Cannabich, who was born at Mannheim in 1731, was more noted as a violinist than as a composer. But his chief claim to fame rests upon his conducting—which just goes to prove that nothing's new under the sun, not even expressive orchestra playing.

Mozart, in letters to his father, spoke frequently of the perfect ensemble of Cannabich's Mannheim orchestra, and called him the best conductor he had ever met. A writer named Schubart wrote of one of these orchestra performances in the following effusive phrases:

"Here the forte is a thunder, the crescendo a cataract, the diminuendo a crystal streamlet babbling away into the far distance, the piano a breeze of spring."

Of course Herr Schubart never saw a Toscanini nor heard a Boston Symphony. But he was an accepted writer and doubtless knew something about his subject. Perhaps, despite the imperfect brasses and woodwinds, vibrato-less strings, lack of rehearsals and so on, there may have been moments of orchestral beauty before the days of von Buelow and Richter.

cont. left.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RAVEL MEMORIAL

Festival of Music of French Composer Marks Program at Carnegie Hall

N.Y. Times Feb. 12/38

MISS AVERINO IS HEARD

Sings the Three Songs of Cycle 'Scheherazade' With Effect —Koussevitzky Directs

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall what amounted almost to a festival of the music of the late Maurice Ravel. The exception to a complete program of his works was the glowing and romantic interpretation of Schumann's D minor Symphony, one that haunts the ear and memory hours after the music has ceased to sound. But Ravel was the center of this concert, as of the one given by the same orchestra the preceding evening.

It seems that only the Boston orchestra and its leader, in this city, have thought fit so to remember one of the most distinguished musicians of his era, which is a little strange—its stranger for the remarkable variety and the unique style of each separate score thus unfolded.

For Ravel never repeated himself. Sometimes Debussy did. Almost every great composer has. One searches the memory for a score of Ravel, large or small, which merely echoes the pattern and the musical contexts of one of his other scores. Each work that he turned out was fashioned fastidiously and with the utmost care, with the cunning of a wizard, and by degree of taste and style which in themselves, and aside from all other characteristics of beauty, would bestow upon these compositions a special character and rank.

French Classic Spirit

The program of yesterday began with that evocation of the French classic spirit, and remarkable modern transformation of old idioms, the suite known as "Le Tom beau de Couperin." This is in no sense imitative Couperin.

There is no thought of a recent composer, at loss for some new idea, tampering with and endeavoring to imitate in a deceptive manner old music. No! This suite is a modern composer looking back with deep knowledge and racial instinct and the traditions of centuries of art upon him to Rameau's time; expetiating upon that time and that aristocratic old music in a very personal and fascinating way of his own.

As we are enabled to gain a clearer perspective of Ravel's art, this suite, so delicate and unpretentious, emerges as one of his most original creations.

Miss Olga Averino, a singer of the most exceptional intelligence and sensitivity, sang the three songs of the cycle, " Sheherazade," that Ravel wrote to the exotic-tinted poems of Tristan Klingsor. It is many colored, lapidary verse, a mosaic of subtle tints and images, evocaive of imaginings and moods of far-off lands.

Two things make "Schéhérazade" somewhat caviar in the big concert room. One is what after all stands as an introspective rather than directly emotional response to the imaginary scenes. The other is the arrangement of the three songs. For concert purposes the first one, "Asie," with the great outbursts of glowing orchestral tone and the declamatory and rhapsodic manner of the singer, would come best at the end.

Ravel is far more distinguished. "L'Indifferent" is the most intimate and paradoxically expressive of them all, and it is the one that has the fewest big brush-strokes or effects calculated to seize the uninitiated listener. On the other hand, Ravel never wore his coat on his sleeve; even in his music he refuses to forget that as an artist he is an aristocrat. And some would say, that underneath his very cultivated elegance there is, as a matter of fact, exceedingly intense and sensuous feeling. At any rate, this is one of the compositions in which Ravel asks the most sympathy of his most sympathetic listeners.

A Dramatic Effect

Had it been another conductor and another singer the music might have escaped the audience. But as it was Mme. Averin sang with such understanding, eloquence, and dramatic effect, and colored her tones so skillfully, and observed so admirably the faintest nuance of the text, that as a recital of poetry this would have been consummate.

In the meantime, the picture painted by the orchestra was as gorgeous as the peacocks and the perfumes of the magical east of the fables. The orchestra alone provided a tone-poem, a mosaic, a tapestry, and the modern colorist of the baton matched his art with that of the composer. We are not sure that ever again will we hear the "Sheherazade" cycyle performed as beautifully and leoquently as yesterday.

Finally, as if to balance this piece for the sophisticates, the orchestra played the most popular piece that Ravel wrote—need we say, the "Bolero"? It piled up to an overwhelming climax, and it did not sound old, hackeneyed, or self-conscious. A slight technical slip of a wind instrument was the accident that happens now and again in the best of orchestras. The performance as a whole was a crash and a scintillation.

On all counts, from his most fanciful to his most realistic, from his most esoteric to his most obvious, Ravel had triumphed, as had the superb leader and the magnificent players who carried out his wishes. Ravel was not only remembered, but revealed, by these performances.

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

N.Y. Times Feb. 12/38

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Ravel Program—'Meistersinger' at Metropolitan

By NOEL STRAUS

In honor of the memory of Maurice Ravel the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in Carnegie Hall last night was largely devoted to selections by that composer. Mr. Koussevitzky has long been recognized as one of the leading interpreters of Ravel's music. At this concert he and his men were heard again in their unsurpassed renditions of the French master's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloé" and "Ma Mere l'Oye." These were preceded by Ravel's less familiar piano concerto, with the accomplished Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Mozart's symphony in D major (K. No. 504).

As John N. Burke remarked in the program notes, Ravel, when requested to compose music for the Boston orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, mentioned a piano concerto. But the work was not ready until a year later, when in 1932 it was first performed in Paris and later the same season in Boston and Philadelphia. It was Mr. Sanroma who was the soloist at its Boston première.

Influence of Jazz Seen

Although the concerto does not go far beneath the surface in its content, it enthralled last night by the glittering magnificence of its scoring, its almost uncanny play of ravishing tonal tints. The influence of jazz is marked in its corner movements. In fact, many a passage in the opening division seems to indicate a strong predilection on Ravel's part for the late George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." But the work has the stamp of Ravel's genius on every page and could have issued from no less skilled a hand.

The concerto was accorded a resplendent presentation, one which impressed as saying the ultimate word regarding the composition's possibilities in all respects. Mr. Sanroma played the piano part with the utmost bravura and keen understanding, while the orchestra in its support reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity. There were moments, such as the ethereally delicate harp cadenza, when the technical attainments of the instrumentalists seemed to be almost unbelievably adroit.

Cantabile Sections Praised

The cantabile sections of the first and second movements were splendidly contrasted with the more highly elaborated measures and the whole brought to a climax with an exhiliratingly vivid and brilliant reading of the final presto. The other movements of the work have their fine points, but it is the andante with its subtle development of the concerto's most poetic theme that proved the crown of the opus.

By a peculiar coincidence the "Prague" symphony of Mozart, one of his greatest, but strangely neglected creations in the genre, arrived at its third performance in two days in the Carnegie auditorium. The masterpiece enjoyed an unfoldment, which, if at times too objective to quite catch the spirit of this intensely subjective music, contained many instances of pronounced beauty, as for example the introductory adagio and the moody announcement of the melody in thirds at the start of the chief theme of the first movement, so knowingly contrasted with the soaring motive of the melody Mozart made use of later in the overture to "The Magic Flute."

55

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 6 - 1938

SATURDAY

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, who arrived in this country during the past week to become the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time. Internationally known as an organist, teacher of composition and lecturer, Mlle. Boulanger will be on the air each Saturday from 10:30 to 11 A. M. A Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, she is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau.

For the first program Mlle. Boulanger will present a capella songs by Poulenc and excerpts from Le Roi Malgre Lue by Chabrier and "Philemon et Baucis," by Gounod. With Mlle. Boulanger directing from the piano, the numbers will be sung by her own group of singers whom she brought to this country. The group includes Comtesse Jean de Polignac, Gisele Peyron and Irene Kedroff, sopranos; Nathalie Kedroff, contralto; Hugues Guenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, bass: WEAF, 10:30-11 A. M.

Young People's Concert, by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, with Rudolph Ganz, conducting: WABC, 11 A. M.-12:30 P. M.

Overture, "Abu Hassan"............Weber
Hungarian Fantasy..................Liszt
Nutcracker Suite.............Tchaikovsky
America, the Beautiful....Bates and Ward
The Worried Drummer............Schreiner
A Victory Ball...................Schelling

Metropolitan Opera — Verdi's "Otello"; WJZ, 1:55-5:15 P. M.

The cast:

Otello ....Giovanni Martinelli, tenor
Iago...........Lawrence Tibbett, baritone
Cassio..............Nicholas Massue, tenor
Roderigo.........Giordano Paltrinieri, tenor
Lodovico............Nicola Moscona, basso
Montano.......George Cehanovsky, baritone
A Herald........Wilfred Engelman, baritone
Desdemona.....Elisabeth Rethberg, soprano
Emilia..............Thelma Votipka, soprano
Conductor......................Ettore Panizza

Finns Give All Vocal Program

New Bedford [illegible]

Helsinki University Chorus At Symphony Hall Sing National Music a Capella

[illegible]

Completely sold to Finland, one returns from the unaccompanied vocal concert of the Helsinki University Chorus given in Symphony hall Sunday afternoon before a capacity audience made up almost entirely of fellow-countrymen and neighboring Scandinavians. Their sponsorship is exceptional — the great in education, music and finance in the home country including Jean Sibelius, whom Serge Koussevitzky has interpreted so nobly for America and Europe; on this side of the Atlantic, all the famous symphony conductors of this country with many prominent Finns here and in Canada and the foremost American music critics. Finland's honorable discharge of war debts alone would secure them favorable reception. They come as the first contribution of Finland to the Delaware Tercentenary next June.

They have had the added publicity of the lost orchestral score and the scientific association with the trans-Atlantic radio photographing of missing string parts to insure performance of the Sibelius "Origin of Fire," one of the two choral-symphonic numbers in which they made their American debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 31. This note for future reference was made at the time:

"The Helsinki University Chorus thrilled the Friday afternoon audience at Symphony Hall with brilliant, heroic utterance of two epics of Finland. The usual program contained a leaflet giving the entire texts in the original and in English translation. The lights were left nearly full for following during the Sibelius choral numbrs by the fine body of 50 selected male singers and Finnish was discovered to be an easily flowing language in their beautiful enunciation.

"An instrumental interlude for the coming of the true knight to free 'The Captive Queen' and the sound picturing of the Maiden of the Air rocking the new-struck flame in 'The Origin of Fire' were portions of highly picturesque imagry."

Such virility, resonance, and beauty of tone must have many of the subtleties in reserve, it was realized and in the concert Sunday they were revealed. A study of the program book in advance found gratefully large type; a broad, conveniently handled format; notes on the all-national composers and their likenesses; the original Finnish and a free translation; a history of the chorus; the story of early Finnish contributions to America before the "melting pot" began to overflow; and a sketch of the new Finland that is one of the most advanced countries in Europe. Maps and choice selections of scenery complete a booklet designed to create the mood in which this article was begun.

It is the language that fairly nestles into the imagination. Side by side with the English it is possible to follow and appreciate its compact, suggestive character; its highly singable qualities often alliteratively presented. It flows, it yields to the tongue, it seems to be of infinite variation. Thorborg, Marian Anderson have sung to us in Finnish to our pleasure; now these vigorous men with their arms-swinging, athletic stride come as the perfect apostles of their speech. Through the ample aids they bring, we may enjoy the beauties of their national music.

They sang many quiet things of lingering loveliness: Haapalainen's "Pan"; Kuula's "Evening Reverie"; Kajanus' "I Sing to You, Fair Maiden"; Sibelius' "My Heart's Song"; Palmgren's "Summer Evening" and "Tuutulaulu" (Cradle Song). At a third demand this second Palmgren was given in English.

Language formation induces a sound sequence class—Jarnevelt's "Sirkka" (The Cricket); Maasalo's "Tullallaa" (Chubby - cheeked); Palmgren's "Paimenen Ilo" (The Shepherd's Joy). Aksel Tornudd was represented by one of his characteristic comic pieces—"Prokko", who got drunk and set his farm in a turmoil and, in gorgeous contrast —"Loitsu" (Conjuration) "Away, disappear, thou evil spirit."

To Sibelius' "Fire on the Island" and "Venematka" (The Boat Trip) in the Kalevala metre Longfellow borrowed from this Finnish epic, the chorus gave possibly the most evanescent treatment of all their light, skillful, opalescent interpretations. The spectacular piece was "The Song of the Slaves of Hiisi"—gold, hammers, mountain; work, work; the world is beautiful, beautiful is the sun. Ha haa! Here was an example of the suggestive, half revealed character of the poetic thought of Finland.

Two strictly national tributes by Genetz and Oskari Merikanto opened and closed the program which had included one sweeping crescendo, incredibly fading pianissimos, blends, marvelously rapid articulation. To each song the mood was imparted by changing tempo and dynamics, by emotional color. The soloists, Alfons Almi, Viljo Lehtinen and Helge Virkkunen with the conductor, Martti Turunen were received with great cordiality.

A. C. R.

The Philadelphia Orchestra

Monitor - Feb. 13/38

—The Arts in Boston

Close on the heels of the Clevelanders, the Philadelphia Orchestra descended upon Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to give the first of two concerts, of which the second is scheduled for tonight. Eugene Ormandy, co-conductor with Leopold Stokowski, is directing both concerts. Yesterday's program (tonight's is different) consisted of the Bach Prelude and Fugue in B minor in Lucien Cailliet's arrangement; Mozart's A major Piano Concerto, with Jan Smeterlin as soloist, and the First Symphony of Brahms.

It is very pleasant to have this orchestra with us again. It is, without doubt, one of the two or three greatest orchestras in the world. Even with Mr. Stokowski becoming more and more addicted to Hollywood and to speeches, it remains the superb instrument that he molded, with the old lambency of tone and the same precision and flexibility. We were assured of this in the Bach item, which had a glorious proclamation. Mr. Ormandy is fortunate in being the inheritor of such an instrument, and he is wise in accepting and preserving it as he finds it; not as a museum piece, of course, but as a living organism.

Mr. Ormandy carries on the Stokowski tradition in several particulars, both of aspect and of performance. He is slender, he has light hair and he conducts without the aid of a baton, and without reference to a score (except in accompaniments). Moreover, he has something of the Stokowski flair for eliciting the utmost from his players, and also for making the most of legitimate musical effects and even for permitting himself license in interpretation.

These interpretative liberties were not in evidence during the first half of the program. The Bach was done with a fine clarity and sense of structure. The orchestral part of the concerto was played with sympathetic discretion, matching the exquisite tone and charming lyricism of Mr. Smeterlin's piano. With reason this performance roused the audience to enthtusiastic response.

The Brahms First had a highly dramatic presentation, deserving admiration for its technical briliancy and rousing .interest, and some questions, as to details of interpretation. The introduction might have had more of the quality of mystery, and the transition to the Allegro might have been more impressive. The Andante was taken a little on the slow side; it did not fall apart, but it gave the feeling that it might. The Allegretto was too sharp in its large contrasts and insufficiently varied in its smaller ones. The Finale was presented in sections rather than as a whole.

Similarly, one did not get from this presentation a clear vision of the symphony as a whole. Inner voices were carefully brought out, but they were not always related to the main lines. There was some effect of choppiness; the symphony was not quite sung.

Nevertheless, the performance was exciting, and it roused the audience to long applause and even to cheers at its close.

L. A. S.

---

rmandy Wins New Laurels at Symphony

Jan Smeterlin Shares In Philadelphians' Success

B. Am. Feb. 13/38

By RUTH MASTERS

Slight, blond, quiet-mannered —Eugene Ormandy came upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to make his first appearance here as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

What followed was reward for many a wintry day of concert going.

For if it is true, as it undeniably is, that in the Philadelphia Orchestra there exists one of the finest instruments of the day for the making of orchestral music, it is also true by the same token that Eugene Ormandy has proved his ability to play upon that instrument with significant results. And then, of course, there was Jan Smeterlin as soloist to still further improve the occasion.

* * *

But to attend to the particulars.

The program opened with Cailliet's arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor. (Cailliet, you must know by this time is a member of the Philadelphia Orchestra itself and is distinguished for the dexterity with which he designs modern dress for ancient treasures.)

The performance of the Prelude, and the massive Fugue was magnificent.

The extent to which Mr. Ormandy has made the orchestra his own after less than two years regime is really extraordinary especially considering the strength of the imprint left upon it by his predecessor, Stokowski. It shows itself in the peculiar sensitiiveness that is his own, in vivid colorization, in suppleness of nuance, in long lines which flow effortlessly and inevitably to the waiting climax.

Stokowski left Ormandy a rich heritage and he has used it wisely. (It is impossible to talk for long about the Philadelphia Orchestra without bringing up the richness and depth of the strings,—a part of Stokowski's endowment to be sure.)

* * *

Jan Smeterlin accomplished the Mozart Concerto in A major with the lucidity of performance one always expects from him. Exquisite phrasing, pearly runs, these are but a few of the essentials in an ideal performance of a Mozart Concerto. These are but a few of the essentials which usually make Mr. Smeterlin's performances of Mozart what they are. The orchestra gave support which may be described as of the most sensitive order.

Mr. Ormandie brought the program to a close with Brahms First Symphony which he conducted, as is his usual custom, without score.

* * *

This evening's program in Symphony Hall, which will conclude the present engagement of the Philadelphia Orchestra here, will include Passacaglio from Buxtehude as arranged by Cailliet, the Beethoven Seventh Symphony, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun, de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" Suite, and lastly Strauss' Burlesque for Piano and Orchestra with Jan Smettrlin appearing again as soloist. Incidentally this will be the last Boston performance by the distinguished Polish pianist for some time. He will sail for Europe immediately after, to return in November.

Symphony Notes

THE distinguished French musician, Nadia Boulanger, will be guest of honor at the regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

The first woman ever to appear as conductor of the orchestra, Mme. Boulanger will present Faure's "Requiem" in its first performance here. Mme. Boulanger will also contribute to these concerts by playing the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor, to be conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The Bach Cantata Club, together with Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone, will assist in the performance of the "Requiem."

NORFOLK, VA.
LEDGER DISPATCH

FEB 5 - 1938

Nadia Boulanger, French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country this week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a series of four radio programs over the WEAF-NBC network beginning next Saturday morning, February 12, at 10:30 o'clock. The programs will be devoted to choral music directed by Miss Boulanger.

The New Records

N.Y. Sun 2/12/38

A Complete 'St. Matthew Passion'—Other Bach—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The phonographic adventures of Bach's epical "St. Matthew Passion" have passed into a new phase with the release by Victor of the first part of its complete version of the great work. The recording was made at an actual performance in Boston last spring.

One may say without hesitation that this is an inifinite advance on the considerably cut, indifferently performed St. Bartholomew version previously available. With the exception of eleven measures of recitative preceding the contralto air "Grief and Pain," the text of the thirty-four numbers included in this volume is complete. The only other curtailment is the elimination of the da capo (or repetition of the first part) of most of the airs, but this is hardly more than a pedagogical point.

The Performance.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston orchestra have given us a performance that is painstaking and dignified, if not remarkably fervent or expressive. However, the soloists are rather less even in merit. The best of them is Keith Faulkner, who interprets the all-important part of Jesus with fine vocal quality and excellent understanding. John Priebe's light tenor is admirable for the music of the Evangelist, but he is frequently embarrassed by its technical demands. Kathryn Meisle sings the contralto airs with sound style and reasonably good vocal quality, but Jeannette Vreeland is less well-suited for the soprano airs. The use of an English text cannot be regarded as other than unfortunate, even if very little of it is distinguishable.

Nevertheless, none of these qualifications would materially impair the documentary value of the performance, were it consistently well-reproduced. But the level of the recording is erratic, the fluctuations of quality curiously wide.

The reproduction of the orchestra is excellent, almost all of the solo airs are clearly recorded, and the singing of the unaccompanied chorales is the most beautiful musical performance in the album. However, the ensemble of chorus and orchestra is disappointingly poor, with much distortion and blurring of the vocal line. An effort has been made to fade the music out at the end of each record side to minimize the effect of the breaks, but in several instances they are annoyingly abrupt. Whether the magnificence of the music is sufficient to offset the interpretative and mechanical weaknesses of this recording is a question that each individual must decide for himself. It is not likely, however, that another complete performance will soon be available. The remaining records are promised for next month.

[illegible]

Ormandy Makes Boston Bow With Philadelphia Orchestra

B. Trans. Feb. 13/38

Matinee Audience Applauds First Concert of a Pair with Jan Smeterlin for Solo Pianist

By MOSES SMITH

For the first of two concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Eugene Ormandy, its conductor, chose to present yesterday afternoon Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor, orchestrated by Lucien Cailliet, Mozart's Piano Concerto in A major and the First Symphony of Brahms. Jan Smeterlin was the soloist as he will be again tonight when there will be presented a Cailliet transcription of a Passacaglia by Buxtehude, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Strauss' "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and the Suite from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat."

The only thing at all unfamiliar was the Bach Prelude and Fugue. Here again, as in the case of a number on the program of the Cleveland Orchestra under Rodzinski in the same hall the night before, was a transcription calculated to exhibit the virtuosity of a modern orchestra. If Cailliet's efforts prevailed more yesterday than had his predecessor's on the earlier occasion there were two reasons. First, he has done a more brilliant job, exhibiting a much more highly polished surface. Second, the Philadelphia Orchestra is a more persuasive aggregation by virtue of its greater numbers and longer experience under conductors demanding the highest standards.

Throughout the concert, indeed, Mr. Ormandy received from assistants a quality of performance with which Bostonians are familiar, from the weekly concerts of their own orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, but which can be noted in few, if any, other capitals of music in the entire world. I do not mean that the playing yesterday was at every moment on the highest plane, any more than the Boston Orchestra can perform at the top of its bent all the time. It was the "average" of the performance that was high. Whether or not the Philadelphia Orchestra, as heard yesterday, plays as well as it did on the occasion of its last visit here two years ago is a matter of speculation, where fickle memory is concerned. But one heard again the astonishing brightness of the strings and felt the tremendous impact of their sonority. Through the wind sections was exquisite solo playing as well as an ensemble fine as to rhythm, pitch and tone quality.

Least satisfactory was the Concerto, particularly the last movement. A little more uncertainty here would have been raggedness. It might be conjectured that the orchestra was not in stride, or that Mr. Ormandy was not a sympathetic, pliant accompanist. It was more likely that Mr. Smeterlin was a difficult pianist to follow. His customarily ingratiating pianism was not at its best, largely because of excessive rubato (for Mozart's heady music) and change of tempo with insufficient warning or warrant. One might easily question the pace of some of the episodes of the finale, a pace so rapid that clear, sharply accentuated, stylized playing by the orchestra was out of the question. What might otherwise have been a poetic and sensitive recreation was thus considerably marred.

Mr. Ormandy, conducting without a stick and from memory, except for the accompaniment to the Concerto, had his moments which indicated clearly why he has risen to such high estate at so early an age. Naturally his talents, as well as his defects, were best to be observed in the familiar Symphony of Brahms. Here was frequently apparent a certain grandeur that recalled a similar quality in his predecessor (and now occasional colleague), Leopold Stokowski. At best, as at the end of the Symphony, the younger man surpassed the older, because the grandeur was not accompanied by grandiloquence.

In general, each movement ended beautifully and usually began so. In the middle, at one time or another, there were procedures to which the present writer, exercising, it must be recalled, a personal opinion, had to object: things like bringing the orchestra too frequently to a full stop, instead of effecting an easy transition; unnecessary and unprofitable distortion of rhythmic outline (almost never, fortunately, of melodic balance); occasional excessive concern with an arresting measure or two, to the detriment of the larger implications of the movement.

On the reverse of the medal is the fact that the Brahms First Symphony is nowadays a battle-horse for almost all conductors, great and small. It offers such temptations as not even so supposedly a literalist as Toscanini can resist. By current standards then, Mr. Ormandy's version of yesterday was really a remarkably fine affair. It indicated his enormous talent for musical expression, just as previously his command of the orchestral medium proper had been made clear. The excesses which this writer noted on watching him in Philadelphia more than a year ago seemed to be at least partly curbed. And in view of the direction he is following, his youth is all in his favor.

The audience of yesterday, whether or not it was disturbed by these considerations, gave audible manifestation of its pleasure in a manner to suggest a much larger company than was actually present. It had done similarly for Smeterlin at the end of the Concerto. Fortunately or unfortunately it was not offered an opportunity for distraction in the form of program-notes.

SYMPHONY HALL—COM 1492
Fri., Feb. 18, 2.30—Sat., Feb. 19, 8.15
Boston Symphony
ORCHESTRA
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY
CONDUCTOR
NADIA BOULANGER will conduct Faure's Requiem, Bach Cantata Club Assisting, and Appear as Organist in Saint Saens 3rd Symphony.

SUPERB MUSIC BY RODZINSKI

B. Post

Leads Cleveland Orchestra in Fine Performance

Feb. 11/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A fine orchestra, a remarkable conductor, a notable singer and a stimulating programme and Sympony Hall by no means full. This is the melancholy tale of the concert given in our temple of music last evening by the Cleveland Orchestra, under Artur Rodzinski, with Rose Pauly, acknowledged queen of Straussian song, giving Boston its first hearing of one of the most extraordinary pages in all dramatic music, the final scene from "Salome."

Those who are in the know have been aware for some time that Mr. Rodzinski stands very high among what may be called the coming conductors. Confronted with them last evening it was easy to feel that Mr. Rodzinski's abilities had been underestimated rather than overpraised. As conductor he is singularly taut and tense. To call his authority absolute is to put it mildly. Whether the Cleveland Orchestra would be a first-rate organization without him might not be said with assurance. With him at the helm it is that quite unmistakably.

Following the fashion of many another present-day conductor, Mr. Rodzinski began the evening with a Bach transcription, that of the Toccata and Fugue in D minor ingeniously fabricated by Julius Wertheim. If it accomplished nothing else, the performance of this arrangement served to make us immediately aware of the unusual blend of fire and precision with which Mr. Rodzinski's orchestra plays. The conductor's second choice, to some hearers inexplicable, was the scrappy, sometimes effective, more often piddling Symphony of the 20-year-old Shostakovich. If the music lacked interest, the performance did not, and there was long and loud applause.

After the interval came a miniature Strauss festival. Before Miss Pauly appeared to sing with varied and compelling eloquence Salome's apostrophe to the severed head of John the Baptist, we were treated to a performance of the "Dance of the Seven Veils" which may unhesitatingly be set down as a revelation. We have heard the music before, and many times, but we have never been made so keenly aware of its dramatic intensity and what might be called its sheer animalism. It also may be said that the performance was less luxurious, less voluptuous than those to which we have grown accustomed. To return to the programme, after Mr. Rodzinski, Miss Pauly and the orchestra—not to mention Strauss—had held us in thrall with Salome's half perverted, half exalted rhapsodizing, we were regaled with a performance of "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" which will not be soon forgotten. There is velvet in the music of Strauss; there is also steel, and Mr. Rodzinski made us more conscious, perhaps, of the latter quality than of the former, though [illegible]out the slightest hint of dryness.

The feeling of complete satisfaction with our own possessions, which a concert by a visiting orchestra is so likely to engender in the Bostonian breast, was not quite so much in evidence last evening. There are some things in the world which we did not know about.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Philadelphia Orchestra

The second and last concert by the Philadelphia Orchestra at Symphon Hall last night was another occasion of glorious orchestral playing. The audience, it was gratifying to observe, was markedly larger than that of Friday afternoon.

Mr. Ormandy's program began with another example of the instrumentation of the Philadelphia Orchestra's skilled transcriber, Lucien Calliet—a Passacgalio by the organist Buxtehude, who was an immediate forerunner of Bach. This was followed by Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Once again Mr. Ormandy proved himself a conductor of resource and taste. Beethoven's Symphony was given an excellent performance, characterized by strict fidelity to the marks of expression found in the score. For example, there were a number of such markings in the scherzo, scrupulously observed, which some conductors are willing to pass over in the turbulent rush of the music. If here and there the balance of chords was less exact than might be desired, Mr. Ormandy's reading in general was one to arouse admiration.

This program was to Bostonians more interesting than Mr. Ormandy's first, because it contained two scores long unplayed here. The "Burleske" of Richard Strauss, indeed, had not been heard in Boston for 20 years. As with the Mozart Concerto on Friday, Jan Smeterlin performed the intricate piano portion with the lightness of spirit and the technical dexterity that are so conspicuous a part of his artistry. Here was not a pianist being "accompanied," but one joined with conductor and orchestra in beautifully co-ordinated music-making.

There was rapturous applause at the end, which Mr. Smeterlin generously shared with the player of the important tympani part—whose name must unfortunately go unrecorded, since there was no roster in the program.

The suite from Manuel De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat" likewise has been committed to an over-long silence hereabouts. Both this and Debussy's "The Afternoon of a Faun" supply to such a conductor as Mr. Ormandy and to so magnificent an orchestra an opportunity for sheer virtuosity. Let no more superlatives be lavished. The whole story is told in the word "gorgeous."

C. W. D.

Ormandy's Symphony

B. Am.– Feb. 13/38

By Ruth Marsters

Music Editor

THAT the Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, and Jan Smeterlin make an irresistible triumvirate was established in two Symphony Hall concerts this week-end during the absence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on tour.

Mr. Ormandy had never visited Boston and anticipation ran high in audiences sufficiently well informed in advance concerning the brilliant achievements of Stokowski's successor.

It began to be fairly certain that no one was to be disappointed from the beginning of the prelude of the Bach Prelude and Fugue in B minor, which opened the first program on Friday afternoon.

As the prelude flowed on, the fact became increasingly obvious, and the applause that followed the conclusion of the magnificent fugue could only indicate to the most wary an approval that was unanimous.

* * *

MR. ORMANDY habitually conducts without baton, and usually, as in this case, without reference to the score.

The orchestra at his hands has lost nothing of the rich string tone for which Stokowski made it famous. The seating of the orchestra is interesting. Beginning at the conductor's left there are the first and second violins and violas; on the extreme right of the fan shape, the 'cello. The idea in this arrangement is that all the stringed instruments are thus facing toward the audience. It works out remarkably well.

But while Mr. Ormandy gives every attention to detail in seating the orchestra, as in shaping a phrase, he would be the last to allow it to obscure the broader significance in either case. Sensitive, sincere, he is both a scholar and a poet.

The feature of Friday afternoon's program was, of course, Jan Smeterlin's appearance as soloist in the Mozart Concerto in A major.

No pianist enjoys a greater popularity in Boston than Mr. Smeterlin and his recent practice of restricting himself to Chopin in recitals devoted exclusively to the latter's music has seemed to us, at any rate, rather a loss.

Mr. Smeterlin's playing of Chopin is, of course, quite distinctive, and the demand for it is therefore understandable. But to stamp an artist of such fine interpretive power as an "expert," be it in Chopin or Stravinsky, is imposing limitations which are quite unreasonable.

AFTER hearing Mr. Smeterlin's performance of the Mozart Concerto on Friday afternoon we decided that Mr. Smeterlin should stop playing Chopin entirely. (This is not prejudice against Chopin but toward Mozart. That, and a burst of temper.)

WOMAN WILL LEAD HUB SYMPHONY

News and Views About Music Matters Here And Elsewhere

B. Post Feb. 13/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

AS THE first woman ever to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Nadia Boulanger will direct at the Symphony Concerts of this week the first performance, under those auspices, of the Requiem of Gabriel Faure. The chorus will be that of the Bach Cantata Club. The other item on the programme, the C minor Symphony of Saint-Saens for orchestra with organ, will enlist the services of this versatile and distinguished French woman as organist.

Mlle. Boulanger is now teaching at Radcliffe College, where she also lectured last season. On Thursday evening, March 3, she will conduct the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society at Sanders Theatre, with members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra assisting and with soloists whom she is bringing from Paris. Compositions by Bach, Palestrina, Poulenc, Tallis, Preger, Hindemith, Stravinsky and Purcell make a programme of more than usual interest.

Mlle. Boulanger belongs to what may properly be called a musical family. Her Russian mother was a singer; her French father a composer who wrote operas for his mother; her paternal grandfather, a 'cellist. Her gifted sister, Lili (1893-1918), was the first woman ever to win the first Grand Prix de Rome, with the cantata "Faust et Helene," while Mlle. Nadia herself won, in 1908, the second Grand Prix de Rome, with the cantata "La Sirene." Recognized as the outstanding teacher of composition in France, Mlle. Boulanger teaches at the Ecole Normale de Musique at the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau. Among her French pupils are Jean Francaix and the Russian emigre, Igor Markevitch; while her American pupils include Aaron Copland, Walter Piston, Roger Sessions, Roy Harris, the late George Gershwin and Herbert Elwell.

In the current issue of "Modern Music," Mr. Elwell makes an impressive summary of Mlle. Boulanger's accomplishments and achievements, dwelling on the breadth of her scholarship, the catholicity of her taste and her valiant service in behalf of the modern school of French composers. In the following lines he gives us a vivid picture of her capacity for work.

"The tempo of her life, as she speeds back and forth from her summer home at Gargenville to Paris, and from Paris to Fontainebleau, meeting appointments and classes by the dozen, makes the business day of an American corporation-head seem leisurely by comparison. It is not uncommon for Mlle. Boulanger to teach 12 consecutive hours a day and top this off by attending or participating in a concert in the evening, after which she will take care of her extensive correspondence or plan courses until 3 in the morning and begin all over again at 8.

"This Spartan existence, almost devoid of recreation or luxury, is something she cannot do without. It is, paradoxically, her one great source of pleasure. And yet its monastic severity results neither in constraint nor feverishness, but liberates energies and provides, as no other plan of life could, the independence essential to her truly creative power."

Final mention might be made of the fact that those of this week will not be Mlle. Boulanger's first appearances in Symphony Hall. In 1925 she appeared at a pair of Symphony Concerts as organist in the first performances here of Copland's Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. The Requiem was sung by the Bach Cantata Club at Jordan Hall last season with Richard Burgin conducting.

Nadia Boulanger to Conduct the Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1938

Koussevitzky And Symphony Heard Again

Emma Boynet, French Pianist, Appears as Soloist in Boston Orchestra Concert

Verdi at Metropolitan

'Il Trovatore' and 'Aida' Are Presented at Opera House

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday when Emma Boynet, French pianist, was the soloist in Mozart's concerto in C major, which is No. 467 in the Köchel catalogue. Serge Koussevitzky began his program with Maximilian Steinberg's edition of a concerto in D major, originally scored for strings only, by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, and completed the list with Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

Miss Boynet, a native Parisian, studied at the Conservatoire with Isidor Philipp, and has played extensively in France and elsewhere in Europe. She had played the Mozart C major in Boston this season on December 3 and 4, and had also made an earlier Boston appearance with the Boston Symphony in November, 1935.

She disclosed a well matured technical skill possessing notable fluency and polish, in addition to accuracy, and her interpretation was also marked by a laudable ability to set forth fine distinctions of dynamic shading. In the first movement this was carried a little to excess at the expense of range and contrast of color, although in the finale she proved capable of more outspoken interpretation. The orchestra gave a praiseworthy performance of its share of the concerto.

Steinberg made his arrangement of Emanuel Bach's concerto, adding a discreet complement of woodwinds and horn to the original scoring, at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion in 1912. While there are measures which do not rise much above craftsmanly routine, the work as a whole offers much to delight its hearers with due pomp and dignity in the first movement, lyric charm in the second and spirit and momentum in the third, and received a performance of this orchestra's customary high standard. Both the conductor and orchestra were in their best vein for the Tchaikovsky symphony.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 7 - 1938

SATURDAY

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, who arrived in this country during the past week to become the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time. Internationally known as an organist, teacher of composition and lecturer, Mlle. Boulanger will be on the air each Saturday from 10.30 to 11 a. m. A Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, she is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fountainebleau.

For the first program Mlle. Boulanger will present a capella songs by Poulenc and excerpts from Le Roi Malgre Lue by Chabrier and "Philemon et Baucis," by Gounod. With Mlle. Boulanger directing from the piano, the numbers will be sung by her own group of singers whom she brought to this country. The group includes Comtesse Jean de Policnac, Gisele Peyron and Irene Kedroff, sopranos; Nathalie Kedroff, contralto; Hugues Guenod, tenor, and Dodo Conrad, bass: KYW-WEAF, 10.30-11 a. m.

Young People's Concert, by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra with Rudolph Ganz, conducting: WCAU-WABC, 11 a. m.-12.30 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 7 - 1938

Tenor Soloist New to Radio In First Show

John Carter Replaces Nelson Eddy on Sunday Broadcast Series

By AARON STEIN

BOULANGER SERIES

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who recently arrived in this country to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over NBC networks in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time. The first broadcast of the series has been scheduled for Saturday.

The programs are to be heard at 10:30 each Saturday morning over WEAF and network. With Mlle. Boulanger at the piano, the programs will be sung by her own group of singers, which she brought to this country. The group includes Comtesse Jean de Polignac, Gisele Peyron and Irene Kedroff, sopranos; Nathalie Kedroff, contralto; Hugues Guenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, bass.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EVENING NEWS

FEB 7 - 1938 16

An artiste

THE COMTESSE JEAN DE POLIGNAC, concert artiste, who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is pictured aboard the S. S. Champlain on her arrival in New York City. The comtesse is the wife of Count Jean de Polignac.
—Acme Photo.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

To Dine Before Concert

A dinner will be given tomorrow night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk before the Boston Symphony concert at Montclair High School.

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished teacher and musician, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. She is the first woman who has ever been chosen to lead this celebrated musical organization.

NADIA BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, Feb. 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

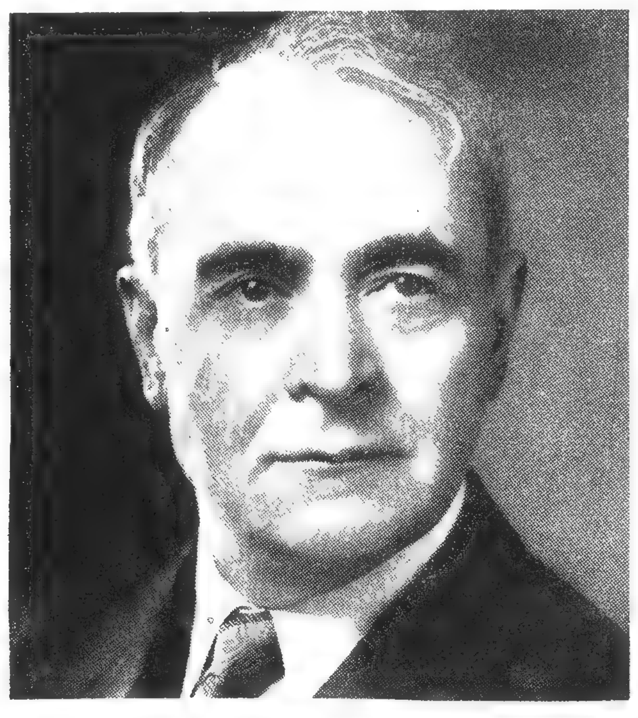
Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem," the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata Club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem," which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevizky will complete the program, conducting the C minor symphony of Saint-Saens.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

[illegible] 7 - [illegible]

Mlle. Boulanger NBC Series

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country last week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over NBC-Red in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, beginning Saturday at 10:30 a.m.



Serge Koussevitzky has been the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since [illegible]

New Victor Higher Fidelity Recordings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

ROMEO AND JULIET — Overture [illegible]
Album M [illegible] AM [illegible] operation [illegible]

SYMPHONY [illegible] IN E MINOR [illegible] (Tschaikowsky) [illegible]
Album M [illegible] AM [illegible] operation [illegible]

SYMPHONY [illegible] MAJOR [illegible]
Album M [illegible] AM [illegible] operation [illegible]

THE PASSION OF OUR LORD ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW [illegible]
Volume [illegible] Records [illegible] AM [illegible]

Listen to: The NBC [illegible] Saturday night [illegible] NBC Blue and Red Networks [illegible] Opera broadcasts [illegible] Saturday [illegible] NBC Blue Network [illegible] The "Magic Key of RCA" [illegible] NBC [illegible] Network

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at your command on VICTOR RECORDS

• • •

● One of the special characteristics of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is exceptional beauty, depth and richness of tone. This is due in part to the magnificent instruments used, many of which are priceless museum pieces. The wonderful tones of these instruments, of this orchestra lose nothing in a Victor Higher Fidelity recording. You hear them mellow, pure, transcendently beautiful, as they are heard from the stage.

Almost all of the great performances for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky are especially famous are on Victor Records. This is true of the other great orchestras of the world as well. Hear a symphonic concert of your own selection on the new Victor Higher Fidelity Records at your dealer's!

NEW RCA VICTOR PHONOGRAPH-RADIO

Completely Automatic
Lower in Price!

RCA Victor Phonograph Radio [illegible] record changer [illegible] RCA Victor [illegible] Tuning [illegible] convenient [illegible] Magic [illegible] a price this low [illegible] fine RCA Victor [illegible]

When buying Radio Tubes, say "RCA"!
First in Metal — Foremost in Glass — Finest in tone.

NEW Higher Fidelity VICTOR RECORDS

AND RCA VICTOR RECORD PLAYERS AND PHONOGRAPH-RADIOS

Nadia Boulanger to Conduct the Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

JAN 9 - 1938

Koussevitzky And Symphony Heard Again

Emma Boynet, French Pianist, Appears as Soloist in Boston Orchestra Concert

Verdi at Metropolitan

'Il Trovatore' and 'Aida' Are Presented at Opera House

By Francis D. Perkins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second afternoon concert of the season in Carnegie Hall yesterday when Emma Boynet, French pianist, was the soloist in Mozart's concerto in C major, which is No. 467 in the Köchel catalogue. Serge Koussevitzky began his program with Maximilian Steinberg's edition of a concerto in D major, originally scored for strings only, by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, and completed the list with Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

Miss Boynet, a native Parisian, studied at the Conservatoire with Isidor Philipp, and has played extensively in France and elsewhere in Europe. She had played the Mozart C major in Boston this season on December 3 and 4, and had also made an earlier Boston appearance with the Boston Symphony in November, 1935.

She disclosed a well matured technical skill possessing notable fluency and polish, in addition to accuracy, and her interpretation was also marked by a laudable ability to set forth fine distinctions of dynamic shading. In the first movement this was carried a little to excess at the expense of range and contrast of color, although in the finale she proved capable of more outspoken interpretation. The orchestra gave a praiseworthy performance of its share of the concerto.

Steinberg made his arrangement of Emanuel Bach's concerto, adding a discreet complement of woodwinds and horn to the original scoring, at Dr. Koussevitzky's suggestion in 1912. While there are measures which do not rise much above craftsmanly routine, the work as a whole offers much to delight its hearers with due pomp and dignity in the first movement, lyric charm in the second and spirit and momentum in the third, and received a performance of this orchestra's customary high standard. Both the conductor and orchestra were in their best vein for the Tchaikovsky symphony.

CAMDEN, N. J.
POST

FEB 7 - 1938

SATURDAY

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, who arrived in this country during the past week to become the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time. Internationally known as an organist, teacher of composition and lecturer, Mlle. Boulanger will be on the air each Saturday from 10.30 to 11 a. m. A Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, she is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fountainebleau.

For the first program Mlle. Boulanger will present a capella songs by Poulenc and excerpts from Le Roi Malgre Lue by Chabrier and "Philemon et Baucis," by Gounod. With Mlle. Boulanger directing from the piano, the numbers will be sung by her own group of singers whom she brought to this country. The group includes Comtesse Jean de Policnac, Gisele Peyron and Irene Kedroff, sopranos; Nathalie Kedroff, contralto; Hugues Guenod, tenor, and Dodo Conrad, bass: KYW-WEAF, 10.30-11 a. m.

Young People's Concert, by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra with Rudolph Ganz, conducting: WCAU-WABC, 11 a. m.-12.30 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 7 - 1938

Tenor Soloist New to Radio In First Show

John Carter Replaces Nelson Eddy on Sunday Broadcast Series

By AARON STEIN

BOULANGER SERIES

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who recently arrived in this country to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over NBC networks in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time. The first broadcast of the series has been scheduled for Saturday.

The programs are to be heard at 10:30 each Saturday morning over WEAF and network. With Mlle. Boulanger at the piano, the programs will be sung by her own group of singers, which she brought to this country. The group includes Comtesse Jean de Polignac, Gisele Peyron and Irene Kedroff, sopranos; Nathalie Kedroff, contralto; Hugues Guenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, bass.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
EVENING NEWS

FEB 7 - 1938 16

An artiste

THE COMTESSE JEAN DE POLIGNAC, concert artiste, who will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is pictured aboard the S. S. Champlain on her arrival in New York City. The comtesse is the wife of Count Jean de Polignac. —Acme Photo.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

To Dine Before Concert

A dinner will be given tomorrow night by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk before the Boston Symphony concert at Montclair High School.

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished teacher and musician, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week. She is the first woman who has ever been chosen to lead this celebrated musical organization.

NADIA BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, Feb. 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem," the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata Club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem," which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevizky will complete the program, conducting the C minor symphony of Saint-Saens.

RADIO DAILY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 7 - 1938

Mlle. Boulanger NBC Series

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country last week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over NBC-Red in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, beginning Saturday at 10:30 a.m.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at your command on

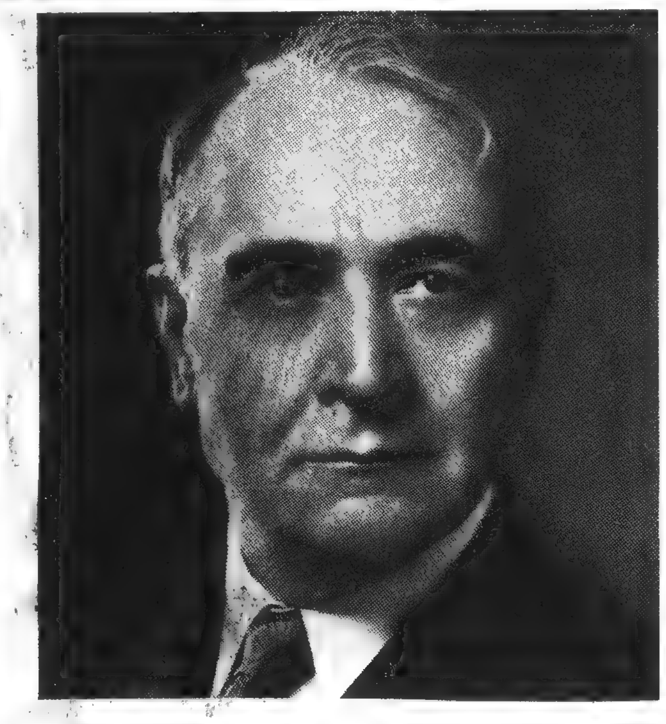
VICTOR RECORDS

• • •



Serge Koussevitzky has been the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1924. He is considered one of the outstanding authorities on Sibelius in the world.

New Victor Higher Fidelity Recordings by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

ROMEO AND JULIET — Overture (Tschaikowsky)
Album M-347 (AM-347 for automatic operation) Price $6.50

SYMPHONY No. 4, IN F MINOR (Tschaikowsky, Op. 36)
Album M-327 (AM-327 for automatic operation) Price $10.00

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F MAJOR (Beethoven, Op. 93)
Album M-336 (AM-336 for automatic operation) Price $6.50

THE PASSION OF OUR LORD ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW (Bach)
Volume 1—10 Records. Album M-411 (AM-411 for automatic operation) Price $20.00

* * *

Listen to: The NBC Symphony Orchestra every Saturday night at 10:00 E.S.T., over the NBC Blue and Red Networks . . . The Metropolitan Opera broadcasts every Saturday afternoon at 2:00 E.S.T., over the NBC Blue Network . . . The "Magic Key of RCA" every Sunday afternoon at 2:00 E.S.T. over the NBC Blue Network.

● One of the special characteristics of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is exceptional beauty, depth and richness of tone. This is due in part to the magnificent instruments used, many of which are priceless museum pieces. The wonderful tones of these instruments, of this orchestra, lose nothing in a Victor Higher Fidelity recording. You hear them mellow, pure, transcendently beautiful, as they are heard from the stage.

Almost all of the great performances for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky are especially famous are on Victor Records. This is true of the other great orchestras of the world as well. Hear a symphonic concert of your own selection on the new Victor Higher Fidelity Records at your dealer's!

NEW RCA VICTOR PHONOGRAPH-RADIO

Completely Automatic

Lower in Price!

● RCA Victor Phonograph-Radio U-106 — Has automatic record changer for 10" and 12" records, and RCA Victor Electric Tuning . . . Crystal pick-up with convenient, top-loading needle socket, Magic Eye, many other improvements. This is the first time a price this low has brought so many fine RCA Victor features.

When buying Radio Tubes, say "RCA"! First in Metal — Foremost in Glass — Finest in tone.

NEW Higher Fidelity VICTOR RECORDS

AND RCA VICTOR RECORD PLAYERS AND PHONOGRAPH-RADIOS

RCA

Ormandy Modestly Explains Why He Directs Minus Baton

B. Globe - Feb. 11/38

Conductor Scorns Affectations and Confesses He Always Prefers Piece Being Played

CONDUCTOR AND SPONSOR-HOST

Eugene Ormandy (right), conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is seen here with Walter S. Bucklin, president of the National Shawmut Bank of Boston. For two years the bank has sponsored the Philadelphia Orchestra in a radio broadcast. Mr. Ormandy was guest at a small luncheon at the bank yesterday after his arrival here for two concerts.

A chat with Eugene Ormandy leaves an impression that he is one of the most modest men who ever directed a symphony orchestra. His alert but unobstrusive manner and his considered speech also suggest that he represents a generation of artists to whom the musical future of these United States is to be closely bound.

There are some eminent masters of music who speak, however sincerely, with a certain amount of "side" about the mysteries of the tonal art. Not so Eugene Ormandy, who communicates cogent ideas with the utmost simplicity and directness. Hungarian by birth, American by transplantation, he has made his career as conductor entirely on this side of the Atlantic. If his dignified courtesy naturally reflects his European background, his quick humor and his mental attitude indicate that he has absorbed much of the gusto which, we are told, characterizes the American.

Mishap Suggested Change

Mr. Ormandy's first visit to Boston brings him as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, one of the three foremost symphonic organizations in the world today. This afternoon and tomorrow night at Symphony Hall Bostonians will have their first opportunity to sample his work on their home grounds.

There is not a trace of vanity or pretense about the man. He conducts now without score or baton.

"I am not especially proud of my memory," says Mr. Ormandy, "but it is simply part of me. I do not use a score in performance because I feel that every time you look at it you break a sort of communication between your own eyes and those of the orchestra. In my mind, I see each page of the music as I go along.

"Last year something happened which made me give up the baton. It was in White Plains, where the stage was small. The cellos were placed so near me that when I gave an entrance signal to them my stick caught in one of their stands and flew into the audience. It was a long stick, one of several which Toscanini gave me some years ago.

"Well, there was no other stick, so I had to use just my hands. And at that minute the orchestra sounded more responsive than it ever had before. My wife, who was sitting in a box, later told me she noticed this, too. I conducted without a stick at the next concert, and surely enough, again they were more responsive.

Indulges No Preferences

"The answer, to my mind, lies in the fact that the Philadelphia Orchestra had been trained and brought to perfection by one man—Leopold Stokowski—who used no stick. It is plain that they could be most responsive to a conductor who employed only his hands. In this I am not trying to copy Stokowski, for I can be only myself."

The statement is typical of the man's candor. This same candor was exemplified a few minutes later when Mr. Ormandy confessed he has no especial musical preferences.

"Whatever we are playing at the moment seems the best music to me. Just the other day we were rehearsing Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony. At the end, I was just about to speak to the orchestra when they started to laugh. They knew well I was going to say: 'Don't you think this is the most wonderful music ever written?' "

Mr. Ormandy likes jazz in its place, and believes that real jazz is an individual musical expression. But he quickly asserts that jazz and symphonic music cannot possibly be mingled without spoiling both.

American symphonic music, Mr. Ormandy believes, is making steady progress. Just this season he ran through 27 American scores and accepted five. Ten years ago, he says, he probably would have accepted them all. But a decade has made a great deal of improvement in compositional technic, and today standards are higher.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Cleveland Orchestra

This is a week of novelty hereabouts, orchestrally speaking. Last evening the Cleveland Orchestra conducted by the distinguished Dr. Artur Rodzinski played at Symphony Hall; this afternoon and tomorrow night the visiting Philadelphians will hold forth.

Dr. Rodzinski's first appearance in Boston was further signalized by what is said to have been the initial performance here of the closing scene from Richard Strauss' once debated opera, "Salome." The soprano soloist for this event was Rose Pauly, the strikingly dramatic Hungarian singer.

The program contained two other items by Strauss—"The Dance of the Seven Veils," likewise out of "Salome," and "Till Eulenspiegel." The first two numbers were Julius Wertheim's orchestral transcription of one of the two D minor Toccatas and Fugues that Bach wrote in his Weimar years, and the First Symphony by the Soviet Dmitri Shostakovitch.

Times have changed since "Salome" was a subject of bitter discussion nearly 30 years ago. Perhaps the marvelously depictive and emotional music can be better judged now than was possible when other considerations subordinated just appraisal of the score itself. At any rate, the music for the final scene is a blend of sheer beauty and macabre emphasis of a pathological character. As played by Dr. Rodzinski and the orchestra, and sung by Mme. Pauly, it was truly an event to stand in memory. Mme. Pauly's voice is large, lustrous and and of sensuous character. Although Strauss' tempestuous orchestra for the most part requires a singer to force her voice, Mme. Pauly brought out as much as possible of what is basically a form of cantilena. This was especially true in those last, horribly fascinating words addressed to the head of Jakanaan, where — incidentally — Mme. Pauly was permitted to display her excellent diction. She may rest assured that her first appearance here was wholly a success.

Dr. Rodzinski's orchestra is a well-disciplined group who play with the utmost precision. Wertheim's transcription of Bach—an ingenious imitation of organ effects applied to what is essentially a brilliant show-piece for that instrument—was performed with vivid color and unanimity.

Shostakovitch's Symphony, on the other hand, sounded completely different from what one remembered the only previous Boston performance of the work to have been. Dr. Rodzinsky secured a performance notable for clarity of details and outline.

There may have been some in last night's audience who took exception to Dr. Rodzinski's reading of Strauss. His treatment is essentially songful, stressing the flow of melody and of rhythm, and yet highly dramatic. In one listener's judgment this accounted in good part for the irresistible power of the "Salome" music. Conversely, "Till Eulenspiegel" fared less well, with tempi that sometimes were too fast and with some unusual details of orchestral balance. "Till" demands, above all, a definitely calculated interpretation to make the most of its hard wit. Otherwise the concert was both stimulating and rewarding.

C. W. D.

B. Her. Feb. 11/38

158

MUSIC

By Alexander Williams

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

The Cleveland Orchestra, Artur Rodzinski, conductor, visited Boston last night for a concert in Symphony hall. The soloist was Rose Pauly, soprano. The program was as follows:

Bach......Toccata and Fugue in D minor, orchestrated by Julius Wertheim
Shostakovich..........Symphony Op. 10
Strauss....Dance of the Seven Veils and Final Scene from "Salome"
Strauss..."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

As the record has it, the Cleveland orchestra has not visited Boston for nearly 12 years. In point of fact it has twice recently come as near as Wellesley, but the hall there is not suitable for orchestral concerts. We had not appreciated the merits of this excellent orchestra until the concert of last night. It is an organization of which Cleveland may well be proud, and a larger audience should certainly have been present to do it honor.

This is a week of orchestral comparisons, what with our own orchestra out of town and the visits of the Cleveland and Philadelphia organizations. A cautious listener will have recognized that the Cleveland orchestra, fine though it is, sometimes lacks the perfect sonority which is the ultimate goal. The individual instruments are good, and there is no discrepancy when an important solo is played. The woodwinds seemed to us to be an unusually fine group. In the Bach there was at times a lack of precision, which was not a fault that obtruded during the rest of the concert.

Mr. Rodzinski is clearly a studious and intelligent conductor. He is responsible for the brilliance of the present orchestra. At times, however, his interpretations are a little rectangular. They lacked, in the "Till Eulenspiegel," for example, thmic surge and pointed brilliance which can so enliven this score. In other words it was a good performance, without being a great one, workmanlike without being inspired.

The most interesting and rewarding event of the evening came with the first performance here of the last scene from Strauss' "Salome." Here the orchestra was in capital—at times almost too exuberant—form. Furthermore, it had a soloist, Mme. Rosa Pauly, who has recently swept New York with her singing of "Elektra." She has a magnificent voice and used it with splendid dramatic effect in the voluptuous music of Strauss. The fight 30 years ago over "Salome" seems pointless now, though it is still news and is retold frequently as though it were of absorbing interest. The lushness and emotional realism of Strauss's operatic scores are an old story. Undeniably last night's performance was an exciting story into the bargain. That, moreover, is what Strauss's operas—except the "Rosenkavalier"—should be at their best, though there is no need to write about them as though they were the sublimest art.

Shostakovich's youthful Symphony was a poor choice for this concert. It has many leanings toward Strauss, but lacks the sincerity of timeliness and is old hat while purporting to be the last word. If Shostakovich is a good composer, it would be kinder to play his later work, in spite of the popular appeal of parts of this Symphony. It is a vapid score, and repetition only emphasizes that fact.

HARVARD ALUMNI BULLETIN

OFFICIAL PUBLICATION OF THE HARVARD ALUMNI ASSOCIATION
AND OF THE ASSOCIATED HARVARD CLUBS

For the opinions expressed in the editorial columns the editors alone are responsible.

VOLUME XL. FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1938. NUMBER 17.

News and Views

The Symphony Dinner. Nearly fifty-seven years ago, in the spring before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the sponsorship of Henry Lee Higginson, gave its first concert, he wrote a statement of his purposes in establishing this organization. It was to provide Boston with the best orchestral music, "to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable, but certainly to give Harvard University all that she needs in this line."

Now for more than half a century these purposes have been fulfilled. The Orchestra has rendered an incalculable enrichment to the life of Harvard; through recent years undergraduates of the College have coöperated, through their Glee Club, to this end; on the last Friday evening of January the local alumni of Harvard bore witness to their recognition of what the Orchestra has meant to them and to the community. A memorable dinner at the Harvard Club of Boston in honor of the conductor and members of the Orchestra gave eloquent expression to this feeling.

The occasion is described on later pages of this issue, but any recital of the facts of the matter should be supplemented by remarks which may more aptly be designated "views" than "news". The dinner was essentially a tribute to a noble art. It is a point of pride with Harvard that among its many agencies of education the civilizing influence of music has long held an important place. One of the merits of an urban university is that an abundance of good music is generally within reach. It is the peculiar blessing of Harvard that such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, from its beginning until the present day, has held the College as a special beneficiary of its gifts of pleasure and spiritual satisfaction. That the members of the club of which Major Higginson was the first president should serve as so definite a link between the Orchestra and Harvard is a fresh example of the eternal fitness of things.

The Harvard Club itself deserves the fullest measure of credit for the form in which its hospitable intent was cast. Every detail of insurance for the success of so large a dinner-party—including that rarest insurance against exhausting length—received the attention of effective forethought. The witty menu, in the guise of a concert program-book, should become a lasting memento. The atmosphere of every such gathering is an evanescent thing, defying translation into words, but the special aroma of it is sure, in this instance, to abide in many memories.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

FEB 7 - 1938

Boy Scout Anniversary This Week Brings Prominent Persons to Mike

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country yesterday to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over National Broadcasting Company networks in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time, beginning Saturday.

Internationally known as an organist, teacher of composition and lecturer, Mlle. Boulanger will be presented each Saturday from 10:30 to 11 A. M. over the NBC-Red Network. One of the outstanding figures in European musical circles, she is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau. She also is a chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1938

FAMOUS RUSSIAN CELLIST COMING TO PLAYHOUSE

Great men are apt to agree to disagree. That is why, when three famous men, a conductor, a composer, and a writer—representing the creative interpretative, and critical criteria of music—agree to call a musician "great," it is news.

It is, therefore, news that Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals" who plays here Wednesday, February 16 at the Playhouse, has been hailed as "great" by the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, by the most famous living composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman of the London Times.

Koussevitzky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest 'cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty of volume of tone that are without equal."

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 7 - 1938

Boston Symphony's Program Announced

Music by Haydn, Ravel and Sibelius will be heard in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday at 8:30 P. M. at the Montclair High School. The concert is the extra event in this season's series of concerts under the auspices of the Unity Institute Concert Course, of which Mrs. Edgar Swan Wiers is director. The orchestra will be conducted by its well known conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Ravel number, "Ma Mere l'Oye," is included in the program as a special tribute to the memory of the great French modernist, who died December 28.

The program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13)	Haydn
"Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose")	Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43	Sibelius

1/58

Ormandy Modestly Explains Why He Directs Minus Baton

B. Globe - Feb. 11/38

Conductor Scorns Affectations and Confesses He Always Prefers Piece Being Played

CONDUCTOR AND SPONSOR-HOST

Eugene Ormandy (right), conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is seen here with Walter S. Bucklin, president of the National Shawmut Bank of Boston. For two years the bank has sponsored the Philadelphia Orchestra in a radio broadcast. Mr. Ormandy was guest at a small luncheon at the bank yesterday after his arrival here for two concerts.

A chat with Eugene Ormandy leaves an impression that he is one of the most modest men who ever directed a symphony orchestra. His alert but unobstrusive manner and his considered speech also suggest that he represents a generation of artists to whom the musical future of these United States is to be closely bound.

There are some eminent masters of music who speak, however sincerely, with a certain amount of "side" about the mysteries of the tonal art. Not so Eugene Ormandy, who communicates cogent ideas with the utmost simplicity and directness. Hungarian by birth, American by transplantation, he has made his career as conductor entirely on this side of the Atlantic. If his dignified courtesy naturally reflects his European background, his quick humor and his mental attitude indicate that he has absorbed much of the gusto which, we are told, characterizes the American.

Mishap Suggested Change

Mr. Ormandy's first visit to Boston brings him as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, one of the three foremost symphonic organizations in the world today. This afternoon and tomorrow night at Symphony Hall Bostonians will have their first opportunity to sample his work on their home grounds.

There is not a trace of vanity or pretense about the man. He conducts now without score or baton.

"I am not especially proud of my memory," says Mr. Ormandy, "but it is simply part of me. I do not use a score in performance because I feel that every time you look at it you break a sort of communication between your own eyes and those of the orchestra. In my mind, I see each page of the music as I go along.

"Last year something happened which made me give up the baton. It was in White Plains, where the stage was small. The cellos were placed so near me that when I gave an entrance signal to them my stick caught in one of their stands and flew into the audience. It was a long stick, one of several which Toscanini gave me some years ago.

"Well, there was no other stick, so I had to use just my hands. And at that minute the orchestra sounded more responsive than it ever had before. My wife, who was sitting in a box, later told me she noticed this, too. I conducted without a stick at the next concert, and surely enough, again they were more responsive.

Indulges No Preferences

"The answer, to my mind, lies in the fact that the Philadelphia Orchestra had been trained and brought to perfection by one man—Leopold Stokowski—who used no stick. It is plain that they could be most responsive to a conductor who employed only his hands. In this I am not trying to copy Stokowski, for I can be only myself."

The statement is typical of the man's candor. This same candor was exemplified a few minutes later when Mr. Ormandy confessed he has no especial musical preferences.

"Whatever we are playing at the moment seems the best music to me. Just the other day we were rehearsing Mozart's 'Haffner' Symphony. At the end, I was just about to speak to the orchestra when they started to laugh. They knew well I was going to say: 'Don't you think this is the most wonderful music ever written?'"

Mr. Ormandy likes jazz in its place, and believes that real jazz is an individual musical expression. But he quickly asserts that jazz and symphonic music cannot possibly be mingled without spoiling both.

American symphonic music, Mr. Ormandy believes, is making steady progress. Just this season he ran through 27 American scores and accepted five. Ten years ago, he says, he probably would have accepted them all. But a decade has made a great deal of improvement in compositional technic, and today standards are higher.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Cleveland Orchestra

This is a week of novelty hereabouts, orchestrally speaking. Last evening the Cleveland Orchestra conducted by the distinguished Dr. Artur Rodzinski played at Symphony Hall; this afternoon and tomorrow night the visiting Philadelphians will hold forth.

Dr. Rodzinski's first appearance in Boston was further signalized by what is said to have been the initial performance here of the closing scene from Richard Strauss' once debated opera, "Salome." The soprano soloist for this event was Rose Pauly, the strikingly dramatic Hungarian singer.

The program contained two other items by Strauss—"The Dance of the Seven Veils," likewise out of "Salome," and "Till Eulenspiegel." The first two numbers were Julius Wertheim's orchestral transcription of one of the two D minor Toccatas and Fugues that Bach wrote in his Weimar years, and the First Symphony by the Soviet Dmitri Shostakovitch.

Times have changed since "Salome" was a subject of bitter discussion nearly 30 years ago. Perhaps the marvelously depictive and emotional music can be better judged now than was possible when other considerations subordinated just appraisal of the score itself. At any rate, the music for the final scene is a blend of sheer beauty and macabre emphasis of a pathological character. As played by Dr. Rodzinski and the orchestra, and sung by Mme. Pauly, it was truly an event to stand in memory. Mme. Pauly's voice is large, lustrous and and of sensuous character. Although Strauss' tempestuous orchestra for the most part requires a singer to force her voice, Mme. Pauly brought out as much as possible of what is basically a form of cantilena. This was especially true in those last, horribly fascinating words addressed to the head of Jakanaan, where—incidentally—Mme. Pauly was permitted to display her excellent diction. She may rest assured that her first appearance here was wholly a success.

Dr. Rodzinski's orchestra is a well-disciplined group who play with the utmost precision. Wertheim's transcription of Bach—an ingenious imitation of organ effects applied to what is essentially a brilliant show-piece for that instrument—was performed with vivid color and unanimity.

Shostakovitch's Symphony, on the other hand, sounded completely different from what one remembered the only previous Boston performance of the work to have been.

Dr. Rodzinsky secured a performance notable for clarity of details and outline.

There may have been some in last night's audience who took exception to Dr. Rodzinski's reading of Strauss. His treatment is essentially songful, stressing the flow of melody and of rhythm, and yet highly dramatic. In one listener's judgment this accounted in good part for the irresistible power of the "Salome" music. Conversely, "Till Eulenspiegel" fared less well, with tempi that sometimes were too fast and with some unusual details of orchestral balance. "Till" demands, above all, a definitely calculated interpretation to make the most of its hard wit. Otherwise the concert was both stimulating and rewarding.

C. W. D.

B. Her. Feb. 11/38

MUSIC

By Alexander Williams

CLEVELAND ORCHESTRA

The Cleveland Orchestra, Artur Rodzinski, conductor, visited Boston last night for a concert in Symphony hall. The soloist was Rose Pauly, soprano. The program was as follows:

Bach......Toccata and Fugue in D minor, orchestrated by Julius Wertheim
Shostakovich..........Symphony Op. 10
Strauss....Dance of the Seven Veils and Final Scene from "Salome"
Strauss..."Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"

As the record has it, the Cleveland orchestra has not visited Boston for nearly 12 years. In point of fact it has twice recently come as near as Wellesley, but the hall there is not suitable for orchestral concerts. We had not appreciated the merits of this excellent orchestra until the concert of last night. It is an organization of which Cleveland may well be proud, and a larger audience should certainly have been present to do it honor.

This is a week of orchestral comparisons, what with our own orchestra out of town and the visits of the Cleveland and Philadelphia organizations. A cautious listener will have recognized that the Cleveland orchestra, fine though it is, sometimes lacks the perfect sonority which is the ultimate goal. The individual instruments are good, and there is no discrepancy when an important solo is played. The woodwinds seemed to us to be an unusually fine group. In the Bach there was at times a lack of precision, which was not a fault that obtruded during the rest of the concert.

Mr. Rodzinski is clearly a studious and intelligent conductor. He is responsible for the brilliance of the present orchestra. At times, however, his interpretations are a little rectangular. They lacked, in the "Till Eulenspiegel," for example, ...thmic surge and pointed brilliance which can so enliven this score. In other words it was a good performance, without being a great one, workmanlike without being inspired.

The most interesting and rewarding event of the evening came with the first performance here of the last scene from Strauss' "Salome." Here the orchestra was in capital—at times almost too exuberant—form. Furthermore, it had a soloist, Mme. Rosa Pauly, who has recently swept New York with her singing of "Elektra." She has a magnificent voice and used it with splendid dramatic effect in the voluptuous music of Strauss. The fight 30 years ago over "Salome" seems pointless now, though it is still news and is retold frequently as though it were of absorbing interest. The lushness and emotional realism of Strauss's operatic scores are an old story. Undeniably last night's performance was an exciting story into the bargain. That, moreover, is what Strauss's operas—except the "Rosenkavalier"—should be at their best, though there is no need to write about them as though they were the sublimest art.

Shostakovich's youthful Symphony was a poor choice for this concert. It has many leanings toward Strauss, but lacks the sincerity or timeliness and is old hat while purporting to be the last word. If Shostakovich is a good composer, it would be kinder to play his later work, in spite of the popular appeal of parts of this Symphony. It is a vapid score, and repetition only emphasizes that fact.

HARVARD ALUMNI BULLETIN

OFFICIAL PUBLICATION OF THE HARVARD ALUMNI ASSOCIATION AND OF THE ASSOCIATED HARVARD CLUBS

For the opinions expressed in the editorial columns the editors alone are responsible.

VOLUME XL. FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1938. NUMBER 17.

News and Views

The Symphony Dinner. Nearly fifty-seven years ago, in the spring before the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the sponsorship of Henry Lee Higginson, gave its first concert, he wrote a statement of his purposes in establishing this organization. It was to provide Boston with the best orchestral music, "to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable, but certainly to give Harvard University all that she needs in this line."

Now for more than half a century these purposes have been fulfilled. The Orchestra has rendered an incalculable enrichment to the life of Harvard; through recent years undergraduates of the College have coöperated, through their Glee Club, to this end; on the last Friday evening of January the local alumni of Harvard bore witness to their recognition of what the Orchestra has meant to them and to the community. A memorable dinner at the Harvard Club of Boston in honor of the conductor and members of the Orchestra gave eloquent expression to this feeling.

The occasion is described on later pages of this issue, but any recital of the facts of the matter should be supplemented by remarks which may more aptly be designated "views" than "news". The dinner was essentially a tribute to a noble art. It is a point of pride with Harvard that among its many agencies of education the civilizing influence of music has long held an important place. One of the merits of an urban university is that an abundance of good music is generally within reach. It is the peculiar blessing of Harvard that such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony, from its beginning until the present day, has held the College as a special beneficiary of its gifts of pleasure and spiritual satisfaction. That the members of the club of which Major Higginson was the first president should serve as so definite a link between the Orchestra and Harvard is a fresh example of the eternal fitness of things.

The Harvard Club itself deserves the fullest measure of credit for the form in which its hospitable intent was cast. Every detail of insurance for the success of so large a dinner-party—including that rarest insurance against exhausting length—received the attention of effective forethought. The witty menu, in the guise of a concert program-book, should become a lasting memento. The atmosphere of every such gathering is an evanescent thing, defying translation into words, but the special aroma of it is sure, in this instance, to abide in many memories.

RICHMOND, VA.
NEWS LEADER

FEB 7 - 1938

Boy Scout Anniversary This Week Brings Prominent Persons to Mike

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country yesterday to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be heard over National Broadcasting Company networks in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the sixteenth century to the present time, beginning Saturday.

Internationally known as an organist, teacher of composition and lecturer, Mlle. Boulanger will be presented each Saturday from 10:30 to 11 A. M. over the NBC-Red Network. One of the outstanding figures in European musical circles, she is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau. She also is a chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

FEB 3 - 1938

FAMOUS RUSSIAN CELLIST COMING TO PLAYHOUSE

Great men are apt to agree to disagree. That is why, when three famous men, a conductor, a composer, and a writer—representing the creative interpretative, and critical criteria of music—agree to call a musician "great," it is news.

It is, therefore, news that Gregor Piatigorsky, the "Russian Casals" who plays here Wednesday, February 16 at the Playhouse, has been hailed as "great" by the distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, by the most famous living composer, Richard Strauss, and by the dean of critics, Ernest Newman of the London Times.

Koussevitzky stated publicly: "Piatigorsky is the greatest 'cellist of our day. He combines high artistry with unlimited technical skill, great depths of feeling and poetry with the beauty of volume of tone that are without equal."

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 7 - 1938

Boston Symphony's Program Announced

Music by Haydn, Ravel and Sibelius will be heard in the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Wednesday at 8:30 P. M. at the Montclair High School. The concert is the extra event in this season's series of concerts under the auspices of the Unity Institute Concert Course, of which Mrs. Edgar Swan Wiers is director. The orchestra will be conducted by its well known conductor, Serge Koussevitzky.

The Ravel number, "Ma Mere l'Oye," is included in the program as a special tribute to the memory of the great French modernist, who died December 28.

The program:

Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13) Haydn
"Ma Mere l'Oye" (Mother Goose") Ravel
Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43 Sibelius

Phila. Forum
Phila. . .

(159)

JAN - 1938

The Philadelphia Forum Program for January

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY'S annual visit to The Philadelphia Forum has become one of the outstanding features of this city's musical life. The combination of a great permanent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and an unsurpassed personnel preserved almost intact from season to season has given Boston one of the supreme symphony orchestras of all musical history. Their 1938 visit to The Forum will take place on Wednesday evening January 5, and the program will be:

Haydn—
Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13)
- I. Adagio; Allegro
- II. Largo
- III. Menuetto; Trio
- IV. Finale; Allegro con spirito

Prokofieff—
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
- I. Birth of Kije
- II. Romance
- III. Kije's Wedding
- IV. Troika
- V. Burial of Kije

INTERMISSION

Brahms—Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68
- I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
- II. Andante sostenuto
- III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
- IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

Opinions

When violence is used to bring about economic and political reform, the method of force must be employed to keep the new government in power. —JOHN DEWEY.

Creative minds have a desperate time dragging along the reluctant mass of mankind.
—HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK.

Today the United States cannot be neutral in any controversey between nations anywhere in the world. —JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS.

The next war will be a naval and air war, and President Roosevelt's love of the Navy is well known. —HARRY ELMER BARNES.

Humanity everywhere is hungry both for a new freedom and a new discipline.
—HENRY A. WALLACE.

The real test of the system of dictatorship comes with the aging of the first dictator; still more with the succession of the second and the third. —LORD HERBERT SAMUEL.

The Democratic Party can remain in power only so long as business is good.
—ROGER W. BABSON.

America, judged by Old World standards, has produced few fine songs.
—REINALD WERRENRATH.

There never was a time when the good relations of the British empire and the United States stood so high as today.
—WINSTON CHURCHILL.

Art has nothing whatsoever to do with social troubles. Real art is abstract with no relation to material things.—SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY.

There is a death by violence in the United States every 40 minutes.—J. EDGAR HOOVER.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

[illegible] 9 - [illegible]

Nadia Boulanger Kept Gershwin at American Music

Cambridge, Mass., Feb. 9.—(AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her ten years ago, while he was writing his "Americans In Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 18 and 19.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

FEB 6 - 1938

Passion According To St. Matthew By Bach Recorded At Boston

Bowing to the pyramiding enthusiasm for the works of Johann Sebastian Bach, Victor this month releases its album of records M 411, the first volume of the Passion according to St. Matthew. The Boston Symphony is under the able leadership of Serge Koussevitzsky, and is assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth.

The St. Matthew Passion was completed in its present form in the year 1740, when Bach was at the height of his powers and his personality was matured. The Passion is to many people the cumulative affirmation of the reverence and devotion of a great soul. It ranks among the timeless masterworks in the field of music.

Owing to the tremendous technical difficulties of the work, though, and the physical inadequacy of all but the most highly trained of choirs and accompanists to perform the St. Matthew Passion, it is seldom given. Certainly one hears it far too infrequently to know it as one would like to. Victor is due a vote of thanks for making the Passion music available for study and appreciation, in such a masterly presentation.

Album M 411 follows the score, without cuts, from the opening chords almost through the first part, leaving off only the final chorus of Part One, "O Man, Bewail Thy Grievous Sin." Presumably that will be included in Volume Two of the Passion, whenever Victor releases it.

This recording was made at an actual performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, and was the result of months of preparation. The few inevitable rustlings and smothered coughings between sections do not detract, but curiously give one the illusion of being present at the performance.

The whole reading is marked by a deep reverence. Orchestra, soloists and chorus seem to realize their opportunity of making what will doubtless be the definitive recording of the St. Matthew Passion for some time to come. The two choruses bring to bear a massed power and beauty that highlights the choral passages, which are among the most lovely of the work. The soloists carry the narrative with compelling emotional intensity against the background of a harpsichord, or harpsichord and oboe, sometimes a capella, sometimes against the full orchestra. Particularly fine is the bass voice which speaks the words of Jesus in the recitatives. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzsky is completely satisfying, as one would expect. Its function in the Passion is to support the chorus rather than to exhibit its own magnificence. But whatever its role, the Boston Symphony Orchestra can't obscure its own quality of tone, its attributes of musicianship which have justly made it one of the world's very great symphonic bodies.

When this monumental recording has been released in full, it will replace the abbreviated version of the St. Matthew Passion put on Victor records some years ago. But in the opinion of this column, it will be a long, long time before the present album, M and-or AM 411, will be replaced by anything. This department is eagerly awaiting the release of the next volume.

BEN S. PARKER JR.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

- 1938

Boston Symphony to Give Rutgers Concert Tonight

Special to Newark News.

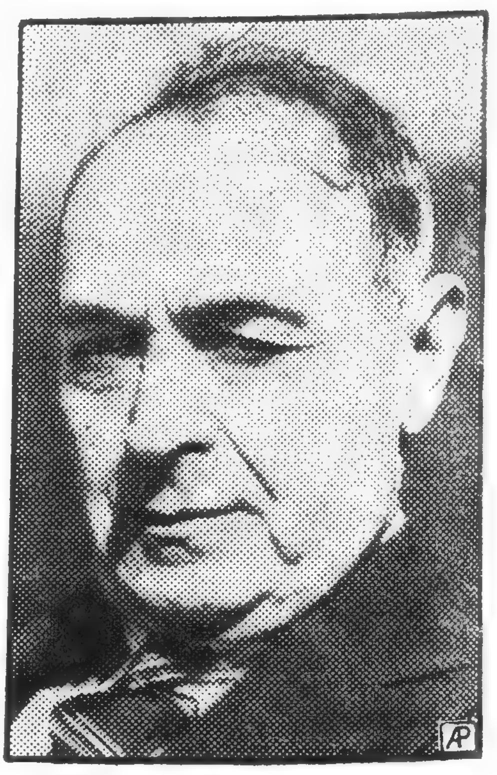
NEW BRUNSWICK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in the fourth concert of the Rutgers University series tonight in Rutgers gymnasium. It will be the group's fourth appearance in the Rutgers series.

The program will include music by aMurice Ravel, French composer who died last December and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in New York and Boston have been dedicated the last two weeks.

Koussevitzky was awarded an honorary degree of doctor of music at the Rutgers concert last year.

The last concert of the series will feature a string trio of Harold Bauer, Albert Spalding and Gaspar Cassado, February 21.

CONDUCTOR



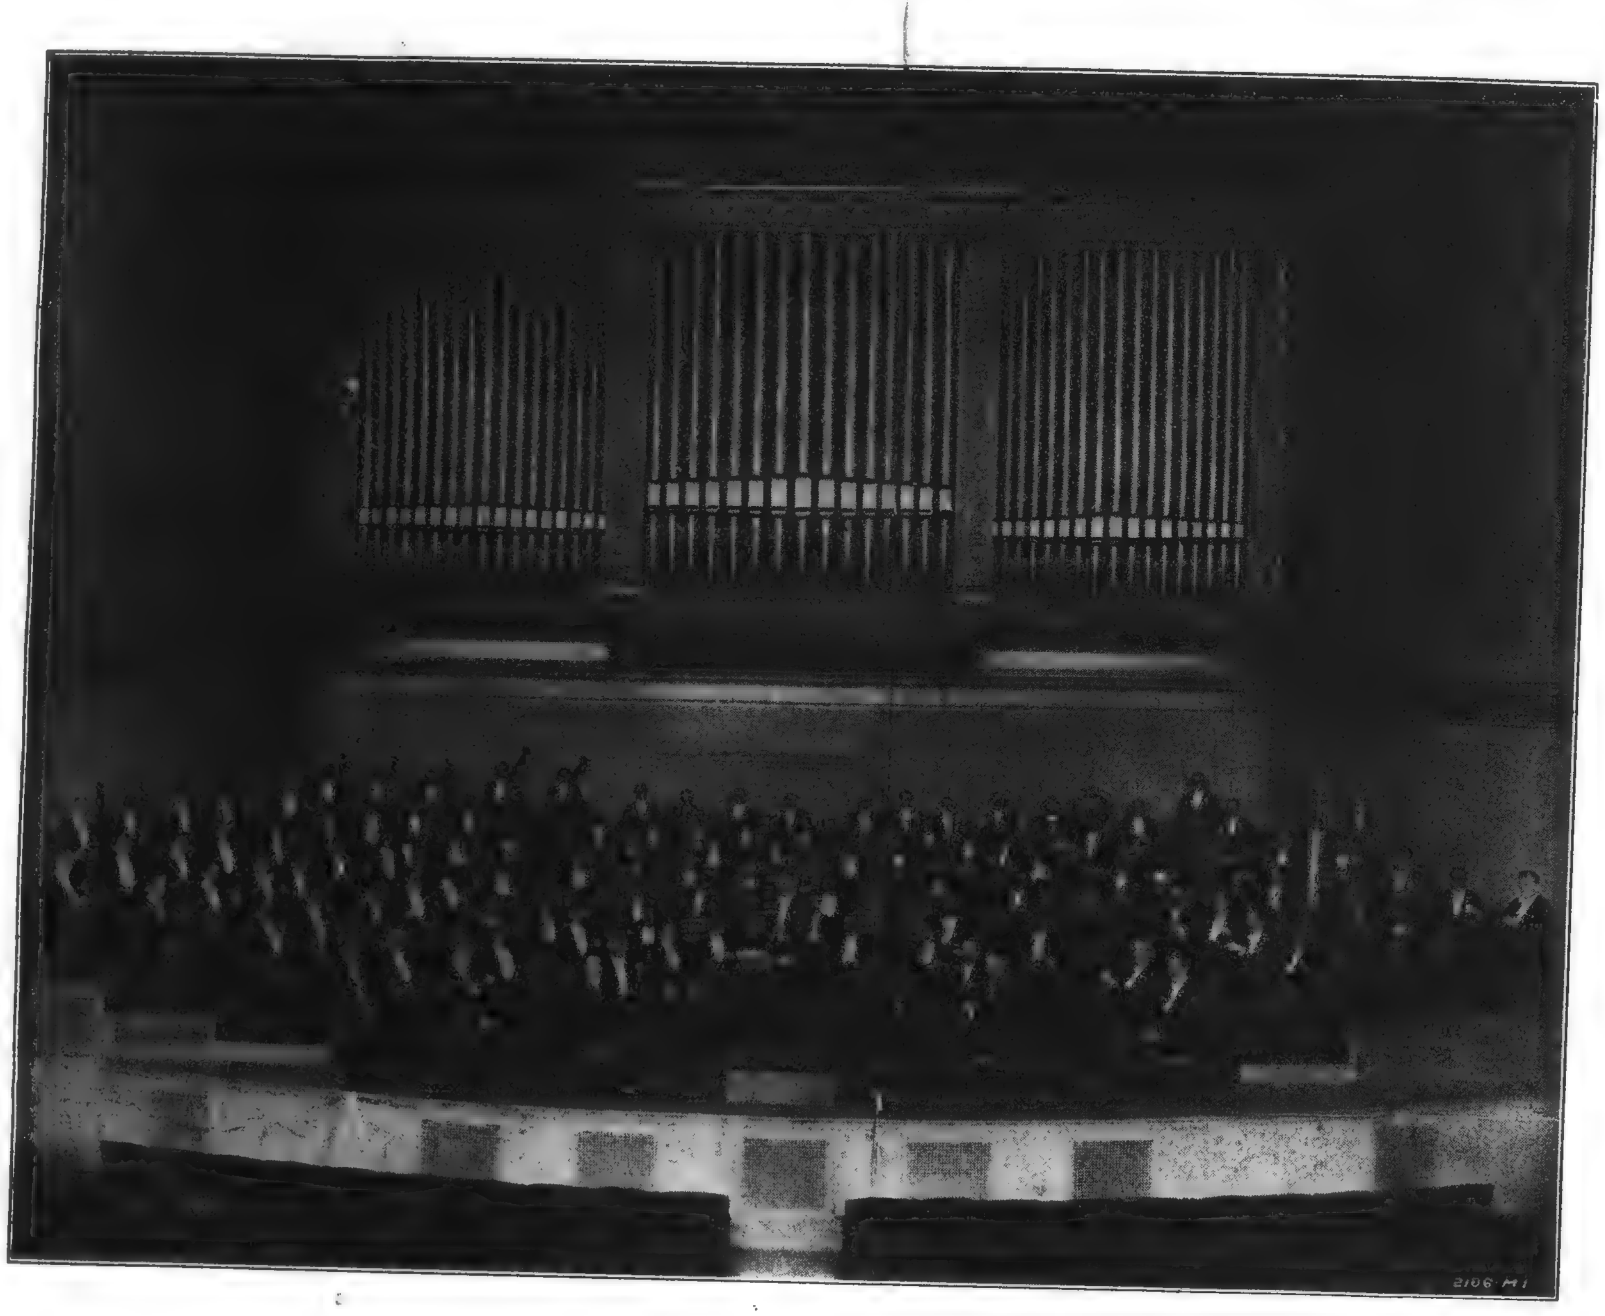
SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, directing the Boston Symphony in a concert tomorrow night at 8:30 in Montclair High School, under Unity auspices. The program includes works by Haydn, Ravel and Sibelius. The concert follows that given tonight by the orchestra in Rutgers Gymnasium, New Brunswick.

Phila. Forum mag.
Phila, Pa.

159

JAN - 1938

The Philadelphia Forum Program for January



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

The Boston Symphony's annual visit to The Philadelphia Forum has become one of the outstanding features of this city's musical life. The combination of a great permanent conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, and an unsurpassed personnel preserved almost intact from season to season has given Boston one of the supreme symphony orchestras of all musical history. Their 1938 visit to The Forum will take place on Wednesday evening January 5, and the program will be:

Haydn—
Symphony in G major, No. 88 (B. & H. No. 13)
  I. Adagio; Allegro
  II. Largo
  III. Menuetto; Trio
  IV. Finale; Allegro con spirito
Prokofieff—
"Lieutenant Kije," Orchestral Suite, Op. 60
  I. Birth of Kije
  II. Romance
  III. Kije's Wedding
  IV. Troika
  V. Burial of Kije

INTERMISSION

Brahms—Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Opus 68
  I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
  II. Andante sostenuto
  III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
  IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
MORNING NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

Opinions

When violence is used to bring about economic and political reform, the method of force must be employed to keep the new government in power. —JOHN DEWEY.

Creative minds have a desperate time dragging along the reluctant mass of mankind.
—HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK.

Today the United States cannot be neutral in any controversey between nations anywhere in the world. —JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS.

The next war will be a naval and air war, and President Roosevelt's love of the Navy is well known. —HARRY ELMER BARNES.

Humanity everywhere is hungry both for a new freedom and a new discipline.
—HENRY A. WALLACE.

The real test of the system of dictatorship comes with the aging of the first dictator; still more with the succession of the second and the third. —LORD HERBERT SAMUEL.

The Democratic Party can remain in power only so long as business is good.
—ROGER W. BABSON.

America, judged by Old World standards, has produced few fine songs.
—REINALD WERRENRATH.

There never was a time when the good relations of the British empire and the United States stood so high as today.
—WINSTON CHURCHILL.

Art has nothing whatsoever to do with social troubles. Real art is abstract with no relation to material things.—SERGEI KOUSSEVITSKY.

There is a death by violence in the United States every 40 minutes.—J. EDGAR HOOVER.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 9 - 1938

Nadia Boulanger Kept Gershwin at American Music

Cambridge, Mass., Feb. 9.—(AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her ten years ago, while he was writing his "Americans In Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on February 18 and 19.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

FEB 6 - 1938

Passion According To St. Matthew By Bach Recorded At Boston

Bowing to the pyramiding enthusiasm for the works of Johann Sebastian Bach, Victor this month releases its album of records M 411, the first volume of the Passion according to St. Matthew. The Boston Symphony is under the able leadership of Serge Koussevitzky, and is assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, under the direction of G. Wallace Woodworth.

The St. Matthew Passion was completed in its present form in the year 1740, when Bach was at the height of his powers and his personality was matured. The Passion is to many people the cumulative affirmation of the reverence and devotion of a great soul. It ranks among the timeless masterworks in the field of music.

Owing to the tremendous technical difficulties of the work, though, and the physical inadequacy of all but the most highly trained of choirs and accompanists to perform the St. Matthew Passion, it is seldom given. Certainly one hears it far too infrequently to know it as one would like to. Victor is due a vote of thanks for making the Passion music available for study and appreciation, in such a masterly presentation.

Album M 411 follows the score, without cuts, from the opening chords almost through the first part, leaving off only the final chorus of Part One, "O Man, Bewail Thy Grievous Sin." Presumably that will be included in Volume Two of the Passion, whenever Victor releases it.

This recording was made at an actual performance in Symphony Hall, Boston, and was the result of months of preparation. The few inevitable rustlings and smothered coughings between sections do not detract, but curiously give one the illusion of being present at the performance.

The whole reading is marked by a deep reverence. Orchestra, soloists and chorus seem to realize their opportunity of making what will doubtless be the definitive recording of the St. Matthew Passion for some time to come. The two choruses bring to bear a massed power and beauty that highlights the choral passages, which are among the most lovely of the work. The soloists carry the narrative with compelling emotional intensity against the background of a harpsichord, or harpsichord and oboe, sometimes a capella, sometimes against the full orchestra. Particularly fine is the bass voice which speaks the words of Jesus in the recitatives. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzsky is completely satisfying, as one would expect. Its function in the Passion is to support the chorus rather than to exhibit its own magnificence. But whatever its role, the Boston Symphony Orchestra can't obscure its own quality of tone, its attributes of musicianship which have justly made it one of the world's very great symphonic bodies.

When this monumental recording has been released in full, it will replace the abbreviated version of the St. Matthew Passion put on Victor records some years ago. But in the opinion of this column, it will be a long, long time before the present album, M and-or AM 411, will be replaced by anything. This department is eagerly awaiting the release of the next volume.

BEN S. PARKER JR.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

Boston Symphony to Give Rutgers Concert Tonight

Special to Newark News.

NEW BRUNSWICK—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, will appear in the fourth concert of the Rutgers University series tonight in Rutgers gymnasium. It will be the group's fourth appearance in the Rutgers series.

The program will include music by aMurice Ravel, French composer who died last December and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in New York and Boston have been dedicated the last two weeks.

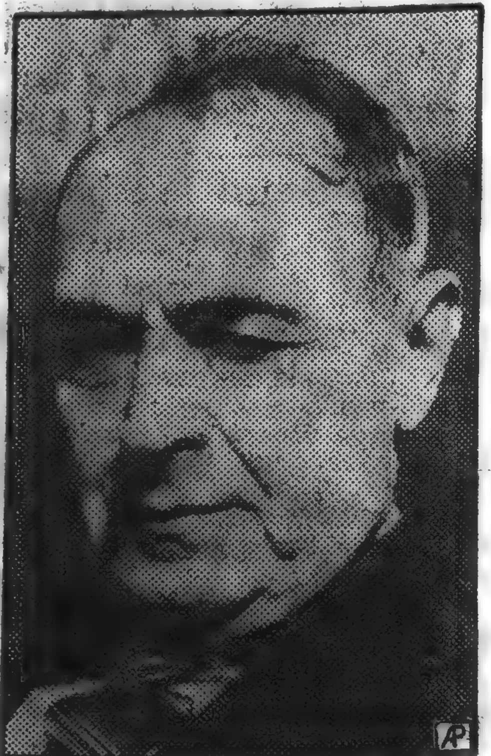
Koussevitzky was awarded an honorary degree of doctor of music at the Rutgers concert last year.

The last concert of the series will feature a string trio of Harold Bauer, Albert Spalding and Gaspar Cassado, February 21.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 8 - 1938

CONDUCTOR



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, directing the Boston Symphony in a concert tomorrow night at 8:30 in Montclair High School, under Unity auspices. The program include works by Haydn, Ravel and Sibelius. The concert follows that given tonight by the orchestra in Rutgers Gymnasium, New Brunswick.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

FEB 9 - 1938

Koussevitzky Scores Triumph With Ravel 'Daphnis and Chloe'

Brilliant Interpretation of Ballet Suite by Boston Symphony Overshadows Sibelius 'Pastoral;' Record Crowd Applauds Performance

By CLIFFORD B. ROSS

The largest audience of music lovers ever assembled in Rutgers concert history was quite unprepared for the emotional thrill it experienced last night at the Rutgers gymnasium when Serge Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony through the Second Suite of Ravel's Daphnis and Chloe music.

Koussevitzky, a name second only to Toscanini in symphonic conductorship, seared the name of Maurice Ravel in the minds of over 3,200 patrons. This is as it should be for so great was the dynamic force of the late French composer's music that it completely obliterated the well-balanced and graceful strains of Mozart's charming little "Prague Symphony." And the Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D Major (Opus 43), which was obviously arranged as the piece de resistance of the program, could only serve as an anti-climax to Ravel's astonishing flood of sound.

The Daphnis and Chloe suite, composed in 1910 for Diaghileff's Ballet Russe, takes its place as one of the greatest twentieth century compositions. There is no room for questioning it as the outstanding landmark in modern music, and as interpreted by the Boston Symphony it was recently described as one "of the seven wonders of the twentieth century."

The rendition was an unparalleled experience for the usual New Brunswick-Rutgers concert-goe who have listened long in tl Bach-Beethoven-Brahms traditio It was a triumph of contemporar composition. They were made cor scious of the fact that Ravel's nam stands for something much greate in modern music than the trit "Bolero;" they were forced to rec ognize his genius as worthy of the company of Stravinsky, Strauss and Sibelius in contemporary tonal art.

The performance of the ballet suite indicated the unquestioned estate of the Boston ensemble of 110 pieces in the music of Ravel. Written in the impressionistic harmonic idiom, the composition relies on its shimmering tone colors and Ravel's inimitable genius for orchestration in producing a catharsis in the listener's reactions. And under the fiery leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra was able to create the musical idea of Ravel into a scintillating unity of adamantine brilliancy.

The opening passage, "Daybreak," was exquisitely tender and nostalgic, faintly reminiscent of Debussy and Delius in its ability to recapture the fresh sounds of nature and to create a pastoral idyll. The orchestra's strings gave its rich opulent tones a luscious quality which completely identified the ballet's delineation: "No sound but the murmur of rivulets fed by the dew that trickles from the rocks. . . . Little by little the day dawns. The songs of birds are heard. Afar off a shepherd leads his flock."

But suddenly, following a short flute theme, Ravel releases a torrent of frenetic sound without musical precedence in its mad, whirling, delirious course. It is the descriptive music of a dance and as the dance becomes more animated, the music becomes more violent and deranged until it approaches demoniacal orgies of crashing notes. Climaxes of sound were piled on top of each other as the magnificent brass section of the orchestra rushed through the electrifying piece creating a nervous excitement that bordered on an emotional exhaustion.

And when the composition was at last completed, the tumult that burst forth was the greatest ever heard in Rutgers concert history.

Sibelius Symphony

The Sibelius Symphony was placed in an unfavorable position on the program following such a tour de force as the Ravel composition. But it really succeeded in making the departure from the rigid mold of concerts a complete triumph inasmuch as placing major compositions of Ravel and Sibelius on the same program is still a thing unheard-of throughout the provinces.

Sometimes called his "pastoral" symphony, Sibelius has done something more than paint tone panoramas of his native Finnish landscapes, of sombre skies and long nights. The moving power of the work is the strong national character suggestive of the aroused patriotism of "Finlandia." And it takes a Koussevitzky to interpret it as such and not a Toscanini who, when he performed it over the radio recently, led one commentator to say "it became pastoral, gay and even sunny."

As interpreted by the Boston Symphony, the strong national spirit, so omnipresent in the music of the living Finnish master, was blended with the "images and atmosphere of fjords and crag and gray unfriendly seas, of sparsely-covered meadows and acrid salt marshes," which the symphony always evokes. There is no evidence in the symphony of sunny Italy or pastoral serenity, despite the fact it was composed by the author while spending a spring in Italy on the Mediterranean.

The crazy quilt of varied tempi, unrelated accelerations and retards together with the fitful alarrums which have led many to describe Sibelius symphonies as "strange music" without regard for orchestration, became a living and new force far removed from the logical sequence of a Mozart concerto or a Bach fugue.

The bite of the string section, the unsurpassed brilliancy of the brass in fortissimo, made the dramatic conclusion of the work a blazing proclamation of triumph. Never passionate, and often stark cold, the thematic material was given a full-blooded treatment which made the creation somehow moving.

Mozart's Symphony

The graceful and elegant Mozart symphony, so typical of 18th century formality in art, was too delicate for the characteristic driving performance of Dr. Koussevitzky, a force which makes him such a past master of Tschaikowsky and Wagner. His tempo was too impetuous for the Mozart work, written in only three movements—without a minuet incidentally. And the rendition was given without recognition for the grace and subtle nuances of the Mozart music.

In the throng present to hear this high water mark in Rutgers concerts was Roy Harris, distinguished contemporary American composer, whose highly intellectual music is striving for a place as the leader of the current American scene.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

FEB 9 - 1938

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour and will repeat in New York the programs recently presented in Boston in memory of Maurice Ravel, the lamented French composer. There will be no lack of symphonic music, however as two visiting orchestras under practiced conductors will be heard. Tomorrow evening to Symphony hall comes the Cleveland Symphony orchestra under Artur Rodzinski. Assisting soloist will be Rose Pauly, new soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, who is to sing numbers from Strauss' "Salome." In concert performance, at any rate, there will be no puritanical objections. The First Symphony of the Russian Shostakovitch will also be on the program as well as the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Strauss.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 10 1938

Boston Symphony

Famous Orchestra Under Koussevitzky Stirs Montclair Unity Course Audience

BY CHARLES HAUFLER

It apparently takes more than a small hall to cramp the style of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The famous organization departed from its regular itinerary to pay a visit to Montclair last night and found itself in the comparative confines of the high school auditorium of the town.

It was a special event in the Unity Institute series, the stage of the hall was extended to accommodate the orchestra's ample membership, a capacity audience was on hand and conditions were accepted with the best of grace by both the musicians and listeners. The result was a delightful, exhilarating evening.

Perhaps the audience was more to be congratulated on its generous attitude than the orchestra. Many were seated under the very heels of the performers. Those best situated were not hearing the instrumentalists at their best. But it's not often one can avail himself of enjoying so superlative a body of musicians so near his own door. It was a treat not to be missed and must as well have been an illuminating eye-opener to those whose only prior acquaintance with the Bostonians had been via the radio.

The orchestra's presiding genius, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, arranged for the occasion a program which doubtless was heartily approved by Montclair's discriminating concertgoers before the concert. His interpretation of it certainly was, for the applause was enthusiastic and rose to an ovation at the close of the evening. A mighty climax was reached in the playing of Sibelius's Second Symphony and the orchestra fairly overwhelmed listeners, who recalled the conductor several times and seemed reluctant to take leave of the instrumentalists.

Hadyn's G Major

The offerings were of the happiest contrast in addition to being of outstanding appeal. For an opener the program had Haydn's G Major Sympony, identified as "The Clock" among that prolific composer's writings for orchestra. Its cheery, graceful measures hardly need any description at this date and continue to charm the ear as completely as ever they have. At the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men it is heard at its brightest and most spontaneous, its clear melodic line and naive spirit presented with utmost effectiveness.

It was a far cry to the intermediate number, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, which enveloped listeners in a mood of lovely fantasy. The work is an example of the very essence of the skill of the modern French school in creating highly sensitized "atmosphere" and held the audience rapt during its deft, bizarre projection of amusing, touching nursery rhyme figures and their affairs. At times it attained heights of serene lyric beauty. The sensitiveness of the musicians to the delicate, evanescent effects and their mastery in tone coloring were revelations.

From this they went to the surging, dramatic phrases of the Sibelius work. The full brilliance and capacity for expressive depths of the orchestra were manifest here. The great Finnish composer seems to have in the D Major Symphony a powerful patriotic message to deliver and his natural sturdiness asserts itself with fire and a soaring majesty seldom met in the concert hall. Those who were present last night will not soon forget the stirring quality of the last two movements with their forceful melodic theme carrying the work to inspired heighths. It was an appropriate finale to an evening of fine music.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
TIMES - PICAYUNE

A glance at the programs offered in New York during the past week reveals that the old standbys are still like more horns in the Brahms. "Eroica" had several hearings and Tschaikowsky was well represented. Brahms' Third was also played a number of times and Berlioz, Franck, Bach, Sibelius and Strauss figured prominently throughout the week.

The Boston Symphony and Dr. Koussevitsky provided most of the novelties during the period. Performing with the Helsinki Univer- ity Chorus of Finland, the orches- ra presented Sibelius' "The Captive Queen" and "The Origin of Fire."

One of the most attractive offer- ngs of the past week in the me- ropolis must have been the perfor- nances of the London Intimate Op- ra Company. This group presented series of one-act operas, including Thomas and Sally," by Arne; "True Blue, or the Press Gang," by Henry arey; "The Brickdust Man," by harles Dibdin, and Purcell's "Don uixote."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 9 - 1938

Got Gershwin to Stick to American Style Music

Cambridge, Mass., Feb. 9.—(AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her 10 years ago, while he was writing his "Americans in Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great a risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18 and 19.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

Gave Gershwin Advice On American Music

CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 9 (AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her 10 years ago, while he was writing his "Americans in Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great a risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. ~~18 and 19~~.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

FEB 10 1938

CASTS AND FORECASTS:

Majestic's Fourth Opera Season to Open

Notes Afield.

New York Events.—The Lyceum will have the only Thursday drama opening on Broadway, that being "Roosty," in which William Harrigan, Katherine Emery and Russell Hardie have important roles. Martin Berkeley wrote the play. . . . Flagstad will be soloist with the Philharmonic-Symphony Thursday evening. The program will include Overture to Schubert's "Alphonso and Estrella," recitative and aira of Beethoven's "Ah, Perfido," Mozart's Symphony No. 38 in D and excerpts from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." . . . Jan Kiepura, Polish tenor, will make his Metropolitan debut Thursday night in "La Boheme," with Bidu Sayao opposite. . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a Ravel memorial concert Thursday evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

FEB 9 - 1938

WOODBRIDGE

The Men's club, Trinity Episcopal hurch, will hold a dinner meeting night at 7 o'clock in Trinity parish ouse.

Fortnightly Guild of the Methodist piscopal church served 125 persons a Valentine luncheon yesterday in e Sunday school room. The table corations were in keeping with the casion. Mrs. Russell Lorch was eneral chairman.

A rehearsal for the entire cast of e minstrel to be presented by St. ames' parish will be held tomorrow ight at St. James' auditorium at 8 clock. Al Ritter, coach and director, ill be in charge. The minstrel will e presented on the night of Jan. 27. Shell Employes association will hold dance Friday night in St. James' uditorium. Eddie Poulsen's well nown radio orchestra will play for e dancing. P. Shaul is general airman.

The Sunday school board of the M. church held its monthly meeting st night at the home of Mrs. Justin Marsh in Cedar street, with the superntendent, P. H. Locker, presiding. lans were made for the short sketch o be presented at the Sunday school ervices on Missionary Sunday, March , by Mrs. H. P. Traill's Sunday chool class. Mrs. Ralph Stauffer and Miss Kathryn Spencer were appointed s co-chairmen for the Easter exerises of the Sunday school. The next neeting will be March 8 at the home f Mrs. Russell Lorch, Rahway venue.

The Jeffersonian club will meet tomorrow night at 8 o'clock at the home of Mrs. James J. Dunne, Green treet. Election of officers will take lace.

The Eunice Bloomfield Society of he C. A. R. will meet Friday afternoon at 4 o'clock at the home of the enior president, Mrs. George R. Merill, Elmwood avenue.

Mrs. R. C. Tyrrell and son, Alfred, of Tisdale place have returned after a few days visit wiht relatives at Binghamton, N. Y.

Mrs. Jeanette Randolph of Sewaren was named prize winner in the miscellaneous club being conducted by Sigma Alpha Phi Sorority, Phi Alumnae Chapter, First Congregational hurch, at Monday night's meeting.

Among the local people seen at the Boston Symphony concert given at Rutgers University in New Brunswick, ast night, were Mr. and Mrs. James A. Compton, Mr. and Mrs. Asher F. Randolph, Mrs. Garret Brodhead, Misses Martha Morrow, Ruth Erb and Helen Pfeiffer.

St. James Columbus Cadets will meet in regular session tonight at 7:15 o'clock in St. James' auditorium. Following the meeting the basketball team will play the Columbus Cadets f New Brunswick team. The game s scheduled to get under way at 8:15 o'clock. The public is invited to attend. A small admission fee will be charged.

Miss Jean Liddle of Sea Girt and Miss Marjorie Hayes of Spring Lake re visiting Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Ranolph of Rahway avenue for a few ays.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

Kept Gershwin Writing Typical American Music

CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 9 (AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her 10 years ago, while he was writing his "Americans in Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great a risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18 and 19.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 11 1938

161

Mlle. Boulanger First Woman To Conduct Boston Symphony

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger

There has arrived in Boston, a famous conductor, composer and teacher, Mlle Nadia Boulanger who will conduct two performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Feb. 18 and 19, will guide musical aspirants of Wellesley, Radcliffe, Harvard and the Longy School to express themselves as composers, and to inform the public in a series of radio talks of what's what in music.

Mlle Boulanger is the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony. Many a time she has wielded the baton over orchestras in France. Last year she became the first woman to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra of London.

Speaking of her experiences, Mlle. Boulanger said:

"I forget that I am a woman. I am interested only in my job." Speaking of modern music, she added:

"People have a tendency to love what they are used to," she said. "They also have a great respect for sound. Music today may not have the sound that we are accustomed to, the sound of the music of Mozart, Wagner or Beethoven. It has far more similarity to the sound of the music in the 12th and 13th centuries.

Discipline Needed

"The great need in composing today," she continued, "is discipline. "No," she replied in answer to a question, "I am not the teacher of all the contemporary American composers. I just do what I can, nothing more. I've taught 34 years." Enjoy teaching? She shrugged her shoulders as only a Parisienne can. "Of course! If I did not, then my work, it is war!"

Asked her opinion of the jazz motifs used by such eminent composers as Artur Honneger and the late George Gershwin, Mlle, Boulanger quickly replied that it is always interesting to employ anything in music, if it is used in the right way.

Mlle. Boulanger enunciated her quick phrases with the trace of an accent. She was dressed all in black, double-breasted suit, with a blouse tailored in masculine fashion, and a four-in-hand tie. On her feet were lisle stockings, with clocks, and low-heeled oxfords. The severity of this ensemble was relieved in the true French manner, with a jeweled sunburst, a silver watch chain and the scarlet Legion of Honor ribbon on the lapel of her jacket.

A strong face has Mlle. Boulanger with a prominent chin, nose and forehead. Her brown eyes shine with enthusiasm. Her facial expression is mobile, now earnest, now amused. Her large mouth has a kindly, generous expression. On meeting her one is drawn to a sympathetic nature.

Third Visit to U. S.

This is Mlle. Boulanger's third visit to the United States. In 1925 she was here on concert tour. Last year she came over on an appointment from the French Government to study the teaching of music in American schools and colleges with a view to coordinating music teaching in both countries in order to aid American composers when they go to France for study.

Mlle. Boulanger studied at the Paris Conservatory, where her father and grandfather were professors of music. She is head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale, in Paris, and professor of harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, where she has interested Igor Stravinsky in her promising pupils.

Among her students are some of the most prominent American composers, including Aaron Copeland, Ross Lee Finney, Professor Walter Piston, Roy Harris, Professor Douglas Moore of Columbia, and Virgil Thomson. Harris attended last summer's Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Speaking of one of the works in which she is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, "Requiem" by Gabriel Faure, under whom she studied, Mlle. Boulanger said:

"Faure's work is of the first quality. People do not know him much because he never has been truly approached. We have been deceived by his simplicity. He is a pioneer in advanced development. Just let your heart go to him."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 10 1938

Kept Gershwin Writing Typical American Music

CAMBRIDGE, Feb. 9 (AP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician who arrived here to lecture on music at Radcliffe College, today told how she persuaded the late George Gershwin to continue writing music of an American flavor.

Gershwin, she said, came to her 10 years ago, while he was writing his "Americans in Paris," and asked to study with her.

"After seeing some of his distinctive work," she said, "I told him he would run too great a risk of losing his individuality.

"In trying what he wanted to do," she said, "he might have lost that which he already had, and with no certainty that he would succeed in the kind of work he thought he wanted to do."

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 18 and 19.

NEWARK, N. J.
STAR EAGLE
FEB 10 1938

Wilfred J. Funks Are Dinner Hosts

Entertain Before Concert

Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk of Montclair gave a small dinner at their home last evening before the Boston Symphony Orchester concert at Montclair High School.

Covers were laid for Mr. and Mrs. C. Everett Bacon and Mr. and Mrs. Chapin Marcus of Montclair and the hosts' son, Wilfred John Funk Jr., who is home from Princeton for a few days.

Mr. and Mrs. Chapin Marcus of 280 Upper Mountain avenue, Montclair, will spend the holiday and week-end in Wilmington, Del., as guests of Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Brown.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TELEGRAM
FEB 10 1938

WPA Co-Stars 'The Blue Danube' With Tschaikowsky Symphony

By SUSAN BREUL

The Bridgeport WPA orchestra last night at Central high school kept a tryst with its Seaside park patrons in a touch of the good, old summer time, a performance of "The Blue Danube Waltz," a veteran of many an out-door concert and worthy favorite in any season.

Companion feature to "the Blue Danube" was Tschaikowsky's fourth symphony which was followed by Liadow's "The Enchanted Lake" and songs by Verdi and Richard Strauss sung by Emily Roosevelt, soprano, of Stamford.

The hit of the evening and the most substantial piece on the program was the Tschaikowsky symphony which can boast not only Tschaikowsky's enviable emotional stimuli but an admirable workmanship and ingenuity with which his other symphonies are not so generously provided.

This fourth symphony, beloved of Serge Koussevitsky, is a happy welding of musical and human values. It has the sweep of the "Pathetique," which endears Tschaikowsky symphonies to the music lover. And it has the qualities which musicians most admire in Tschaikowsky, his canny use of striking rhythmic combinations and his ability to spin enthralling melodies when enthralling melodies are called for.

The fourth symphony, on the whole, keeps under cover the qualities which musicians ridicule in Tschaikowsky's work, his obvious rabble rousing climaxes and the musically stagnant pools where the master endlessly repeats a single phrase until the trained musician wriggles with impatience.

The orchestra did an excellent job, particularly in the two middle movements and in the pleasant, inconsequential "Enchanted Lake" which called for a transparent texture and lightness far removed from the robust symphony.

Ormandy

Monitor
Feb 11/38

For the second and final program of the Philadelphia Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Saturday evening, the audience was somewhat larger than on Friday, though not so large as this fine body of players deserved.

The main item of Mr. Ormandy's program was the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which was preceded by another of Lucien Cailliet's transcriptions, a Passacaglio of Buxtehude, and followed after the intermission by Strauss's "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra, Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and the Dance Suite from De Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat."

Jan Smeterlin was again the soloist, and he and the orchestra gave an excellent performance of a composition which evidently was designed chiefly for display. It is an early work, brilliantly written but of small musical content.

The symphony was performed with a splendid vigor and virtuosity, to which at times purity of tone was sacrificed. It left an impression, as the Brahms First had the day before, that Mr. Ormandy does not sufficiently appreciate the need for the long lyrical line in such works. The tempo of the Allegretto was a little slow, and the speed of the final movement was attained at the cost of clarity.

De Falla's showy dances were dazzlingly done, but the chief pleasure of the evening was derived from the performance of "The Afternoon of a Faun." Here lyricism is less essential, and Mr. Ormandy evoked and maintained the dreamy fantasy of this score, making no attempt to invest it with an emotional depth which does not belong to it. It was an interpretation of rare poetic beauty, in which the conductor was well served by the orchestra and particularly by Mr. Kincaid's flute and Mr. Tabuteau's oboe.

The audience applauded warmly throughout. L. A. S.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 11 1938

8

Third Concert of Boston Symphony Season Given Last Evening at Academy

The third concert of the 52d Brooklyn season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a special program last night at the Academy of Music in honor of the great French composer, Maurice Ravel, who died on Dec. 28.

Mrs. Lewis W. Francis was the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mr. and Mrs. Francis entertained at dinner at their home, 81 Remsen St., before the concert. Their guests were Borough President and Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Reginald R. Belnap, and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Francis.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark Woodward entertained at a dinner party and had as their box guests Mr. and Mrs. Karl Kritz, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Heff, and Mrs. Cornelius Crane.

In the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. William Baylies Parker.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum also entertained at dinner at their home, 106 Willow St. Their box guests were Mr. and Mrs. Richard V. Lindabury, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene E. Taliaferro, Dr. and Mrs. R. Townley Paton, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Minton and Roger Woolley.

Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester had as their box guests Mrs. J. Tracy Lay, Charles W. Walther, Mr. and Mrs. James Meador, and Richard Peck.

In the box with Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff, Miss Irene Miles, and Walter Golde.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Simmons entertained at dinner at their home, 31 8th Ave. Their box guests included Mr. and Mrs. James Cochran, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Rountree, Miss Florence English, and Walter Wessels.

Other box subscribers last night were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Mrs. James Maclay, and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The appearances in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee.

Officers of the Brooklyn committee for the 1937-38 season in addition to Mr. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenport are: Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee; and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

Members of the Junior League committee include: Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyliss Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer, and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

The fourth concert will be presented Friday evening, March 11, and the final concert, Friday evening, April 1.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 11 1938

MUSIC NOTES

Today's major events: "Barber of Seville," afternoon, "Die Meistersinger," evening, Metropolitan Opera House; Boston Symphony Orchestra, Carnegie Hall, 8:45 P. M.; Emily Roosevelt, soprano, and Harold Henry, pianist, Town Hall, 8:30 P. M.; New York Civic Orchestra, Federal Music Theatre, evening.

Alix Young Maruchess, viola and viola d'amore player, assisted by Earle Voorhies, pianist, will appear in recital tonight at the Henry Street Settlement School.

Carl and Augusta Tollefsen will give a recital this evening at the Tollefsen Studios, 946 President Street, Brooklyn.

Volunteer singers are wanted for the Bach Festival to be held at Park Slope Congregational Church, Brooklyn. Auditions are held Friday and Monday evenings.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 11 1938

EVENING OF MUSIC DEDICATED TO RAVEL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Works of Late Composer

By PAUL J. BROWN

It was quite fitting that our community should dedicate an evening to the music of Maurice Ravel, whose death less than two months ago closed one of the very few creative musical careers of this era that has caught the fancy of this generation. It was a very expressive occasion for Brooklyn. The Academy of Music was filled and some were standing — an unusual event for Boston Symphony concerts here; the audience, obviously dressier than has been the rule, was in full sympathy with the music, apparently enjoyed it immensely and applauded heartily.

The program which Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky's Boston Symphony Orchestra offered as the third of its five concerts scheduled for its 1937-1938 Brooklyn series, was four parts Ravel and one part Schumann. We might say, on the other hand, that the program was in three parts. There was Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor; there were Ravel's Suite, "Le Tombeau de Couperin," his "Rapsodie Espagnole" and his "Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), and as the third group there was his "Bolero.'

The reason for separating the other works from the "Bolero" is that they are works esteemed by musicians; the "Bolero" is notably esteemed by the public. Perhaps its popularity it not what it was some years ago, but it is still tremendous and probably is accountable for last night's large attendance. The growth in repetition of that simple, brief melody from woodwinds, through pizzicato strings, brasses, strings and tympani cannot fail to excite unless tastes are jaded by "excess of it."

The other Ravel works are less distinctive; perhaps to their advantage. In theme there is more of the Ravel tendency toward the strange combination of Spanish rhythm and both overtoned and undertoned minor scales. In them, too, Ravel employs more of his genius for musical scope and orchestration.

The chief reaction from the placing of the Schumann Fourth among the Ravel works is to denote the latter as inconsequential commentaries. Schumann, particularly in the final, largo movement of his Fourth, takes a musical theme, gives it real power and carries it to definite conclusion. By contrast Ravel seems to have resorted to musical guile.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays excellently; probably no orchestra could have given Ravel as successfully as did Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony, which rose mightily indeed to the important occasion.

TORONTO, CAN.
GLOBE
FEB 12 1938

To Wield Baton

MLLE. NAIDA BOULANGER, Head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, who will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 11 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Barbirolli Returns to the Philharmonic, With Kirsten Flagstad as Soloist

3,375th concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, John Barbirolli conductor; assisting artist, Kirsten Flagstad, soprano; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Schubert,
   Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella"
   (First time by the society)
2. Beethoven,
   Scene and aria, "Ah, perfido!"
   Kirsten Flagstad
3. Mozart,
   Symphony in D major (Kochel 504)
   I. Adagio—Allegro
   II. Andante
   III. Finale: Presto
   Intermission
4. Wagner,
   Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung"
   Siegfried's Rhine-Journey—Funeral Music
   Closing scene: Brunnhilde's Immolation
   (performed without pauses)
   Brunnhilde: Kirsten Flagstad

MR. BARBIROLLI, his midwinter holiday at an end, returned last evening to his place on the Philharmonic-Symphony podium and led his orchestra through an engrossing program, assisted by no less an artist than Kirsten Flagstad.

It was a program that climbed steadily to the heights. It began with Schubert's almost unknown Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," with its suggestions of Beethovenian grandeur; traversed the "Ah, perfido" of the master himself, sung by Mme. Flagstad; came momentarily to a point of rest with one of the subtlest and least appreciated symphonies of Mozart, the "Prague," in D major; and ended with the sublimities of Brünnhilde's valedictory and the cosmic fires of the "Gotterdammerung" Finale. When it was over, the audience, shaken by the greatness of the music it had heard, brought back repeatedly to the platform the artists who had been the instruments of its experience.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli should be thanked especially for letting us hear the noble symphony of Mozart so beautifully played as it was by the Philharmonic virtuosi. Not that the "Prague" Symphony is seldom heard—the Boston Orchestra is to play it this evening in Carnegie Hall, and is sure to do it justice. But each one of the magnificent orchestras that New York is privileged to know can bring to its performances some special quality that is peculiarly its own. Each throws a new light upon the music that it plays, tells us something new concerning it.

Last night it was the deep and seasoned beauty of the Philharmonic's strings, the lucid clarity of its solo wood, that stood forth remarkably in its performance of Mozart's score. Certain of the chromatic passages for the violins and woodwind at the beginning of the slow movement, as one heard them from the Philharmonic players, still haunt the ear as though they had captured something of the living essence of Mozartian loveliness and fervor.

* * *

This symphony is underrated. It belongs of right with the famous three of Mozart that are supposed to be excelling. Some of us may wonder if it is not the equal of the G minor or the E flat. There are pages in each of its three movements that Mozart the symphonist scarcely equalled elsewhere for fineness and originality of musical thought; and the Adagio introduction is a masterpiece of rhythmic subtlety and power.

* * *

It was a happy idea of Mr. Barbirolli's to disinter the almost forgotten Overture that Schubert wrote for his opera "Alfonso and Estrella" in the years when Beethoven was completing his Ninth Symphony. Was something of the might of that colossal inspiration imparted to the Vienna air, so that we hear occasionally, in this overture of Schubert's, brief echoes, or premonitions, of Olympian speech? The overture had never been played by the Philharmonic, and I can recall no performance in years by any other orchestra. It should not be allowed to lapse again.

* * *

Mme. Flagstad, singing for the first time with a symphonic orchestra in New York, naturally made the program's final word her own. Is there another living singer, one wonders, who could utter so simply and so completely, with such entire forgetfulness of her audience and of herself, the essential quality of Wagner's tremendous scene? Standing quietly beside the podium, glancing occasionally at the score she held, she became for us the sacrificial Brünnhilde of the tragedy, the seeress filled with the greatness of her vision and her love. And when she had finished singing, while the orchestra hymned the passing of the gods, her face still held the exaltation of her vision as she looked beyond the audience toward some transfiguring beauty of the spirit's world that only she had seen.

Kirsten Flagstad

Philharmonic Soloist

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

FEB 11 1938

Ravel Music Played By Boston Orchestra

In memory of Maurice Ravel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted most of its program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night to four of his works. It was the third Brooklyn concert this season of the visiting Bostonians and as usual Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

The compositions by Ravel were the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the suite "Ma Mere l'Oye" and "Bolero." Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor completed the offerings. All the numbers will be repeated either tonight or tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were in fine technical and interpretative fettle. The playing had its familiar smoothness and richness of tone and felicitous details of phrasing and instrumental coloring abounded.

The selections from Ravel's works were made with an eye to representative variety and one revelled in the wealth of imaginative and stunning orchestration unfolded—the infinite charm and jeweled delicacy of the "Couperin" suite, the flashing colors of the "Rhapsodie," the cumulative breadth of the "Bolero."

Conductor and orchestra were cordially greeted when the curtains parted, and throughout the concert enthusiasm mounted steadily, until after the "Bolero" applause swept like a cyclone through the Academy, which was packed to the doors.

L. B.

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

FEB 11 1938

Society News

By LUCILE MINTZ

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Maurice Ravel; Many Dinners Are Given in Advance of Concert

A large and responsive audience joined with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in paying tribute at the Brooklyn Academy of Music to Maurice Ravel, French composer who died on Dec. 28. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in a program of four Ravel works, including "Bolero" and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

Many of the subscribers attended the concert with guests. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis gave a dinner at their home, No. 81 Remsen street, later taking their guests to the concert, where Mrs. Francis was hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee. In the party were Borough President of Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Reginald R. Eelnap and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Francis.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark Woodward entertained at a dinner party and had as their box guests Mr. and Mrs. Karl Kritz, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hoff and Mrs. Cornelius Crane.

In the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were Dr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. William Baylies Parker. Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum gave a dinner at their home, No. 106 Willow street. Their box guests were Mr. and Mrs. Richard V. Lindabury, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Dr. and Mrs. R. Townley Paton, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Minton, and Roger Woolley.

Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester had as their box guests Mrs. J. Tracy Lay, Charles W. Walther, Mr. and Mrs. James Meador, and Richard Peck. In another box with Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff, Miss Miles and Walter Golde.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Simmons entertained at dinner at their home No. 31 Eighth avenue. Their box guests included Mr. and Mrs. James Cochran, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Rountree, Miss Florence English, and Walter Wessels. Other boxholders wer Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Mrs. James Maclay and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The concert was the third in a series of five to be given here this season by the orchestra. The fourth will be heard on Friday evening, March 11 and the final program will be given on Friday, April 1. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger is chairman of a Junior eLague committee for the concerts.

Cresset
[illegible]

FEB - - 1938

MUSIC and Music Makers

By WALTER A. HANSEN

The World of Music Mourns the Loss of One of Its Important Figures.

A composer of extraordinary skill was claimed by death a few days before the year 1937 passed on into history. Maurice Ravel, the gifted Frenchman, was a figure of far-reaching importance. Some of his detractors have decried and derided him as a rebel who took keen delight in kicking over the traces and as an eccentric whose entire career was dominated by what to them seemed to be an irrepressible urge to gain wealth and popularity by writing music in a unique and radically different way. Others have sought to brand him as little more than an extremely clever poseur. But against all aspersions of this kind we can pit the undeniable fact that thousands upon thousands have derived and continue to derive no end of genuine pleasure from his works.

Ravel's music does not, as a rule, probe deep into the recesses of the heart. In other words, it is seldom profound in character. But even though it usually lacks the sweep of elemental power which stirs one to the very marrow, it is always brimful of melodic distinctiveness. It invariably reveals the hand of a painstaking craftsman, the deftness of a master-technician, the reserve and the emotional restraint of an artist who weighed, winnowed and polished each and every note and phrase with the most scrupulous care before he sent a composition out into the world. Even the gripping and relentlessly surging Bolero, which has brought Ravel's name to all parts of the civilized world, gives striking evidence of uncommon refinement and sensitiveness. The man who wrote this intensely fascinating work has been aptly referred to as one of the aristocrats of modern music. There is something unmistakably patrician in the legacy he has handed down.

Some have maintained that Ravel—who, contrary to common belief, was not a Jew—and his illustrious countryman, Claude Debussy, were kindred spirits. But the statement is only partially true. To a certain extent, it is based on superficial observation and founded on hastily formed conclusions. Debussy was infinitely more important as a trail-blazer than Ravel, and the many atmospheric and by the flute, the clarinet, the bassoon, the E flat clarinet, the oboe d'amore, the muted trumpet, the saxophone, the woodwinds in various combinations, the French horn in conjunction with other instruments, the trombone, and finally by the string choir and by strings adroitly grouped with other members of the orchestral family.

(Cont. over)

There is a steadily mounting crescendo. With technical dexterity of the rarest kind and with an uncanny understanding of the possibilities of each and every instrument, the composer gradually leads up to an overpowering climax. He clings tenaciously to the key of C major until shortly before the end, when a singularly abrupt change in tonality comes like a sudden dash of icecold water to relieve the tenseness and to dispel the frenzy.

An orchestral tour de force of this nature is assuredly not the work of a dabbler. Neither is it a mere stunt. If there is a composer alive today who is able to achieve such exciting effects with one simple little melody, he has not yet come to the fore. It is not going too far to say that Richard Strauss and Jan Sibelius could not write in this way even if they tried, because the domains over which they reign supreme are widely different from the sphere in which Ravel lived, moved and had his being.

The Bolero is unique in music. It has little depth; but the writer of this article is not ashamed to admit that he is always thrilled to the bone when he hears the composition performed by a fine orchestra under a competent conductor. For him it is an exhilarating experience to listen to the readings given by Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky. Philip Hale, on the other hand, thought that the work "does not fare better by repetition." In his opinion, "it is the clever trick of a super-refined composer." And the eminent critic of Boston went on to say that "the trick is amazingly well performed; but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second time."

Yet the Bolero does not represent Ravel's technical skill at its height. The two concert suites drawn from the ballet, Daphnis and Chloe, were written more than 25 years ago; but they are scored with even greater wizardry than we find in the work by which the French composer is best known. Over and above this, the music itself has far more substance, far more poetry. These suites rank with the Scheherazade and the Capriccio Espagnole, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, with the Magic Fire Spell, from Wagner's Die Walkuere, and with portions of Richard Strauss' Salome as examples of brilliant and astonishing craftsmanship. The same statement can be made with respect to the magnificent orchestral version of the great Modest Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

162

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
FEB 1 1 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

Barbirolli Returns to the Philharmonic, With Kirsten Flagstad as Soloist

3,375th concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, John Barbirolli conductor; assisting artist, Kirsten Flagstad, soprano; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Schubert,
   Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella"
   (First time by the society)
2. Beethoven,
   Scene and aria, "Ah, perfido!"
   Kirsten Flagstad
3. Mozart,
   Symphony in D major (Kochel 504)
   I. Adagio—Allegro
   II. Andante
   III. Finale; Presto
   Intermission
4. Wagner,
   Excerpts from "Gotterdammerung"
   Siegfried's Rhine-Journey—Funeral Music
   Closing scene: Brunnhilde's Immolation
   (performed without pauses)
   Brunnhilde: Kirsten Flagstad

Kirsten Flagstad

Philharmonic Soloist

MR. BARBIROLLI, his midwinter holiday at an end, returned last evening to his place on the Philharmonic-Symphony podium and led his orchestra through an engrossing program, assisted by no less an artist than Kirsten Flagstad.

It was a program that climbed steadily to the heights. It began with Schubert's almost unknown Overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," with its suggestions of Beethovenian grandeur; traversed the "Ah, perfido" of the master himself, sung by Mme. Flagstad; came momentarily to a point of rest with one of the subtlest and least appreciated symphonies of Mozart, the "Prague," in D major; and ended with the sublimities of Brünnhilde's valedictory and the cosmic fires of the "Gotterdammerung" Finale. When it was over, the audience, shaken by the greatness of the music it had heard, brought back repeatedly to the platform the artists who had been the instruments of its experience.

* * *

Mr. Barbirolli should be thanked especially for letting us hear the noble symphony of Mozart so beautifully played as it was by the Philharmonic virtuosi. Not that the "Prague" Symphony is seldom heard—the Boston Orchestra is to play it this eve[redacted]negie Hall, and is sure to do it justice. But each one of the magnificent orchestras that New York is privileged to know can bring to its performances some special quality that is peculiarly its own. Each throws a new light upon the music that it plays, tells us something new concerning it.

Last night it was the deep and seasoned beauty of the Philharmonic's strings, the lucid clarity of its solo wood, that stood forth remarkably in its performance of Mozart's score. Certain of the chromatic passages for the violins and woodwind at the beginning of the slow movement, as one heard them from the Philharmonic players, still haunt the ear as though they had captured something of the living essence of Mozartian loveliness and fervor.

* * *

This symphony is underrated. It belongs of right with the famous three of Mozart that are supposed to be excelling. Some of us may wonder if it is not the equal of the G minor or the E flat. There are pages in each of its three movements that Mozart the symphonist scarcely equalled elsewhere for fineness and originality of musical thought, and the Adagio introduction is a masterpiece of rhythmic subtlety and power.

* * *

It was a happy idea of Mr. Barbirolli's to disinter the almost forgotten Overture that Schubert wrote for his opera "Alfonso and Estrella" in the years when Beethoven was completing his Ninth Symphony. Was something of the might of that colossal inspiration imparted to the Vienna air, so that we hear occasionally, in this overture of Schubert's, brief echoes, or premonitions, of Olympian speech? The overture had never been played by the Philharmonic, and I can recall no performance in years by any other orchestra. It should not be allowed to lapse again.

* * *

Mme. Flagstad, singing for the first time with a symphonic orchestra in New York, naturally made the program's final word her own. Is there another living singer, one wonders, who could utter so simply and so completely, with such entire forgetfulness of her audience and of herself, the essential quality of Wagner's tremendous scene? Standing quietly beside the podium, glancing occasionally at the score she held, she became for us the sacrificial Brünnhilde of the tragedy, the seeress filled with the greatness of her vision and her love. And when she had finished singing, while the orchestra hymned the passing of the gods, her face still held the exaltation of her vision as she looked beyond the audience toward some transfiguring beauty of the spirit's world that only she had seen.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
FEB 11 1938

Ravel Music Played By Boston Orchestra

In memory of Maurice Ravel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted most of its program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night to four of his works. It was the third Brooklyn concert this season of the visiting Bostonians and as usual Serge Koussevitzky conducted.

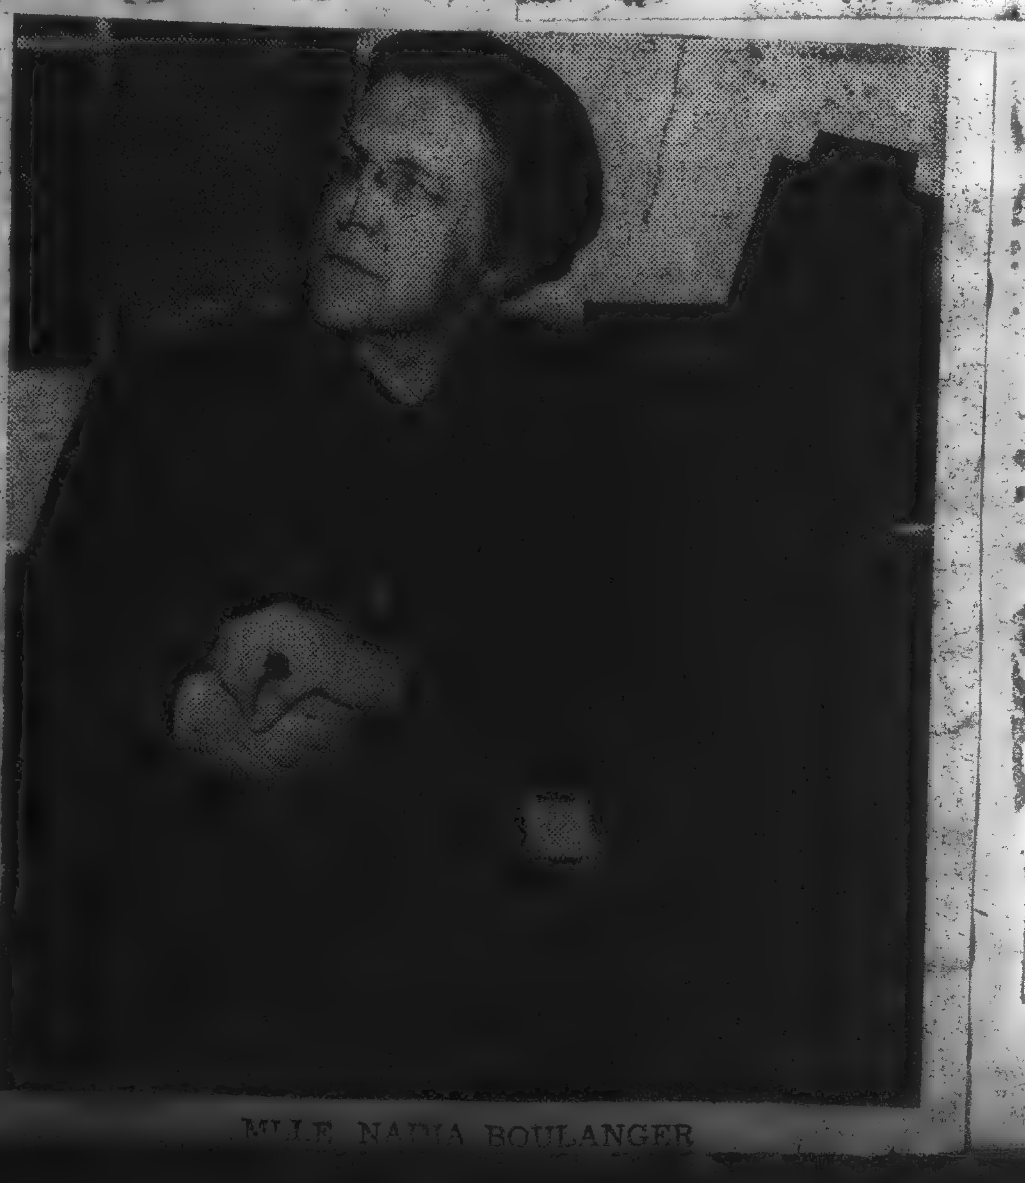
The compositions by Ravel were the suite "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the suite "Ma Mere l'Oye" and "Bolero." Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor completed the offerings. All the numbers will be repeated either tonight or tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his men were in fine technical and interpretative fettle. The playing had its familiar smoothness and richness of tone and felicitous details of phrasing and instrumental coloring abounded.

The selections from Ravel's works were made with an eye to representative variety and one revelled in the wealth of imaginative and stunning orchestration unfolded—the infinite charm and jeweled delicacy of the "Couperin" suite, the flashing colors of the "Rhapsodie," the cumulative breadth of the "Bolero."

Conductor and orchestra were cordially greeted when the curtains parted, and throughout the concert enthusiasm mounted steadily, until after the "Bolero" applause swept like a cyclone through the Academy, which was packed to the doors.

L. B.



MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 1 1 1938

Society News

By LUCILE MINTZ

Boston Symphony Pays Tribute to Maurice Ravel; Many Dinners Are Given in Advance of Concert

A large and responsive audience joined with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening in paying tribute at the Brooklyn Academy of Music to Maurice Ravel, French composer who died on Dec. 28. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in a program of four Ravel works, including "Bolero" and Schumann's Fourth Symphony in D minor.

Many of the subscribers attended the concert with guests. Mr. and Mrs. Lewis W. Francis gave a dinner at their home, No. 81 Remsen street, later taking their guests to the concert, where Mrs. Francis was hostess in the box of the sponsoring committee. In the party were Borough President of Mrs. Raymond V. Ingersoll, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Reginald R. Belnap and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur W. Francis.

Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark Woodward entertained at a dinner party and had as their box guests Mr. and Mrs. Karl Kritz, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Hoff and Mrs. Cornelius Crane.

In the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association were Dr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart and Mr. and Mrs. William Baylies Parker. Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Blum gave a dinner at their home, No. 106 Willow street. Their box guests were Mr. and Mrs. Richard V. Lindabury, Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro, Dr. and Mrs. R. Townley Paton, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Minton, and Roger Woolley.

Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester had as their box guests Mrs. J. Tracy Lay, Charles W. Walther, Mr. and Mrs. James Meador, and Richard Peck. In another box with Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff, Miss Miles and Walter Golde.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry R. Simmons entertained at dinner at their home No. 31 Eighth avenue. Their box guests included Mr. and Mrs. James Cochran, Mr. and Mrs. Louis Rountree, Miss Florence English, and Walter Wessels. Other boxholders wer Mrs. Thomas E. Murray, Mrs. James Maclay and Miss Mary E. Mills.

The concert was the third in a series of five to be given here this season by the orchestra. The fourth will be heard on Friday evening, March 11 and the final program will be given on Friday, April 1. The series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the Board of Trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, headed by Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger is chairman of a Junior eLague committee for the concerts.

Cresset R
Menasha-Wis.
FEB - - 1938

MUSIC and Music Makers

By WALTER A. HANSEN

The World of Music Mourns the Loss of One of Its Important Figures.

A composer of extraordinary skill was claimed by death a few days before the year 1937 passed on into history. Maurice Ravel, the gifted Frenchman, was a figure of far-reaching importance. Some of his detractors have decried and derided him as a rebel who took keen delight in kicking over the traces and as an eccentric whose entire career was dominated by what to them seemed to be an irrepressible urge to gain wealth and popularity by writing music in a unique and radically different way. Others have sought to brand him as little more than an extremely clever poseur. But against all aspersions of this kind we can pit the undeniable fact that thousands upon thousands have derived and continue to derive no end of genuine pleasure from his works.

Ravel's music does not, as a rule, probe deep into the recesses of the heart. In other words, it is seldom profound in character. But even though it usually lacks the sweep of elemental power which stirs one to the very marrow, it is always brimful of melodic distinctiveness. It invariably reveals the hand of a painstaking craftsman, the deftness of a master-technician, the reserve and the emotional restraint of an artist who weighed, winnowed and polished each and every note and phrase with the most scrupulous care before he sent a composition out into the world. Even the gripping and relentlessly surging Bolero, which has brought Ravel's name to all parts of the civilized world, gives striking evidence of uncommon refinement and sensitiveness. The man who wrote this intensely fascinating work has been aptly referred to as one of the aristocrats of modern music. There is something unmistakably patrician in the legacy he has handed down.

Some have maintained that Ravel—who, contrary to common belief, was not a Jew—and his illustrious countryman, Claude Debussy, were kindred spirits. But the statement is only partially true. To a certain extent, it is based on superficial observation and founded on hastily formed conclusions. Debussy was infinitely more important as a trail-blazer than Ravel, and the many atmospheric and by the flute, the clarinet, the bassoon, the E flat clarinet, the oboe d'amore, the muted trumpet, the saxophone, the woodwinds in various combinations, the French horn in conjunction with other instruments, the trombone, and finally by the string choir and by strings adroitly grouped with other members of the orchestral family.

(Cont. over)

There is a steadily mounting crescendo. With technical dexterity of the rarest kind and with an uncanny understanding of the possibilities of each and every instrument, the composer gradually leads up to an overpowering climax. He clings tenaciously to the key of C major until shortly before the end, when a singularly abrupt change in tonality comes like a sudden dash of icecold water to relieve the tenseness and to dispel the frenzy.

An orchestral tour de force of this nature is assuredly not the work of a dabbler. Neither is it a mere stunt. If there is a composer alive today who is able to achieve such exciting effects with one simple little melody, he has not yet come to the fore. It is not going too far to say that Richard Strauss and Jan Sibelius could not write in this way even if they tried, because the domains over which they reign supreme are widely different from the sphere in which Ravel lived, moved and had his being.

The Bolero is unique in music. It has little depth; but the writer of this article is not ashamed to admit that he is always thrilled to the bone when he hears the composition performed by a fine orchestra under a competent conductor. For him it is an exhilarating experience to listen to the readings given by Arturo Toscanini and Serge Koussevitzky. Philip Hale, on the other hand, thought that the work "does not fare better by repetition." In his opinion, "it is the clever trick of a super-refined composer." And the eminent critic of Boston went on to say that "the trick is amazingly well performed; but it is only a trick. The surprise of a first performance does not affect one a second time."

Yet the Bolero does not represent Ravel's technical skill at its height. The two concert suites drawn from the ballet, Daphnis and Chloe, were written more than 25 years ago; but they are scored with even greater wizardry than we find in the work by which the French composer is best known. Over and above this, the music itself has far more substance, far more poetry. These suites rank with the Scheherazade and the Capriccio Espagnole, by Rimsky-Korsakoff, with the Magic Fire Spell, from Wagner's Die Walkuere, and with portions of Richard Strauss' Salome as examples of brilliant and astonishing craftsmanship. The same statement can be made with respect to the magnificent orchestral version of the great Modest Moussorgsky's Pictures at an Exhibition.

10 Monitor — Boston News — Feb. 10/38

16

Mme. Pauly Prepares to Sing With Cleveland Orchestra

Mme. Rosa Pauly, Soprano

Presents Music of Strauss's "Salome" in Concert at Symphony Hall Tonight

Acclaimed at the Metropolitan Opera as one of the greatest dramatic sopranos to make their debut there in recent season, Rosa Pauly, Hungarian prima donna, was busy at the Statler this morning warming up her voice in anticipation of rehearsal for her debut in Symphony Hall tonight as soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra, Artur Rodzinski conducting. She has made her mark in 67 roles, ranging from Carmen and Amneris to Isolde and Elektra, although her greatest fame is as an interpreter of dramatic roles in German opera.

Tonight will mark both the introduction to Boston of Miss Pauly and a hearing of a complete orchestral and vocal episode from Richard Strauss' opera, "Salome." An announced performance of "Salome," with Mary Garden, was cancelled 29 years ago by action of Mayor Hibbard, and the work has continued in neglect here ever since.

"Your biggest successes have been in the operas of Wagner and Richard Strauss?" Miss Pauly was asked.

"That is true."

"Which is your favorite composer?"

"Mozart — and next, Beethoven. There is a place for my voice and my acting in Wagner and Struass. But for enjoyment, I prefer Mozart. Two of my favorite roles—my personal favorites—are Dona Anna in 'Don Giovanni,' and the Countess in 'The Marriage of Figaro.' Also, I very much like the role of Leonore in Beethoven's 'Fidelio.' A role I like a great deal is Amneris in 'Aida.' She is a villain, but interesting. The title role is not so interesting, in spite of its being that of the heroine. Isolde I am very fond of, too; but sung in Italian. Never did I sing Isolde in German in Europe, but only in America.

"I think all the Wagnerian operas are much better for the singers in Italian. When the Italians perform Wagner, however, it is very strange. The orchestra never gets terribly loud. The Italian singers ride up and down the tunes as they do in Italian opera. 'Tristan' is very popular in Italy. Their tenors sing it like 'Rigoletto.' The best women singers they have in Wagner are either Spanish, or half Spanish, and half Italian."

From her own dramatic impressiveness in Wagnerian roles in Italy, the natives have called Mme. Pauly "The German Duse."

Her hobby?

"Cooking, by all means. I make very good goulash."

"May I ask," the reporter ventured rashly, "whether the materials of goulash are definite? Or do they vary according to the circumstances and mood of the cook?"

"You shall not speak so of goulash!" Mme. Pauly histrionically closed the interview.

Preface to an Abbreviated "Salome"

Trans. Feb. 7/38

When excerpts from Strauss's opera "Salome" are played on Thursday evening of this week in Symphony Hall by the Cleveland Orchestra, under the direction of Artur Rodzinski and with the Hungarian soprano, Rosa Pauly, singing the role of Elektra, a few in the audience may recall the reasons for the previous neglect of the opera here.

On April 2, 1909, the Boston newspapers announced that Oscar Hammerstein would produce "Salome" the following week at the Boston Theater. Mary Garden, who had just sung Melisande in the course of a week of opera, was to play the leading role.

On the next day, the following front-page story was carried by the Boston papers: "'Salome' will not be presented in Boston. Mayor Hibbard yesterday afternoon told Mr. Hammerstein's representatives that if the manager did not voluntarily withdraw it, he would feel justified in exercising his powers and would prohibit the performance."

Under this pressure, Hammerstein withdrew the intended performance; and, although the "Dance of the Seven Veils" was played by Dr. Muck in 1912 and subsequently by Dr. Koussevitzky, the opera has remained unsung in Boston. Following its withdrawal, and on the same day, Hammerstein published in Boston papers his own views on the character of Salome herself and of the opera:

"'Salome' is neither moral nor immoral—she is unmoral. She is governed absolutely by the most primitive passions. Her love, once awakened, as it has been by the vision of the Prophet, is as real, as honest as the love that might be awakened in the heart of a vestal virgin. It is like a tidal wave. Swept against an immovable mountain, it rebounds in a hatred overwhelming in its vengeance; the death of the beloved object alone allays this awful passion; but, once the passion of hatred is satiated, the tidal wave of love returns intensified ten-fold b the dreadful consciousness that the beloved is forever lost. It is no mere material passion that is expressed by Salome when she seizes and apostrophizes the severed head of Jokanaan. It is the awakened soul of the superabundantly vital woman that gushes forth torrentially. From that lifeless morsel her glowing imagination recreates the whole man, and her infinite anguish is voiced in the words:

"'I know well that if thou hadst looked upon me thou wouldst have loved me, and that the Mystery of Love is greater than the Mystery of Death.'

"I regret more than I can express that some writers have dwelt upon what they conceive to be the abnormality or sensuality of 'Salome.' Why do they do this? Why see only the material side of this great work of art? Why be blind to the inwardness of this great creation of the two master minds, Wilde and Strauss?"

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1938 B

l Musicians --- News of

Cleveland Orchestra

Artur Rodzinski Directs an Exciting Program; Rose Pauly Gives Voice to Salome's Fury

By MOSES SMITH

The Festival of the Visiting Orchestras began in Symphony Hall last night before a goodly company assembled to hear and see the Cleveland Orchestra and its conductor, Artur Rodzinski, and also, perhaps incidentally, to be present at the first public performance in Boston of a scene from Strauss' opera "Salome," with Rose Pauly to sing, but not act, the part of the notorious leading "lady."

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky out of town this week, it was a courteous and thoughtful gesture to remind the Bostonian public that there are other proficient symphonic ensembles and conductors on the American scene. Perhaps there was a measure of misfortune for the box-office in the presence of two visiting orchestras here in rapid succession, the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy having been "booked" for this afternoon and tomorrow evening But for those desirous of making the inevitable comparisons the task has been relatively simplified.

The present writer has already recorded in these columns the markedly favorable impression received from the Cleveland Orchestra and Dr. Rodzinski during a concert in Severance Hall, Cleveland, some time ago. Last night's concert tended to deepen that impression. The playing of a program more difficult than the earlier was even more brilliant, precise and musical. An orchestra somewhat smaller than Bostonians are accustomed to hear almost weekly through the season could scarcely be expected to encompass equivalent resonance. Besides, that is not one of the more obvious (or, very likely, sought) virtues of the ensemble. But, at least for this writer, there was never a suggestion of dry, lifeless tone, save when the conductor asked for it in following the implications of the music.

The program began with Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, which, in the arrangement of Julius Wertheim, was bombastic music. In that style, it must be confessed, it was interpreted last night by Dr. Rodzinski. But it served the inevitable purpose of showing how spirited and brilliant a company of youthful executants he has assembled. The performance of the Shostakovitch First Symphony, which followed, was fairly extraordinary in its biting precision, sharp accentuation, characterful phrasing and superb clarity of line. Similar virtues were in evidence during the playing of Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" at the end of the program. Perhaps Dr. Rodzinski was only making a virtue of necessity when he emphasized line at the expense of color and resonance. But it was good, at least once, to hear the music in this way, to be able to observe the ingenious orchestration of Strauss, to hear all the parts sing.

Such things as careful instrumental balance, sharp definition and so forth, would seem to be the most marked attributes of Dr. Rodinski, a musician, conductor and interpreter clearly of the first rank. He satisfied, in qualification for that title, perhaps the principal requirement—that his presentation of the music at hand seemed for the moment to be the exact and only way in which to play it, as to tempo, dynamic scheme, phrasing. His control of his instrumental forces was obviously complete. His knowledge of the scores (which, with the exception of the aforementioned excerpt from "Salome" he directed from memory) was equally comprehensive. At every stage he seemed to be perfectly aware of what to do and how to do it. And exciting as the resulting performances were, they seemed to be based principally and in fact almost entirely on purely musical considerations.

This last was almost true of

Woman Leads Boston Symphony, And Gives Orchestra Scolding Too

For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its member musicians yesterday played at the command of a woman, and they took a scolding in the process.

Midway in a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," in which she will conduct the orchestra Friday and Saturday, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French music teacher and organist, halted the musicians for a lecture.

"This may be boring for some of you experienced men," she said. "But please do not take this music for granted. The difficulty is that most of you think the music too simple. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

The lecture over, the orchestra obediently bent to the rehearsal, and this time there was no complaint. Mlle. Boulanger, who has conducted Faure's "Requiem" for the past two seasons in London, believes that the composer's work has not been properly appreciated and that its apparent simplicity is the result of misunderstanding.

Using both hands instead of a baton, Mlle. Boulanger also rehearsed the Bach Cantata Club which will sing with the Symphony Orchestra. To this group also she explained the composer's message.

"Don't be afraid," she encouraged, humming the music as the singers joined in.

Cleveland Orchestra Invades Boston

The Arts in Boston

After an absence of 12 years, the Cleveland Orchestra returned to Boston last night to give a concert in Symphony Hall under the direction of its distinguished conductor, Artur Rodzinski. Large numbers of the musical public of this city were able to restrain their curiosity about an artistic development in another center, but there was an audience of respectable size which welcomed the visitors warmly and rewarded their performance with enthusiasm.

The concert was stimulating. It is good for us to hear other orchestras than our own, orchestras with other textures and colors of tone, and led by conductors with their own notions of interpretation. Although Mr. Rodzinski is a leader of international experience and fame, his orchestra still seems to reflect some of the characteristics which we regard as Middle-Western. Its tone is bright and rather hard, its utterance incisive, its technique precise. Mr. Rodzinski, conducting without score (except in an accompaniment for his soloist), was always the master, in control of every detail. Everything about the performance was notably efficient.

The program, too, was interesting. It opened with Julius Wertheim's orchestration of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, which suffers from some of the common complaints of such transcriptions, but which is undeniably effective in the concert hall. Mr. Rodzinski, who was a protégé of Mr. Stokowski's, comes legitimately by his interest in such scores. His performance of this one was forthright and clean cut.

Shostakovich's First Symphony was given a brilliant rendition. Its amusing style, roughly in the Prokofieff tradition, gives much pleasure, especially in the first two movements, which recall again and again "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." Into the third movement comes the shadow of Wagner, and the last movement does that master too much honor.

After the intermission came two (or rather three) numbers from Strauss: the Dance of the Seven Veils and the final scene from "Salome," and "Till Eulenspiegel." The soloist in the "Salome" music was Rose Pauly, the noted Viennese dramatic soprano whose singing of "Elektra" with the New York Philharmonic last year made an enormous impression. Last night Mme. Pauly confirmed the impression received over the radio last season of a brilliant lyrical actress whose voice is dramatically expressive though not without shortcomings from the viewpoint of pure vocalism. She brought to her interpretation of Salome's scene with the head of John the Baptist not only vocal but histrionic resources, the latter to a degree not commonly seen on the concert platform.

Mr. Rodzinski's readings of the orchestral items from Strauss were provocative. Salome's Dance became under his baton a barbaric rite which was singularly lacking in sensuousness. "Till" was rather mechanical. Few conductors seem to be able to bring out the humor of this score and Mr. Rodzinski is not one of them. His performance was expert but it missed many of the witty subtleties of expression and failed altogether to give value to the final note of mocking pathos.

L. A. S.

MORE TURN OUT FOR CONCERT

Ormandy's Selections Not New, But Interesting

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The third concert by an out-of-town orchestra in as many days, and the second by the band from Philadelphia, took place at Symphony Hall last night with Eugene Ormandy again conducting. The audience, although the largest of the three, still did not fill the hall. It is easy to reproach the Boston public for its lack of curiosity but hard to quarrel with its satisfaction in its own orchestra and conductor.

Mr. Ormandy's second programme was more interesting than his first although it contained little that was new or even unfamiliar. Under the first head came Mr. Cailliet's transcription of a Passacaglia by Buxtehude; under the second, Strauss' Burlesque for Piano and Orchestra, in which Jan Smeterlin was the solist. The remainder consisted of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the suite of dances from De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat."

If the authorship of Strauss' early Burlesque were not known it would not be easily guessed. Except for some waltz tunes which remind us faintly of "Der Rosenkavalier" there is little in it to suggest the Strauss of either the tone poems or the operas. It might almost be the work of Brahms, but of a Brahms with considerably more wit and considerably less heaviness than usual. It is however, an engaging and diverting piece, masterly in its construction and effectively written both for the solo instrument and for the orchestra. In view of the scarcity of good concerted pieces, it is surprising that pianists so consistently neglect it. The second of the two previous performances in Boston took place 21 years ago. Mr. Smeterlin is to be commended for recalling the Burlesque to our attention, and there are few pianists who could make so much of it as did he. Neither its humor nor its charm escaped him. And it is typical of the man that he should have included in the hearty applause Mr. Schwar, the kettle drummer, to whom Strauss had assigned both the opening and the closing measures.

If the listener wishes the music, all of the music and nothing but the music, he will get it from Mr. Ormandy and the Philadelphia orchestra. The case in point last night was the familiar Prelude of Debussy. The performance had everything but one thing, and that was glamor. On the purely musical side it was especially graced by the playing of the solo flute and oboe. Since there is no call here for atmosphere, for the display of imagination, or even of temperament the performance of Beethoven's Symphony was a fine one. Well played also was the rather trite music of De Falla. The Spanish idiom is something of which one in time grows weary.

Cont.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS. STANDARD-TIMES

FEB 16 1938

Scolds Musicians

—Associated Press Photo

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French music teacher and organist, rehearsed the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the first woman ever to direct the 57-year-old organization. She uses no baton. In her first rehearsal yesterday, she stopped the orchestra and scolded the musicians for lack of feeling while playing a simple score. She will direct Friday.

464

MME. PAULY PREFERS LEONORE TO SALOME

Singer, Here for Concert, Likes to Cook

B. Globe
Feb 10/38

Of all the 67 opera roles that she sings, Rose Pauly likes Leonore in "Fidelio" best. Then comes Salome in Richard Strauss' opera of like name. And next to singing, Mme. Pauly likes best to cook.

This dark-eyed Hungarian artist, who gave blase New Yorkers quite a jar when she burst almost unannounced upon Gotham a year ago to sing in concert performances of Strauss' "Elektra," is here in Boston to appear with the Cleveland Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight in the final scene from "Salome." In view of the fact that a projected performance of "Salome" caused quite a furore hereabouts 29 years ago until it had to be abandoned, let it be said right now that this will be the first time that a note of "Salome"—except for the concert fragment, "The Dance of the Seven Veils"—has been sung publicly in Boston.

There will be no scenery, no "props" and no dramatic action tonight, just a large orchestra conducted by the distinguished Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and Mme. Pauly to voice the music of Salome. She promises that Salome's costume will be a gold-colored evening dress.

Speaks Little English

Mme. Pauly is the sort whose appearance and manner are simple and friendly, yet require the adjective "magnetic." As she talks her dark eyes flash and her face changes expression ceaselessly. There are gestures to go with her words. She speaks but little English, and although she arrived here late yesterday afternoon, she was ready within a few minutes to talk to newspapermen with great gusto and the interpretive services of her woman companion.

MME. ROSE PAULY

"I really first came to America just for a week-end," she laughed, managing so much English well enough. And then in a mixture of English and German: "I got a cable from Dr. Rodzinski in Brussels one Saturday morning at 6, saying that his singer for a few concert performances of 'Elektra' could not appear. He asked me to come."

She went and she conquered completely a packed Carnegie Hall audience that stamped and cheered for 15 minutes after the performance. She was a sensation. Just last month she repeated her triumph when she made her Metropolitan Opera debut in the same role.

Her Roles Diversified

Her immense vitality stands her well in such an exhausting role as Elektra, which she readily admits is her most strenuous. And there is a directness about her that probably accounted in part for her simplicity of costume—grayish skirt, wine-colored sweater, and a brooch for her only jewelry.

Although she has made many successes in the operas of Wagner and Strauss, she sings widely diversified roles, and her own musical preference is for Mozart and Beethoven. She is very fond of the leading role in Strauss' "The Egyptian Helen," and she sings Carmen in Spanish as well as other tongues. Salome she has sung 400 times, Elektra 90 times.

Born in Pesth (the town across the river from Buda and which forms the second half of Budapest) of Hungarian ancestry, Mme. Pauly made her debut in the title part of "Aida" at Hamburg, in 1922. She now lives in Prague with her husband, Dr. Hafiz Haggag, an Egyptian throat specialist, and their daughter, aged 6½, who speaks Arabic and doesn't like music.

"Next to singing, I like best to cook. I'm a good hausfrau. I like to make goulash and my own coffee. I think goulash and coffee in this country are terrible. Why, your coffee is so weak you can almost see through it."

Didn't Recognize Duce

She says that famous yarn about her not recognizing Mussolini, at a banquet in her honor, is true.

"It was two years ago, in Venice. We waited and I didn't see anyone who looked like Mussolini. We sat down to dinner, and I said to the man next to me: 'Why hasn't he come, anyway?' The Austrian Minister kicked me under the table, but I kept right on. And then I said: 'I wonder if Mussolini has ever heard me in opera?' And then the man next to me said: 'No, I'm sorry I shall not be able to hear you, because I have to go to Rome.'

"O, was I embarrassed!"

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 12 1938

Friday evening, February 11, and Saturday afternoon, February 12, Carnegie Hall. Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is offering two programs in memory of the late Maurice Ravel. On Friday evening he'll accompany Jesus Maria Sanroma in the piano concerto, and will play the Mother Goose Suite and the second suite of orchestral excerpts from the Daphnis et Chloe ballet music. The Saturday afternoon program will include the Suite, Le Tombeau de Couperin; the Rapsodie Espagnole; the Bolero; and Scheherazade, three poems for voice and orchestra, sung by Olga Averino.

Each program will contain also a non-Ravel work; Friday's, the Mozart Symphony in D major (K. 504); and Saturday's, the Schumann Fourth Symphony in D minor.

Phonograph Records: Ravel: Mother Goose Suite, Victor, 7370-1 (Boston Symphony with Koussevitzky), Columbia Set 74 (Damrosch); Daphnis et Chloe, Victor 7143-4 (Koussevitzky); Columbia 67827-8D; Le Tombeau de Couperin, Victor 11150-1; Rapsodie Espagnole, Victor 8282-3 (Stokowski); Bolero, Victor 7251-2 (Koussevitzky), Columbia 67890-1; Piano Concerto, Columbia Set 176. Mozart K. 504, Gramaphone (English) C 1686-8: Schumann 4th, Victor Album M 201, Columbia Set 106.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD

FEB 11 1938

Two Musicians Of Note Here For Week-End

Dr. Klein Accompanied By World - Famous Woman Violinist

Two musicians, whose unusual ability and talents have won for them widespread recognition in musical circles in this country and abroad, are week-end visitors in St. Augustine.

One, Miss Charlotte Klein, Mus. Doc., F. A. G. O., is a former St. Augustine resident and is well known here. With Dr. Klein is Leonora Jackson (Mrs. William Duncan McKim), outstanding violinist, whose home also is in Washington, D. C. This noted artist, who will share honors with Dr. Klein at a number of delightful social functions planned during their brief stay here, is a graduate of the Royal School of Music in Berlin. As a student in Berlin she was awarded the coveted Mendelssohn State prize.

She has been soloist with symphony orchestras in Germany, France, England and Scotland, receiving a decoration from Queen Victoria. Miss Jackson has made six triumphant tours in the United States and has appeared eight times as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also with other orchestras in Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and other large cities. She made a world tour in 1926, the year in which Miss Klein was organist at historic old Trinity Episcopal Church in St. Augustine.

She, too, is an Episcopalian.

These two musicians of note—Dr. Klein is one of the leading women concert organists in the United States—will be the guests of Mrs. Frederick S. Vaill at Vaill Point during their stay here.

They arrived in St. Augustine this morning.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

B. Her
Feb 12/38

The Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Bach......Prelude and Fugue in B minor, transcribed by Lucien Cailliet
Mozart...Concerto in A major for piano and orchestra
Brahms...Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68

The Philadelphia orchestra can boast a string section that is unsurpassed for smoothness and beauty of tone in the world; and it is, of course, recognized as one of the great orchestras of the times. Some people object that they do not get the incisive brilliance which the Boston Symphony achieves without sacrificing sonority. It is true that the edges are rounded and bevelled, and the tone has thus a different quality. It is chiefly a matter of taste which one prefers.

Mr. Ormandy is a new conductor to us, though he has achieved an enviable reputation in other cities. He is careful to do nothing that will interrupt the smooth flow of this orchestra's playing. In interpretation it is possible that he can not or does not want to shake off entirely the Stokowski touch. The conclusion of the Bach and moments in the Brahms indicate that even if Mr. Stokowski is more and more courting the flesh-pots of Hollywood his influence is still strong in Philadelphia.

But Mr. Ormandy is a very much less theatrical conductor than the later Stokowski. His approach to the music is less capricious. It is true that he has the common notion in the Brahms that every diminuendo must also be a ritard. He moulds his phrases accordingly and prepares the entrance of a new theme deliberately. The performance of this symphony, then, was a trifle too consciously planned, though from a tonal aspect it had much that was profoundly moving.

Mr. Smeterlin was an excellent choice for the soloist in this rarely lovely Mozart concerto. He is a pianist of such bright and tidy clarity, of such poise and taste, that the proportions of the concerto were admirably recreated. From the orchestral side the last movement was too fast, though the piano still sounded serene and effortless. Otherwise the sympathy between soloist and orchestra was realized. Although the audience was not nearly large enough for a concert by such a visiting orchestra as this, it made up for its size in enthusiasm at this point and at the end.

We have left Mr. Cailliet's transcription of the Bach till the last on purpose. The prelude may be allowed to be a satisfactory arrangement, but the fugue will not do. Mr. Cailliet operates on the principle, a mistaken one, that Bach's fugues should emerge as one long crescendo. Moreover, Mr. Ormandy set so fast a pace that he was obliged to emphasize the harmony and let the counterpoint fend for itself. It was thus an unhappy and unmusical distortion and no improvement on the Wertheim arrangement of the D minor toccata and fugue, which the Cleveland orchestra played on Thursday night.

The Philadelphia orchestra will give a second concert this evening in Symphony Hall at 8:15 o'clock. Smeterlin will again be soloist, this time in the Strauss Burlesque, which has not been heard here for a long time. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and other works complete the program.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Philadelphia Orchestra

B. Globe
Feb 12/38

The Philadelphia Orchestra, second of the week's visiting symphonic organizations, gave the first of its two Symphony Hall concerts yesterday afternoon. Eugene Ormandy made his Boston debut conducting a sound and conservative program that began with Lucien Cailliet's transcription of a Bach Prelude and Fugue. Next came the verdant A major Piano Concerto of Mozart with that superlative artist, Jan Smeterlin, for soloist. The afternoon ended with the Olympian First Symphony by Brahms.

Disinterested and competent observers have testified that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras are the two best in the world today. Not to go further into the second half of the matter lest there be an impression of unseemly pride, it must unreservedly be stated that Philadelphia's tonal glory is magnificent. The rich and luminous tone of the strings, the supple if occasionally wayward playing of the woodwinds, the mellow quality of the brass, and the precision of all choirs proclaim virtuosity.

The Philadelphians, placed on a level and not in tiers like the Boston Symphony, are also governed by a much different seating arrangement with cellos at the front. For another difference Mr. Ormandy dispenses with score and baton.

A modest and self-effacing conductor, Mr. Ormandy is likewise an authoritative, and to some degree, distinctive, interpreter. He possesses the grasp of large outlines, he proportions mass to detail, and his command of style (to judge by this concert) is irreproachable. His scale of dynamic shadings is applied sensitively.

If any should ask what is the right style for a Bach transcription, the answer is found in the brilliant yet dignified performance of Mr. Cailliet's skillful work. Mr. Ormandy brought out the polyphonic voices, stressed the fantasia nature of the Prelude without trying to find sentiment where none exists. Nor did he whip up great climaxes of sonority for their own sake.

In fact, the orchestral part of Mozart's Concerto was too subdued, probably accountable to Mr. Ormandy's familiarity with the size of Symphony Hall. Conductor, orchestra and soloist secured a reading absolutely delightful for clarity and good taste, as well as consistent lyricism. Mr. Smeterlin, long a favorite in these parts, is as successful with Mozart as with Chopin. Fortunately, he is not of the school who treat Mozart like something breakable.

Mr. Ormandy's performance of the Brahms Symphony, obviously thought out as a sculptor might plan his art, strangely exhibited both the finest of the conductor's traits and some shortcomings. His conception was distinctive yet far from heroic. He sought to make details clear, to preserve orchestral balance and to let the music flow rather than to achieve boad effects and resounding sonorities. Not for a moment, however, was sentiment overdone. But Mr. Ormandy did vary the tempo where that was not specifically marked in the score, and diminuendos of the second movement were overstressed. Each conductor naturally has his own idea of the pace for the chorale theme in the last movement. If Mr. Ormandy erred on the slow side, he was consistent and did not gather speed once the passage had begun. The marvelous climax of brass, also in the last movement, was understated.

Let not this foregoing dissection bulk too large in the record of a noteworthy concert whose beauty will be remembered. Tonight Mr. Ormandy will play the following program: Buxtehude-Cailliet: Passacaglio; Beethoven: Seventh Symphony; Strauss: "Burleske" (Jan Smeterlin, soloist); Debussy: "The Afternoon of a Faun"; De Falla: Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

C. W. D.

APPLAUD QUAKER PLAYERS

B. Post

Philadelphia Orchestra Under Ormandy Scores Hit

Feb. 12/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within less than 24 hours Symphony Hall has been the scene of two concerts, each from a different visiting orchestra; something that has never happened here before and is likely never to happen again. Moreover, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, who yesterday afternoon succeeded Artur Rodzinski and the Cleveland Orchestra, will reappear at Symphony Hall this evening and, for a second time, with Jan Smeterlin, pianist, as the soloist.

ORMANDY RELIABLE

Seldom is a reviewer of concerts in these parts so tempted to overlook the fact that comparisons are odious. What a critical delight it would be to compare or contrast the two visiting orchestras and their conductors, but the temptation must be resisted; this review shall be written as though Thursday's concert had not taken place.

There is, however, a comparison which may still be made with propriety; between yesterday's concert of the Philadelphia orchestra and the one given here by that organization two seasons ago under Mr. Stokowski. For one thing, and a good thing, Mr. Ormandy gave us more of what may be called legitimate symphonic music. Whereas we received from Mr. Stokowski nothing but the conductor's transcription from Bach and his assembling of excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," Mr. Ormandy gave us but one transcription, that made by Lucien Cailliet, clarinetist of the orchestra, of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor and, for the rest, Brahms' First Symphony and the A major Piano Concerto of Mozart. Orchestras inevitably reflect the personality of their leaders.

Tone Like Boston's

A sound and sensitive musician, though by no means phlegmatic, Mr. Ormandy has none of Mr. Stokowski's electrifying brilliance and as a result the tone of the orchestra under him is not precisely that to which Mr. Stokowski has accustomed us. It is, indeed, more like that of our own orchestra; rich, full, eminently satisfying. Time and again in the performance of the Symphony the listener could have shut his eyes and have easily imagined that Dr. Koussevitzky and his band sat upon the stage.

Some day one of our industrious transcribers, and their name is now legion, is going to try the experiment of transcribing Bach's organ music for wind choirs only, in order to approximate still more closely the tone of the organ itself. Mr. Cailliet's felicitous scoring of the beginning of the Fugue suggested this thought, which is hereby passed along to anyone who cares to make use of it.

Strauss' Burleske Tonight

This evening Mr. Smeterlin will play for us the Burleske of Richard Strauss. Yesterday he contented himself and also greatly pleased his listeners with more familiar matter, the aforementioned Concerto of Mozart. Mr. Smeterlin's Mozart is limpid, crystalline, wholly in the vein, expressive without inappropriate sentimentality. The orchestral accompaniment yesterday matched and mated these virtues.

It remains only to be said that as on Thursday evening there were many empty seats, if not quite so many, and that the performance of the Symphony was received with excited acclaim; cries of "bravo!" stamping and all the rest of it. Brahms, at least the Brahms of this Symphony, is still sure-fire.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

FEB 12 1938

Noise of Radiator Halts Concert

Pittsburgh—(INS)—A noisy radiator backstage last night brought a sudden halt to the concert of the world famous pianist, Artur Schnabel of Austria, and caused him to walk off the stage.

"What is this noise? I can't play here," he shouted, abruptly stopping his recital a few minutes after he had started it.

As the noted pianist left the stage, the large audience, fearing it was to blame for the interruption, burst into applause.

In a moment Schnabel reappeared and began again Schubert's "Sonata in A Major." Applause greeted his return.

The audience, mindful of the incident which occurred in the same hall a few months ago when late arrivals caused the noted Boston symphony conductor Serge ~~Koussevitzky~~ to leave the stage, became deathly quiet as the noted pianist began his recital again.

During the intermission an announcer, over the loud speaker system, asked the audience not to misconstrue Schnabel's action, explaining it was a noisy radiator and no fault of the audience that caused the artist to abruptly halt his recital.

464

MME. PAULY PREFERS LEONORE TO SALOME

Singer, Here for Concert, Likes to Cook

B. Globe
Feb 10/38

Of all the 67 opera roles that she sings, Rose Pauly likes Leonore in "Fidelio" best. Then comes Salome in Richard Strauss' opera of like name. And next to singing, Mme. Pauly likes best to cook.

This dark-eyed Hungarian artist, who gave blasé New Yorkers quite a jar when she burst almost unannounced upon Gotham a year ago to sing in concert performances of Strauss' "Elektra," is here in Boston to appear with the Cleveland Orchestra at Symphony Hall tonight in the final scene from "Salome." In view of the fact that a projected performance of "Salome" caused quite a furore hereabouts 29 years ago until it had to be abandoned, let it be said right now that this will be the first time that a note of "Salome"—except for the concert fragment, "The Dance of the Seven Veils"—has been sung publicly in Boston.

There will be no scenery, no "props" and no dramatic action tonight, just a large orchestra conducted by the distinguished Dr. Artur Rodzinski, and Mme. Pauly to voice the music of Salome. She promises that Salome's costume will be a gold-colored evening dress.

Speaks Little English

Mme. Pauly is the sort whose appearance and manner are simple and friendly, yet require the adjective "magnetic." As she talks her dark eyes flash and her face changes expression ceaselessly. There are gestures to go with her words. She speaks but little English, and although she arrived here late yesterday afternoon, she was ready within a few minutes to talk to newspapermen with great gusto and the interpretive services of her woman companion.

MME. ROSE PAULY

"I really first came to America just for a week-end," she laughed, managing so much English well enough. And then in a mixture of English and German: "I got a cable from Dr. Rodzinski in Brussels one Saturday morning at 6, saying that his singer for a few concert performances of 'Elektra' could not appear. He asked me to come."

She went and she conquered completely a packed Carnegie Hall audience that stamped and cheered for 15 minutes after the performance. She was a sensation. Just last month she repeated her triumph when she made her Metropolitan Opera debut in the same role.

Her Roles Diversified

Her immense vitality stands her well in such an exhausting role as Elektra, which she readily admits is her most strenuous. And there is a directness about her that probably accounted in part for her simplicity of costume—grayish skirt, wine-colored sweater, and a brooch for her only jewelry.

Although she has made many successes in the operas of Wagner and Strauss, she sings widely diversified roles, and her own musical preference is for Mozart and Beethoven. She is very fond of the leading role in Strauss' "The Egyptian Helen," and she sings Carmen in Spanish as well as other tongues. Salome she has sung 400 times, Elektra 90 times.

Born in Pesth (the town across the river from Buda and which forms the second half of Budapest) of Hungarian ancestry, Mme. Pauly made her debut in the title part of "Aida" at Hamburg, in 1922. She now lives in Prague with her husband, Dr. Hafiz Haggag, an Egyptian throat specialist, and their daughter, aged 6½, who speaks Arabic and doesn't like music.

"Next to singing, I like best to cook. I'm a good hausfrau. I like to make goulash and my own coffee. I think goulash and coffee in this country are terrible. Why, your coffee is so weak you can almost see through it."

Didn't Recognize Duce

She says that famous yarn about her not recognizing Mussolini, at a banquet in her honor, is true.

"It was two years ago, in Venice. We waited and I didn't see anyone who looked like Mussolini. We sat down to dinner, and I said to the man next to me: 'Why hasn't he come, anyway?' The Austrian Minister kicked me under the table, but I kept right on. And then I said: 'I wonder if Mussolini has ever heard me in opera?' And then the man next to me said: 'No, I'm sorry I shall not be able to hear you, because I have to go to Rome.'

"O, was I embarrassed!"

CUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 12 1938

Friday evening, February 11, and Saturday afternoon, February 12, Carnegie Hall. Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Koussevitzky is offering two programs in memory of the late Maurice Ravel. On Friday evening he'll accompany Jesus Maria Sanroma in the piano concerto, and will play the Mother Goose Suite and the second suite of orchestral excerpts from the Daphnis et Chloe ballet music. The Saturday afternoon program will include the Suite, Le Tombeau de Couperin; the Rapsodie Espagnole; the Bolero; and Scheherazade, three poems for voice and orchestra, sung by Olga Averino.

Each program will contain also a non-Ravel work; Friday's, the Mozart Symphony in D major (K. 504); and Saturday's, the Schumann Fourth Symphony in D minor.

Phonograph Records: Ravel: Mother Goose Suite, Victor, 7370-1 (Boston Symphony with Koussevitzky), Columbia Set 74 (Damrosch); Daphnis et Chloe, Victor 7143-4 (Koussevitzky); Columbia 67827-8D; Le Tombeau de Couperin, Victor 11150-1; Rapsodie Espagnole, Victor 8282-3 (Stokowski); Bolero, Victor 7251-2 (Koussevitzky), Columbia 67890-1; Piano Concerto, Columbia Set 176. Mozart K. 504, Gramaphone (English) C 1686-8: Schumann 4th, Victor Album M 201, Columbia Set 106.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

B. Her.
Feb 12/38

The Philadelphia orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Jan Smeterlin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Bach......Prelude and Fugue in B minor, transcribed by Lucien Cailliet
Mozart...Concerto in A major for piano and orchestra
Brahms...Symphony No. 1 in C minor Op. 68

The Philadelphia orchestra can boast a string section that is unsurpassed for smoothness and beauty of tone in the world; and it is, of course, recognized as one of the great orchestras of the times. Some people object that they do not get the incisive brilliance which the Boston Symphony achieves without sacrificing sonority. It is true that the edges are rounded and bevelled, and the tone has thus a different quality. It is chiefly a matter of taste which one prefers.

Mr. Ormandy is a new conductor to us, though he has achieved an enviable reputation in other cities. He is careful to do nothing that will interrupt the smooth flow of this orchestra's playing. In interpretation it is possible that he can not or does not want to shake off entirely the Stokowski touch. The conclusion of the Bach and moments in the Brahms indicate that even if Mr. Stokowski is more and more courting the flesh-pots of Hollywood his influence is still strong in Philadelphia.

But Mr. Ormandy is a very much less theatrical conductor than the later Stokowski. His approach to the music is less capricious. It is true that he has the common notion in the Brahms that every diminuendo must also be a ritard. He moulds his phrases accordingly and prepares the entrance of a new theme deliberately. The performance of this symphony, then, was a trifle too consciously planned, though from a tonal aspect it had much that was profoundly moving.

Mr. Smeterlin was an excellent choice for the soloist in this rarely lovely Mozart concerto. He is a pianist of such bright and tidy clarity, of such poise and taste, that the proportions of the concerto were admirably recreated. From the orchestral side the last movement was too fast, though the piano still sounded serene and effortless. Otherwise the sympathy between soloist and orchestra was realized. Although the audience was not nearly large enough for a concert by such a visiting orchestra as this, it made up for its size in enthusiasm at this point and at the end.

We have left Mr. Cailliet's transcription of the Bach till the last on purpose. The prelude may be allowed to be a satisfactory arrangement, but the fugue will not do. Mr. Cailliet operates on the principle, a mistaken one, that Bach's fugues should emerge as one long crescendo. Moreover, Mr. Ormandy set so fast a pace that he was obliged to emphasize the harmony and let the counterpoint fend for itself. It was thus an unhappy and unmusical distortion and no improvement on the Wertheim arrangement of the D minor toccata and fugue, which the Cleveland orchestra played on Thursday night.

The Philadelphia orchestra will give a second concert this evening in Symphony Hall at 8:15 o'clock. Smeterlin will again be soloist, this time in the Strauss Burlesque, which has not been heard here for a long time. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and other works complete the program.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Philadelphia Orchestra

B. Globe
Feb 12/38

The Philadelphia Orchestra, second of the week's visiting symphonic organizations, gave the first of its two Symphony Hall concerts yesterday afternoon. Eugene Ormandy made his Boston debut conducting a sound and conservative program that began with Lucien Cailliet's transcription of a Bach Prelude and Fugue. Next came the verdant A major Piano Concerto of Mozart, with that superlative artist, Jan Smeterlin, for soloist. The afternoon ended with the Olympian First Symphony by Brahms.

Disinterested and competent observers have testified that the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras are the two best in the world today. Not to go further into the second half of the matter lest there be an impression of unseemly pride, it must unreservedly be stated that Philadelphia's tonal glory is magnificent. The rich and luminous tone of the strings, the supple if occasionally wayward playing of the woodwinds, the mellow quality of the brass, and the precision of all choirs proclaim virtuosity.

The Philadelphians, placed on a level and not in tiers like the Boston Symphony, are also governed by a much different seating arrangement with cellos at the front. For another difference Mr. Ormandy dispenses with score and baton.

A modest and self-effacing conductor, Mr. Ormandy is likewise an authoritative, and to some degree, distinctive, interpreter. He possesses the grasp of large outlines, he proportions mass to detail, and his command of style (to judge by this concert) is irreproachable. His scale of dynamic shadings is applied sensitively.

If any should ask what is the right style for a Bach transcription, the answer is found in the brilliant yet dignified performance of Mr. Cailliet's skillful work. Mr. Ormandy brought out the polyphonic voices, stressed the fantasia nature of the Prelude without trying to find sentiment where none exists. Nor did he whip up great climaxes of sonority for their own sake.

In fact, the orchestral part of Mozart's Concerto was too subdued, probably accountable to Mr. Ormandy's familiarity with the size of Symphony Hall. Conductor, orchestra and soloist secured a reading absolutely delightful for clarity and good taste, as well as consistent lyricism. Mr. Smeterlin, long a favorite in these parts, is as successful with Mozart as with Chopin. Fortunately, he is not of the school who treat Mozart like something breakable.

Mr. Ormandy's performance of the Brahms Symphony, obviously thought out as a sculptor might plan his art, strangely exhibited both the finest of the conductor's traits and some shortcomings. His conception was distinctive yet far from heroic. He sought to make details clear, to preserve orchestral balance and to let the music flow rather than to achieve boad effects and resounding sonorities. Not for a moment, however, was sentiment overdone. But Mr. Ormandy did vary the tempo where that was not specifically marked in the score, and diminuendos of the second movement were overstressed. Each conductor naturally has his own idea of the pace for the chorale theme in the last movement. If Mr. Ormandy erred on the slow side, he was consistent and did not gather speed once the passage had begun. The marvelous climax of brass, also in the last movement, was understated.

Let not this foregoing dissection bulk too large in the record of a noteworthy concert whose beauty will be remembered. Tonight Mr. Ormandy will play the following program: Buxtehude-Cailliet; Passacaglio; Beethoven: Seventh Symphony; Strauss: "Burleske" (Jan Smeterlin, soloist); Debussy: "The Afternoon of a Faun"; De Falla: Suite from "The Three-Cornered Hat."

C. W. D.

APPLAUD QUAKER PLAYERS

B. — Post

Philadelphia Orchestra Under Ormandy Scores Hit

Feb. — 12/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Within less than 24 hours Symphony Hall has been the scene of two concerts, each from a different visiting orchestra; something that has never happened here before and is likely never to happen again. Moreover, Eugene Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, who yesterday afternoon succeeded Artur Rodzinski and the Cleveland Orchestra, will reappear at Symphony Hall this evening and, for a second time, with Jan Smeterlin, pianist, as the soloist.

ORMANDY RELIABLE

Seldom is a reviewer of concerts in these parts so tempted to overlook the fact that comparisons are odious. What a critical delight it would be to compare or contrast the two visiting orchestras and their conductors, but the temptation must be resisted; this review shall be written as though Thursday's concert had not taken place.

There is, however, a comparison which may still be made, with propriety; between yesterday's concert of the Philadelphia orchestra and the one given here by that organization two seasons ago under Mr. Stokowski. For one thing, and a good thing, Mr. Ormandy gave us more of what may be called legitimate symphonic music. Whereas we received from Mr. Stokowski nothing but the conductor's transcription from Bach and his assembling of excerpts from "Goetterdaemmerung," Mr. Ormandy gave us but one transcription, that made by Lucien Cailliet, clarinetist of the orchestra, of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor and, for the rest, Brahms' First Symphony and the A major Piano Concerto of Mozart. Orchestras inevitably reflect the personality of their leaders.

Tone Like Boston's

A sound and sensitive musician, though by no means phlegmatic, Mr. Ormandy has none of Mr. Stokowski's electrifying brilliance and as a result the tone of the orchestra under him is not precisely that to which Mr. Stokowski has accustomed us. It is, indeed, more like that of our own orchestra; rich, full, eminently satisfying. Time and again in the performance of the Symphony the listener could have shut his eyes and have easily imagined that Dr. Koussevitzky and his band sat upon the stage.

Some day one of our industrious transcribers, and their name is now legion, is going to try the experiment of transcribing Bach's organ music for wind choirs only, in order to approximate still more closely the tone of the organ itself. Mr. Cailliet's felicitous scoring of the beginning of the Fugue suggested this thought, which is hereby passed along to anyone who cares to make use of it.

Strauss' Burleske Tonight

This evening Mr. Smeterlin will play for us the Burleske of Richard Strauss. Yesterday he contented himself and also greatly pleased his listeners with more familiar matter, the aforementioned Concerto of Mozart. Mr. Smeterlin's Mozart is limpid, crystalline, wholly in the vein, expressive without inappropriate sentimentality. The orchestral accompaniment yesterday matched and mated these virtues.

It remains only to be said that as on Thursday evening there were many empty seats, if not quite so many, and that the performance of the Symphony was received with excited acclaim; cries of "bravo!" stamping and all the rest of it. Brahms, at least the Brahms of this Symphony, is still sure-fire.

ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.
RECORD

FEB 11 1938

Two Musicians Of Note Here For Week-End

Dr. Klein Accompanied By World - Famous Woman Violinist

Two musicians, whose unusual ability and talents have won for them widespread recognition in musical circles in this country and abroad, are week-end visitors in St. Augustine.

One, Miss Charlotte Klein, Mus. Doc., F. A. G. O., is a former St. Augustine resident and is well known here. With Dr. Klein is Leonora Jackson (Mrs. William Duncan McKim), outstanding violinist, whose home also is in Washington, D. C. This noted artist, who will share honors with Dr. Klein at a number of delightful social functions planned during their brief stay here, is a graduate of the Royal School of Music in Berlin. As a student in Berlin she was awarded the coveted Mendelssohn State prize.

She has been soloist with symphony orchestras in Germany, France, England and Scotland, receiving a decoration from Queen Victoria. Miss Jackson has made six triumphant tours in the United States and has appeared eight times as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, also with other orchestras in Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and other large cities. She made a world tour in 1926, the year in which Miss Klein was organist at historic old Trinity Episcopal Church in St. Augustine.

She, too, is an Episcopalian.

These two musicians of note—Dr. Klein is one of the leading women concert organists in the United States—will be the guests of Mrs. Frederick S. Vaill at Vaill Point during their stay here.

They arrived in St. Augustine this morning.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

FEB 12 1938

Noise of Radiator Halts Concert

Pittsburgh—(INS)—A noisy radiator backstage last night brought a sudden halt to the concert of the world famous pianist, Artur Schnabel of Austria, and caused him to walk off the stage.

"What is this noise? I can't play here," he shouted, abruptly stopping his recital a few minutes after he had started it.

As the noted pianist left the stage, the large audience, fearing it was to blame for the interruption, burst into applause.

In a moment Schnabel reappeared and began again Schubert's "Sonata in A Major." Applause greeted his return.

The audience, mindful of the incident which occurred in the same hall a few months ago when late arrivals caused the noted Boston symphony conductor Serge [redacted] to leave the stage, became deathly quiet as the noted pianist began his recital again.

During the intermission an announcer, over the loud speaker system, asked the audience not to misconstrue Schnabel's action, explaining it was a noisy radiator and no fault of the audience that caused the artist to abruptly halt his recital.

(165)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 11 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Dedicated Program to Ravel at the Academy of Music Concert—Pauline Pierce Successful in Town Hall Debut

With the shift of the usual Friday concert to Thursday evening, Brooklyn had the honor of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first New York program dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel, whose recent death deprived us of one of the most ingenious and significant of twentieth century composers. Whether it was this fact or the realization on the part of a greater number of people that this orchestra probably ranks first in the country this year, the audience at the Academy of Music last night was the largest at these concerts this season.

While he is perhaps more widely known for his "Bolero" than for most of his other compositions, it was such works as "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Rhapsodie Espagnole, and "Ma Mere l'Oyle," which Dr. Koussevitsky included in this program, that have placed Ravel among the foremost of modern composers. The "Bolero" remains a tour de force of the very same brand of orchestration that sets off all his other compositions. For a thorough appreciation of Ravel's music one must follow his instrumentation closely. Though the appeal may be more intellectual than emotional, nevertheless, that is the key to all his works.

Until one recognizes that Ravel's orchestration was an end in itself, most of last night's program loses some of its lustre. As a miniaturist Ravel perfected within a self-imposed limitation and wrote melodies clear in form with rhythm as a part of the musical structure. The music is that of a realist with a keen sense of humor or irony, as the case may be, and a love of color derived from the timbre of instruments. Thus "Le Tombeau de Couperin" is fragile, precise and stylistic, a work of delicacy and perfection: its rhythms are fascinating, certain phrases like that of the Forlane, insinuating; and its spirit truly eighteenth century. All this was expressed through the performance, perhaps the closest to perfection during the evening.

Again in the "Rapsodie Espagnole" the music takes on similar characteristics, this time with Spanish influence predominant. While he secured a beautifully transparent reading of the Prelude a la Nuit which opens this work, Dr. Koussevitsky so refined the Spanish rhythms in the Malaguena and Habanera as to deprive them of their inherent flavor.

But that very refinement which characterizes so much of the playing of the Boston Symphony made the "Mother Goose" pieces delightful. And though it contributed to an exhilerating performance of the "Bolero," at the same itme it took away something from the final measures that is a frenzy of rhythm and sonority. The conductor, who has put fire into his performances of this work, built his climax too carefully last night.

There was much applause for Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which reveals the romantic fervor of the composer, heightened by the fact that the work is conceived as a whole, thus becoming more of a symphonic poem than a symphony. The symphony has even more richness than last night's beautiful performance brought out.

No doubt the "Bolero," which naturally ended the concert, is compelling music. The composer is said to have called it a "danse lasive," a fact which may account for its savage rhythm.

* * *

Pauline Pierce

Pauline Pierce, winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation Prize for 1937, gave a recital in Town Hall yesterday afternoon which more than justified her selection by the judges and which was a thoroughly enjoyable occasion. The young woman has a mezzo-soprano voice of full, warm, rich texture, satisfactory in range, steady in production and clear in note. She has a sense of style and phrasing highly praiseworthy and excellent diction. In other words, she made a highly successful debut.

Her program was pleasantly varied and cleverly arranged. A group of Brahms was sung with emotional warmth and a Russian group with awareness of content, especially in the amusing songs of Moussorgsky. She sang Respighi's "Il Tramonto" with a string quartet, and ended the recital with a group of English songs. Throughout her performance she caught the mood of the song and won her large audience with her artistic abilities. Gibner King accompanied.

* * *

La Boheme

Attention was centered on the debut of Jan Kiepura as Rodolpho in "La Boheme" at the Metropolitan last night. Since it was not possible to hear him, comment must be reserved for a later date. Bidu Sayao was Mimi and Natalie Bodanya Musetta. Messrs. Cehanovsky, D'Angelo, Altglass, Tagliabue, Cordon and Coscia completed the cast. Mr. Papi conducted.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1938

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Ravel Program—'Meistersinger' at Metropolitan

By NOEL STRAUS

In honor of the memory of Maurice Ravel the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in Carnegie Hall last night was largely devoted to selections by that composer. Mr. Koussevitzky has long been recognized as one of the leading interpreters of Ravel's music. At this concert he and his men were heard again in their unsurpassed renditions of the French master's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloé" and "Ma Mere l'Oye." These were preceded by Ravel's less familiar piano concerto, with the accomplished Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Mozart's symphony in D major (K. No. 504).

As John N. Burke remarked in the program notes, Ravel, when requested to compose music for the Boston orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, mentioned a piano concerto. But the work was not ready until a year later, when in 1932 it was first performed in Paris and later the same season in Boston and Philadelphia. It was Mr. Sanroma who was the soloist at its Boston première.

Influence of Jazz Seen

Although the concerto does not go far beneath the surface in its content, it enthralled last night by the glittering magnificence of its scoring, its almost uncanny play of ravishing tonal tints. The influence of jazz is marked in its corner movements. In fact, many a passage in the opening division seems to indicate a strong predilection on Ravel's part for the late George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." But the work has the stamp of Ravel's genius on every page and could have issued from no less skilled a hand.

The concerto was accorded a resplendent presentation, one which impressed as saying the ultimate word regarding the composition's possibilities in all respects. Mr. Sanroma played the piano part with the utmost bravura and keen understanding, while the orchestra in its support reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity. There were moments, such as the ethereally delicate harp cadenza, when the technical attainments of the instrumentalists seemed to be almost unbelievably adroit.

Cantabile Sections Praised

The cantabile sections of the first and second movements were splendidly contrasted with the more highly elaborated measures and the whole brought to a climax with an exhiliratingly vivid and brilliant reading of the final presto. The other movements of the work have their fine points, but it is the andante with its subtle development of the concerto's most poetic theme that proved the crown of the opus.

By a strange coincidence the "Prague" symphony of Mozart, one of his greatest, but strangely neglected creations in the genre, arrived at its third performance in two days in the Carnegie auditorium. The masterpiece enjoyed an unfoldment, which, if at times too objective to quite catch the spirit of this intensely subjective music, contained many instances of pronounced beauty, as for example the introductory adagio and the moody announcement of the melody in thirds at the start of the chief theme of the first movement, so knowingly contrasted with the soaring motive of the melody Mozart made use of later in the overture to "The Magic Flute."

Die Meistersinger Heard

The second "Die Meistersinger" of the season, given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, enlisted the services of a cast which, with one exception, was familiar to the town's Wagnerites. That exception is Irene Jessner, who added to her growing list of impersonations that of Eva.

As in her other appearances, Miss Jessner proved an intelligent artist. There is musical reason in the vocal treatment of her part and a wise deference to the qualitative limitations of her voice. Simply by heeding the obvious human motivation of her role in the drama, her acting achieves a credibility and effectiveness beyond the reach of robot attitudes honored by the traditions of operatic stage direction.

Of the others in the cast, little need be said. Friedrich Schorr's Hans Sachs remains a consummation of ripe artistry; Charles Kullmann's Walther gains one [illegible]pathy by its youthful, romantic spirit and pleasant lyric quality; Adolf Vogel makes Beckmesser a character instead of a grimacing clown; Emanuel List is a stately Pogner and Karl Laufkoetter a plausible adolescent David. Karin Branzell and Julius Huehn satisfactorily filled their respective roles of Magdalene and Kothner.

Artur Bodanzky conducted a performance that began sluggishly, but made amends as the evening progressed. G. G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1938

Woman Conductor Scolds Orchestra

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history last night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its [illegible]-seven-year history.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple. But that is where the difficulty lies."

She will make more musical history Friday by becoming the first woman to conduct the orchestra in a concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
FEB 12 1938

Koussevitzky Dedicates His Symphony Concert To Memory of Ravel

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a tribute to Maurice Ravel, distinguished French composer who died six weeks ago, and dedicated to him last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall. The program was mainly devoted to his works.

After beginning the concert with Mozart's D major Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky directed his musicians in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanromas as soloist. At the American premiere of the work, composed for the Bostonians' fiftieth anniversary and which took place six years ago, the same interpreters participated. The reading was a grateful and engaging one, with eloquent weaving of details and fancinul arabseques, performed in a glib and brilliant fashion by the pianist who received authoritative support by the orchestra.

The same composer's picturesque "Mother Goose" Suite of five delightful and whimsical pieces for children proved interesting and attractive for the large audience of grown-ups. In contrast was Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite, a diaphonous and poetical work whose graceful and delicate substance was captured and communicated with appropriate spirit and charm.

* * *

At Town Hall last night Emily Roosevelt, soprano, and Harold Henry, pianist, were heard in a concert planned for the benefit of the Lincoln Memorial University.

Mr. Henry's artistry, which has often invited the esteem and praise of music patrons, was illustrated in pieces by Brahms, Beethoven, Ravel, Chopin and Liszt and his own work, "While the Piper Played."

Miss Roosevelt, a gifted and intelligent vocalist who has frequently appeared in this city, presented "Divinites du Styx," by Gluck; German lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Wolf, Max and Strauss; a group by Henry and others.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1938

BOSTONIANS HONOR RAVEL'S MEMORY

Sanroma Plays Concerto With Koussevitzky.

The first of two programs designed to honor the memory of Maurice Ravel was given in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto for piano and orchestra, which Ravel completed in 1931, just too late for it to figure with the specially commissioned compositions performed during the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary season.

Two other works by Ravel were heard in company with the concerto last night. These were "Ma Mere l'Oye," which in its piano-duet form dates from 1908, and the second of the suites extracted from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" of two years later. The concert was not an all-Ravel one, however, the Boston conductor choosing to open it with Mozart's so-called "Prague" symphony—that in D major, which is No. 504 of the Kocehel catalogue. Its three movements were fastidiously played, with the famous strings of the orchestra justifying their reputation.

This is sometimes called "the symphony without a minuet," though there are others in the long list of Mozart symphonies to which the designation may be given quite as properly. This work might better be identified by reference to the noble introduction to the first movement, an extended adagio which presents much of kinship to certain pages of "Don Giovanni," composed shortly after the symphony and similarly brought out in Prague.

The concerto, like its companion for left hand alone, was among the last of Ravel's major orchestral works. No great headway has been made by it in this country since its introduction some six years ago, when Mr. Sanroma was the soloist in Boston and Sylvain Levin in Philadelphia and New York. As experienced again last night, it is a work of superficial brilliance, symptomatic of a time when jazz had invaded the ateliers of the Old World. It belongs to the era when the percussion section held new hopes for many composers. The ingenuity of a virtuoso in orchestral writing is discoverable on every page. But the musical substance is pretty thin. Mr. Sanroma's performance was one of captivating dash, with the orchestra flawlessly co-ordinated. The audience responded whole heartedly and Mr. Sanroma had to bow repeatedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is something of specialist in surprisingly diverse types of symphonic music, but in none more than the music of Ravel. His performances of the coruscating "Daphnis and Chloe" suite have set a standard. On this occasion both this work and "Ma Mere l'Oye" were about as beautifully achieved as it is possible to conceive for them. The orchestra, like the conductor, was very much in the vein. O. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
FEB 12 1938

Boston Symphony In Fine Program

For perhaps the only time in history Mozart's Prague symphony, in D major (K. 504), one of his greatest, by the way, has had in Carnegie Hall three hearings in two days. It was the Philharmonic-Symphony's symphonic piece Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon, and last night it headed the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The performance of this symphonic masterpiece (without a minuet) was a model of precision, balance, and unclouded tone. No wonder the huge audience received it with joy and thanksgiving! Appropriately, too, " led off the program, for the concert was officially denominated "In memory of Maurice Ravel, March 7, 1875—December 28, 1937," and Mozart was Ravel's favorite among all composers.

The remainder of the program was given over entirely to Ravel's own music, the works selected being the concerto for piano and orchestra, the "Mother Goose" suite, and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe." The assisting pianist was Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Ravel's amazing proficiency, as an orchestrator was exhibited by this list in variety and splendor, ranging from measures of miniature delicacy in "Mother Goose" to the tremendous sonorities of "Daphnis and Chloe," not to forget the Aladdin-like treasures of the concerto.

The execution provided by Mr. Koussevitzky and his astounding band was the last word in virtuosity. P. S.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER - NEWS
FEB 12 1938

Boston Symphony Gives Concert At Rutgers

Perfection is a goal deemed unattainable, but Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra pressed close to that superlative standard last Tuesday evening at Rutgers University in their role of mediators between the triumvirate of Mozart, Ravel, and Sibelius on the one hand and an audience of more than 3,000 on the other. Nearly 150 Plainfielders were among the enthralled throng, who listened without the usual disturbances of coughs, sneezes, and foot-shufflings.

The orchestral excerpts ("Daybreak," "Pantomime," and "General Dance") from Maurice Ravel's second suite, composed in 1910 for his famous "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet to go with Fokine's scenario, were played as a memorial to the composer, who died last Dec. 28. Koussevitzky's reading of this captivating music transported his hearers into a world of fantasy and allurement.

All the clear-cut, classic beauty of Mozart's delightful imagery was brought out by the orchestra in the "Prague" symphony, which opened the program.

Jean Sibelius is one genius who seems destined to come into his own during his life-time. The Finnish government recognized his genius by granting him a life pension 40 years ago, realizing that he has done more than any other man to win Finland world recognition.

The D Major Symphony, No. 2, played magnificently by the Boston Symphony as their closing number, was composed by Sibelius in the midst of a Mediterranean spring, when he was under the spell of Italy. Nevertheless, it depicts the varying moods of the Finnish people; pastoral, timid, yet aspiring.

The obvious understanding between the conductor and the members of his orchestra seems an ideal relationship and communicates to the audience a sense of security and confidence.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 15 1938

Symphony Series

NBC on Feb. 12 started a series of four programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, who is the first woman to conduct this orchestra. The series, heard on the Red network is devoted to choral music.

(165)

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 11 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Dedicated Program to Ravel at the Academy of Music Concert—Pauline Pierce Successful in Town Hall Debut

With the shift of the usual Friday concert to Thursday evening, Brooklyn had the honor of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first New York program dedicated to the memory of Maurice Ravel, whose recent death deprived us of one of the most ingenious and significant of twentieth century composers. Whether it was this fact or the realization on the part of a greater number of people that this orchestra probably ranks first in the country this year, the audience at the Academy of Music last night was the largest at these concerts this season.

While he is perhaps more widely known for his "Bolero" than for most of his other compositions, it was such works as "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the Rhapsodie Espagnole, and "Ma Mere l'Oyle," which Dr. Koussevitsky included in this program, that have placed Ravel among the foremost of modern composers. The "Bolero" remains a tour de force of the very same brand of orchestration that sets off all his other compositions. For a thorough appreciation of Ravel's music one must follow his instrumentation closely. Though the appeal may be more intellectual than emotional, nevertheless, that is the key to all his works.

Until one recognizes that Ravel's orchestration was an end in itself, most of last night's program loses some of its lustre. As a miniaturist Ravel perfected within a self-imposed limitation and wrote melodies clear in form with rhythm as a part of the musical structure. The music is that of a realist with a keen sense of humor or irony, as the case may be, and a love of color derived from the timbre of instruments. Thus "Le Tombeau de Couperin" is fragile, precise and stylistic, a work of delicacy and perfection: its rhythms are fascinating, certain phrases like that of the Forlane, insinuating; and its spirit truly eighteenth century. All this was expressed through the performance, perhaps the closest to perfection during the evening.

Again in the "Rapsodie Espagnole" the music takes on similar characteristics, this time with Spanish influence predominant. While he secured a beautifully transparent reading of the Prelude a la Nuit which opens this work, Dr. Koussevitsky so refined the Spanish rhythms in the Malaguena and Habanera as to deprive them of their inherent flavor.

But that very refinement which characterizes so much of the playing of the Boston Symphony made the "Mother Goose" pieces delightful. And though it contributed to an exhilerating performance of the "Bolero," at the same itme it took away something from the final measures that is a frenzy of rhythm and sonority. The conductor, who has put fire into his performances of this work, built his climax too carefully last night.

There was much applause for Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which reveals the romantic fervor of the composer, heightened by the fact that the work is conceived as a whole, thus becoming more of a symphonic poem than a symphony. The symphony has even more richness than last night's beautiful performance brought out.

No doubt the "Bolero," which naturally ended the concert, is compelling music. The composer is said to have called it a "danse lasive," a fact which may account for its savage rhythm.

* * *

Pauline Pierce

Pauline Pierce, winner of the Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation Prize for 1937, gave a recital in Town Hall yesterday afternoon which more than justified her selection by the judges and which was a thoroughly enjoyable occasion. The young woman has a mezzo-soprano voice of full, warm, rich texture, satisfactory in range, steady in production and clear in note. She has a sense of style and phrasing highly praiseworthy and excellent diction. In other words, she made a highly successful debut.

Her program was pleasantly varied and cleverly arranged. A group of Brahms was sung with emotional warmth and a Russian group with awareness of content, especially in the amusing songs of Moussorgsky. She sang Respighi's "Il Tramonto" with a string quartet, and ended the recital with a group of English songs. Throughout her performance she caught the mood of the song and won her large audience with her artistic abilities. Gibner King accompanied.

* * *

La Boheme

Attention was centered on the debut of Jan Kiepura as Rodolpho in "La Boheme" at the Metropolitan last night. Since it was not possible to hear him, comment must be reserved for a later date. Bidu Sayao was Mimi and Natalie Bodanya Musetta. Messrs. Cehanovsky, D'Angelo, Altglass, Tagliabue, Cordon and Coscia completed the cast. Mr. Papi conducted.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 12 1938

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Leads Boston Symphony in Ravel Program—'Meistersinger' at Metropolitan

By NOEL STRAUS

In honor of the memory of Maurice Ravel the program offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, in Carnegie Hall last night was largely devoted to selections by that composer. Mr. Koussevitzky has long been recognized as one of the leading interpreters of Ravel's music. At this concert he and his men were heard again in their unsurpassed renditions of the French master's second suite from "Daphnis et Chloé" and "Ma Mere l'Oye." These were preceded by Ravel's less familiar piano concerto, with the accomplished Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Mozart's symphony in D major (K. No. 504).

As John N. Burke remarked in the program notes, Ravel, when requested to compose music for the Boston orchestra's fiftieth anniversary, mentioned a piano concerto. But the work was not ready until a year later, when in 1932 it was first performed in Paris and later the same season in Boston and Philadelphia. It was Mr. Sanroma who was the soloist at its Boston première.

Influence of Jazz Seen

Although the concerto does not go far beneath the surface in its content, it enthralled last night by the glittering magnificence of its scoring, its almost uncanny play of ravishing tonal tints. The influence of jazz is marked in its corner movements. In fact, many a passage in the opening division seems to indicate a strong predilection on Ravel's part for the late George Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." But the work has the stamp of Ravel's genius on every page and could have issued from no less skilled a hand.

The concerto was accorded a resplendent presentation, one which impressed as saying the ultimate word regarding the composition's possibilities in all respects. Mr. Sanroma played the piano part with the utmost bravura and keen understanding, while the orchestra in its support reached a dizzy peak of virtuosity. There were moments, such as the ethereally delicate harp cadenza, when the technical attainments of the instrumentalists seemed to be almost unbelievably adroit.

Cantabile Sections Praised

The cantabile sections of the first and second movements were splendidly contrasted with the more highly elaborated measures and the whole brought to a climax with an exhiliratingly vivid and brilliant reading of the final presto. The other movements of the work have their fine points, but it is the andante with its subtle development of the concerto's most poetic theme that proved the crown of the opus.

By a strange coincidence the "Prague" symphony of Mozart, one of his greatest, but strangely neglected creations in the genre, arrived at its third performance in two days in the Carnegie auditorium. The masterpiece enjoyed an unfoldment, which, if at times too objective to quite catch the spirit of this intensely subjective music, contained many instances of pronounced beauty, as for example the introductory adagio and the moody announcement of the melody in thirds at the start of the chief theme of the first movement, so knowingly contrasted with the soaring motive of the melody Mozart made use of later in the overture to "The Magic Flute."

Die Meistersinger Heard

The second "Die Meistersinger" of the season, given last night at the Metropolitan Opera House, enlisted the services of a cast which, with one exception, was familiar to the town's Wagnerites. That exception is Irene Jessner, who added to her growing list of impersonations that of Eva.

As in her other appearances, Miss Jessner proved an intelligent artist. There is musical reason in the vocal treatment of her part and a wise deference to the qualitative limitations of her voice. Simply by heeding the obvious human motivation of her role in the drama, her acting achieves a credibility and effectiveness beyond the reach of robot attitudes honored by the traditions of operatic stage direction.

Of the others in the cast, little need be said. Friedrich Schorr's Hans Sachs remains a consummation of ripe artistry; Charles Kullmann's Walther gains one [illegible]pathy by its youthful, romantic spirit and pleasant lyric quality; Adolf Vogel makes Beckmesser a character instead of a grimacing clown; Emanuel List is a stately Pogner and Karl Laufkoetter a plausible adolescent David. Karin Branzell and Julius Huehn satisfactorily filled their respective roles of Magdalene and Kothner.

Artur Bodanzky conducted a performance that began sluggishly, but made amends as the evening progressed.

G. G.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1938

Woman Conductor Scolds Orchestra

By the United Press.

BOSTON, Feb. 16.—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history last night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its [illegible]-seven-year history.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple. But that is where the difficulty lies."

She will make more musical history Friday by becoming the first woman to conduct the orchestra in a concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL
FEB 12 1938

Koussevitzky Dedicates His Symphony Concert To Memory of Ravel

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid a tribute to Maurice Ravel, distinguished French composer who died six weeks ago, and dedicated to him last evening's concert in Carnegie Hall. The program was mainly devoted to his works.

After beginning the concert with Mozart's D major Symphony, Serge Koussevitzky directed his musicians in Ravel's Concerto for piano and orchestra, with Jesus Maria Sanromas as soloist. At the American premiere of the work, composed for the Bostonians' fiftieth anniversary and which took place six years ago, the same interpreters participated. The reading was a grateful and engaging one, with eloquent weaving of details and fancinul arabseques, performed in a glib and brilliant fashion by the pianist who received authoritative support by the orchestra.

The same composer's picturesque "Mother Goose" Suite of five delightful and whimsical pieces for children proved interesting and attractive for the large audience of grown-ups. In contrast was Ravel's "Daphnis et Chloe" Suite, a diaphonous and poetical work whose graceful and delicate substance was captured and communicated with appropriate spirit and charm.

* * *

At Town Hall last night Emily Roosevelt, soprano, and Harold Henry, pianist, were heard in a concert planned for the benefit of the Lincoln Memorial University.

Mr. Henry's artistry, which has often invited the esteem and praise of music patrons, was illustrated in pieces by Brahms, Beethoven, Ravel, Chopin and Liszt and his own work, "While the Piper Played."

Miss Roosevelt, a gifted and intelligent vocalist who has frequently appeared in this city, presented "Divinites du Styx," by Gluck; German lieder by Schubert, Schumann, Wolf, Max and Strauss; a group by Henry and others.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1938

BOSTONIANS HONOR RAVEL'S MEMORY

Sanroma Plays Concerto With Koussevitzky.

The first of two programs designed to honor the memory of Maurice Ravel was given in Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was soloist in the concerto for piano and orchestra, which Ravel completed in 1931, just too late for it to figure with the specially commissioned compositions performed during the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary season.

Two other works by Ravel were heard in company with the concerto last night. These were "Ma Mere l'Oye," which in its piano-duet form dates from 1908, and the second of the suites extracted from the ballet, "Daphnis and Chloe" of two years later. The concert was not an all-Ravel one, however, the Boston conductor choosing to open it with Mozart's so-called "Prague" symphony—that in D major, which is No. 504 of the Kocehel catalogue. Its three movements were fastidiously played, with the famous strings of the orchestra justifying their reputation.

This is sometimes called "the symphony without a minuet," though there are others in the long list of Mozart symphonies to which the designation may be given quite as properly. This work might better be identified by reference to the noble introduction to the first movement, an extended adagio which presents much of kinship to certain pages of "Don Giovanni," composed shortly after the symphony and similarly brought out in Prague.

The concerto, like its companion for left hand alone, was among the last of Ravel's major orchestral works. No great headway has been made by it in this country since its introduction some six years ago, when Mr. Sanroma was the soloist in Boston and Sylvain Levin in Philadelphia and New York. As experienced again last night, it is a work of superficial brilliance, symptomatic of a time when jazz had invaded the ateliers of the Old World. It belongs to the era when the percussion section held new hopes for many composers. The ingenuity of a virtuoso in orchestral writing is discoverable on every page. But the musical substance is pretty thin. Mr. Sanroma's performance was one of captivating dash, with the orchestra flawlessly co-ordinated. The audience responded whole heartedly and Mr. Sanroma had to bow repeatedly.

Mr. Koussevitzky is something of specialist in surprisingly diverse types of symphonic music, but in none more than the music of Ravel. His performances of the coruscating "Daphnis and Chloe" suite have set a standard. On this occasion both this work and "Ma Mere l'Oye" were about as beautifully achieved as it is possible to conceive for them. The orchestra, like the conductor, was very much in the vein.

O. T.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
FEB 12 1938

Boston Symphony In Fine Program

For perhaps the only time in history Mozart's Prague symphony, in D major (K. 504), one of his greatest, by the way, has had in Carnegie Hall three hearings in two days. It was the Philharmonic-Symphony's symphonic piece Thursday evening and yesterday afternoon, and last night it headed the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

The performance of this symphonic masterpiece (without a minuet) was a model of precision, balance, and unclouded tone. No wonder the huge audience received it with joy and thanksgiving! Appropriately, too, [illegible] led off the program, for the concert was officially denominated "In memory of Maurice Ravel, March 7, 1875—December 28, 1937," and Mozart was Ravel's favorite among all composers.

The remainder of the program was given over entirely to Ravel's own music, the works selected being the concerto for piano and orchestra, the "Mother Goose" suite, and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe." The assisting pianist was Jesus Maria Sanroma.

Ravel's amazing proficiency, as an orchestrator was exhibited by this list in variety and splendor, ranging from measures of miniature delicacy in "Mother Goose" to the tremendous sonorities of "Daphnis and Chloe," not to forget the Aladdin-like treasures of the concerto.

The execution provided by Mr. Koussevitzky and his astounding band was the last word in virtuosity.

P. S.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER - NEWS
FEB 12 1938

Boston Symphony Gives Concert At Rutgers

Perfection is a goal deemed unattainable, but Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony Orchestra pressed close to that superlative standard last Tuesday evening at Rutgers University in their role of mediators between the triumvirate of Mozart, Ravel, and Sibelius on the one hand and an audience of more than 3,000 on the other. Nearly 150 Plainfielders were among the enthralled throng, who listened without the usual disturbances of coughs, sneezes, and foot-shufflings.

The orchestral excerpts ("Daybreak," "Pantomime," and "General Dance") from Maurice Ravel's second suite, composed in 1910 for his famous "Daphnis and Chloe" ballet to go with Fokine's scenario, were played as a memorial to the composer, who died last Dec. 28. Koussevitzky's reading of this captivating music transported his hearers into a world of fantasy and allurement.

All the clear-cut, classic beauty of Mozart's delightful imagery was brought out by the orchestra in the "Prague" symphony, which opened the program.

BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 15 1938

Symphony Series

NBC on Feb. 12 started a series of four programs by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, who is the first woman to conduct this orchestra. The series, heard on the Red network is devoted to choral music.

Jean Sibelius is one genius who seems destined to come into his own during his life-time. The Finnish government recognized his genius by granting him a life pension 40 years ago, realizing that he has done more than any other man to win Finland world recognition.

The D Major Symphony, No. 2, played magnificently by the Boston Symphony as their closing number, was composed by Sibelius in the midst of a Mediterranean spring, when he was under the spell of Italy. Nevertheless, it depicts the varying moods of the Finnish people; pastoral, timid, yet aspiring.

The obvious understanding between the conductor and the members of his orchestra seems an ideal relationship and communicates to the audience a sense of security and confidence.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1938

The New Records

A Complete 'St. Matthew Passion'—Other Bach—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The phonographic adventures of Bach's epical "St. Matthew Passion" have passed into a new phase with the release by Victor of the first part of its complete version of the great work. The recording was made at an actual performance in Boston last spring.

One may say without hesitation that this is an inifinite advance on the considerably cut, indifferently performed St. Bartholomew version previously available. With the exception of eleven measures of recitative preceding the contralto air "Grief and Pain," the text of the thirty-four numbers included in this volume is complete. The only other curtailment is the elimination of the da capo (or repetition of the first part) of most of the airs, but this is hardly more than a pedagogical point.

The Performance.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston orchestra have given us a performance that is painstaking and dignified, if not remarkably fervent or expressive. However, the soloists are rather less even in merit. The best of them is Keith Faulkner, who interprets the all-important part of Jesus with fine vocal quality and excellent understanding. John Priebe's light tenor is admirable for the music of the Evangelist, but he is frequently embarrassed by its technical demands. Kathryn Meisle sings the contralto airs with sound style and reasonably good vocal quality, but Jeannette Vreeland is less well-suited for the soprano airs. The use of an English text cannot be regarded as other than unfortunate, even if very little of it is distinguishable.

Nevertheless, none of these qualifications would materially impair the documentary value of the performance, were it consistently well-reproduced. But the level of the recording is erratic, the fluctuations of quality curiously wide.

The reproduction of the orchestra is excellent, almost all of the solo airs are clearly recorded, and the singing of the unaccompanied chorales is the most beautiful musical performance in the album. However, the ensemble of chorus and orchestra is disappointingly poor, with much distortion and blurring of the vocal line. An effort has been made to fade the music out at the end of each record side to minimize the effect of the breaks, but in several instances they are annoyingly abrupt. Whether the magnificence of the music is sufficient to offset the interpretative and mechanical weaknesses of this recording is a question that each individual must decide for himself. It is not likely, however, that another complete performance will soon be available. The remaining records are promised for next month.

Other Bach.

Some of the finest organ reproductions yet to be achieved, as well as playing of high excellence, may be heard on a series of recent Musicraft records. The performer is the gifted Carl Weinrich, who has utilized the organ of the Westminster Choir School at Princeton for his interpretations of the trio sonatas Nos. 5 and 6, and the great C minor Passacaglia. The qualities of the last of these are, of course, familiar, but the sonatas which Bach wrote as instruction pieces for his sons are in their way no less remarkable. The musical thought is unfailingly vital and distinctive; and the two slow movements are exceptional for their placidity and rich emotional background.

Mr. Weinrich matches the loftiness of the music with performances that are equally impressive for their scholarship, musical vigor, and technical accomplishment. He makes especially effective use of the beautiful sound of this instrument, whose focused tone and lack of tremolo should be heard by every one whose conception of organ tone is based on the thunderings and rumbles emitted by the vast mechanisms in favor today. Musicraft's surfaces are better than have been, but they are still noisier than necessary.

The Lighter Side.

A combination of Red Norvo's xylophone, Mildred Bailey's voice, and two Gershwin tunes is this department's idea of something better than all right. The tunes are "I Was Doing All Right" and "Love is Here to Stay," both from the forthcoming "Goldwyn Follies," and both of them distinctly goo Gershwin. If there is a perference to be expressed, mine is for the second, for its greater individuality, but both are top-drawer Gershwin, another and saddening reminder of the superior talent of the lamented George. The Norvo-Bailey combination, on Brunswick 8086, is backed by the new and able band which Norvo has recently assembled, and while the performances lack any remarkable solo performances other than those by the leader and his vocalist-wife, the playing is altogether pleasant.

If you prefer a version of the same tunes by Ella Logan, who appears in the film, Brunswick has that too, on No. 8064. Unless it is pure coincidence, Miss Logan has adopted much of the manner of Billie Holliday, an eminently admirable model. But the individual touches of her own are too vocally coquettish for this taste. There are capable orchestral accompaniments directed by Bill Harty. The performances of the pair of tunes by Larry Clinton and his orchestra on Victor No. 25761 employs more elaborate orchestrations which verge on swing, but never quite cross into this choicer domain. Bea Wain is the vocalist. A third tune from the "Goldwyn Follies" is "Love Walked In," but the only version now at hand is Jan Garber's on Brunswick 8060, and judgement on the tune must thus be held in abeyance.

What They're Selling.

Aeolian—
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"....V
"You're A Sweetheart".....V
Gramophone—
"Thanks for the Memory"..B
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"...B
Liberty—
"Thanks for the Memory"..V
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"...V
Wanamaker—
"I Double Dare You".......V
"Snow White"..............V

The records reviewed in this column were played on an RCA-Victor R-99, and Victor Shadowgraphed (steel) needles were used. Queries on records, needles, machines, &c. are invited.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 12 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Ravel Memorialized By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Devotes Half of Program To Works of Late French Modern Master

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

At Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphonists devoted more than half of their concert to the memory of Maurice Ravel. No doubt there were some in the audience who thought the late French composer merited an entire concert. Yet the presence of Mozart's D major (Prague) symphony as a prelude to Ravel's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra," "Mother Goose" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite was welcome, for it is a grave and beautiful work, and it permits of no speculation about its chances of immortality.

The orchestra was in magnificent form, and Dr. Koussevitzky directed the classic symphony with evident ardor and appreciation of its faultless structure. Certainly Mozart could never have heard his composition played so carefully and with such solicitude for sheer beauty of sound and for instrumental balance. Yet for all its physical loveliness the work lacked the dimension of depth. It was a black and white symphony, which is the equivalent of one that is alternately loud and soft. It is true that Mozart's indications seldom go beyond these extremes. Nevertheless it is not to be assumed that the frugal symbols which he used were the confines of his thought and feeling. Permitted to suggest its own dynamics the music itself creates a gamut as large as any that Beethoven commanded. Mozart was a sensitive creature who not only experienced the "slings and arrows" but was also well aware of the mystery of life, and his poetic reactions must have colored his music. There were only faint intimations in the performance last night that the "Prague" symphony was human, and for that reason the composition appeared lovely, but dull.

I thought that the Bostonians came closer to Ravel than they did to Mozart, since the three pieces of the latter contain very little more than meets the ear. A valuation of Maurice Ravel is still distant. Mr. Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Boston Post, has this to say of the late composer: "Less imaginative than Debussy he [Ravel] may, nevertheless, outlast him because he chose to build on firmer ground." Mr. Smith may be prophetic, but last night the Ravel of the piano Concerto appeared to have been built on considerably less firm ground than had the Debussy of even so minor a work as the Sonata for violin and piano. Of course, all such speculations are silly in may do

r. One
Edvard

who is cial pi-
Ravel
ad the ton on is an se, and zy and was a e com-
the audience was, as it now generally is at the Boston concerts, large and appreciative. On Saturday the orchestra will continue its Ravel celebration with the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the "Scheherazade" and the "Bolero." Schumann's minor symphony will be an added feature.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 12 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Fine Performance of 'Meistersinger' Heard at the Metropolitan — Boston Symphony Plays Ravel in Carnegie Hall

Serge Koussevitsky continued to champion the music of Ravel in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Perhaps only he among the conductors of our leading orchestras would do so much, but then he has always shown himself receptive to new music and new composers, while the orchestra has been unrivaled in its performances of modern music. That both have done New York a distinct service is thus helping music lovers to evaluate for themselves the music of this noted composer, deserves more than passing gratitude.

Prefacing the Ravel works last night was Mozart's Symphony in D which conductor and orchestra treated in the polished and elegant manner of performance which the perfection and the proportion of the music demanded. Running through the symphony is the more montemplative mood of the composer, expressed in the Adagio introduction and the idyllic beauty of the Andante, while the finale reveals the more spritely mood. This Prague symphony is beautiful music when played as it was last night.

Chief among the Ravel compositions was the concerto for piano and orchestra played by Jesus Maria Sanroma who performed it for the first time in America at a Boston concert in 1932. In this work Ravel is said to have expressed himself completely and to his own satisfaction. If that is so, then his leading characteristics are a cool, intellectual cleverness, an abundance of wit, a passionate love of rhythm, brilliance, and modern jazz. He treats the piano like a percussion instrument of the orchestra and gives the soloist many a dazzling technical feat to master. The last movement crackles with gaiety and wit, and is an extraordinary piece of writing.

It is doubtful if any one could play this concerto better than Mr. Sanroma whose temperament fits the music perfectly and whose amazingly fluent technique makes his performance as brilliant as the music.

The program also included the "Ma Mere l' Oyle" suite heard in Brooklyn on Thursday night, and the "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet music which is some of the finest work of Ravel.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 16 1938

Boston Symphony Scolded by Woman

Mlle. Boulanger Halts Rehearsal of "Requiem"

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (AP)—For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman today stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will become the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, Friday, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
FEB 12 1

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Honors [illegible]ory of Maurice Ravel

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Mozart............Symphony in D Major
(Koechel No. 504)
Intermission
Ravel..."Ma Mere l'Oye"("Mother Goose")
Five children's pieces.
I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant
II. Petit Poucet
III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes
IV. Les Entretiens de da Belle et de la Bete
V. Le Jardin Feerique.
Ravel.."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet; Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the greater part of its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall to music performed in memory of Maurice Ravel. There was a prefatory symphony (the "Prague") by Mozart; the remaining numbers were by Ravel.

This was an admirable act of aesthetic piety on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. The two musicians—conductor and composer—had stood in a closely reciprocal relationship for years. Ravel had written music especially for performance by Koussevitzky, and Koussevitzky had long been one of the most loyal and eloquent of Ravel's exponents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership has become, indeed, almost Ravel's official mouthpiece in America. It was fitting that this tribute should have been paid to the memory of a gifted creative spirit by one of the great orchestras of the world.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky elected to begin his memorial exercises with the piano concerto, one of the last works of major dimensions composed by Ravel. It was Ravel's intention, he said, to write "a brilliant work, aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the virtuosity of the pianist." It is a pity that he has not been taken at his word. He accomplished precisely what he set out to do. Despite the cheerfully blasphemous assertion of that admirable French savant, Monsieur Henry Prunières, that the slow movement of this concerto is "analogous with certain arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite," the concerto remains no more than an extremely brilliant, amusing, and immensely effective jeu d'esprit, wholly engaging and wholly inconsequential.

It is surefire with any audience, when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreaso[illegible] to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which the final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved.

* * *

The clou of the concert was not, for some of us, the gorgeous and dazzling music of "Daphnis et Chloé," which ended the program, but that perfect example of Ravel in one of his most characteristic incarnations, Ravel the miniaturist, the Lilliputian of genius. This was the performance—a consummate one—of "Ma Mèr l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from fairy tales of Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two fortunate children, Mimie and Jean Godebski.

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis et Chloé," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

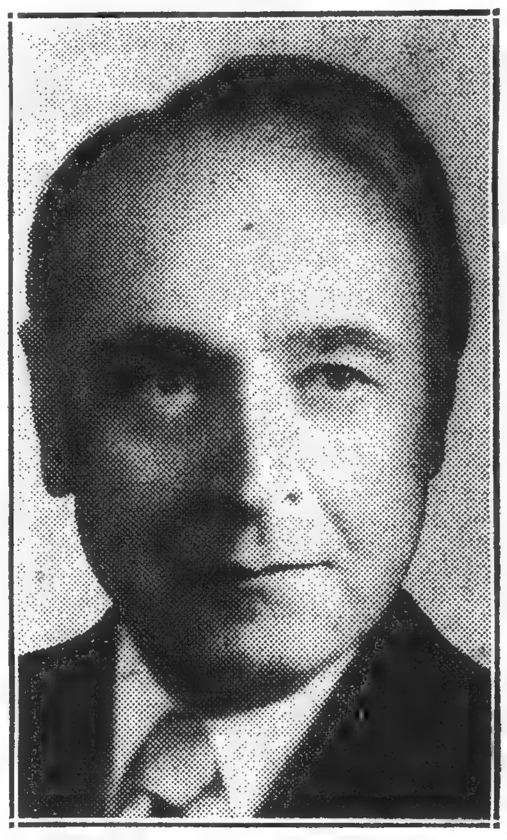
For the finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew beyond his title. We can only listen with innocent ears and remember a line from Poe: "Ah, bear in mind this garden is enchanted!" The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its scrupulous reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained. And it is all most dexterously held to scale. This is an infinitesimal world, and all its marvels are in proportion to its miniature fragility. Even in the radiant climax of "The Fairy Garden," the jubilation is remote and delicate, muted with the pathos of frailness and distance.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is always at his best when he gives us Ravel. All the memorializing music was beautifully played last night; and the resplendent music from "Daphnis et Chloé" provided the inevitable ending for a just and moving act of piety and affection.

Serge Koussevitzky



Conducting the Boston Orchestra's Ravel concert

INFORMATION OBSCURED

166

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 12 1938

The New Records

A Complete 'St. Matthew Passion'—Other Bach—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

The phonographic adventures of Bach's epical "St. Matthew Passion" have passed into a new phase with the release by Victor of the first part of its complete version of the great work. The recording was made at an actual performance in Boston last spring.

One may say without hesitation that this is an inifinite advance on the considerably cut, indifferently performed St. Bartholomew version previously available. With the exception of eleven measures of recitative preceding the contralto air "Grief and Pain," the text of the thirty-four numbers included in this volume is complete. The only other curtailment is the elimination of the da capo (or repetition of the first part) of most of the airs, but this is hardly more than a podagogical point.

The Performance.

Under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Boston orchestra have given us a performance that is painstaking and dignified, if not remarkably fervent or expressive. However, the soloists are rather less even in merit. The best of them is Keith Faulkner, who interprets the all-important part of Jesus with fine vocal quality and excellent understanding. John Priebe's light tenor is admirable for the music of the Evangelist, but he is frequently embarrassed by its technical demands. Kathryn Meisle sings the contralto airs with sound style and reasonably good vocal quality, but Jeannette Vreeland is less well-suited for the soprano airs. The use of an English text cannot be regarded as other than unfortunate, even if very little of it is distinguishable.

Nevertheless, none of these qualifications would materially impair the documentary value of the performance, were it consistently well-reproduced. But the level of the recording is erratic, the fluctuations of quality curiously wide.

The reproduction of the orchestra is excellent, almost all of the solo airs are clearly recorded, and the singing of the unaccompanied chorales is the most beautiful musical performance in the album. However, the ensemble of chorus and orchestra is disappointingly poor, with much distortion and blurring of the vocal line. An effort has been made to fade the music out at the end of each record side to minimize the effect of the breaks, but in several instances they are annoyingly abrupt. Whether the magnificence of the music is sufficient to offset the interpretative and mechanical weaknesses of this recording is a question that each individual must decide for himself. It is not likely, however, that another complete performance will soon be available. The remaining records are promised for next month.

Other Bach.

Some of the finest organ reproductions yet to be achieved, as well as playing of high excellence, may be heard on a series of recent Musicraft records. The performer is the gifted Carl Weinrich, who has utilized the organ of the Westminster Choir School at Princeton for his interpretations of the trio sonatas Nos. 5 and 6, and the great C minor Passacaglia. The qualities of the last of these are, of course, familiar, but the sonatas which Bach wrote as instruction pieces for his sons are in their way no less remarkable. The musical thought is unfailingly vital and distinctive; and the two slow movements are exceptional for their placidity and rich emotional background.

Mr. Weinrich matches the loftiness of the music with performances that are equally impressive for their scholarship, musical vigor, and technical accomplishment. He makes especially effective use of the beautiful sound of this instrument, whose focused tone and lack of tremolo should be heard by every one whose conception of organ tone is based on the thunderings and rumbles emitted by the vast mechanisms in favor today. Musicraft's surfaces are better than have been, but they are still noisier than necessary.

The Lighter Side.

A combination of Red Norvo's xylophone, Mildred Bailey's voice, and two Gershwin tunes is this department's idea of something better than all right. The tunes are "I Was Doing All Right" and "Love is Here to Stay," both from the forthcoming "Goldwyn Follies," and both of them distinctly good Gershwin. If there is a perference to be expressed, mine is for the second, for its greater individuality, but both are top-drawer Gershwin, another and saddening reminder of the superior talent of the lamented George. The Norvo-Bailey combination, on Brunswick 8086, is backed by the new and able band which Norvo has recently assembled, and while the performances lack any remarkable solo performances other than those by the leader and his vocalist-wife, the playing is altogether pleasant.

If you prefer a version of the same tunes by Ella Logan, who appears in the film, Brunswick has that too, on No. 8064. Unless it is pure coincidence, Miss Logan has adopted much of the manner of Billie Holliday, an eminently admirable model. But the individual touches of her own are too vocally coquettish for this taste. There are capable orchestral accompaniments directed by Bill Harty. The performances of the pair of tunes by Larry Clinton and his orchestra on Victor No. 25761 employs more elaborate orchestrations which verge on swing, but never quite cross into this choicer domain. Bea Wain is the vocalist. A third tune from the "Goldwyn Follies" is "Love Walked In," but the only version now at hand is Jan Garber's on Brunswick 8060, and judgement on the tune must thus be held in abeyance.

What They're Selling.

Aeolian—
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"....V
"You're A Sweetheart".....V
Gramophone—
"Thanks for the Memory"..B
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"...B
Liberty—
"Thanks for the Memory"..V
"Bei Mir Bist du Schoen"...V
Wanamaker—
"I Double Dare You".......V
"Snow White" V

The records reviewed in this column were played on an RCA-Victor R-99, and Victor Shadowgraphed (steel) needles were used. Queries on records, needles, machines, &c. are invited.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
FEB 12 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Ravel Memorialized By Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Devotes Half of Program To Works of Late French Modern Master

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

At Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphonists devoted more than half of their concert to the memory of Maurice Ravel. No doubt there were some in the audience who thought the late French composer merited an entire concert. Yet the presence of Mozart's D major (Prague) symphony as a prelude to Ravel's "Concerto for Piano and Orchestra," "Mother Goose" and the second "Daphnis and Chloe" suite was welcome, for it is a grave and beautiful work, and it permits of no speculation about its chances of immortality.

The orchestra was in magnificent form, and Dr. Koussevitzky directed the classic symphony with evident ardor and appreciation of its faultless structure. Certainly Mozart could never have heard his composition played so carefully and with such solicitude for sheer beauty of sound and for instrumental balance. Yet for all its physical loveliness the work lacked the dimension of depth. It was a black and white symphony, which is the equivalent of one that is alternately loud and soft. It is true that Mozart's indications seldom go beyond these extremes. Nevertheless it is not to be assumed that the frugal symbols which he used were the confines of his thought and feeling. Permitted to suggest its own dynamics the music itself creates a gamut as large as any that Beethoven commanded. Mozart was a sensitive creature who not only experienced the "slings and arrows" but was also well aware of the mystery of life, and his poetic reactions must have colored his music. There were only faint intimations in the performance last night that the "Prague" symphony was human, and for that reason the composition appeared lovely, but dull.

I thought that the Bostonians came closer to Ravel than they did to Mozart, since the three pieces of the latter contain very little more than meets the ear. A valuation of Maurice Ravel is still distant. Mr. Warren Storey Smith, writing in the Boston Post, has this to say of the late composer: "Less imaginative than Debussy he [Ravel] may, nevertheless, outlast him because he chose to build on firmer ground." Mr. Smith may be prophetic, but last night the Ravel of the piano Concerto appeared to have been built on considerably less firm ground than had the Debussy of even so minor a work as the Sonata for violin and piano. Of course, all such speculations are silly in the face of what the future may do the reputation of either. One ed only take the case of Edvard ieg

Mr. Jesus Maria Sanroma, who is Boston Symphony's official pi- st, was the soloist in the Ravel no Concerto, which he had the or to introduce to Boston on il 22, 1932. Mr. Sanroma is an rpreter of the modern muse, and playing of the crafty, jazzy and er superficial Concerto was a pathetic projection of the comion. The audience was, as it now generally is at the Boston concerts, large and appreciative. On Saturday the orchestra will continue its Ravel celebration with the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," the "Scheherazade" and the "Bolero." Schumann's minor symphony will be an added feature.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
FEB 16 1938

Boston Symphony Scolded by Woman

Mlle. Boulanger Halts Rehearsal of "Requiem"

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (AP)—For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman today stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will become the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, Friday, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
FEB 12 193

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

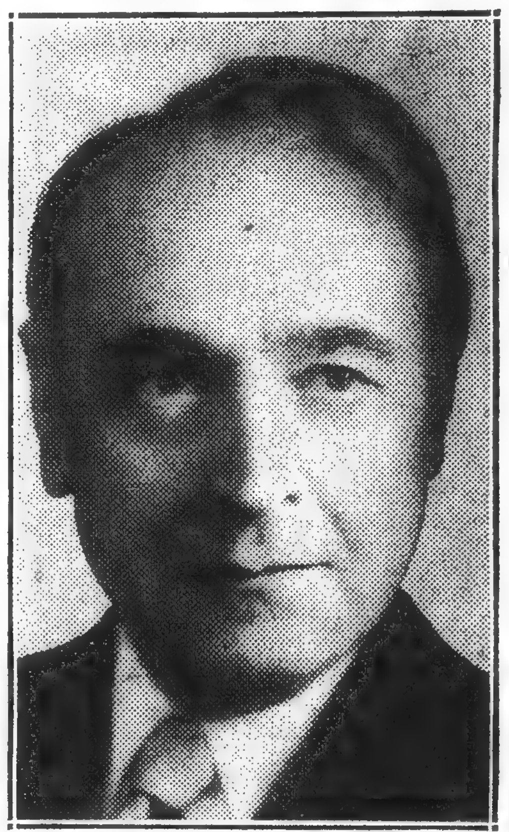
The Boston Symphony Honors the Memory of Maurice Ravel

Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

Mozart............Symphony in D Major
(Koechel No. 504)
Intermission
Ravel..."Ma Mere l'Oye" ("Mother Goose")
Five children's pieces.
I. Pavane de la Belle au Bois Dormant
II. Petit Poucet
III. Laideronnette, Imperatrice des Pagodes
IV. Les Entretiens de da Belle et de la Bete
V. Le Jardin Feerique.
Ravel.."Daphnis et Chloe," Ballet; Orchestral Excerpts (Second Suite)
Lever du Jour — Pantomime — Danse Generale.

Serge Koussevitzky



Conducting the Boston Orchestra's Ravel concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the greater part of its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall to music performed in memory of Maurice Ravel. There was a prefatory symphony (the "Prague") by Mozart; the remaining numbers were by Ravel.

This was an admirable act of aesthetic piety on Mr. Koussevitzky's part. The two musicians—conductor and composer—had stood in a closely reciprocal relationship for years. Ravel had written music especially for performance by Koussevitzky, and Koussevitzky had long been one of the most loyal and eloquent of Ravel's exponents. The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Koussevitzky's leadership has become, indeed, almost Ravel's official mouthpiece in America. It was fitting that this tribute should have been paid to the memory of a gifted creative spirit by one of the great orchestras of the world.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky elected to begin his memorial exercises with the piano concerto, one of the last works of major dimensions composed by Ravel. It was Ravel's intention, he said, to write "a brilliant work, aiming less at profundity than at setting in relief the virtuosity of the pianist." It is a pity that he has not been taken at his word. He accomplished precisely what he set out to do. Despite the cheerfully blasphemous assertion of that admirable French savant, Monsieur Henry Prunières, that the slow movement of this concerto is "analogous with certain arias of Bach, whose melodic flow seems to reach out into the infinite," the concerto remains no more than an extremely brilliant, amusing, and immensely effective jeu d'esprit, wholly engaging and wholly inconsequential.

It is surefire with any audience, when it is played as superbly as it was last night by Mr. Sanroma. It would be unreasonable to ask for a better performance than he achieved, one more entirely in the vein of the music. When Mr. Sanroma had completed the dazzling feat of acrobatics which the final Presto requires, the audience gave him what one is obliged to call an ovation. It was well deserved.

* * *

The clou of the concert was not, for some of us, the gorgeous and dazzling music of "Daphnis et Chloé," which ended the program, but that perfect example of Ravel in one of his most characteristic incarnations, Ravel the miniaturist, the Lilliputian of genius. This was the performance—a consummate one—of "Ma Mère l'Oye" ("Mother Goose"), that delectable suite of "cinq pièces enfantines," derived from fairy tales of Perrault and others, which Ravel composed as piano duets for the amusement of two fortunate children, Mimie and Jean Godebski.

The captivating little work is scored for a limited body of instruments (save for two horns, Ravel foregoes the brass). This concentrated orchestra glows and flashes like a casket of fairy jewels—and once or twice it takes us out of doors into the wood beyond the world. Here is tonal poetry at its most laconic and concise. Enchanting things are said with the utmost economy of means, yet with astonishing completeness of effect. The gorgeous and exuberant Ravel of the "Rapsodie Espagnole," of "Daphnis et Chloé," of "La Valse," is here a spinner of gossamer and tender loveliness, achieving a humor and a poetic charm that are saved by Gallic irony from the offense of being whimsical or quaint.

* * *

For the finale of his suite, "The Fairy Garden," Ravel offers us no clew beyond his title. We can only listen with innocent ears and remember a line from Poe: "Ah, bear in mind this garden is enchanted!" The close is radiant and jubilant—you might almost think you were in that marvelous Garden opened by Tyltyl's magic key, with a thousand million bluebirds flying in the moonlight among the stars and planets and jeweled boughs.

This music gives us Ravel at his most intimately exquisite. The composition is masterly in its delicate blending of instrumental colors, its scrupulous reticence, the necromantic skill with which fragile and tenuous webs of tone are spun and sustained. And it is all most dexterously held to scale. This is an infinitesimal world, and all its marvels are in proportion to its miniature fragility. Even in the radiant climax of "The Fairy Garden," the jubilation is remote and delicate, muted with the pathos of frailness and distance.

* * *

Mr. Koussevitzky is always at his best when he gives us Ravel. All the memorializing music was beautifully played last night; and the resplendent music from "Daphnis et Chloé" provided the inevitable ending for a just and moving act of piety and affection.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 12 1938

Mus

B

Fine Perform the Metro
Plays

nui room, nicely furnished; ouse; transits; reasonable. -1934.
LATBUSH — Cheerful, attracti lished room, all conveniences 1-2; Brighton line, Kings DEwey 9-9442.
LATBUSH—E. 21st St.; oppor ter living-bedroom; next bat new elevator apartment. BUc 5046, evenings.
LATBUSH—2909 Newkirk Av subway station; 3 rooms, la furnished; steam, refrigerati minster 2-6886.
LATBUSH—1199 E. 8th St.; keeping room, suitable 1-2 subway; reasonable. Walun

Serge Koussevitzky continued to champion the music of Ravel in the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night. Perhaps only he among the conductors of our leading orchestras would do so much, but then he has always shown himself receptive to new music and new composers, while the orchestra has been unrivaled in its performances of modern music. That both have done New York a distinct service is thus helping music lovers to evaluate for themselves the music of this noted composer, deserves more than passing gratitude.

Prefacing the Ravel works last night was Mozart's Symphony in D which conductor and orchestra treated in the polished and elegant manner of performance which the perfection and the proportion of the music demanded. Running through the symphony is the more montemplative mood of the composer, expressed in the Adagio introduction and the idyllic beauty of the Andante, while the finale reveals the more spritely mood. This Prague symphony is beautiful music when played as it was last night.

Chief among the Ravel compositions was the concerto for piano and orchestra played by Jesus Maria Sanroma who performed it for the first time in America at a Boston concert in 1932. In this work Ravel is said to have expressed himself completely and to his own satisfaction. If that is so, then his leading characteristics are a cool, intellectual cleverness, an abundance of wit, a passionate love of rhythm, brilliance, and modern jazz. He treats the piano like a percussion instrument of the orchestra and gives the soloist many a dazzling technical feat to master. The last movement crackles with gaiety and wit, and is an extraordinary piece of writing.

It is doubtful if any one could play this concerto better than Mr. Sanroma whose temperament fits the music perfectly and whose amazingly fluent technique makes his performance as brilliant as the music.

The program also included the "Ma Mere l' Oyle" suite heard in Brooklyn on Thursday night, and the "Daphnis et Chloe" Ballet music which is some of the finest work of Ravel.

ST. LOUIS, MO.
POST DISPATCH

FEB 13 1938

MUSIC and Music MAKERS

To the Radio Audience.

By Thomas B. Sherman

EVERYBODY admits that a radio performance of music is unlike the original from which it is so magically derived. It is not only reduced in size, but suffers a varying degree of internal distortion as well. These facts are worth repeating not because they have been challenged but because the home auditor of concert performances—who may be a little too delighted with the privilege of having Grace Moore sing to him while he shaves—should be constantly reminded of the acoustical changes that occur during the process of converting sound into electrical impulses and back into sound again.

Generally speaking, a broadcast is strictly accurate only in values affected by tempo and pitch. If Koussevitzky takes the "Kleine Nachtmusik" of Mozart much too fast, as he always does, nobody in the control room can make it any slower. Nor can engineering ingenuity do anything for the soprano who sings out of tune. But if the texture of the orchestra seems coarse, or the woodwinds too loud, or a rhythmic pattern sounds too weak because of an accent that fails to register, one can never be sure of what caused it. The fault may lie with the performer, the broadcasting apparatus or the receiving apparatus.

—o-o—

● THE LISTENER who does not bear this in mind will inevitably build up a whole complex of wrong notions about the music he is hearing and the way it is being performed. He will be particularly prone to do so if he has not acquired a familiarity with the work either through a study of the score or through having heard it, at first hand, a sufficient number of times.

Making a point of these discrepancies may sound like just another exercise in fine distinctions. What does it matter, one may ask, if the radio reception is acoustically inaccurate, so long as it sounds good? Well, the answer is that it doesn't always sound good in which case the innocent listener may be excluding himself from future pleasures by assuming that it is sounding as the composer intended it should.

—o-o—

● I WONDER, for instance, what the innocent listener must have thought about a recent performance of the Leonore Overture No. 3 which was broadcast from the studios of the Radio City orchestra. The first trumpet call was played fortissimo, the second was still fortissimo though a little louder. If he didn't know the overture he may have wondered at the sudden injection of these ear-splitting blasts. If he did know the overture he also knew that the first call was supposed to come from a distance (in concert performances the trumpeter is always behind the scenes) and the second to come from a point much nearer. Knowing this the dramatic climax of this intensely dramatic composition was destroyed. Both listeners were the losers. The first, perhaps, will never know how much because such a performance could hardly have made him want to hear it under better circumstances.

—o-o—

● ANOTHER CASE in point is a recent broadcast by the New York Philharmonic of the Introduction to the Third Act of "Tristan and Isolde." The English horn, which in the opera is also played off stage, was situated so close to the microphone that it sounded like a trombone. The miraculously descriptive quality of this passage, needless to say, was turned into musical balderdash. Any one who formed his impression of the music from this performance would have been justified in so considering it.

All of which must not be considered an argument against the radio. Its effect on the musical awareness of the nation is only too apparent. And who wants to be caught firing a pop-gun at the inevitable? It is certainly better to hear a Beethoven symphony over the radio than not at all. But it is better still to hear it with the knowledge that it is a substitute and an understanding if its peculiar disabilities.

—o-o—

● HAVING SPOKEN these ugly words about a popular household institution, a gracious concluding remark is, perhaps, in order. Well, here it is: the radio is undoubtedly a healthy corrective of eye-mindedness. Those concertgoers who filter the sound of a symphony through the image of the conductor and are affected accordingly cannot indulge in such practices when there is only a wooden box to look at. This is all to the good, for it puts all performers on an equal footing so far as extraneous and non-musical influences are concerned, which accounts for the difference in temperature between the audiences who merely hear the Toscanini broadcasts from New York and those who both see and hear. According to all accounts, the latter have been behaving like angels in one of Father Divine's less orderly heavens. The former are plenty pleased but more temperate. Some of them, in fact, prefer the New York Philharmonic broadcasts for the sound musical reason that the Philharmonic is a better orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 13 1938

167

Woman to Wield Baton Over Boston Symphony

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, First of Sex Ever to be Given This Musical Distinction, Will Lecture Here Feb. 25.—Grants First Press Interview

By Myra H. Blosser

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER, who will be the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will possibly not be so aware of her unusual distinction, when she occupies the podium in Symphony Hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, as will the orchestra and the audience.

It is always her greatest joy, says this noted French musician, to conduct an orchestra. She never thinks then that she is a woman doing a man's work. She is, instead, a musician realizing one of the dreams of her early years of study. In France she has often wielded the baton over orchestras and choral groups. Last year she led the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in London; there again being the first woman accorded that honor.

She conducted in London the same work which will be the feature of the programs at Symphony Hall this week. It is music she knows intimately, being the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure, who was her own "master" at the Paris Conservatoire. It is, she says, one of his finest works, a beautiful tonal expression of sorrow and unassailable faith.

Will Talk of French Artists

Mlle. Boulanger will come to Providence the following Friday to give a lecture recital in Alumnae Hall. Pembroke College, under the auspices of Brown University and the Alliance Francaise. She will speak of three French musicians—Monteverdi, Debussy and Faure.

Though Mlle. Boulanger takes the conductor's stand with so much pleasure and so little concern that it is a rare place for a woman, it will be a very feminine figure that will step out on the platform Friday; slender, not very tall, very shy she will probably be glad to get the applause over with so she may give attention to the music.

In the chorus that will sing in the "Requiem" will be members from the great conductor's own choral groups in Paris, who accompanied her to London and to this country. These include two men and four women; one the Comtesse Jean de Polignac, daughter of Lanvin, the famous French stylist. They will sing again, with the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, when the combined groups give a concert March 3 under the leadership of the noted guest.

Long Interested in Choral Work

For several years Mlle. Boulanger has been specially interested in directing choral groups in Paris, which give small chamber music recitals as well as large public concerts. In both the singers have been accustomed to give many ancient works that are little known and introduced the works of young composers. Mlle. Boulanger has instilled in the singers much of her own enthusiasm for music.

This noted French musician has had an outstanding influence on the young composers of today. To her acolytes have come from all parts of the world. She is in the United States as a guest member of the music department of Radcliffe College. In her classes, Harvard men, for the first time, are being allowed to sit in classes at Radcliffe. Ten Harvard men and five Radcliffe women compose a seminar group of advanced students in music composition. With the class of 50 undergraduates, in a course on "Early and Modern Music—A Comparative Study," there is a total of 65 students from Harvard and Radcliffe who are now enjoying advantages in music study for which young musicians and composers of all nationalities have for years been going to Paris.

Began Class Work Last Week

Mlle. Boulanger met her first class in an American college on Tuesday afternoon. Though only 50 undergraduates are registered in the course, 100 students crowded into the white hall at Fay House, Radcliffe's beautiful administration building.

They saw a slender woman with dark hair touched with gray, dressed in simply tailored black with a thin band of white edging about the high neck and two fine silver chains crossing the front of the blouse. The red ribbon of the French Legion of Honor and a small jewelled pin were other ornaments. Mlle. Boulanger looks much more like an Englishwoman, or an American, than a Frenchwoman.

That may be because her mother was a Russian; Russian gentlewomen having a way of looking English or American. But once Mlle. Boulanger begins to speak, she is like her French forbears. Her shrugs and gestures are unmistakably French.

Is An Inspiring Teacher

What her collegiate audience also saw—what they must have seen—was an inspired teacher. She spoke fast, in fluent, slightly accented English, the words welling up from her enthusiasm in the same effortless way that water bubbles from a spring. You felt there was infinite knowledge, but no egotism on that account.

Just before her lecture Mlle. Boulanger reluctantly granted an interview to the press, the first she has ever given in all her distinguished career. She was reticent about her own achievements. but when she spoke of Faure she became eloquent. "If one knew him, one worshipped him. If people do not love and understand his music, it is because they have not approached him in the right way," she said.

She declared that a teacher receives as much from her students as she gives, a noteworthy remark from a master to whom most of the young composers of today owe their training. For 34 years she has been teaching and of course—the "of course" was her own—she likes it. She gave up composition to devote her life to instruction. She enjoys watching the development of ideas in the gifted young people who come to her. And she believes firmly in a mastery of technique before a student may have freedom to follow his ideas.

"Freedom comes from discipline" and "true technique" is the right way to freedom, she says.

Urges Childhood Training

She emphasizes the necessity for the young musician to develop the ear, a pure musical sense of hearing, objective, not subjective or literary. She advises mothers to foster this musical ear in their children, almost from the time they are babies, so that later on they will enjoy good music, whether they ever become musicians or not.

The relation between music of different epochs is one of her creeds. Her teaching connects very ancient and essentially modern traditions, finding a relationship in sound between Stravinsky, for example, and certain 12th century masters.

Mlle. Boulanger is a hard worker at her art. Her lectures at the Ecole Normale of Paris, where she is head of the department of music, begin usually at 8 o'clock in the morning. She is also professor of harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, where she has interested Igor Stravinsky in the work of promising young pupils. When her teaching day at these two schools, and with her private pupils, is at an end she works far into the night at her apartment, near the Place Clichy on Montmartre.

Mlle. Boulanger's father and grandfather were both professors at the Paris Conservatoire. She became a pupil there when she was very young and in 1908 she won the second Grand Prix de Rome. When she was but 14 she was made assistant to Dallier, professor of harmony at the Paris Conservatoire and, a few years later, became his associate at the great organ in the church of La Madeleine. She is widely considered the greatest living woman organist.

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER of Paris, distinguished musician who has had an outstanding influence on the younger composers of today, began on Tuesday afternoon her first course of lectures to American college students in Fay House, Radcliffe College. Mlle. Boulanger will occupy the podium in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, the first woman to have the honor to lead the Boston Symphony orchestra. She will lecture the following Friday evening in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College, on three French musicians, Monteverdi, Faure, Debussy.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American

FEB 13 1938

Carnegie Hall Filled Thrice In a Day by Music Lovers

By GRENA BENNETT.

Carnegie Hall was filled three times yesterday. Teh first event

Two hours after the children had departed, the mature subscribers of the Boston Symphony Orchestra filed into the auditorium, Serge Koussevitzky occupied his customary position as batonist of the band from the Bay State and presented his second program in tribute to the late composer, Maurice Ravel.

At night, Dorothy Blumberg gave a piano recital.

ROCHESTER, MINN.
POST - BULLETIN

FEB 14 1938

First in U. S. in 1925

On Mlle. Boulanger's first visit to this country, in 1925, at the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, she played the organ part for a symphony for organ and orchestra by Aaron Copland, one of her American pupils, with the Boston Symphony. This was the first public presentation of the work. Among other of her American pupils are George Antheil, Theodore Chanler, Igor Markevitch, Virgil Thomson and Walter Piston, head of the department of music at Harvard and Radcliffe.

Mlle. Boulanger's second visit here was last spring, when at the instance of the French government she came to study the methods of musical instruction in American schools.

MICHIGAN CITY, IND.
EVENING DISPATCH

FEB 1 [illegible]

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

168

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 13 1938

As the orchestra sees him—Montage of Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, taken during a performance at Symphony hall, Boston.

Woman Halts Boston Symphony, Scolds Musicians

BOSTON, Feb. 17.—A woman stopped a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and scolded the musicians.

The woman was Mlle. Nadia Boulanger who will be the first woman to conduct the renowned organization tomorrow. The orchestra was engaged in rehearsing Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" when Mlle. Boulanger called the halt.

In crisp French-accented words she said:

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

Lowell Tele. Feb. 13/38

BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Nad'a Boulanger, distinguished French musician, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, February 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem", the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem", which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevitzky will complete the programme, conducing the organ symphony of Saint-Saens.

Saint-Saens Piano Concerto in G minor will be presented by Miss Kassman with the orchestra at the Cambridge concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 99, and close it with two numbers of Ravel: the Suite "Mother Goose", and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orlando Barera, the distinguished Italian violinist, will appear for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra when he plays at the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, in Symphony hall, to be given February 21 and 22. Mr. Barera, born in Ferrara, Italy, in 1907, has attained an extensive reputation in European cities. He visited this country last season, giving concerts in New York, and in Washington, D. C., at the Library of Congress series. He will be heard on this occasion in Mozart's Concerto in D maor, No. 4.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the Concerto of Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, which

---

MOLINE, ILL.
DISPATCH

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 13 193

Committee Assistants Are Named For Questers Ball in Montclair

"Gay Nineties" Fete on February 21 Will Follow Progressive Dinner; Bollards to Entertain for President Wriston, of Brown University

A "Gay Nineties Ball" will be given February 21 by the Questers, the junior group of the Montclair Women's Club. Mrs. George Felt, ticket chairman, is being assisted by Mrs. Paul Clifford, Mrs. William Mackie, Mrs. Henry Mills, Mrs. Helen Johnstone, Miss Jule Trelease and Miss Betty Hayes.

Miss Marjorie Kieselbach, who is poster chairman, will be assisted by Mrs. Richard Miller, Miss Marjorie Shand and Miss Viola MacLaughlin. The Misses Cecile and Ruth Forshay and Miss Margot MacGregor will assist Mrs. Richard Hayes with refreshments.

Miss Marion Benbow is general chairman. Miss Bobbie Howard is in charge of music and Miss Marjorie McConnell of publicity. A progressive dinner will precede the dance.

A floor show, under the direction of Mr. T. Brooks Cross, will be a feature of the Montclair Dramatic Club "Varieties" on February 26 at the Montclair Athletic Club. Mrs. Francis F. Merriam is general chairman and proceeds will be used to help finance the new clubhouse. There will be dances by Mrs. Robert M. Boyd and her sister, Mrs. C. Sanford Smith jr., the former Orton sisters, and songs will be sung by the Misses Gertrude Neidlinger and Helen Harbourt, the latter accompanied by Mr. Julius C. Zingg.

Tacoma Visitor Entertained

A tea was given February 8 by Mrs. William W. Elder, of Draper Terrace, in honor of her guest, Mrs. A. C. Tousey, of Tacoma, Wash., who will remain until Tuesday. Mrs. E. W. Foote, Mrs. Paul Bancel and Mrs. Charles Smythe, of Montclair; Mrs. Simeon Hauser, of Bloomfield; Mrs. George L. Craig, Mrs. I. M. Baker jr. and Mrs. Francis C. Bethell, of Montclair, and Mrs. J. Gordon Ives, of Glen Ridge, assisted the hostess. Mr. Elder departed last week for the Pacific Coast and Mr. William W. Elder jr. returned to Williams College.

Mrs. Joseph H. Fobes and daughter, Miss Josephine Fobes, of North Mountain Avenue, sailed Wednesday for a two-weeks cruise to the West Indies and South America.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald D. Peet, of Berkeley Place, will sail Thursday for a Caribbean cruise, after which they will pass a couple of weeks at Hope Ranch, Jamaica.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph H. Bollard, of 32 Llewellyn Road, will give a dinner for Mr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston, Thursday at their home. Dr. Wriston, formerly president of Lawrence College, Appleton, Wisconsin, is the author of "The Nature of the Liberal College." On Wednesday, he will address Brown alumni in New York and on Thursday will speak in Montclair to a group of alumnae of Pembroke College, Brown University. Thirty of the alumnae have been invited to the dinner for Mr. and Mrs. Wriston.

A tea was given Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. S. Brent Girdler, of South Mountain Avenue, for mothers of members of the Montclair Girls' Mounted Troop. Mrs. Beverley Burnham, of Montclair, Mrs. Lionel Reid, of Glen Ridge, Mrs. S. Waldo Thompson and Mrs. Oscar Westen, of Essex Fells, poured tea. Assisting were the Misses Katherine Campbell, of South Orange, Betty Burnham, of Montclair, Patty Reid, of Glen Ridge, Nancy Thompson and Virginia Westen, of Essex Fells, and Jean Girdler, daughter of the hostess.

Mrs. Coleman Wynne, of Plymouth Street, will depart Tuesday for California for a two-months' stay. She will visit Mrs. Emily Sterling and Miss Mary Sterling, of Glendora, formerly of Montclair, after which she will take a trip along the Pacific Coast. Miss Katharine Grant, of Greens Farms, Conn., who was her guest last week end and who is departing today for California, will join her in the West.

Miss Barbara Porter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James M. Porter, of Russell Terrace, was home last week end from the Madeira School, Greenway, Va., and had as guest a classmate, Miss Elaine Ott, of White Plains, N. Y.

Miss Carol Prince, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James F. Prince, of Montclair Avenue, who was home last week from Connecticut, is attending the winter carnival at Dartmouth College.

Junior Assembly Held

The seventh Junior Assembly of the season was held Friday at the Montclair Women's Club under direction of Miss Susanne Sawyer. Mrs. Bernard M. Carter and Mrs. Swen R. Swenson received the guests and were assisted by the Misses Virginia Taylor, Barbara Bailey and Carol Christopher. Buffet suppers were given by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Fiske, of Westover Road, for twenty-four guests in honor of their son, Mr. Dick Fiske. Lieutenant Colonel P. J. Horton and Mrs. Horton, of Warren Place, entertained for their daughter, Miss Inez Horton. The next assembly will take place February 25, when Dr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Hahn, of Wellesley Road, will give a supper in honor of their daughter, Miss Ann Hahn, and Mr. and Mrs. G. Stewart King, of Sutherland Road, will entertain for Mrs. King's daughter, Miss Jean Downes. Colonel and Mrs. Horton and Miss Horton passed the week end at West Point and attended the dance at the Military Academy on Saturday.

A luncheon bridge for twenty guests was given Thursday at Essex County Country Club by Mrs. Robert E. Jennings, of South Mountain Avenue, in honor of her guest, Mrs. W. R. Farrington, of Honolulu, whose late husband was a former Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

A dinner was given Wednesday by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk, of Erwin Park Road, preceding the Boston Symphony concert at the Montclair High School. Guests included Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Marvin, Mr. and Mrs. Chapin Marcus, Mr. and Mrs. C. Everett Bacon and Mr. Wilfred J. Funk jr., who was home last week from Princeton.

Mrs. Joseph Pollet, of Woodstock, N. Y., has been visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Perry B. Strassburger, of Hawthorne Place.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Kelsey and daughter, Miss Margaret Kelsey, of South Mountain Avenue, departed Thursday to pass a month in Bermuda.

Mrs. John Wood and daughter have returned to their Montclair home after visiting the former's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Morris, in Pasadena, Calif.

Sally Ross, Bride-Elect, Guest

Mr. and Mrs. H. Bradley Sexton, Mr. Charles Hayward and Mr. Grainger Costikyan, all of Montclair, entertained at dinner for twenty-seven guests February 5 at the Sexton home in honor of Miss Sally Ross, of Madison, N. Y., who will be married Saturday to Mr. H. St. John Webb jr., of Montclair.

Miss Barbara Spadone, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Spadone, of Upper Mountain Avenue, accompanied by Mrs. William Burpee and Miss Evelyn Burpee, of Montreal, sailed yesterday on the Carinthia for a three-week vacation in Nassau. Mrs. Florence Le Bosquet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Murphy, of Llewellyn Road, has joined Mrs. Edward Vintschger and daughter, Miss Muriel Vintschger, at Nassau.

Mr. and Mrs. Morris Sayre and sons, Messrs. William and John M Sayre, of Prospect Avenue, and Miss Miriam McConnell, of Chicago, are attending the winter carnival at Dartmouth. Mr. William Sayre, a graduate of Dartmouth in 1937, is now studying at the Tuck Administration School at Hanover, N. H. Mr. John Sayre attends the Harvard School of Business Administration.

A second son was born February 2 to Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Coolidge Davidson jr., of Rydal Place. The child will be named Penn White Davidson. Mrs. Davidson was Miss Ellen Mary White.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
HERALD

FEB 18

168

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 13 1938

s the orchestra sees him—Montage of erge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, taken during a erformance at Symphony hall, Boston.

Woman Halts Boston Symphony, Scolds Musicians

BOSTON, Feb. 17.—A womman stopped a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and scolded the musicians.

The woman was Mlle. Nadia Boulanger who will be the first woman to conduct the renowned organization tomorrow. The orchestra was engaged in rehearsing Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" when Mlle. Boulanger called the halt.

In crisp French-accented words she said:

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Lowell Tele Feb 13/38

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, February 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem", the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem", which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevitzky will complete the programme, conducing the organ symphony of Saint-Saens.

Saint-Saens Piano Concerto in G minor will be presented by Miss Kassman with the orchestra at the Cambridge concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 99, and close it with two numbers of Ravel: the Suite "Mother Goose", and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orlando Barera, the distinguished Italian violinist, will appear for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra when he plays at the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, in Symphony hall, to be given February 21 and 22. Mr. Barera, born in Ferrarra, Italy, in 1907, has attained an extensive reputation in European cities. He visited this country last season, giving concerts in New York, and in Washington, D. C., at the Library of Congress series. He will be heard on this occasion in Mozart's Concerto in D maor, No. 4.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the Concerto of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, which

---

MOLINE, ILL.
DISPATCH

FEB 14 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 13 1938

Committee Assistants Are Named For Questers Ball in Montclair

"Gay Nineties" Fete on February 21 Will Follow Progressive Dinner; Bollards to Entertain for President Wriston, of Brown University

A "Gay Nineties Ball" will be given February 21 by the Questers, the junior group of the Montclair Women's Club. Mrs. George Felt, ticket chairman, is being assisted by Mrs. Paul Clifford, Mrs. William Mackie, Mrs. Henry Mills, Mrs. Helen Johnstone, Miss Jule Trelease and Miss Betty Hayes.

Miss Marjorie Kieselbach, who is poster chairman, will be assisted by Mrs. Richard Miller, Miss Marjorie Shand and Miss Viola MacLaughlin. The Misses Cecile and Ruth Forshay and Miss Margot MacGregor will assist Mrs. Richard Hayes with refreshments.

Miss Marion Benbow is general chairman. Miss Bobbie Howard is in charge of music and Miss Marjorie McConnell of publicity. A progressive dinner will precede the dance.

A floor show, under the direction of Mr. T. Brooks Cross, will be a feature of the Montclair Dramatic Club "Varieties" on February 26 at the Montclair Athletic Club. Mrs. Francis F. Merriam is general chairman and proceeds will be used to help finance the new clubhouse. There will be dances by Mrs. Robert M. Boyd and her sister, Mrs. C. Sanford Smith jr., the former Orton sisters, and songs will be sung by the Misses Gertrude Neidlinger and Helen Harbourt, the latter accompanied by Mr. Julius C. Zingg.

Tacoma Visitor Entertained

A tea was given February 8 by Mrs. William W. Elder, of Draper Terrace, in honor of her guest, Mrs. A. C. Tousey, of Tacoma, Wash., who will remain until Tuesday. Mrs. E. W. Foote, Mrs. Paul Bancel and Mrs. Charles Smythe, of Montclair; Mrs. Simeon Hauser, of Bloomfield; Mrs. George L. Craig, Mrs. I. M. Baker jr. and Mrs. Francis C. Bethell, of Montclair, and Mrs. J. Gordon Ives, of Glen Ridge, assisted the hostess. Mr. Elder departed last week for the Pacific Coast and Mr. William W. Elder jr. returned to Williams College.

Mrs. Joseph H. Fobes and daughter, Miss Josephine Fobes, of North Mountain Avenue, sailed Wednesday for a two-weeks cruise to the West Indies and South America.

Mr. and Mrs. Gerald D. Peet, of Berkeley Place, will sail Thursday for a Caribbean cruise, after which they will pass a couple of weeks at Hope Ranch, Jamaica.

Mr. and Mrs. Ralph H. Bollard, of 32 Llewellyn Road, will give a dinner for Mr. Henry M. Wriston, president of Brown University, and Mrs. Wriston, Thursday at their home. Dr. Wriston, formerly president of Lawrence College, Appleton, Wisconsin, is the author of "The Nature of the Liberal College." On Wednesday, he will address Brown alumni in New York and on Thursday will speak in Montclair to a group of alumnae of Pembroke College, Brown University. Thirty of the alumnae have been invited to the dinner for Mr. and Mrs. Wriston.

A tea was given Friday afternoon at the home of Mrs. S. Brent Girdler, of South Mountain Avenue, for mothers of members of the Montclair Girls' Mounted Troop. Mrs. Beverley Burnham, of Montclair, Mrs. Lionel Reid, of Glen Ridge, Mrs. S. Waldo Thompson and Mrs. Oscar Westen, of Essex Fells, poured tea. Assisting were the Misses Katherine Campbell, of South Orange, Betty Burnham, of Montclair, Patty Reid, of Glen Ridge, Nancy Thompson and Virginia Westen, of Essex Fells, and Jean Girdler, daughter of the hostess.

Mrs. Coleman Wynne, of Plymouth Street, will depart Tuesday for California for a two-months' stay. She will visit Mrs. Emily Sterling and Miss Mary Sterling, of Glendora, formerly of Montclair, after which she will take a trip along the Pacific Coast. Miss Katharine Grant, of Greens Farms, Conn., who was her guest last week end and who is departing today for California, will join her in the West.

Miss Barbara Porter, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James M. Porter, of Russell Terrace, was home last week end from the Madeira School, Greenway, Va., and had as guest a classmate, Miss Elaine Ott, of White Plains, N. Y.

Miss Carol Prince, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James F. Prince, of Montclair Avenue, who was home last week from Connecticut, is attending the winter carnival at Dartmouth College.

Junior Assembly Held

The seventh Junior Assembly of the season was held Friday at the Montclair Women's Club under direction of Miss Susanne Sawyer. Mrs. Bernard M. Carter and Mrs. Swen R. Swenson received the guests and were assisted by the Misses Virginia Taylor, Barbara Bailey and Carol Christopher. Buffet suppers were given by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney W. Fiske, of Westover Road, for twenty-four guests in honor of their son, Mr. Dick Fiske. Lieutenant Colonel P. J. Horton and Mrs. Horton, of Warren Place, entertained for their daughter, Miss Inez Horton. The next assembly will take place February 25, when Dr. and Mrs. Frederick C. Hahn, of Wellesley Road, will give a supper in honor of their daughter, Miss Ann Hahn, and Mr. and Mrs. G. Stewart King, of Sutherland Road, will entertain for Mrs. King's daughter, Miss Jean Downes. Colonel and Mrs. Horton and Miss Horton passed the week end at West Point and attended the dance at the Military Academy on Saturday.

A luncheon bridge for twenty guests was given Thursday at Essex County Country Club by Mrs. Robert E. Jennings, of South Mountain Avenue, in honor of her guest, Mrs. W. R. Farrington, of Honolulu, whose late husband was a former Governor of the Hawaiian Islands.

A dinner was given Wednesday by Mr. and Mrs. Wilfred J. Funk, of Erwin Park Road, preceding the Boston Symphony concert at the Montclair High School. Guests included Mr. and Mrs. Walter S. Marvin, Mr. and Mrs. Chapin Marcus, Mr. and Mrs. C. Everett Bacon and Mr. Wilfred J. Funk jr., who was home last week from Princeton.

Mrs. Joseph Pollet, of Woodstock, N. Y., has been visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Perry B. Strassburger, of Hawthorne Place.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Kelsey and daughter, Miss Margaret Kelsey, of South Mountain Avenue, departed Thursday to pass a month in Bermuda.

Mrs. John Wood and daughter have returned to their Montclair home after visiting the former's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Guy Morris, in Pasadena, Calif.

Sally Ross, Bride-Elect, Guest

Mr. and Mrs. H. Bradley Sexton, Mr. Charles Hayward and Mr. Grainger Costikyan, all of Montclair, entertained at dinner for twenty-seven guests February 5 at the Sexton home in honor of Miss Sally Ross, of Madison, N. Y., who will be married Saturday to Mr. H. St. John Webb jr., of Montclair.

Miss Barbara Spadone, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Spadone, of Upper Mountain Avenue, accompanied by Mrs. William Burpee and Miss Evelyn Burpee, of Montreal, sailed yesterday on the Carinthia for a three-week vacation in Nassau. Mrs. Florence Le Bosquet, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick D. Murphy, of Llewellyn Road, has joined Mrs. Edward Vintschger and daughter, Miss Muriel Vintschger, at Nassau.

Mr. and Mrs. Morris Sayre and sons, Messrs. William and John M. Sayre, of Prospect Avenue, and Miss Miriam McConnell, of Chicago, are attending the winter carnival at Dartmouth. Mr. William Sayre, a graduate of Dartmouth in 1937, is now studying at the Tuck Administration School at Hanover, N. H. Mr. John Sayre attends the Harvard School of Business Administration.

A second son was born February 2 to Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Coolidge Davidson jr., of Rydal Place. The child will be named Penn White Davidson. Mrs. Davidson was Miss Ellen Mary White.

VICKSBURG, MISS.
HERALD

FEB 18 1938

PASTE OVER

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RAVEL MEMORIAL

Festival of Music of French Composer Marks Program at Carnegie Hall

OLGA AVERINO IS HEARD

Sings the Three Songs of Cycle 'Scheherazade' With Effect —Koussevitzky Directs

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall what amounted almost to a festival of the music of the late Maurice Ravel. The exception to a complete program of his works was the glowing and romantic interpretation of Schumann's D minor Symphony, one that haunts the ear and memory hours after the music has ceased to sound. But Ravel was the center of this concert, as of the one given by the same orchestra the preceding evening.

It seems that only the Boston orchestra and its leader, in this city, have thought fit so to remember one of the most distinguished musicians of his era, which is a little strange—the stranger for the remarkable variety and the unique style of each separate score thus unfolded.

For Ravel never repeated himself. Sometimes Debussy did. Almost every great composer has. One searches the memory for a score of Ravel, large or small, which merely echoes the pattern and the musical contents of one of his other scores. Each work that he turned out was fashioned fastidiously and with the utmost care, with the cunning of a wizard, and by degree of taste and style which in themselves, and aside from all other characteristics of beauty, would bestow upon these compositions a special character and rank.

French Classic Spirit

The program of yesterday began with that evocation of the French classic spirit, and remarkable modern transformation of old idioms, the suite known as "Le Tombeau de Couperin." This is in no sense imitative Couperin.

There is no thought of a recent composer, at loss for some new idea, tampering with and endeavoring to imitate in a deceptive manner old music. No! This suite is a modern composer looking back with deep knowledge and racial instinct and the traditions of centuries of art upon him to Rameau's time; expatiating upon that time and that aristocratic old music in a very personal and fascinating way of his own.

As we are enabled to gain a clearer perspective of Ravel's art, this suite, so delicate and unpretentious, emerges as one of his most original creations.

Miss Olga Averino, a singer of the most exceptional intelligence and sensitivity, sang the three songs of the cycle, "Schéhérazade" that Ravel wrote to the exotic-tinted poems of Tristan Klingsor. It is many colored, lapidary verse, a mosaic of subtle tints and images, evocative of imaginings and mooc of far-off lands.

Two things make "Schéhérazade somewhat caviar in the big concei room. One is what after all stana as an introspective rather than directly emotional response to the imaginary scenes. The other is the arrangement of the three songs. For concert purposes the first one, "Asie," with the great outbursts of glowing orchestral tone and the declamatory and rhapsodic manner of the singer, would come best at the end.

Ravel is far more distinguished. "L'Indifferent" is the most intimate and paradoxically expressive of them all, and it is the one that has the fewest big brush-strokes or effects calculated to seize the uninitiated listener. On the other hand, Ravel never wore his heart on his sleeve; even in his music he refuses to forget that as an artist he is an aristocrat. And some would say, that underneath his very cultivated elegance there is, as a matter of fact, exceedingly intense and sensuous feeling. At any rate, this is one of the compositions in which Ravel asks the most sympathy of his most sympathetic listeners.

A Dramatic Effect

Had it been another conductor and another singer the music might have escaped the audience. But as it was Miss Averino sang with such understanding, eloquence, and dramatic effect, and colored her tones so skillfully, and observed so admirably the faintest nuance of the text, that as a recital of poetry this would have been consummate.

In the meantime, the picture painted by the orchestra was as gorgeous as the peacocks and the perfumes of the magical east of the fables. The orchestra alone provided a tone-poem, a mosaic, a tapestry, and the modern colorist of the baton matched his art with that of the composer. We are not sure that ever again will we hear the "Schéhérazade" cycle performed as beautifully and eloquently as yesterday.

Finally, as if to balance this piece for the sophisticates, the orchestra played the most popular piece that Ravel wrote—need we say, the "Bolero"? It piled up to an overwhelming climax, and it did not sound old, hackneyed, or self-conscious. A slight technical slip of a wind instrument was the accident that happens now and again in the best of orchestras. The performance as a whole was a crash and a scintillation.

On all counts, from his most fanciful to his most realistic, from his most esoteric to his most obvious, Ravel had triumphed, as had the superb leader and the magnificent players who carried out his wishes. Ravel was not only remembered, but revealed, by these performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

164

RECENT RECORDINGS

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

ON Good Friday last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special pension fund concert. The "Passion According to St. Matthew" of Bach was chosen for the occasion. Serge Koussevitzky directed. The double choir was supplied by the choral society of Radcliffe College and the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland (soprano), Kathryn Meisle (contralto), John Priebe (tenor), Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner (basses). Ernst Victor Wolff at the harpsichord supplied the continuo and Carl Weinrich was the organist.

In the ordinary course of events, to discover anything about such an occasion, reference would have to be made to the reviews of the following day. However expert the comment in these, they could do no more than suggest to one who knew the score something of the quality of the performance. The heart of the whole affair, the actual musical sounds as projected in Symphony Hall on March 26, 1937, would have been lost in eternity. In this particular case, however, that is not so. While the presentation was in progress, Victor secured a complete transcription.

* * *

Running to fifty-three sides, the set must be about the largest ever to have been produced. To lighten its own and the collector's problem, the company has put it in three albums, to be released at intervals. The first of these is already in circulation. It contains ten records, and, strangely enough, had one more been included, the end of the first half of the "Passion" would have been reached. The recording of an actual performance of a work of this nature encounters difficulties all its own. Pauses between episodes and the numbers contained in each episode are entirely incalculable. The conductor's first duty is to his present audience. It would be too much to expect him to shoulder any further responsibility.

So, in the titanic work such as this, running to seventy-eight numbers of uneven length, one must expect rather more than the usual concomitants to reproduction of actual performances. The miracle is that the length of waste sound track is not double, that breaks between record sides are not more unfortunate and that the audience permits any degree of intelligibility. The concert distribution of a double choir, permanent organ, orchestra and soloists could not possibly be exactly suited to recording. Yet the first installment shows remarkable balance.

Once the listener has accepted the fact that here is the result of an infrequent opportunity being grasped boldly, can adjust himself to the effect of recording in a packed hall and realize that in actual performance the pauses would seem about half as long, he will have no difficulty in extracting as much from this as any studio recording made under ideal conditions. An appreciation of the work is impossible with less than half by which to judge. The "Matthew Passion" is such a perfect whole, marches forward so steadily to achieve its magnificently moving effect, that it must be considered of a piece.

* * *

The present portion shows Koussevitzky directing with clear understanding and musicianship. One may be assured of a well-proportioned whole. Two of his soloists are consistently fine. The remainder are adequate. The choirs can maintain a solid quality down to their quietest chorale passages, and the catching of their full blend has been well done. We are promised a second album containing eight more records next month. It is to be hoped that the third and final part will immediately succeed it.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

Nadia Boulanger, Paris music professor, is the first woman to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

FEB 14 1938

Wide Variety

'Otello' at Met and Toscanini are High Lights

By PITTS SANBORN.

Week-end music events included on Saturday afternoon, "Otello" at the Metropolitan, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and Leonora Cortes' piano recital at the Town Hall, on Saturday evening, Alexander Brailowsky's piano recital at the Town Hall, the Toscanini broadcast from NBC, "Tannhaeuser" at the Metropolitan, Dorothy Blumberg's piano recital at Carnegie Hall; yesterday afternoon, the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall and Gregor Piatigorsky's 'cello recital at the Town Hall, and last evening, Eudice Shapiro's violin recital at the Town Hall, the dance program of Waldeen at the Guild Theater, and the concert of the Federal Symphony Orchestra at the WPA Federal Music Theater.

* * *

Boston Symphony Bill

Orchestral execution to which only superlatives could do justice, if we overlook a passing blunder in "Bolero," marked once more the Boston Symphony's concert. The program was the last of its three for Greater New York in memory of that necromancer of instruments and timbres, Maurice Ravel.

Schumann's D minor sym- prevented the list from being avel, and the exception was lly chosen. For in both substance and instrumental dress the symphony provided an illustrative contrast. Moreover, placed second it relieved possible monotony.

Actually, the comparative inexpertness of Schumann's orchestration instead of being made more prominent by the juxtaposition took on a kind of comfortable solidity, and the thematic richness did the rest. The playing was of a kind to exhibit the familiar music at its best.

Before the symphony Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite was heard; after it, the "Spanish Rhapsody," the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra," collectively entitled "Scheherazade" and "Bolero." The assisting soprano was Olga Averino.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted as if with special sympathy. Unsurpassable in finesse and brilliance were the suite, the rhapsody and orchestral part of "Scheherazade."

It was a particular privilege to hear the songs—less frequently done than the other pieces—performed in such masterly fashion. Mme. Averino's treatment of words and music was exceedingly accomplished.

As for the concluding "Bolero," it made the inevitable effect on the large audience, which rewarded it with tempestuous applause. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with more freedom of tempo than some others have done and a sure instinct for the voluptuous possibilities of the score.

* * *

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1938 B

l Musicians --- News of

Philadelphia Orchestra

Stature of Its Conductor, Eugene Ormandy, Is Established in a Second Concert

By Moses Smith

The second concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening confirmed—if any confirmation were necessary—not only that it is a magnificent, virtuoso band but also that it is now being led by a conductor of great and growing talent and musical imagination. There was indication that Mr. Ormandy is a worthy successor of Leopold Stokowski, possessing much of that man's ardent brilliance and being apparently less handicapped by an obsessing tendency to promote himself at the expense of the music.

The performance of the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which constituted the principal number of the program, was an admirable illustration of the difference between a simply musical temperament and an imaginative one. It is relatively recent that we observed the first type in action in this same Symphony, with results that did not tend to display the composer in his enormous stature. On Sat- ght, by contrast, Beetho- ied a greater composer . The explanation was vious. Most of the time Mr. Ormandy, assisted by his superb orchestra, was concerned with recreating music, a fairly accurate record of which had been left by the composer, who knew his business. As a discerning, divining musician, Mr. Ormandy knew and felt that the record, while accurate, was not complete. And with a sympathy born of understanding plus temperament, he supplied those missing links, subtle but important, without which no performance can be called a complete musical performance.

Wherever he imposed, so to say, his own personality on the composer's record, Mr. Ormandy was persuasive and compelling, so that this presentation of the Symphony is likely to remain long in the memory. It was when the conductor neglected explicit instructions of the composer that results were less happy. Fortunately these moments were in the minority. They were also less obvious, and not in such poor taste, as similar experiments with the Brahms C minor Symphony on Friday afternoon.

The conductor's talents and those of his orchestra were similarly displayed—perhaps to even greater advantage here and there—through the rest of the program, which began with Cailliet's transcription of a passacaglia by Buxtehude and proceeded, after the Symphony, through Strauss's "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and the Suite from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." Both the opening and closing numbers showed off at best the incandescent brightness of the orchestra, its superlative agility and spotless ensemble. Perhaps the Philadelphian seating arrangement, by which all the men are placed on a flat stage, cuts down some of the brilliance of the brass. It certainly did not result in anything less than extraordinary clarity from the woodwind and the strings, particularly of the full-bodied 'cellos and basses.

In the "Burlesque" of Strauss, which is a showy, expansive work in the Romantic manner, Jan Smeterlin was much more at home than he had been in the Mozart Concerto on Friday, whatever the reason. His playing, admirably seconded by the orchestra under Mr. Ormandy, had virtuosity, warmth and the grand manner. Quite deservedly he was accorded a demonstration of applause that halted the concert several minutes.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" did not have on Saturday that exquisite pliancy and subtlety with which Bostonians are familiar from the performances of the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. It is not a question of finding fault. Nothing was wrong; everything was in place. But instead of enchantment one was greeted with sweet sounds.

It is, however, no cause for concern that a conductor and an orchestra are less at home in one music than in another. By the two concerts Mr. Ormandy has certainly established himself, in the minds of the members of audiences that were much smaller than they ought to have been, as a conductor and musician of the first quality. He has shortcomings which, for a while, threatened to stop his growth, principally that quality for which we have the pungent expression, "swelled head." But if this writer has observed correctly, in a few opportunities, Mr. Ormandy is passing that stage, and is marching steadily to a top position among American interpretative artists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB

Music of the Day

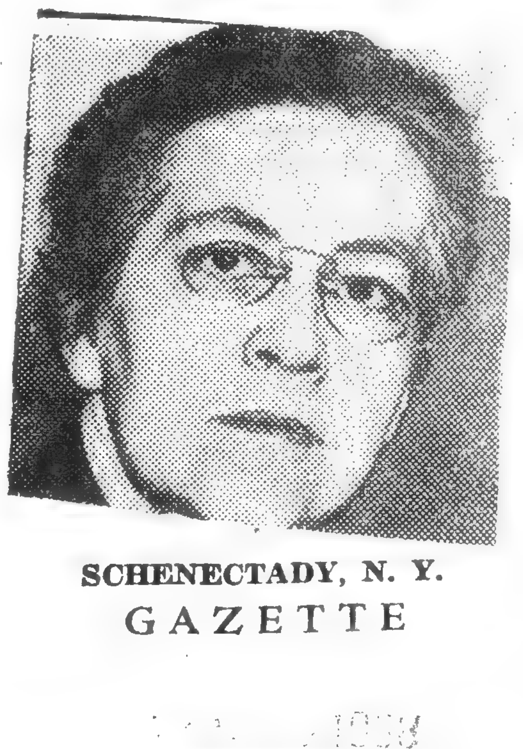
By MILES KASTENDIECK

Striking Program Given by NBC Symphony—Piatigorsky Receives Ovation—Cortes and Others Heard

Boston Symphony

For its second Manhattan program, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Schumann Symphony in D Minor and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "Rapsodie Espagnole," and "Bolero," as in the Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening. The new work was Ravel's "Scherezade," with Olga Averino, the gifted soprano, as soloist.

HOBOKEN, N. J.
JERSEY OBSERVER



SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

1938

PASTE OVER

169

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RAVEL MEMORIAL

Festival of Music of French Composer Marks Program at Carnegie Hall

OLGA AVERINO IS HEARD

Sings the Three Songs of Cycle 'Scheherazade' With Effect —Koussevitzky Directs

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall what amounted almost to a festival of the music of the late Maurice Ravel. The exception to a complete program of his works was the glowing and romantic interpretation of Schumann's D minor Symphony, one that haunts the ear and memory hours after the music has ceased to sound. But Ravel was the center of this concert, as of the one given by the same orchestra the preceding evening.

It seems that only the Boston orchestra and its leader, in this city, have thought fit so to remember one of the most distinguished musicians of his era, which is a little strange—the stranger for the remarkable variety and the unique style of each separate score thus unfolded.

For Ravel never repeated himself. Sometimes Debussy did. Almost every great composer has. One searches the memory for a score of Ravel, large or small, which merely echoes the pattern and the musical contents of one of his other scores. Each work that he turned out was fashioned fastidiously and with the utmost care, with the cunning of a wizard, and by degree of taste and style which in themselves, and aside from all other characteristics of beauty, would bestow upon these compositions a special character and rank.

French Classic Spirit

The program of yesterday began with that evocation of the French classic spirit, and remarkable modern transformation of old idioms, the suite known as "Le Tombeau de Couperin." This is in no sense imitative Couperin.

There is no thought of a recent composer, at loss for some new idea, tampering with and endeavoring to imitate in a deceptive manner old music. No! This suite is a modern composer looking back with deep knowledge and racial instinct and the traditions of centuries of art upon him to Rameau's time; expatiating upon that time and that aristocratic old music in a very personal and fascinating way of his own.

As we are enabled to gain a clearer perspective of Ravel's art, this suite, so delicate and unpretentious, emerges as one of his most original creations.

Miss Olga Averino, a singer of the most exceptional intelligence and sensitivity, sang the three songs of the cycle, "Schéhérazade" that Ravel wrote to the exotic-tinted poems of Tristan Klingsor. It is many colored, lapidary verse, a mosaic of subtle tints and images, evocative of imaginings and mood of far-off lands.

Two things make "Schéhérazade somewhat caviar in the big concert room. One is what after all stand as an introspective rather than directly emotional response to the imaginary scenes. The other is the arrangement of the three songs. For concert purposes the first one, "Asie," with the great outbursts of glowing orchestral tone and the declamatory and rhapsodic manner of the singer, would come best at the end.

Ravel is far more distinguished. "L'Indifferent" is the most intimate and paradoxically expressive of them all, and it is the one that has the fewest big brush-strokes or effects calculated to seize the uninitiated listener. On the other hand, Ravel never wore his heart on his sleeve; even in his music he refuses to forget that as an artist he is an aristocrat. And some would say, that underneath his very cultivated elegance there is, as a matter of fact, exceedingly intense and sensuous feeling. At any rate, this is one of the compositions in which Ravel asks the most sympathy of his most sympathetic listeners.

A Dramatic Effect

Had it been another conductor and another singer the music might have escaped the audience. But as it was Miss Averino sang with such understanding, eloquence, and dramatic effect, and colored her tones so skillfully, and observed so admirably the faintest nuance of the text, that as a recital of poetry this would have been consummate.

In the meantime, the picture painted by the orchestra was as gorgeous as the peacocks and the perfumes of the magical east of the fables. The orchestra alone provided a tone-poem, a mosaic, a tapestry, and the modern colorist of the baton matched his art with that of the composer. We are not sure that ever again will we hear the "Schéhérazade" cycle performed as beautifully and eloquently as yesterday.

Finally, as if to balance this piece for the sophisticates, the orchestra played the most popular piece that Ravel wrote—need we say, the "Bolero"? It piled up to an overwhelming climax, and it did not sound old, hackneyed, or self-conscious. A slight technical slip of a wind instrument was the accident that happens now and again in the best of orchestras. The performance as a whole was a crash and a scintillation.

On all counts, from his most fanciful to his most realistic, from his most esoteric to his most obvious, Ravel had triumphed, as had the superb leader and the magnificent players who carried out his wishes. Ravel was not only remembered, but revealed, by these performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

RECENT RECORDINGS

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

ON Good Friday last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special pension fund concert. The "Passion According to St. Matthew" of Bach was chosen for the occasion. Serge Koussevitzky directed. The double choir was supplied by the choral society of Radcliffe College and the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland (soprano), Kathryn Meisle (contralto), John Priebe (tenor), Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner (basses). Ernst Victor Wolff at the harpsichord supplied the continuo and Carl Weinrich was the organist.

In the ordinary course of events, to discover anything about such an occasion, reference would have to be made to the reviews of the following day. However expert the comment in these, they could do no more than suggest to one who knew the score something of the quality of the performance. The heart of the whole affair, the actual musical sounds as projected in Symphony Hall on March 26, 1937, would have been lost in eternity. In this particular case, however, that is not so. While the presentation was in progress, Victor secured a complete transcription.

* * *

Running to fifty-three sides, the set must be about the largest ever to have been produced. To lighten its own and the collector's problem, the company has put it in three albums, to be released at intervals. The first of these is already in circulation. It contains ten records, and, strangely enough, had one more been included, the end of the first half of the "Passion" would have been reached. The recording of an actual performance of a work of this nature encounters difficulties all its own. Pauses between episodes and the numbers contained in each episode are entirely incalculable. The conductor's first duty is to his present audience. It would be too much to expect him to shoulder any further responsibility.

So, in the titanic work such as this, running to seventy-eight numbers of uneven length, one must expect rather more than the usual concomitants to reproduction of actual performances. The miracle is that the length of waste sound track is not double, that breaks between record sides are not more unfortunate and that the audience permits any degree of intelligibility. The concert distribution of a double choir, permanent organ, orchestra and soloists could not possibly be exactly suited to recording. Yet the first installment shows remarkable balance.

Once the listener has accepted the fact that here is the result of an infrequent opportunity being grasped boldly, can adjust himself to the effect of recording in a packed hall and realize that in actual performance the pauses would seem about half as long, he will have no difficulty in extracting as much from this as any studio recording made under ideal conditions. An appreciation of the work is impossible with less than half by which to judge. The "Matthew Passion" is such a perfect whole, marches forward so steadily to achieve its magnificently moving effect, that it must be considered of a piece.

* * *

The present portion shows Koussevitzky directing with clear understanding and musicianship. One may be assured of a well-proportioned whole. Two of his soloists are consistently fine. The remainder are adequate. The choirs can maintain a solid quality down to their quietest chorale passages, and the catching of their full blend has been well done. We are promised a second album containing eight more records next month. It is to be hoped that the third and final part will immediately succeed it.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

FEB 16 1938

Nadia Boulanger, Paris music professor, is the first woman to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

FEB 14 1938

Wide Variety

'Otello' at Met and Toscanini are High Lights

By PITTS SANBORN.

Week-end music events included on Saturday afternoon, "Otello" at the Metropolitan, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and Leonora Cortes' piano recital at the Town Hall, on Saturday evening, Alexander Brailowsky's piano recital at the Town Hall, the Toscanini broadcast from NBC, "Tannhaeuser" at the Metropolitan, Dorothy Blumberg's piano recital at Carnegie Hall; yesterday afternoon, the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall and Gregor Piatigorsky's 'cello recital at the Town Hall, and last evening, Eudice Shapiro's violin recital at the Town Hall, the dance program of Waldeen at the Guild Theater, and the concert of the Federal Symphony Orchestra at the WPA Federal Music Theater.

* * *

Boston Symphony Bill

Orchestral execution to which only superlatives could do justice, if we overlook a passing blunder in "Bolero," marked once more the Boston Symphony's concert. The program was the last of its three for Greater New York in memory of that necromancer of instruments and timbres, Maurice Ravel.

y Schumann's D minor sym-/ prevented the list from being avel, and the exception was lly chosen. For in both substance and instrumental dress the symphony provided an illustrative contrast. Moreover, placed second it relieved possible monotony.

Actually, the comparative inexpertness of Schumann's orchestration instead of being made more prominent by the juxtaposition took on a kind of comfortable solidity, and the thematic richness did the rest. The playing was of a kind to exhibit the familiar music at its best.

Before the symphony Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite was heard; after it, the "Spanish Rhapsody," the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra," collectively entitled "Scheherazade" and "Bolero." The assisting soprano was Olga Averino.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted as if with special sympathy. Unsurpassable in finesse and brilliance were the suite, the rhapsody and orchestral part of "Scheherazade."

It was a particular privilege to hear the songs—less frequently done than the other pieces—performed in such masterly fashion. Mme. Averino's treatment of words and music was exceedingly accomplished.

As for the concluding "Bolero," it made the inevitable effect on the large audience, which rewarded it with tempestuous applause. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with more freedom of tempo than some others have done and a sure instinct for the voluptuous possibilities of the score.

* * *

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1938 B

l Musicians --- News of

Philadelphia Orchestra

Stature of Its Conductor, Eugene Ormandy, Is Established in a Second Concert

By Moses Smith

The second concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening confirmed—if any confirmation were necessary—not only that it is a magnificent, virtuoso band but also that it is now being led by a conductor of great and growing talent and musical imagination. There was indication that Mr. Ormandy is a worthy successor of Leopold Stokowski, possessing much of that man's ardent brilliance and being apparently less handicapped by an obsessing tendency to promote himself at the expense of the music.

The performance of the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which constituted the principal number of the program, was an admirable illustration of the difference between a simply musical temperament and an imaginative one. It is relatively recent that we observed the first type in action in this same Symphony, with results that did not tend to display the composer in his enormous stature. On Sat-

ght, by contrast, Beethoied a greater composer
:. The explanation was /ious. Most of the time Mr. Ormandy, assisted by his superb orchestra, was concerned with recreating music, a fairly accurate record of which had been left by the composer, who knew his business. As a discerning, divining musician, Mr. Ormandy knew and felt that the record, while accurate, was not complete. And with a sympathy born of understanding plus temperament, he supplied those missing links, subtle but important, without which no performance can be called a complete musical performance.

Wherever he imposed, so to say, his own personality on the composer's record, Mr. Ormandy was persuasive and compelling, so that this presentation of the Symphony is likely to remain long in the memory. It was when the conductor neglected explicit instructions of the composer that results were less happy. Fortunately these moments were in the minority. They were also less obvious, and not in such poor taste, as similar experiments with the Brahms C minor Symphony on Friday afternoon.

The conductor's talents and those of his orchestra were similarly displayed—perhaps to even greater advantage here and there—through the rest of the program, which began with Cailliet's transcription of a passacaglia by Buxtehude and proceeded, after the Symphony, through Strauss's "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and the Suite from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." Both the opening and closing numbers showed off at best the incandescent brightness of the orchestra, its superlative agility and spotless ensemble. Perhaps the Philadelphian seating arrangement, by which all the men are placed on a flat stage, cuts down some of the brilliance of the brass. It certainly did not result in anything less than extraordinary clarity from the woodwind and the strings, particularly of the full-bodied 'cellos and basses.

In the "Burlesque" of Strauss, which is a showy, expansive work in the Romantic manner, Jan Smeterlin was much more at home than he had been in the Mozart Concerto on Friday, whatever the reason. His playing, admirably seconded by the orchestra under Mr. Ormandy, had virtuosity, warmth and the grand manner. Quite deservedly he was accorded a demonstration of applause that halted the concert several minutes.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" did not have on Saturday that exquisite pliancy and subtlety with which Bostonians are familiar from the performances of the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. It is not a question of finding fault. Nothing was wrong; everything was in place. But instead of enchantment one was greeted with sweet sounds.

It is, however, no cause for concern that a conductor and an orchestra are less at home in one music than in another. By the two concerts Mr. Ormandy has certainly established himself, in the minds of the members of audiences that were much smaller than they ought to have been, as a conductor and musician of the first quality. He has shortcomings which, for a while, threatened to stop his growth, principally that quality for which we have the pungent expression, "swelled head." But if this writer has observed correctly, in a few opportunities, Mr. Ormandy is passing that stage, and is marching steadily to a top position among American interpretative artists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 14 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Striking Program Given by NBC Symphony—Piatigorsky Receives Ovation—Cortes and Others Heard

Boston Symphony

For its second Manhattan program, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Schumann Symphony in D Minor and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "Rapsodie Espagnole," and "Bolero," as in the Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening. The new work was Ravel's "Scherezade," with Olga Averino, the gifted soprano, as soloist.

HOBOKEN, N. J.
JERSEY OBSERVER

FEB 14 1938

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 15 1938

PASTE OVER

169

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN RAVEL MEMORIAL

Festival of Music of French Composer Marks Program at Carnegie Hall

OLGA AVERINO IS HEARD

Sings the Three Songs of Cycle 'Scheherazade' With Effect —Koussevitzky Directs

By OLIN DOWNES

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall what amounted almost to a festival of the music of the late Maurice Ravel. The exception to a complete program of his works was the glowing and romantic interpretation of Schumann's D minor Symphony, one that haunts the ear and memory hours after the music has ceased to sound. But Ravel was the center of this concert, as of the one given by the same orchestra the preceding evening.

It seems that only the Boston orchestra and its leader, in this city, have thought fit so to remember one of the most distinguished musicians of his era, which is a little strange — the stranger for the remarkable variety and the unique style of each separate score thus unfolded.

For Ravel never repeated himself. Sometimes Debussy did. Almost every great composer has. One searches the memory for a score of Ravel, large or small, which merely echoes the pattern and the musical contents of one of his other scores. Each work that he turned out was fashioned fastidiously and with the utmost care, with the cunning of a wizard, and by degree of taste and style which in themselves, and aside from all other characteristics of beauty, would bestow upon these compositions a special character and rank.

French Classic Spirit

The program of yesterday began with that evocation of the French classic spirit, and remarkable modern transformation of old idioms, the suite known as "Le Tombeau de Couperin." This is in no sense imitative Couperin.

There is no thought of a recent composer, at loss for some new idea, tampering with and endeavoring to imitate in a deceptive manner old music. No! This suite is a modern composer looking back with deep knowledge and racial instinct and the traditions of centuries of art upon him to Rameau's time; expatiating upon that time and that aristocratic old music in a very personal and fascinating way of his own.

As we are enabled to gain a clearer perspective of Ravel's art, this suite, so delicate and unpretentious, emerges as one of his most original creations.

Miss Olga Averino, a singer of the most exceptional intelligence and sensitivity, sang the three songs of the cycle, "Schéhérazade" that Ravel wrote to the exotic-tinted poems of Tristan Klingsor. It is many colored, lapidary verse, a mosaic of subtle tints and images, evocative of imaginings and mood of far-off lands.

Two things make "Schéhérazade somewhat caviar in the big concert room. One is what after all stand as an introspective rather than directly emotional response to the imaginary scenes. The other is the arrangement of the three songs. For concert purposes the first one, "Asie," with the great outbursts of glowing orchestral tone and the declamatory and rhapsodic manner of the singer, would come best at the end.

Ravel is far more distinguished. "L'Indifferent" is the most intimate and paradoxically expressive of them all, and it is the one that has the fewest big brush-strokes or effects calculated to seize the uninitiated listener. On the other hand, Ravel never wore his heart on his sleeve; even in his music he refuses to forget that as an artist he is an aristocrat. And some would say, that underneath his very cultivated elegance there is, as a matter of fact, exceedingly intense and sensuous feeling. At any rate, this is one of the compositions in which Ravel asks the most sympathy of his most sympathetic listeners.

A Dramatic Effect

Had it been another conductor and another singer the music might have escaped the audience. But as it was Miss Averino sang with such understanding, eloquence, and dramatic effect, and colored her tones so skillfully, and observed so admirably the faintest nuance of the text, that as a recital of poetry this would have been consummate.

In the meantime, the picture painted by the orchestra was as gorgeous as the peacocks and the perfumes of the magical east of the fables. The orchestra alone provided a tone-poem, a mosaic, a tapestry, and the modern colorist of the baton matched his art with that of the composer. We are not sure that ever again will we hear the "Schéhérazade" cycle performed as beautifully and eloquently as yesterday.

Finally, as if to balance this piece for the sophisticates, the orchestra played the most popular piece that Ravel wrote—need we say, the "Bolero"? It piled up to an overwhelming climax, and it did not sound old, hackneyed, or self-conscious. A slight technical slip of a wind instrument was the accident that happens now and again in the best of orchestras. The performance as a whole was a crash and a scintillation.

On all counts, from his most fanciful to his most realistic, from his most esoteric to his most obvious, Ravel had triumphed, as had the superb leader and the magnificent players who carried out his wishes. Ravel was not only remembered, but revealed, by these performances.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

FEB 13 1938

RECENT RECORDINGS

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

On Good Friday last, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a special pension fund concert. The "Passion According to St. Matthew" of Bach was chosen for the occasion. Serge Koussevitzky directed. The double choir was supplied by the choral society of Radcliffe College and the Harvard Glee Club. The soloists were Jeannette Vreeland (soprano), Kathryn Meisle (contralto), John Priebe (tenor), Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner (basses). Ernst Victor Wolff at the harpsichord supplied the continuo and Carl Weinrich was the organist.

In the ordinary course of events, to discover anything about such an occasion, reference would have to be made to the reviews of the following day. However expert the comment in these, they could do no more than suggest to one who knew the score something of the quality of the performance. The heart of the whole affair, the actual musical sounds as projected in Symphony Hall on March 26, 1937, would have been lost in eternity. In this particular case, however, that is not so. While the presentation was in progress, Victor secured a complete transcription.

* * *

Running to fifty-three sides, the set must be about the largest ever to have been produced. To lighten its own and the collector's problem, the company has put it in three albums, to be released at intervals. The first of these is already in circulation. It contains ten records, and, strangely enough, had one more been included, the end of the first half of the "Passion" would have been reached. The recording of an actual performance of a work of this nature encounters difficulties all its own. Pauses between episodes and the numbers contained in each episode are entirely incalculable. The conductor's first duty is to his present audience. It would be too much to expect him to shoulder any further responsibility.

So, in the titanic work such as this, running to seventy-eight numbers of uneven length, one must expect rather more than the usual concomitants to reproduction of actual performances. The miracle is that the length of waste sound track is not double, that breaks between record sides are not more unfortunate and that the audience permits any degree of intelligibility. The concert distribution of a double choir, permanent organ, orchestra and soloists could not possibly be exactly suited to recording. Yet the first installment shows remarkable balance.

Once the listener has accepted the fact that here is the result of an infrequent opportunity being grasped boldly, can adjust himself to the effect of recording in a packed hall and realize that in actual performance the pauses would seem about half as long, he will have no difficulty in extracting as much from this as any studio recording made under ideal conditions. An appreciation of the work is impossible with less than half by which to judge. The "Matthew Passion" is such a perfect whole, marches forward so steadily to achieve its magnificently moving effect, that it must be considered of a piece.

* * *

The present portion shows Koussevitzky directing with clear understanding and musicianship. One may be assured of a well-proportioned whole. Two of his soloists are consistently fine. The remainder are adequate. The choirs can maintain a solid quality down to their quietest chorale passages, and the catching of their full blend has been well done. We are promised a second album containing eight more records next month. It is to be hoped that the third and final part will immediately succeed it.

CHARLESTON, W. VA.
MAIL

FEB 16 1938

Nadia Boulanger, Paris music professor, is the first woman to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM

FEB 14 1938

Wide Deci

'Otello' at Met and Toscanini are High Lights

By PITTS SANBORN.

Week-end music events included on Saturday afternoon, "Otello" at the Metropolitan, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, and Leonora Cortes' piano recital at the Town Hall, on Saturday evening, Alexander Brailowsky's piano recital at the Town Hall, the Toscanini broadcast from NBC, "Tannhaeuser" at the Metropolitan, Dorothy Blumberg's piano recital at Carnegie Hall; yesterday afternoon, the concert of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society at Carnegie Hall and Gregor Piatigorsky's 'cello recital at the Town Hall, and last evening, Eudice Shapiro's violin recital at the Town Hall, the dance program of Waldeen at the Guild Theater, and the concert of the Federal Symphony Orchestra at the WPA Federal Music Theater.

* * *

Boston Symphony Bill

Orchestral execution to which only superlatives could do justice, if we overlook a passing blunder in "Bolero," marked once more the Boston Symphony's concert. The program was the last of its three for Greater New York in memory of that necromancer of instruments and timbres, Maurice Ravel.

y Schumann's D minor sym- y prevented the list from being avel, and the exception was lly chosen. For in both substance and instrumental dress the symphony provided an illustrative contrast. Moreover, placed second it relieved possible monotony.

Actually, the comparative inexpertness of Schumann's orchestration instead of being made more prominent by the juxtaposition took on a kind of comfortable solidity, and the thematic richness did the rest. The playing was of a kind to exhibit the familiar music at its best.

Before the symphony Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin" suite was heard; after it, the "Spanish Rhapsody," the "Three Poems for Voice and Orchestra," collectively entitled "Scheherazade" and "Bolero." The assisting soprano was Olga Averino.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted as if with special sympathy. Unsurpassable in finesse and brilliance were the suite, the rhapsody and orchestral part of "Scheherazade."

It was a particular privilege to hear the songs—less frequently done than the other pieces—performed in such masterly fashion. Mme. Averino's treatment of words and music was exceedingly accomplished.

As for the concluding "Bolero," it made the inevitable effect on the large audience, which rewarded it with tempestuous applause. Mr. Koussevitsky conducted it with more freedom of tempo than some others have done and a sure instinct for the voluptuous possibilities of the score.

* * *

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1938 B

l Musicians --- News of

Philadelphia Orchestra

Stature of Its Conductor, Eugene Ormandy, Is Established in a Second Concert

By Moses Smith

The second concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy in Symphony Hall on Saturday evening confirmed—if any confirmation were necessary—not only that it is a magnificent, virtuoso band but also that it is now being led by a conductor of great and growing talent and musical imagination. There was indication that Mr. Ormandy is a worthy successor of Leopold Stokowski, possessing much of that man's ardent brilliance and being apparently less handicapped by an obsessing tendency to promote himself at the expense of the music.

The performance of the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, which constituted the principal number of the program, was an admirable illustration of the difference between a simply musical temperament and an imaginative one. It is relatively recent that we observed the first type in action in this same Symphony, with results that did not tend to display the composer in his enormous stature. On Saturday night, by contrast, Beethoven seemed a greater composer than ever. The explanation was fairly obvious. Most of the time Mr. Ormandy, assisted by his superb orchestra, was concerned with recreating music, a fairly accurate record of which had been left by the composer, who knew his business. As a discerning, divining musician, Mr. Ormandy knew and felt that the record, while accurate, was not complete. And with a sympathy born of understanding plus temperament, he supplied those missing links, subtle but important, without which no performance can be called a complete musical performance.

Wherever he imposed, so to say, his own personality on the composer's record, Mr. Ormandy was persuasive and compelling, so that this presentation of the Symphony is likely to remain long in the memory. It was when the conductor neglected explicit instructions of the composer that results were less happy. Fortunately these moments were in the minority. They were also less obvious, and not in such poor taste, as similar experiments with the Brahms C minor Symphony on Friday afternoon.

The conductor's talents and those of his orchestra were similarly displayed—perhaps to even greater advantage here and there —through the rest of the program, which began with Cailliet's transcription of a passacaglia by Buxtehude and proceeded, after the Symphony, through Strauss's "Burlesque" for piano and orchestra, "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and the Suite from de Falla's "Three-Cornered Hat." Both the opening and closing numbers showed off at best the incandescent brightness of the orchestra, its superlative agility and spotless ensemble. Perhaps the Philadelphian seating arrangement, by which all the men are placed on a flat stage, cuts down some of the brilliance of the brass. It certainly did not result in anything less than extraordinary clarity from the woodwind and the strings, particularly of the full-bodied 'cellos and basses.

In the "Burlesque" of Strauss, which is a showy, expansive work in the Romantic manner, Jan Smeterlin was much more at home than he had been in the Mozart Concerto on Friday, whatever the reason. His playing, admirably seconded by the orchestra under Mr. Ormandy, had virtuosity, warmth and the grand manner. Quite deservedly he was accorded a demonstration of applause that halted the concert several minutes.

"The Afternoon of a Faun" did not have on Saturday that exquisite pliancy and subtlety with which Bostonians are familiar from the performances of the Boston Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. It is not a question of finding fault. Nothing was wrong; everything was in place. But instead of enchantment one was greeted with sweet sounds.

It is, however, no cause for concern that a conductor and an orchestra are less at home in one music than in another. By the two concerts Mr. Ormandy has certainly established himself, in the minds of the members of audiences that were much smaller than they ought to have been, as a conductor and musician of the first quality. He has shortcomings which, for a while, threatened to stop his growth, principally that quality for which we have the pungent expression, "swelled head." But if this writer has observed correctly, in a few opportunities, Mr. Ormandy is passing that stage, and is marching steadily to a top position among American interpretative artists.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 14 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Striking Program Given by NB Symphony—Piatigorsky Receives Ovati—Cortes and Others Heard

Boston Symphony

For its second Manhattan program, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the Schumann Symphony in D Minor and Ravel's "Le Tombeau de Couperin," "Rapsodie Espagnole," and "Bolero," as in the Brooklyn concert on Thursday evening. The new work was Ravel's "Scherezade," with Olga Averino, the gifted soprano, as soloist.

HOBOKEN, N. J.
JERSEY OBSERVER

FEB 14 1938

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 15 1938

(170)

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 14 1938

SOLOISTS APPEAR WITH ORCHESTRAS

Guila Bustabo and Olga Averino Take Part.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Violinists, weary of the almost unbroken round in the orchestral halls of little more than a half dozen concertos for their instrument, were given opportunity yesterday afternoon to consider the seldom-played Dvorak opus in A minor, once much better known than it is today. As soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under John Barbirolli, eighteen-year-old Guila Bustabo brought the work back to currency in Carnegie Hall and tossed it off in a manner to elicit the hearty applause of a large audience.

Dedicated to Joachim, and in considerable measure revised by him, the concerto first appeared on Philharmonic programs in the middle nineties, when Maud Powell was the soloist. A little earlier in the same season (1894) it figured on New York Symphony lists, with Henri Marteau the violinist. Latterly the elect of the bow have passed it by. Though energetically performed, the work left a rather negative impression yesterday. In its songlike, direct adagio and its blithe, folk-spirited finale is good fiddlistic material but little that can be regarded as significant music.

Miss Bustabo played cleanly and with uncommon strength for one of her years. But if her tone was highly vitalized it also verged on the strident and her style was generally more aggressive than it was poised or sensitive. In the orchestral support, Mr. Barbirolli also seemed intent upon showing that there is still red blood in Dvorak's music if treated with sufficient muscularity.

The purely orchestral works of the day were the overture to Weber's "Oberon" and the fourth of the Tschaikowsky symphonies. Both were encompassed with much vigor; more of it, in fact, than there was of the tonal refinement expected of this orchestra. In the climactic upbuildings of the symphony the brasses were about as piercing as the hall has known in many moons. But the applause indicated general enthusiasm, irrespective of the din.

Averino Sings With Bostonians.

In concluding his two-concert memorial to Maurice Ravel on Saturday afternoon, Serge Koussevitzky placed before his Boston Symphony subscribers in Carnegie Hall two compositions which stand at the opposite poles of the French illusionist's art, the remote and epicurean "Sheherazade" and the only too popular "Bolero." Other Ravel music of the afternoon included "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Rhapsodie Espagnole." For variety's sake, there was also Schumann's fourth symphony, which, though fervidly and winningly played, was a less fortunate departure from what might appropriately have been an all-Ravel program than was the Mozart symphony of the first of the two concerts.

Fastidious and sensitive in its details, the performance of "Sheherazade" with Olga Averino as soloist was the most memorable achievement of the afternoon. The three symphonic songs, "Asie," "La Flute Enchantee" and "L'Indifferent," present their appeal to the imagination rather than to the emotions, hence ask a good deal of their auditors. The skill and sympathy with which Mme. Averino presented them was matched by the refinement of the orchestral collaboration. If the response was not tumultuous it was genuinely cordial.

Patrician was the playing of the suite which pays tribute to Couperin the Great, and there was much of zest and color in the projection of the Spanish rhapsody. Some momentary aberrations of the first trombone could not seriously mar a highly intensified performance of the "Bolero." But there is other music by Ravel worthier of such zeal and technical flourish.

CELEBRITIES PERFORM IN HUB

ews and Views About Music Matters Here and Elsewhere

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Paul Hindemith, to return to Symphony Hall, is in disfavor with the present German government, but not on the customary racial grounds. Mr. Hindemith rates as a "modernist," and the National Socialists do not approve of radical tendencies in art. Your political extremist is apt to be an artistic conservative. Napoleon's favorite composer, for example, was the milk and water Paisiello. Besides the Viola Concerto, in which Mr. Hindemith will be given a chance to justify his reputation as one of the world's foremost performers on that instrument, this week's Symphony programme will contain his "Concert Music" for strings and brass, composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary season, and one of the most worthwhile of the pieces then. commissioned. from. distinguished European and American hands.

While on the subject of orchestral concerts, it may be as well to mention that Dr. Koussevitzky's programme will also contain Beethoven's Fourth Symphony and that the co-soloist with Major Warner will be Peggy Stuart of Cambridge, who will play the piano part in her Miniature Rhapsody, "Cracked Ice." Another Cambridge composer of somewhat different stamp, Walter Piston of the music department of Harvard University will be represented on Mr. Thiede's list by his Prelude and Fugue for Orchestra.

* * * *

Personalities again: Mrs. Horatio Parker, widow of the composer, will be guest of honor at the performance of Parker's oratorio, "Hora Novissima," at Jordan Hall Wednesday evening by the State Chorus and the Commonwealth Symphony Orchestra under A. Buckingham Simpson. The Boston composer, Mabel Daniels, will share in this programme through the performance of her "Exultate Deo," composed for the 50th anniversary of her alma mater, Radcliffe College, and subsequently heard at a pair of Symphony Concerts.

* * * *

Other opera than that to be given by the Metropolitan Company in the 10-day period beginning March 24 is in prospect. On Sunday afternoon and evening, March 6, it is definitely announced that the Salzburg Opera Guild will tenant the Boston Opera House, presenting in the afternoon Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," and in the evening a double bill consisting of Jacques Ibert's "Angelique" and Rossini's "The Matrimonial Market." Mozart's opera buffa, which some critics rank almost as high as "The Marriage of Figaro," will be new to Boston, as will the other operas to be given. The performances of the Opera Guild have been widely praised for their excellent and sprightly ensemble.

Scheduled for performance at Jordan Hall sometime in April is an opera by the American composer, Charles Wakefield Cadman, entitled "South in Sonora." The performers will be the Copley Opera Company, recently formed in this city, with Giovanni Pompeo as the musical director, and the affair will benefit the Boston Speech School for Crippled Children.

* * * *

Besides the Symphony Concerts mentioned above there will be another pair in the so-called supplementary series, tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. At both the soloist will be Orlando Barera, distinguished Italian violinist, as yet unknown here, who will play Mozart's Concerto in D major. The programme will conclude with Ravel's "Mother Goose" suite and "Bolero," and begin with the Concerto of Philip Emanuel Bach, arranged by Steinberg.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

FEB 16 1938

Woman Raps Knuckles Of Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 16 (UP).—Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical histroy last night as the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony orchestra in its fifty-seven-year history.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said at a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

She will make more musical history Friday as the first woman to conduct the orchestra in a concert

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 14 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony Gives the Concluding Concert of Its Ravel Festival

Third New York matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky; assisting artist, Olga Averino, soprano; at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Ravel..."Le Tombeau de Couperin," Suite
2. Schumann..Symphony No. 4 in D minor, op. 120
(Played without pause)
Intermission
3. Ravel..............Rapsodie Espagnole
4. Ravel...."Shéhérazade," three poems for voice and orchestra to the verses of Tristan Klingsor
I. Asie
II. La Flute Enchantee
III. L'Indifferent
5. Ravel.............................."Bolero"

MR. KOUSSEVITZKY, whose New York concerts this month were given in memory of Maurice Ravel, paid his final tribute to the dead master at Saturday's matinee in Carnegie Hall.

Like the program of the previous evening's concert, this one was not wholly devoted to music by Ravel. Between the "Tombeau de Couperin" Suite and the "Rapsodie Espagnole" of Ravel, Mr. Koussevitzky interjected the D minor Symphony of Schumann. This was not one of Mr. Koussevitzky's most brilliant feats of program-making. The nobly romantic symphony of Schumann, a beautiful and treasurous work, was an incongruous element in the afternoon's scheme. It violated the concert's unity of plan and style, and was as glaringly out of place as a work by Ravel would have been on an otherwise all-Schumann program. The symphony was sympathetically played, and beyond question the audience enjoyed hearing it; but it was out of place, nevertheless.

Mr. Koussevitzky, usually a sensitive and expert master of the fine art of program-building, indulged on this occasion in a Homeric nod. It would have been better to reserve Schumann for a different occasion, and to have given us, instead, another one or two of Ravel's scores—the "Pavane pour une Infante défunte" and "La Valse," for example. This would also, I imagine, have been better box-office. Ravel has a considerable and enthusiastic public in New York, especially among the young; and a program devoted entirely to his works would have been attractive as well as appropriat. Many of Saturday's audience may have wondered, incidentally, why the superb "La Valse" was ignored in a two-day tribute to the memory of Ravel.

* * *

Nevertheless, the concert gave memorable pleasure. The famous orchestra was at its best (barring a momentary brainstorm that afflicted the first trombone in "Bolero"), and its playing in such exacting scores as "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and "Shéhérazade" was delightful in clarity, euphony and precision.

One was especially grateful to Mr. Koussevitzky for letting us hear again the "Shéhérazade," those "three poems for voice and orchestra," to the verses of the French writer, Tristan Leclère, who calls himself (with a droll sense of Wagnerian compatibilities) "Tristan Klingsor." These songs were composed in 1903, but they are heard too seldom—probably because they require not only a virtuoso orchestra, but a singer of the most penetrating imagination, infallible taste, and exceptional skill.

It was an artist of this sort who sang them Saturday—Mme. Olga Averino. Mme. Averino, who was born at Moscow of Greek and Russian parents and is a goddaughter of Modest Tchaikovsky (Peter's brother), has lived in America since the revolution, and has been heard on various occasions in New York. She should be heard more often. Singers of her finesse and her esthetic integrity are exceedingly rare.

Olga Averino

Solo soprano with Boston Symphony

* * *

Ravel's "Shéhérázade" is now thirty-five years old. It belongs to the early post-"Pelléas" period of French composition, and the immortal Claude is occasionally recalled in its pages. Yet no one save Ravel could have written it.

This music is fundamentally original, personal to the texture of Ravel's nature and his sorcerous art. It has nothing whatever to do with the subjects that stirred the imagination of Rimsky-Korsakoff. It tells us rather what the East can evoke from a musical imagination of the utmost subtlety and exquisiteness. The poet dreams of Damascus and of Persian cities with slender minarets in air, of "landscapes painted on fabrics framed in fir-wood," of an old Arabian cup, of those who died from love and hate, of a distant flute played by the beloved one, of the seductive stranger who passes the threshold, indifferent to the one who waits within. And all this has stirred Maurice Ravel to music of intense and voluptuous charm, of entrancing loveliness and distinction. He is here a delicate magician conjuring for us an imagined, incredible Orient, that enchanted world which has haunted Occidental dreams. Mme. Averino and the orchestra brought this world about our minds, and made it live for us.

* * *

After this magical and haunting evocation, the "Bolero," with which Mr. Koussevitzky closed his program, seemed, as a somewhat draconian fellow-listener remarked to me afterward, like a rather bad joke. Certainly it is a somewhat stale one. But one may doubt if Ravel himself thought much of it. He will be remembered for other things—for such music as "Le Tombeau de Couperin," the "Rapsodie Espagnole," "Ma Mere l'Oye," "Daphnis et Chloe," "L'Heure Espagnole," "La Valse,' "Shéhérazade'—music of an artist whose like we shall not see again.

Herald Feb 16

Woman Leads Boston Symphony, And Gives Orchestra Scolding Too

For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its member musicians yesterday played at the command of a woman, and they took a scolding in the process.

Midway in a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," in which she will conduct the orchestra Friday and Saturday, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French music teacher and organist, halted the musicians for a lecture.

"This may be boring for some of you experienced men," she said. "But please do not take this music for granted. The difficulty is that most of you think the music too simple. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

The lecture over, the orchestra obediently bent to the rehearsal, and this time there was no complaint. Mlle. Boulanger, who has conducted Faure's "Requiem" for the past two seasons in London, believes that the composer's work has not been properly appreciated and that its apparent simplicity is the result of misunderstanding.

Using both hands instead of a baton, Mlle. Boulanger also rehearsed the Bach Cantata Club which will sing with the Symphony Orchestra. To this group also she explained the composer's message.

"Don't be afraid," she encouraged, humming the music as the singers joined in.

Miss Boulanger Is Master of Symphony in Rehearsal

B. ~~Trav~~.

Indicates Well-Conducted Concert Friday—Men Bow to Direction

Feb. 16/38

Nadi Boulanger, a French woman, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon in Faure's "Requiem," with a choir from the Bach Cantata Club. This is probably the first time a woman has conducted a major orchestra in this country.

Miss Boulanger came here recently to teach at Radcliffe. She is in her late forties, tall, with a figure that most young women should envy and a carriage all young women might imitate. She wears nosepinch glasses and her voice is a rich contralto.

It is a hrader job for her than for Dr. Koussevitzky to conduct the Boston orchestra because the accident of her sex is a handicap even in Symphoy Hall. Yet Dr. Koussevitzky is not half so fraceful on the podium; he cannot sing the music as Miss Boulanger can.

Last night Miss Boulanger put the orchestra and the choir through a rehearsal. She wor a dark shirt and a black shirtwaist with a black four-in-hand tie. She stood on the platform and cocked one foot up on the podium as she stopped the music to explain what she wanted. Her English has a slur imported from Paris.

There is a passage in the Requiem where the celli and the double basses pluck in pizzicatto for a little while, then the violas swing in and there is a surge of the woods and brasses; the burden shifts back to the celli and the organ booms. All this time the choir is singing like anything. Over all that sound came a voice, counting: "One, two, three, four. Ah, ah, ah, ah."

Then she cut in on them. "No, no," she said. "Please excuse me." When she gets in earnest like that her English begins to break down, but the orchestra seemed to know what she was talking about as she explained what she wanted. They grinned and went back to the beginning.

NADIA BOULANGER

"You are the leaders now, not me," she called to the big bass fiddles. "Now—Bim, bam, bim. (That was the pizzicatto.) Nothing can stop that bim, bam, bim. You go right on, even if we all stop."

Her long arms waved at them, her big hands were hypnotic. She was gentle with the orchestra, stern with the singers. From the orchestra she wants music without expression, just as a background for the whole. From the choir she demands enunciation that can be understood.

The only other number on Friday's program is St. Saens' C Minor, or "organ" symphony. Miss Boulanger will play the organ in that one, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
LIGHT

FEB 11 1938

The first woman ever called upon to direct the Boston Symphony orchestra and now in the United States for that purpose, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, the distinguished French musician, will be heard over N. B C. in a series of four Saturday programs devoted to choral music, beginning tomorrow (WOAI — 9:3 a. m.).

On her initial program, Mlle Boulanger will present a capell songs by Poulenc, excerpts from "L Roi Malgre Lue" by Chabrier an "Philemon et Baucis" by Gounod She will feature a group of chora singers, which accompanied her t America.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1938

Musicians --- News of

B. Trans

Enter a Woman Conductor

Overseas Interview with Nadia Boulanger, Guest At This Week's Symphony Concerts

(From a Special Correspondent.)

LONDON (By mail)

Quiet, gray-haired Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, France's premier woman musician, is about to realize the greatest ambition of her life. After having caused a furore in London musical circles by her broadcasts with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra—she is the first woman to have conducted it in its 126 years' existence—she is to set up a similar record by being the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"'This is something that I have been longing to do for the last fifteen years," she told me when I called to see her at the British Broadcasting Company's Maida Vale Studios (London) before she sailed.

"I was brought up in a musical atmosphere. When I was five years old I could play the piano after a fashion, but I quickly transferred my affections to the organ. There has always been something about the sonorous tones of this great instrument that has fascinated me. And I account it one of the greatest compliments ever paid to me that Serge Koussevitzky, whom I rate on a par with Toscanini, arranged that I conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for half a program and play the organ for the other half.

"I naturally received my musical education at the Conservatoire, where I was privileged to study under some of the great masters of the day, including Guilmant and Vierne for the organ and the great Gabriel Faure himself for composition. This last was a tremendous honor for a young girl, and I have always remained greatly influenced by his personality and teaching.

"For thirty-four years now I myself have been a teacher of music. I have lectured in harmony, counterpoint, fugue and composition at the Conservatoire, the American School at Fontainebleu, and at the Ecole Normale. I have had very many American pupils, and they are a great delight to me—so keen and eager. Indeed, I always think of America as my second home. I have friends in every part of the continent, and especially round Boston.

"Do you know, I made my first journey to the States thirteen years ago? I wonder how many people remember it? I was encouraged to go by the affection of Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra. Most of the time I spent in Texas, and although a family death unexpectedly recalled me to France, I had been over long enough to receive a lasting impression of the great—I might almost say 'breathless'— hospitality of the people and their abounding kindness."

Mlle. Boulanger's claim to distinction does not rest solely on her talents as an organist and composer. She is renowned in Europe for her connection with the Nadia Boulanger Group of Singers, which she founded, and whose broadcasts with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra swept Londoners off their feet. She tells how the group came into being.

"Fifteen years ago," she says, "I conceived the plan of making my pupils gather once a week and sing a Bach cantata. I think that there is nothing to equal singing for instilling into one a true sense of musical values, and I was convinced that such an exercise would vastly improve both their knowledge and execution. The enthusiasm with which they responded surprised even me. As their ability increased, so did their repertory and their numbers, until even well-known singers were asking to be admitted into the group.

"Even then I had no idea that we should become a professional company. However, I was offered a small engagement somewhere and accepted it chiefly to enable the young musicians to feel the sensation of performing in public. Our success was instantaneous, and engagement followed engagement until I found that I had started a snowball rolling that was eventually to carry me and all the others right away.

"This was really why I became a conductor. You cannot have a group of singers without one, and so I had to set to and learn this new department of my art. It was about this time that I first formulated a wish to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I heard a very faulty recording of them, and in spite of the defects of the record I was immediately transported.

"My group of singers is an elactic body, and we vary in numbers from 200 or 300 to the three or four that I am taking with me to Boston.

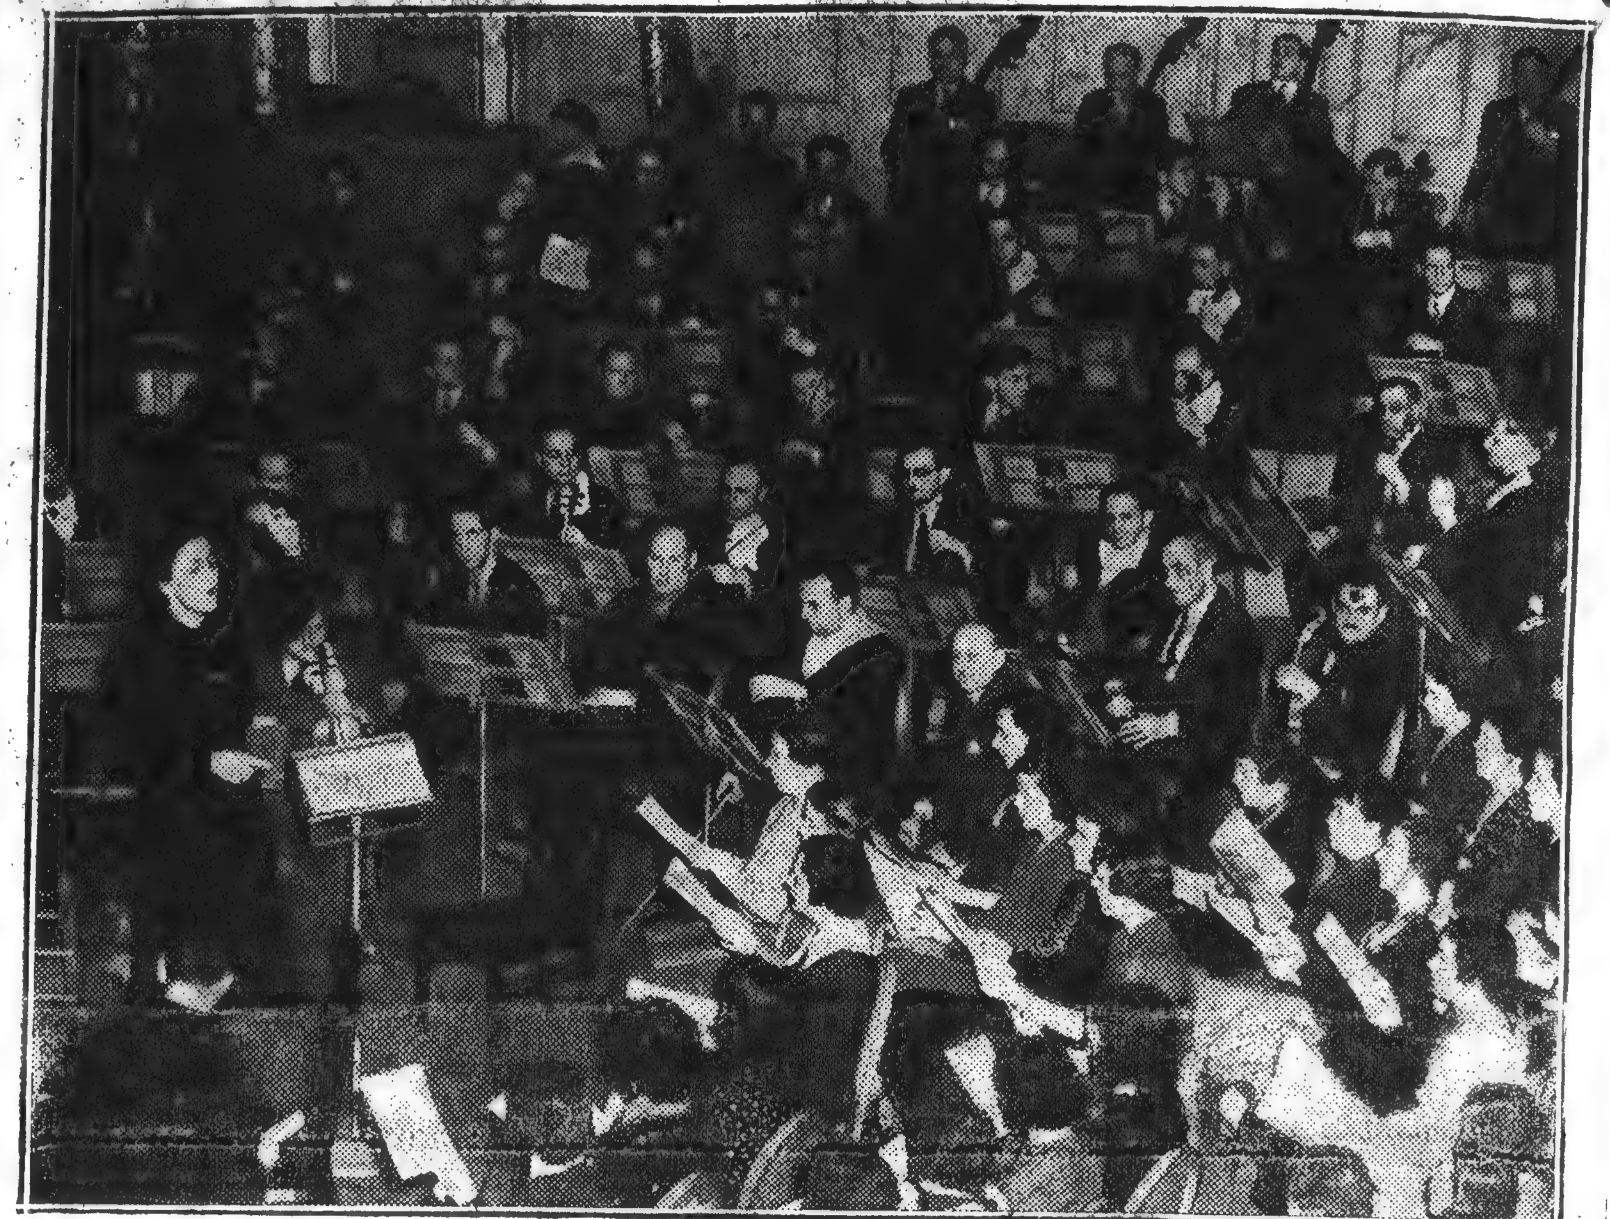
"In my opinion, and I certainly am not alone in this, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest in the world, and I think that much of their success is due to the quality of always giving of their best. I visited Boston last year when I was on a mission from my Government—although I also found time to give one organ recital—and I was struck then with the fine quality of both audience and orchestra. There was such a marvellous atmosphere of keenness and enthusiasm. You know, the real need of music is for an appreciative audience, and I have always considered that the quality of any performance depends in great measure upon the quality of the audience."

Mlle. Boulanger is not one of those critics who are ever carping about the decadence of the present age in general and of music in particular. On the contrary, she says:

"I think that altogether the present state of music is wonderful. There is certainly no decline in our age. Why, if Stravinsky alone had lived, his achievements would have entitled this century to be ranked as a great musical era. As for jazz, ce n'est pas mon affaire. Actually, I think that it is quite an excellent thing in itself. For example, I could listen to your Cab Calloway or Fats Waller without so much as a shudder, and even with a certain positive enjoyment. After all, every age has had its light music, and jazz, like Stravinsky, is a product of the times. The important thing is to realize that everything has its place, and must be judged by what it sets out to do, and not by some totally different standard. Jazz sets out to amuse. Good! I am prepared to be amused. But do not, I entreat you, talk of some Negro saxaphonist as if he were a reincarnation of Beethoven!"

K. T. OZZARD

Woman Leads Boston Symphony



Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, at rehearsal yesterday directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It marked the first time in history that a woman directed the Boston Symphony. She may be seen at the left. In the foreground, at the right, are members of Bach Cantata choral group. The rehearsal is in preparation for the concert to be offered Friday.

WOMAN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

B. Post

Mlle. Boulanger Conducts and Scolds Musicians

Feb. 16/38

A slender woman of 50 sharply halted the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, looked about her for a moment and then, in clipped words —which lost none of their meaning for the French accent in which they were uttered—scolded the famed orchestra.

It mattered not to her that she was making history. She didn't care that for the first time in the 57 years of its history the famous orchestra was being led by a woman. She said simply, with a shrug, "What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it is done by a man or a woman?"

She knew exactly what she wanted from the musicians and from the chorus that was rehearsing with it. Only a few minutes before she had stripped from her slender shoulders the coat of her tailored suit. She wanted the freedom the absence of the coat would give her and she wanted the precious minutes of the rehearsal to count their utmost for the concerts she will lead Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

The coat she dropped in a chair. For Mlle. Nadia Boulanger is not so intensely interested in the frills of her sex as she is bringing forth the beauty of music.

Through the minutes of the rehearsal she worked with the inspired attention to detail that only the true artist can know.

Her scolding came behind the dropped curtain of the stage and the house beyond the stage was empty. Yet history was being made and she cared not.

Scolds Orchestra Men

"This," she said, when her impatient signal had brought silence, "this may be boring for some of you more experienced men, but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies.

"You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty behind its simplicity.

Her slender hands were held up—Mlle. Boulanger uses no baton—and the orchestra went back to its work.

Once, she chided the members of the Bach Cantata Club, which will offer the choral features of the programmes Friday and Saturday. "Don't be afraid," and with the injunction she began to hum.

The rehearsal under Mlle. Boulanger's direction was for the performance of "Requiem of Gabriel Faure."

Forces Divided on Stage

As at all Symphony rehearsals a curtain was dropped before the stage to prevent the echo which would otherwise result in an empty hall; but probably for the first time in Bostonian experience a choral work was performed with the orchestra on one side of the stage and the chorus on the other, an arrangement which Mlle. Boulanger has found satisfactory in London and other cities where she has conducted this work by her one-time teacher.

With singers and instrumentalists thus sharply divided, it was easy to see that Mlle. Boulanger was giving most of her attention to the former. In this Requiem, as in most choral works, the orchestra plays a subordinate role, and in no unkindness it may be suggested that Mlle. Boulanger's singers needed more attention than her players, whose task in this instance was light.

Takes Off Her Coat

The arch-type of woman conductor in Boston's experience is the dynamic, energetic Ethel Leginska, who has appeared here both as symphonic and operatic conductor. In rehearsal, at least, Mlle. Boulanger is more restrained than English sister.

Her costume of last evening was innocent of feminine frills. She wore a tailored suit of Oxford gray, and the rehearsal had not progressed very far before, after the manner of most conductors, she discarded her coat, beneath which she wore a black shirt-waist of unquestionable severity.

Will Play Organ Part

Besides the Requiem, which Mlle. Boulanger will conduct and which will be new to these concerts though not to this city, this week's Symphony programme will continue the C minor Symphony of Saint Saens. In it the important organ part will be played with Mlle. Boulanger, who will then be making her second appearance in Symphony Hall, as organist.

Some 15 years ago she took part in the performance there of the Symphony for Orchestra and Organ by her American pupil, Aaron Copland.

Woman Jolts Symphony Players

A woman not only directed the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time in its 57-year history, yesterday, but actually stopped the rehearsal at Symphony Hall and scolded the musicians.

Dissatisfied with what she felt was a lackadaisical rendition of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who is to conduct the orchestra in a recital Friday, brought the music to a halt.

In crisp French-accented words, she said,

"This may be boring to some of you more experienced men, but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think this music simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

She raised her hands and one of the most famous musical units in the world returned sheepishly to work.

International News Photo

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, here as the first woman ever to direct Boston Symphony Orchestra, startled the men players yesterday in rehearsal when she halted the music and told the men to watch the score and put some feeling into their work.

Front page of B. Record - Feb. 16/38

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK

FEB 21 1938

Fourth Conductress

Changes in the personnel or program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the nation's second oldest—are so gradual that they pass almost unnoticed. But this week there was something to cause a stir. Serge Koussevitzky announced a woman, Nadia Boulanger, would conduct before the formidable Friday audience.

The French pianist-teacher, 50, gray-haired, and alert, will be the fourth woman to lead an important American orchestra. Others: in 1894 Emma Steiner conducted the Anton Seidl Orchestra, New York; in 1925 Ethel Leginska led the New York Symphony; in 1935 Antonia Brico conducted the National Symphony, Washington.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1938

(14)

l Musicians --- News of

B. Trans

Enter a Woman Conductor

Overseas Interview with Nadia Boulanger, Guest At This Week's Symphony Concerts

(From a Special Correspondent.)

LONDON (By mail)

Quiet, gray-haired Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, France's premier woman musician, is about to realize the greatest ambition of her life. After having caused a furore in London musical circles by her broadcasts with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra—she is the first woman to have conducted it in its 126 years' existence—she is to set up a similar record by being the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"'This is something that I have been longing to do for the last fifteen years," she told me when I called to see her at the British Broadcasting Company's Maida Vale Studios (London) before she sailed.

"I was brought up in a musical atmosphere. When I was five years old I could play the piano after a fashion, but I quickly transferred my affections to the organ. There has always been something about the sonorous tones of this great instrument that has fascinated me. And I account it one of the greatest compliments ever paid to me that Serge Koussevitzky, whom I rate on a par with Toscanini, arranged that I conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra for half a program and play the organ for the other half.

"I naturally received my musical education at the Conservatoire, where I was privileged to study under some of the great masters of the day, including Guilmant and Vierne for the organ and the great Gabriel Faure himself for composition. This last was a tremendous honor for a young girl, and I have always remained greatly influenced by his personality and teaching.

"For thirty-four years now I myself have been a teacher of music. I have lectured in harmony, counterpoint, fugue and composition at the Conservatoire, the American School at Fontainebleu, and at the Ecole Normale. I have had very many American pupils, and they are a great delight to me—so keen and eager. Indeed, I always think of America as my second home. I have friends in every part of the continent, and especially round Boston.

"Do you know, I made my first journey to the States thirteen years ago? I wonder how many people remember it? I was encouraged to go by the affection of Walter Damrosch, conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra. Most of the time I spent in Texas, and although a family death unexpectedly recalled me to France, I had been over long enough to receive a lasting impression of the great—I might almost say 'breathless'— hospitality of the people and their abounding kindness."

Mlle. Boulanger's claim to distinction does not rest solely on her talents as an organist and composer. She is renowned in Europe for her connection with the Nadia Boulanger Group of Singers, which she founded, and whose broadcasts with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra swept Londoners off their feet. She tells how the group came into being.

"Fifteen years ago," she says, "I conceived the plan of making my pupils gather once a week and sing a Bach cantata. I think that there is nothing to equal singing for instilling into one a true sense of musical values, and I was convinced that such an exercise would vastly improve both their knowledge and execution. The enthusiasm with which they responded surprised even me. As their ability increased, so did their repertory and their numbers, until even well-known singers were asking to be admitted into the group.

"Even then I had no idea that we should become a professional company. However, I was offered a small engagement somewhere and accepted it chiefly to enable the young musicians to feel the sensation of performing in public. Our success was instantaneous, and engagement followed engagement until I found that I had started a snowball rolling that was eventually to carry me and all the others right away.

"This was really why I becamc a conductor. You cannot have a group of singers without one, and so I had to set to and learn this new department of my art. It was about this time that I first formulated a wish to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. I heard a very faulty recording of them, and in spite of the defects of the record I was immediately transported.

"My group of singers is an elactic body, and we vary in numbers from 200 or 300 to the three or four that I am taking with me to Boston.

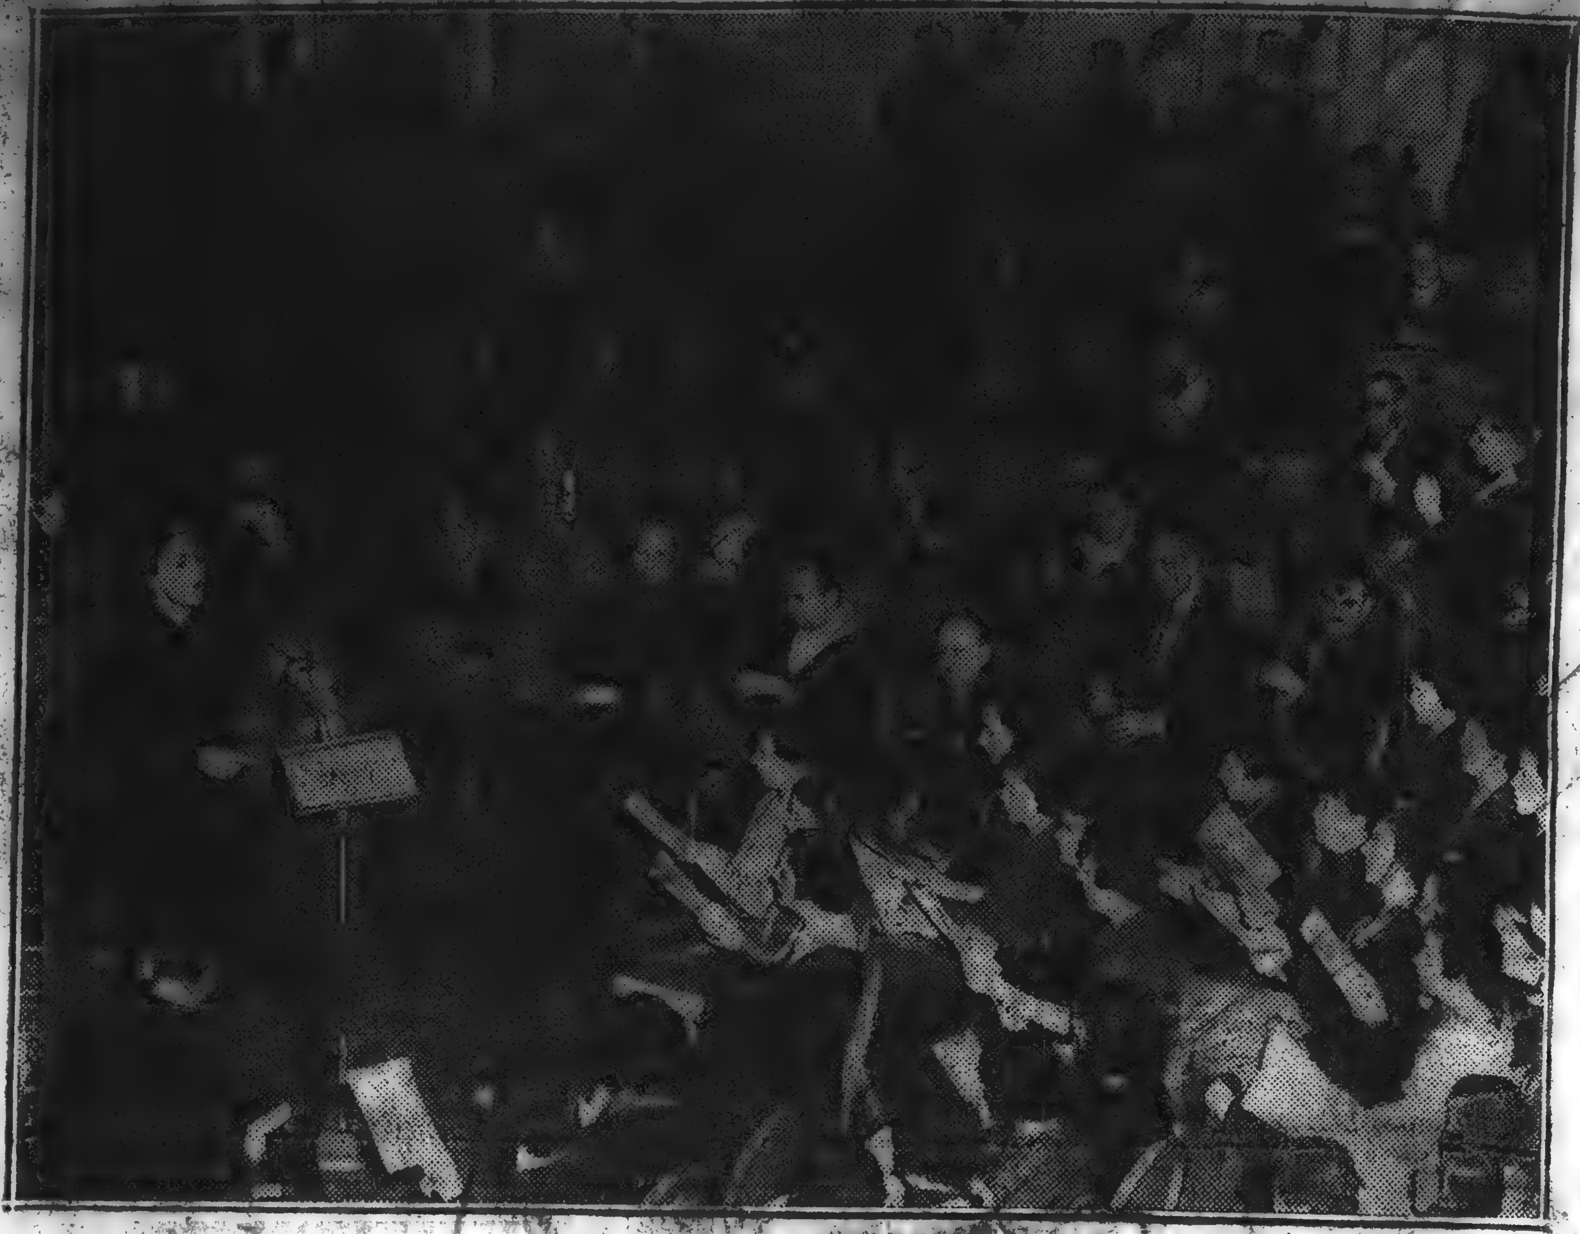
"In my opinion, and I certainly am not alone in this, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the finest in the world, and I think that much of their success is due to the quality of always giving of their best. I visited Boston last year when I was on a mission from my Government—although I also found time to give one organ recital—and I was struck then with the fine quality of both audience and orchestra. There was such a marvellous atmosphere of keenness and enthusiasm. You know, the real need of music is for an appreciative audience, and I have always considered that the quality of any performance depends in great measure upon the quality of the audience."

Mlle. Boulanger is not one of those critics who are ever carping about the decadence of the present age in general and of music in particular. On the contrary, she says:

"I think that altogether the present state of music is wonderful. There is certainly no decline in our age. Why, if Stravinsky alone had lived, his achievements would have entitled this century to be ranked as a great musical era. As for jazz, ce n'est pas mon affaire. Actually, I think that it is quite an excellent thing in itself. For example, I could listen to your Cab Calloway or Fats Waller without so much as a shudder, and even with a certain positive enjoyment. After all, every age has had its light music, and jazz, like Stravinsky, is a product of the times. The important thing is to realize that everything has its place, and must be judged by what it sets out to do, and not by some totally different standard. Jazz sets out to amuse. Good! I am prepared to be amused. But do not, I entreat you, talk of some Negro saxaphonist as if he were a reincarnation of Beethoven!"

K. T. OZZARD

Woman Leads Boston Symphony



Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French musician, at rehearsal yesterday directed the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It marked the first time in history that a woman directed the Boston Symphony. She may be seen at the left. In the foreground, at the right, are members of Bach Cantata choral group. The rehearsal is in preparation for the concert to be offered Friday.

WOMAN AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

B. Post

Mlle. Boulanger Conducts and Scolds Musicians

Feb. 16/38

A slender woman of 50 sharply halted the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last night, looked about her for a moment and then, in clipped words—which lost none of their meaning for the French accent in which they were uttered—scolded the famed orchestra.

It mattered not to her that she was making history. She didn't care that for the first time in the 57 years of its history the famous orchestra was being led by a woman. She said simply, with a shrug, "What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it is done by a man or a woman?"

She knew exactly what she wanted from the musicians and from the chorus that was rehearsing with it. Only a few minutes before she had stripped from her slender shoulders the coat of her tailored suit. She wanted the freedom the absence of the coat would give her and she wanted the precious minutes of the rehearsal to count their utmost for the concerts she will lead Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

The coat she dropped in a chair. For Mlle. Nadia Boulanger is not so intensely interested in the frills of her sex as she is bringing forth the beauty of music.

Through the minutes of the rehearsal she worked with the inspired attention to detail that only the true artist can know.

Her scolding came behind the dropped curtain of the stage and the house beyond the stage was empty. Yet history was being made and she cared not.

Scolds Orchestra Men

"This," she said, when her impatient signal had brought silence, "this may be boring for some of you more experienced men, but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies.

"You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty behind its simplicity.

Her slender hands were held up—Mlle. Boulanger uses no baton—and the orchestra went back to its work.

Once, she chided the members of the Bach Cantata Club, which will offer the choral features of the programmes Friday and Saturday. "Don't be afraid," and with the injunction she began to hum.

The rehearsal under Mlle. Boulanger's direction was for the performance of "Requiem of Gabriel Faura."

Forces Divided on Stage

As at all Symphony rehearsals a curtain was dropped before the stage to prevent the echo which would otherwise result in an empty hall; but probably for the first time in Bostonian experience a choral work was performed with the orchestra on one side of the stage and the chorus on the other, an arrangement which Mlle. Boulanger has found satisfactory in London and other cities where she has conducted this work by her one-time teacher.

With singers and instrumentalists thus sharply divided, it was easy to see that Mlle. Boulanger was giving most of her attention to the former. In this Requiem, as in most choral works, the orchestra plays a subordinate role, and in no unkindness it may be suggested that Mlle. Boulanger's singers needed more attention than her players, whose task in this instance was light.

Takes Off Her Coat

The arch-type of woman conductor in Boston's experience is the dynamic, energetic Ethel Leginska, who has appeared here both as symphonic and operatic conductor. In rehearsal, at least, Mlle. Boulanger is more restrained than English sister.

Her costume of last evening was innocent of feminine frills. She wore a tailored suit of Oxford gray, and the rehearsal had not progressed very far before, after the manner of most conductors, she discarded her coat, beneath which she wore a black shirt-waist of unquestionable severity.

Will Play Organ Part

Besides the Requiem, which Mlle. Boulanger will conduct and which will be new to these concerts though not to this city, this week's Symphony programme will continue the C minor Symphony of Saint Saens. In it the important organ part will be played with Mlle. Boulanger, who will then be making her second appearance in Symphony Hall, as organist.

Some 15 years ago she took part in the performance there of the Symphony for Orchestra and Organ by her American pupil, Aaron Copland.

Woman Jolts Symphony Players

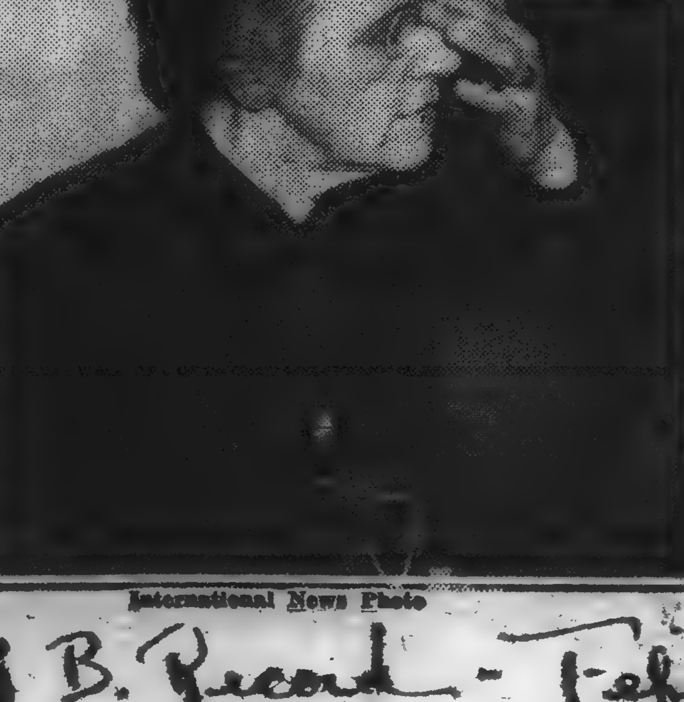
A woman not only directed the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first time in its 57-year history, yesterday, but actually stopped the rehearsal at Symphony Hall and scolded the musicians.

Dissatisfied with what she felt was a lackadaisical rendition of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who is to conduct the orchestra in a recital Friday, brought the music to a halt.

In crisp French-accented words, she said,

"This may be boring to some of you more experienced men, but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think this music simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

She raised her hands and one of the most famous musical units in the world returned sheepishly to work.



International News Photo

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, here as the first woman ever to direct Boston Symphony Orchestra, startled the men players yesterday in rehearsal when she halted the music and told the men to watch the score and put some feeling into their work.

First page of B. Record - Feb. 16/38

DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK

FEB 21 1938

Fourth Conductress

Changes in the personnel or program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—the nation's second oldest—are so gradual that they pass almost unnoticed. But this week there was something to cause a stir. Serge Koussevitzky announced a woman, Nadia Boulanger, would conduct before the formidable Friday audience.

The French pianist-teacher, 50, gray-haired, and alert, will be the fourth woman to lead an important American orchestra. Others: in 1894 Emma Steiner conducted the Anton Seidl Orchestra, New York; in 1925 Ethel Leginska led the New York Symphony; in 1935 Antonia Brico conducted the National Symphony, Washington.

First page of B Globe

SHE REBUKED ORCHESTRA

Feb. 16/38

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER
First woman to conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

Will Civil Service Report Be Toned Down in Redraft?

Study Made For Recess Commission Loaded With Criticism—May Prove Embarrassing

---

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1938

Boston Symphony Is Scolded by Woman Director

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (AP)—For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman today stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will become the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra Friday, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, raised her hands—she uses no baton and conducts with both hands—and the orchestra went back to work.

With the same confidence, the slim, dark-haired woman rehearsed the Bach Cantata Club which will sing with the symphony.

"Don't be afraid," she said, and hummed the music as the singers responded.

Mlle. Boulanger is not especially impressed that she is making orchestra history.

"What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it is done by a man or a woman?" she asked.

WOMAN CONDUCTOR SCOLDS ORCHESTRA

Mlle. Boulanger Halts Boston Rehearsal

With an admonitory finger raised, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, made musical history yesterday by becoming the first woman to ever give a scolding to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the first time in its 57-year history, the orchestra will be conducted by a woman at its concert on Friday afternoon.

While Mlle. Boulanger was rehearsing the orchestra in Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," she halted the players and reproved them in crisp accents.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies.

"You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play the music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Then raising both hands—for she uses no baton—she resumed her direction of the piece. With the same confidence the slim, dark-haired Frenchwoman also rehearsed the Bach Cantata Club which will sing with the orchestra. Humming the air, she urged the singers not to be "afraid."

She was exceedingly modest at being the first woman conductor of the orchestra, saying:

"What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it be done by a man or a woman?"

WESTFIELD, N. J.
STANDARD
FEB 11 1938

* * * * *

MUSIC: Anent this current coronation of swing: Did you read about the triumph of Benny Goodman in his Carnegie Hall concert? While concert managers struggle with such small fry as Heifitz, Serken, Rachmaninoff, Lily Pons, Zimbalist and the Boston Symphony, Benny jiggles his baton over reverent multitudes.

The queer and undigestible thing about this is that the instrumental hog-calls called "swing" have not only captured the masses. It has also rocked the intellectuals. Bach has given way to Horace Heit, Beethoven to the Big Apple and Brahms to "Bei Mir Bist du Schoen."

The cult of swing is the talk of the Harvard Club as well as the Hester Street Athletic Club. You're considered beyond the pale if you don't rattle like a tympannum every time you hear a swing song, or if you don't ripple to so-called "rippling rhythm."

We think the intellectuals have been sold a gold brick.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
FEB 19 1938

BOSTON'S ORCHESTRA CONDUCTED BY WOMAN

Nadia Boulanger Is First of Her Sex to Lead Symphony, Which Plays Faure's 'Requiem'

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (AP).—The French composer-teacher Mlle. Nadia Boulanger today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Fauré. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
STAR
FEB 16 1938

ELMAN WILL PLAY IN CITY TONIGHT

Violinist and Young Composer to Share Spotlight With National Symphony.

Mischa Elman, world-famous violinist, and Nicolai Berezowsky, young Russo-American composer, will share the spotlight tonight when the fifth midweek concert of the National Symphony Orchestra is presented in Constitution Hall at 8:30 o'clock.

Mr. Elman will play two concertos for violin and orchestra—that in G minor, by Vivaldi, and the "Concerto in E Minor," by Mendelssohn. Other works to be played include Mozart's "Symphony in A Major" and the "Second Rumanian Rhapsody" of Georges Enesco.

Mr. Berezowsky has come to Washington especially to conduct the first Washington performance of his modern "First Symphony," composed in 1925 and first performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1931.

SOMERVILLE, N. J.
Semi-Weekly Messenger
FEB 4 - 1938

Boston Symphony Will Be Heard at Rutgers

NEW BRUNSWICK — Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the university gymnasium here next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the fourth presentation of the current Rutgers Concert Series.

The program for next Tuesday's concert will include music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer who died last month. Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe." Also on the program will be the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
FEB 19 1938

Boston Symphony Plays Under Woman Conductor

Mlle. Boulanger First of Her Sex to Lead Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (AP).—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the fifty-seven-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that evoked vigorous applause from a capacity audience.

B. Trav. Feb. 16/38 (Last Edition)

Woman Leads Boston Symphony, And Gives Orchestra Scolding Too

For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its member musicians yesterday played at the command of a woman, and they took a scolding in the process.

Midway in a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," in which she will conduct the orchestra Friday and Saturday, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French music teacher and organist, halted the musicians for a lecture.

"This may be boring for some of you experienced men," she said. "But please do not take this music for granted. The difficulty is that most of you think the music too simple. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

The lecture over, the orchestra obediently bent to the rehearsal, and this time there was no complaint. Mlle. Boulanger, who has conducted Faure's "Requiem" for the past two seasons in London, believes that the composer's work has not been properly appreciated and that its apparent simplicity is the result of misunderstanding.

Using both hands instead of a baton, Mlle. Boulanger also rehearsed the Bach Cantata Club which will sing with the Symphony Orchestra. To this group also she explained the composer's message.

"Don't be afraid," she encouraged, humming the music as the singers joined in.

(172)

[illegible] 19

Mlle. Boulanger Scores As Symphony Director

By RUTH MARSTERS

Neither of the conductors, nor the audience, nor any of the many concerned with the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra had any just cause for disappointment.

And this is saying a lot—for the following reasons:

1—The audience was prepared to entertain an unique personality in the person of Mlle. Boulanger, who, as a teacher, has sent virtually all of our foremost contemporary composers winging on their way.

2—Because Dr. Koussevitzky had a high regard for Mlle. Boulanger's understanding of Faure, the performance of whose Requiem he had engaged her to conduct. (Mlle. Boulanger has necessarily a pristine understanding of Faure, having been one of his most brilliant pupils.)

3—Because Mlle. Boulanger, in a London interview, before sailing for America to be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, had expressed delightful anticipations over conducting the group, which she considers "the finest orchestra in the world," and in appearing again before an audience which, as organist, she had previously faced and found one of the keenest and most enthusiastic she ever knew.

We repeat nobody was disappointed. Which is another way of saying that everything worked out as splendidly as could be imagined.

The program, predominantly French, stemmed directly from Saint-Saens in an unbroken line through Faure, his pupil, to Mlle. Boulanger herself.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the performance of the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, No. 3 Op. 78 in the first half of the program. It was a brilliant performance, in itself sufficient reward for an afternoon's concert going.

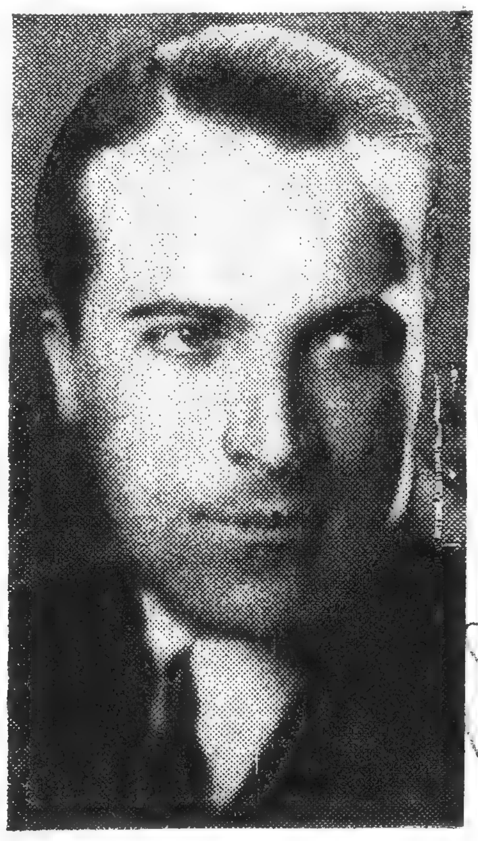
The Requiem, in which Mlle. Boulanger first came upon the stage as conductor, had not been previously performed here.

The Bach Cantato Club assisting, and soloists which Mam'selle had herself brought from France for the occasion, proved more than adequate.

With the glowing performance on the part of the orchestra, the whole infused with Mlle. Boulanger's sensitive and exacting interpretation, the performance took its place among memorable music events here.

BARERA TO APPEAR HERE WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orlando Barera, young Italian violinist, will appear for the first time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts in Symphony Hall next Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon. He will play the D major Concerto (K 218) of Mozart. The program, which will be the same for both concerts, will include Steinberg's arrangement of the K. P. E. Bach Concerto for Strings, the "Mother Goose" Suite and the "bolero" of Ravel.



ORLANDO BARERA
Will play Mozart's D-major concerto

Globe Feb 19

Mr. Barera was born in Ferrara, Italy, in 1907. Before he made his first visit to the United States to play in New York and Washington, D. C., in 1936 he had made high reputation in Europe.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
JOURNAL
FEB 13 1938

MLLE. BOULANGER ON CHORAL HOUR

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French musician and teacher, now in the United States to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra, will be heard over NBC-KSTP in a series of Saturday morning programs devoted to choral music.

The programs, which will cover choral music from the sixteenth century to the present time, will be heard from 9:30 to 10 a. m. for the next three Saturdays.

Saturday's program will consist of the Liebeslieder waltzes by Brahms, sung by the Comtesse Jean de Polignac, Irene Kedroff, Hugues Cuenod and Doda Conrad. Mlle. Boulanger will be heard in the piano accompaniment.

5

BOULANGER CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

B. Post

Faure's Requiem Is Given With Chorus, Plays Organ

Feb. 19/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was not so much a Symphony Concert in regular course as a compliment and tribute to a distinguished musician now in our midst, Nadia Boulanger. A performance of Faure's Requiem, in which the Bach Cantata Club and solo singers assisted, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger, who also played the organ part in the performance of Saint Saens' Symphony in C minor, the only other number on the programme.

CHORUS CHIEF CONCERN

Much has already been made of the fact that Mlle. Boulanger is the first woman to have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all the 57 years of its existence. It may be as long again before a woman, save perhaps a composer directing her own music, conducts the orchestra as such, not as an adjunct to a choral performance. As though to emphasize the fact that the chorus was her chief concern Mlle. Boulanger had the singers seated on her right, the men of the orchestra on her left. As at the first rehearsal, fully described in these columns, Mlle. Boulanger conducted without baton, using arms freely.

To state that Mlle. Boulanger had her singers on her right is not to be strictly accurate, since the soprano soloist, Gisele Peyron, was stationed far at her left, beside the organ console to which Mr. Snow had now succeeded. As singer Miss Peyron was inclined toward a wavering and tremulous delivery of her measures, and of her male companions, Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone, only the latter made an at all convincing impression.

Most Gentle of Requiems

The Requiem itself was heard yesterday for the first time under these particular auspices. The first performance in Boston took place at Jordan Hall last season. Then, too, the Bach Cantata Club was the chorus; a group of Symphony men made the orchestra and Mr. Burgin conducted. A predominantly gentle composer, Faure has written here the most gentle of Requiems. At times this gentleness verges on tepidity, at times it inclines toward a rather insipid sweetness. There is, beside, much that in its quiet way is both lovely and moving. The orchestral part, the soul of reticence and discretion, has the charm of color which we expect from Faure—from any 19th century Frenchman, for that matter—and the writing for voices is as effective as it is considerate.

Obviously fired by Mlle. Boulanger's enthusiasm for this work of her beloved master the chorus entered wholeheartedly into the spirit of the music though there still might have been more fulness of tone in certain choirs. The orchestra accomplished its portion with the expected finish and with a clear show of co-operation.

Refuses to Return

It would have been far more appropriate if, at the end of the beautiful "In Paradisum," the audience had departed in silence. But no, there must be an ovation for Mlle. Boulanger which, of course, was well deserved. Unfortunately it was evident that the audience mistook the nature of Mlle. Boulanger's role in the Symphony, preferring to interpret as a solo performance, something for which the composer had a far different intention. Mlle. Boulanger, however, was too much the artist to accede to this view of her role, and she refused to return to the platform, though it was evident that the long continued applause was partly meant for her.

There is no need at this late date to go into the merits and shortcomings of Saint Saens' Symphony. If the music is often empty and hollow it is extraordinarily well put together and it is tempting matter for both conductor and orchestra. Yesterday's performance was one of great brilliance and had there been no Mlle. Boulanger it would still have aroused enthusiasm.

ORCHESTRA KISSED BY BOULANGER

B. Post

Woman Conductor First Kissed by Men Returns Salutes

Feb. 19/38

The efficient, commanding Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was as feminine and as excited as a movie star at the conclusion of the epoch-making concert yesterday afternoon. Beginning with the maestro, himself, Serge Koussevitzky, the great musicians made up the big parade to kiss Mlle. Nadia and she kissed them back as they formed in line at the end of her ovation.

LITERALLY MOBBED

She was literally mobbed by Boston's cognoscenti, intelligentzia and literati of the music and social worlds. She pleaded that the honor of being able to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra was one too great and extraordinary to permit comment. She said in a two-line interview that the event speaks for itself.

"The concert is finished. My work is done. What can I say," she smiled as she made a dozen significant Gallic gestures as she stood there in the conductor's room surrounded by a milling crowd of the awed and reverent.

Koussevitzkys Kiss First

There was the maestro, Monsieur Koussevitzky and Madame Koussevitzky, not to mention as much of the Back Bay which could wend its way into the room. Mlle. Boulanger who appeared as a commanding figure on the podium seemed as she stood there, embraced and was embraced by her admirers, a somewhat frail, very feminine woman. She wore a black dress with long jet embroidered sleeves. The dress, the reporter observed, was very modern. It zipped up the back. Adjectives like "charmant," "extraordinaire," "merveilleuse," "gentil" and "magnifique" were in the air.

A blonde woman with a delicate profile congratulated Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger. The woman conductor looked at her sympathetically and asked, "Etes vous Russe" (are you Russian?). The woman replied that she regretted that she was not. The Russians, she added, were adorable. Mlle. Boulanger's face lighted up. For the white Russians are nearest to her heart. Her own mother was the Russian Princess Mischetsky. Serge Koussevitzky is a white Russian.

Began as Composer

Her father, a Frenchman, was a composer and her paternal grandfather a 'cellist. Her sister, Lili Boulanger, who died in 1918, was a composer of great talent. Mlle. Nadia Boulanger began her career as a composer but in recent years has devoted her energies to the instruction of others.

The reporter asked her if she intended returning to this country again to conduct. She replied hurriedly, "Oh, I am much too busy to say what I shall do in the future."

FREEPORT, ILL.
JOURNAL STANDARD

FEB 1 1938

SATURDAY

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French musician and pedagogue, who arrived in this country this week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard over National Broadcasting company networks in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the 16th century to the present time, beginning Saturday. Mlle. Boulanger will be presented each Saturday morning at 9:30 over WCFL.

Feb 19 Globe

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

If Mlle. Nadia Boulanger were not already internationally distinguished as a teacher of music, she would yet be at this moment among the immortals of the tonal art. For she is the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other women, to be sure, have waved a stick over sundry choral and instrumental groups in this city, but yesterday afternoon was the first time that female arms of authority were extended from the conductor's stand at a Boston Symphony concert.

Mlle. Boulanger's performance of the Requiem by Gabriel Faure was also the initial appearance of this work at these concerts. The afternoon was appropriately given over to French music. An organist as well as pianist, teacher and conductor, Mlle. Boulanger played the organ part in the C minor Symphony by Camille Saint-Saens—which by a last-minute reversal of the order of the program, began the concert. The Symphony was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The choral singers for the Requiem were the members of the Bach Cantata Club; the soloists were Giselle Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone; the organist was Albert Snow.

No doubt it was characteristic of Mlle. Boulanger's sensitivity that she chose to conduct a work so utterly lacking in external display as Faure's Requiem. No self-seeking conductor longing to conquer the public will ever do so with this music, which is the quintessence of inward thought and feeling expressed in an unpretentious style.

Dressed simply in a long-skirted black gown, Mlle. Boulanger made a striking appearance with her slender, erect figure and her long, graceful arms. Though she kept the printed score before her, she used no baton. Perhaps because Mlle. Boulanger knew well the mettle of the Boston Symphony men, most of her attention was directed toward chorus and soloists, the shaping of whose phrases was constantly guided by her gestures.

Mlle. Boulanger was a pupil of Faure, therefore it may be assumed with some logic that she has had the benefit of the composer's own ideas about the performance of his music. She conducted the Requiem in musicianly fashion, with a quiet simplicity to match the essential quality of the music.

Faure's Requiem is conspicuously noble but in-dwelling, devoid of the excitements conducive to frequent public performance. Here are no supplicatory wails for salvation, no depiction of the day of wrath (Faure omitted the "Dies Irae"), no dramatic cliches, no sentimentality. Mood and expression are tranquil, spiritually exalted. The few touches of French melodic sensuousness were merely part of the musical currency of Faure's time and race. With him this was absorbed into his own style. With Gounod, Massenet, Thomas and Saint-Saens, for example, it was a vital point of style.

Despite Mlle. Boulanger's admirable work, the excellence of soloists and orchestra and the conscientious choral singing, it seemed that the Requiem was more emotionally touching in the relatively intimate surroundings of Jordan Hall a year ago, than it was yesterday in the vast spaces of Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a brilliant reading of Saint-Saens "Organ" Symphony. But how Saint-Saens' music does pale with the years! Today this particular Symphony is only a specimen of skilled craftsmanship whose fabrication cannot conceal withered substance. Even when the fugate in the latter portion strikes out with a Gallic equivalent of "Whoop 'er up, boys!" the symphonic pulse remains unquickened.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Paul Hindemith will be soloist in his own "Kammermusik No. 5." Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for Brass and Strings, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will also be played.

C. W. D.

Her Feb 19

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted one half, and Nadia Boulanger, the first woman to lead the orchestra during the regular season, conducted the other. The Bach Cantanta Club, Mrs. Langdon Warner, conductor, and Gisele Peyon, Hughes Cuenod and Doda Conrad assisted in the performance of the Faure Requiem. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78 .... Saint-Saens
Requiem, Op. 48 .... Faure

It was a curious idea of program building to go from the pompous Symphony of Saint-Saens to the exquisite and subtly simple music of Faure, but in practice it worked out well. It was, however, sensible to change the order of the two works. Before the concert we had thought that the grandiose peroration of the Saint-Saens would make the logical conclusion. But the Faure was such a complete contrast and is music of such spiritual peace that the symphony would have sounded crass indeed after it.

Faure's music has been unjustly neglected, though during his lifetime he at least enjoyed the honor and respect of his contemporaries. Since he was chiefly famous for his songs and chamber music, it is not surprising that his name does not appear more often on symphony programs. The Requiem, though, is a work of such rare beauty that it is shocking to learn how infrequently it has been performed in this country.

The Faure Requiem is different from all the others that are commonly heard. It breathes a spirit of gentleness and compassion. It is restrained but not austere. And has been truly suggested, its simplicity is deceptive and really amounts to the fact that Faure has said perfectly what he felt and that what he felt was one of the most exalted and ultimate emotions known to man. The effect, if it has been properly performed, is almost overwhelming in the illusion of sadness which it evokes.

In brief the Requiem is a great work of art. Mlle. Boulanger conducted it in that spirit. Her conception was as sincere as the music she was interpreting. The performance moved with true serenity. In addition the three soloists, whom Mlle. Boulanger brought with her from France, were all singers of taste. Mlle Peyron and Messrs. Cuenod and Conrad accomplished their task admirably. We wish we could say the same of the Bach Cantata Club chorus, but its enunciation was poor and its tone only fair. Fortunately it is best when singing softly, which is where the heaviest demands of the music are made. The choral performance was thus adequate without being impressive

Saint-Saens' Symphony is a boring work with some charming passages. Was ever a slow movement taken so slowly as the celebrated adagio of this work was taken yesterday? It is a platitudinous work, though evidently, from the applause, the audience did not find it as tedious as we did. At the time when it was first played, some critics thought that it was radical, perhaps because it introduced an organ and a piano. Nowadays it seems insipidly conventional in style, if not in form. With the exception of the excessive deliberation over the adagio Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in an eloquent performance.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Paul Hindemith, the celebrated German composer, will be soloist in one of his own concertos for viola. His Konzertmusik for strings and brass will begir and Beethoven's 4th Symphony will close the program.

B. ~~Post~~ Her MUSIC Feb. 19/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted one half, and Nadia Boulanger, the first woman to lead the orchestra during the regular season, conducted the other. The Bach Cantanta Club, Mrs. Langdon Warner, conductor, and Gisele Peyon, Hughes Cuenod and Doda Conrad assisted in the performance of the Faure Requiem. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78 .... Saint-Saens
Requiem, Op. 48 .... Faure

It was a curious idea of program building to go from the pompous Symphony of Saint-Saens to the exquisite and subtly simple music of Faure, but in practice it worked out well. It was, however, sensible to change the order of the two works. Before the concert we had thought that the grandiose peroration of the Saint-Saens would make the logical conclusion. But the Faure was such a complete contrast and is music of such spiritual peace that the symphony would have sounded crass indeed after it.

Faure's music has been unjustly neglected, though during his lifetime he at least enjoyed the honor and respect of his contemporaries. Since he was chiefly famous for his songs and chamber music, it is not surprising that his name does not appear more often on symphony programs. The Requiem, though, is a work of such rare beauty that it is shocking to learn how infrequently it has been performed in this country.

The Faure Requiem is different from all the others that are commonly heard. It breathes a spirit of gentleness and compassion. It is restrained but not austere. And has been truly suggested, its simplicity is deceptive and really amounts to the fact that Faure has said perfectly what he felt and that what he felt was one of the most exalted and ultimate emotions known to man. The effect, if it has been properly performed, is almost overwhelming in the illusion of sadness which it evokes.

In brief the Requiem is a great work of art. Mlle. Boulanger conducted it in that spirit. Her conception was as sincere as the music she was interpreting. The performance moved with true serenity. In addition the three soloists, whom Mlle. Boulanger brought with her from France, were all singers of taste. Mlle Peyron and Messrs. Cuenod and Conrad accomplished their task admirably. We wish we could say the same of the Bach Cantata Club chorus, but its enunciation was poor and its tone only fair. Fortunately it is best when singing softly, which is where the heaviest demands of the music are made. The choral performance was thus adequate without being impressive

Saint-Saens' Symphony is a boring work with some charming passages. Was ever a slow movement taken so slowly as the celebrated adagio of this work was taken yesterday? It is a platitudinous work, though evidently, from the applause, the audience did not find it as tedious as we did. At the time when it was first played, some critics thought that it was radical, perhaps because it introduced an organ and a piano. Nowadays it seems insipidly conventional in style, if not in form. With the exception of the excessive deliberation over the adagio Dr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in an eloquent performance.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Paul Hindemith, the celebrated German composer, will be soloist in one of his own concertos for viola. His Konzert-musik for strings and brass will begir and Beethoven's 4th Symphony will close the program.

News of Music

Trans Feb 17

Orchestra

Paul Hindemith will appear as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week. Two of his compositions will be included in the program. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct his Concerto for string and brass instruments, which was composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and which was first played here in 1931. With Mr. Hindemith as soloist, Dr. Koussevitzky will present the eminent composer's Concerto for viola and chamber orchestra, known as "Kammermusik" No. 5. The remaining number on the program will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

The State (W P A) Symphony Orchestra, led by Alexander Thiede, will be assisted by two soloists at the concert in Jordan Hall next Sunday evening. Major John A. Warner, pianist, will be the soloist in Schumann's Concerto. Peggy Stuart, composer-pianist, will play the solo part of "Cracked Ice," a miniature rhapsody. The program will also contain the first Boston performance of a prelude and fugue by Walter Piston.

When Bernard Zighera conducts the Boston Chamber Orchestra in Jordan Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 24, his exceptional program will comprise an English Suite of the sixteenth century arranged by Henri Rabaud; Mozart's Symphony Concertante for violin, viola and orchestra; Walter Piston's Concertino for piano and orchestra; Honegger's "Pastorale d'Ete," and a Suite of Brazilian Dances by Darius Milhaud. The soloists on the program will be Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; William Kroll, violinist, and Leon Barzin, violist.

When Alexandre Tcherepnin, Russian pianist-composer, appears in a program of his own composition next Sunday afternoon in Jordan Hall, his program will comprise a Sonata in A minor, "Petite Suite," five Etudes de Concert, [illegible] Romances and several shorter pieces.

Symphony Peanuts

To the Editor of The Herald:

Speaking of the high culture of those composing the audience at the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which nobody was, I am moved to write of a happening at the concert of last Friday afternoon.

A young woman sitting near me was apparently not much interested in the presentation of the Faure requiem. She fidgeted about, and when the beautiful Agnus Dei was reached, she snapped open her hand bag, propped her make-up kit on her knee, and proceeded to dab at her face with whatever they dab at it with.

I am taking a bag of peanuts with me next time I go.

ARTHUR T. COLE.

174

BOULANGER CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

B. — Post

Faure's Requiem Is Given With Chorus, Plays Organ

Feb. 19/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

What took place at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon was not so much a Symphony Concert in regular course as a compliment and tribute to a distinguished musician now in our midst, Nadia Boulanger. A performance of Faure's Requiem, in which the Bach Cantata Club and solo singers assisted, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger, who also played the organ part in the performance of Saint Saens' Symphony in C minor, the only other number on the programme.

CHORUS CHIEF CONCERN

Much has already been made of the fact that Mlle. Boulanger is the first woman to have led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in all the 57 years of its existence. It may be as long again before a woman, save perhaps a composer directing her own music, conducts the orchestra as such, not as an adjunct to a choral performance. As though to emphasize the fact that the chorus was her chief concern Mlle. Boulanger had the singers seated on her right, the men of the orchestra on her left. As at the first rehearsal, fully described in these columns, Mlle. Boulanger conducted without baton, using arms freely.

To state that Mlle. Boulanger had her singers on her right is not to be strictly accurate, since the soprano soloist, Gisele Peyron, was stationed far at her left, beside the organ console to which Mr. Snow had now succeeded. As singer Miss Peyron was inclined toward a wavering and tremulous delivery of her measures, and of her male companions, Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone, only the latter made an at all convincing impression.

Most Gentle of Requiems

The Requiem itself was heard yesterday for the first time under these particular auspices. The first performance in Boston took place at Jordan Hall last season. Then, too, the Bach Cantata Club was the chorus; a group of Symphony men made the orchestra and Mr. Burgin conducted. A predominantly gentle composer, Faure has written here the most gentle of Requiems. At times this gentleness verges on tepidity, at times it inclines toward a rather insipid sweetness. There is, beside, much that in its quiet way is both lovely and moving. The orchestral part, the soul of reticence and discretion, has the charm of color which we expect from Faure—from any 19th century Frenchman, for that matter—and the writing for voices is as effective as it is considerate.

Obviously fired by Mlle. Boulanger's enthusiasm for this work of her beloved master the chorus entered wholeheartedly into the spirit of the music though there still might have been more fulness of tone in certain choirs. The orchestra accomplished its portion with the expected finish and with a clear show of co-operation.

Refuses to Return

It would have been far more appropriate if, at the end of the beautiful "In Paradisum," the audience had departed in silence. But no, there must be an ovation for Mlle. Boulanger which, of course, was well deserved. Unfortunately it was evident that the audience mistook the nature of Mlle. Boulanger's role in the Symphony, preferring to interpret as a solo performance, something for which the composer had a far different intention. Mlle. Boulanger, however, was too much the artist to accede to this view of her role, and she refused to return to the platform, though it was evident that the long continued applause was partly meant for her.

There is no need at this late date to go into the merits and shortcomings of Saint Saens' Symphony. If the music is often empty and hollow it is extraordinarily well put together and it is tempting matter for both conductor and orchestra. Yesterday's performance was one of great brilliance and had there been no Mlle. Boulanger it would still have aroused enthusiasm.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
FEB 19 1938

Boston Symphony Led First Time by Woman

Boston, Feb. 19 (UP) — Music critics today praised the performance of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, France, as the first woman ever to conduct the 57 year old Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mlle. Boulanger directed the 110 piece orchestra in its first rendition of the appealing but simple "Requiem" of her one-time teacher Gabriel Faure. Then, amid prolonged applause of the audience of 2,700, she kissed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, his wife, and several of the musicians.

B. Globe - MUSIC - Feb. 19/38

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

If Mlle. Nadia Boulanger were not already internationally distinguished as a teacher of music, she would yet be at this moment among the immortals of the tonal art. For she is the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Other women, to be sure, have waved a stick over sundry choral and instrumental groups in this city, but yesterday afternoon was the first time that female arms of authority were extended from the conductor's stand at a Boston Symphony concert.

Mlle. Boulanger's performance of the Requiem by Gabriel Faure was also the initial appearance of this work at these concerts. The afternoon was appropriately given over to French music. An organist as well as pianist, teacher and conductor, Mlle. Boulanger played the organ part in the C minor Symphony by Camille Saint-Saens—which by a last-minute reversal of the order of the program, began the concert. The Symphony was conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky. The choral singers for the Requiem were the members of the Bach Cantata Club; the soloists were Giselle Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone; the organist was Albert Snow.

No doubt it was characteristic of Mlle. Boulanger's sensitivity that she chose to conduct a work so utterly lacking in external display as Faure's Requiem. No self-seeking conductor longing to conquer the public will ever do so with this music, which is the quintessence of inward thought and feeling expressed in an unpretentious style.

Dressed simply in a long-skirted black gown, Mlle. Boulanger made a striking appearance with her slender, erect figure and her long, graceful arms. Though she kept the printed score before her, she used no baton. Perhaps because Mlle. Boulanger knew well the mettle of the Boston Symphony men, most of her attention was directed toward chorus and soloists, the shaping of whose phrases was constantly guided by her gestures.

Mlle. Boulanger was a pupil of Faure, therefore it may be assumed with some logic that she has had the benefit of the composer's own ideas about the performance of his music. She conducted the Requiem in musicianly fashion, with a quiet simplicity to match the essential quality of the music.

Faure's Requiem is conspicuously noble but in-dwelling, devoid of the excitements conducive to frequent public performance. Here are no supplicatory wails for salvation, no depiction of the day of wrath (Faure omitted the "Dies Irae"), no dramatic cliches, no sentimentality. Mood and expression are tranquil, spiritually exalted. The few touches of French melodic sensuousness were merely part of the musical currency of Faure's time and race. With him this was absorbed into his own style. With Gounod, Massenet, Thomas and Saint-Saens, for example, it was a vital point of style.

Despite Mlle. Boulanger's admirable work, the excellence of soloists and orchestra and the conscientious choral singing, it seemed that the Requiem was more emotionally touching in the relatively intimate surroundings of Jordan Hall a year ago, than it was yesterday in the vast spaces of Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a brilliant reading of Saint-Saens "Organ" Symphony. But how Saint-Saens' music does pale with the years! Today this particular Symphony is only a specimen of skilled craftsmanship whose fabrication cannot conceal withered substance. Even when the fugate in the latter portion strikes out with a Gallic equivalent of "Whoop 'er up, boys!" the symphonic pulse remains unquickened.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Paul Hindemith will be soloist in his own "Kammermusik No. 5." Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for Brass and Strings, and Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will also be played.

C. W. D.

Woman Leads Boston Symphony

B. Adv. By Ruth Marsters Feb. 20/38
Music Editor

SERENELY POISED, her slim figure gowned quietly in black, Mlle. Boulanger added yet more laurel to her store contributing to the Boston Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening both as organist—and conductor.

It was the first occasion in the history of the orchestra in which a woman had appeared in the capacity of conductor. It was also an event of memorable significance, musically — which is more to the point.

The program was pre-eminently French in a line unbroken from Saint-Saens, whose Symphony in C-minor, conducted by Dr. Koussevitsky, formed the first half of the program.

(It is interesting to note in this connection that Faure, whose "Requiem" Mlle. Boulanger conducted, was a pupil of Saint-Saens, that Mlle. Boulanger in turn was a pupil of Faure.)

The opening work (in which Mlle. Boulanger played the organ) was magnificently performed.

It is written in two movements, according to the composer, the better "to shun . . . interminable repetitions."

Brilliantly orchestrated, rich in thematic and rhythmic invention as in dramatic contrast of mood, it is one of Saint-Saens' most interesting creations.

Dr. Koussevitsky's reading of the score was both studied and brilliant. From the first plaintive measures of the introduction through the nervously agitated allegro passages, the mystical adagio of the first movement, one could not but feel that the author's own conception was crystallized in performance.

And what a superb climax in the second when the final victory over the darker powers is so gloriously won!

And then the Requiem!

PAURE'S great work has not previously been heard at these concerts, and it's first perform-

---

B. Globe - MUSIC - Feb. 22/38

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

In a series always noteworthy for sterling programs and excellent performances last night's Monday evening concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra attained superlative luster. Of more than ordinary significance was a half program dedicated to Ravel (in the same manner that this homage was paid in a pair of earlier Friday-Saturday concerts); and, in extra good measure, there was an interesting young violinist, new to Boston, to be heard.

The latter, Orlando Barera, was heard as soloist in the Mozart D major concerto (K. 218). Always an agreeable performer, in the ways of tone and style, Mr. Barera seemed a trifle new at the business of playing with an orchestra, as a few catch-as-catch-can measures bore (luckily) not too obvious witness. His tone, though of refined and unaffected quality, lacks the opulence a little more vitality would give it. In fact, one wondered if many of the faults which could be found with the performance did not rise from a somewhat precious approach to Mozart. At this point Mr. Barera is in an uncertain position of being neither an arresting virtuosa nor a significant musician; yet he is clearly an intelligent, sensitive performer with still a world of possibilities.

Orchestrally—if that were news—the evening was impressive. A perfectly groomed performance of C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, set an initial example, enlarged upon by the subsequent readings of the Ravel items—the "Mother Goose" suite and "Bolero." (An air of orchestral uneasiness had sat, albeit usually without cause, upon the accompaniment of the Mozart.) To such matchless interludes as "Laideronnette, Empress of the Pagodas," "Colloquy of Beauty and the Beast" and "the Fairy Garden," Dr. Koussevitzky brought all his cunning as a lapidary in tone and its color. To test his prowess as a builder of mood and of dramatic fire there was the "Bolero"—a test fully realized.

MUSIC

MONDAY SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

B. Her. Feb. 22/38

The fourth concert of the Monday-Tuesday subsidiary series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted, and the soloist was Orlando Barera, violinist. The program was as follows:

C. P. E. Bach
Concerto in D major for strings, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinber
Mozart
Concerto for violin in D major No. 4 (K. 218)
Ravel ....'Ma Mere l'Oye"
Ravel ....''Bolero"

Since all the music at yesterday's concert has been played and discussed recently this season, we need only concern ourselves with the familiar Mozart D major violin concerto. It is generally agreed that Mozart was not an inventive genius as far as form is concerned. In the combination of instruments that he used for chamber music he was amazingly experimental, so that anyone who designs a chamber orchestra program today has still to rely on Mozart for at least one number. Harmonically he was also, though more rarely, very daring.

Formally his great contribution was the classical concerto form, one that has largely been misunderstood by even such composers as Schumann and Mendelssohn. It has been most interestingly elucidated in Sir Donald Tovey's third volume of "Essays in Musical Analysis." The example offered last night is one of the most deservedly popular concertos in existence. It abounds in attractive and rather bold themes, which are developed with characteristic and yet unpredictable cunning.

In performance it demands a feeling for the style and a willingness to forego exaggeration. That is not to say that the solo part should not be played with considerable expression, for some of the melodies are ornate and must be performed with a great deal of life. Mr. Barera seemed to us an excellent soloist. He had vitality and he governed this with grace and delicacy. It was a performance which did justice to the wit that the music possesses so abundantly. The orchestra, for its part, played with a just precison and balance which is necessary to the proportions of the classical concerto. Mr. Barera was accorded a cordial reception.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock. The fifth concerts in the series will be given on March 21 and 22, with Mr. Burgin conducting. The soloist will be the eminent French pianist, Robert Casadesus. He will play in Liszt's E flat Concerto and the Symphony on a Mountain Air by Vincent d'Indy.

LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
FEB 12 1938

Mlle. Nadia Baulanger, distinguished French musician pedagogue, who arrived in this country yesterday to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be heard over the NBC network in a series of four programs devoted to choral music, ranging from the 16th century to the present time, beginning today.

The programs to be presented by Mlle Boulanger, internationally known organist, teacher and lecturer, will be presented each Saturday from 10.30 to 11 A. M. over Station WNAC

BARERA WITH THE SYMPHONY

B. Post - Feb. 22/38

Young Violinist Scores at Monday Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For last evening's Symphony concert and that of this afternoon, which together make the fourth pair in the supplementary series, Dr. Koussevitzky once more prepared a programme largely drawn from those of the regular concerts. Thus there was only one piece last evening which had not been heard at Symphony Hall this season, Mozart's Concerto for the Violin in D major, the performance of which introduced to Boston, in the person of Orlando Barera, a young, prepossessing and high accomplished master of that instrument. For his other numbers Dr. Koussevitzky borrowed two pieces from the concerts which served as a memorial to the late Maurice Ravel, "The Mother Goose" Suite and "Bolero," and he placed at the head of his list the D major Concerto for Strings by Philipp Emanuel Bach, as arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg.

More and more Dr. Koussevitzky resorts to the practice of scaling down his orchsetra in 18th century music. Only a fraction of the strings, with the necessary pairs of oboes and horns, provided the accompaniment in last evening's performance of Mozart's Concerto. Against this light and supple, though sufficiently sonorous background, Mr. Barera sang Mozart's melodies or wove his figurations with a tone that constantly charmed the ear, with dependable intonation and unfailing taste and sensibility. Not often is one of these Mozart Concertos given such a fetching presentation.

Of the performance of the other numbers on the programme it is not necessary to speak, since they have all been heard here so recently. It may be assumed that Ravel's "Bolero" once more brought down the house.

MUSIC

Providence Journal

Second Young People's Concert Features Beethoven Works

Feb. — 20/38

By G. Y. Loveridge

Beethoven became something more than a plaster bust catching dust on the bookshelf to hundreds of young people yesterday afternoon. They, with scores of their elders, attended the second of three young people's concerts by the Providence Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre. Dr. Wassili Leps conducted and Martha Baird described the music and played the piano.

Externally these concerts are coming to resemble the ones given for adults. Taxis swoop up to the entrances and policemen are on hand to keep the practical world from running down the dreaming plodder after music.

But the concerts themselves maintain the informal character that gives them charm and makes the music so companionable. This time, the kettledrums had been put in front of the orchestra, so that Mr. Geer might demonstrate them, at Miss Baird's direction. He showed how the pitch can be changed by use of the pedals, and produced some very satisfying thunder by whacking them with the sticks.

"Aw heck!" said one of the entranced audience, about 10 years of age, when the kettledrums were moved to their usual place back of everybody else in the band. This remark is not to be passed over lightly; it shows that, although no composer before Beethoven had sense enough to give kettledrums sincere attention, the value of them is apparent at once to any boy.

Mr. McKay came forward with his oboe. Miss Baird explained the working of it, and Mr. McKay sounded it, to the gratification of everybody. Miss DeGuichard, with a bassoon, was next, and then Mr. Vallente with a French horn.

Miss Baird told something of the youth from Bonn who was given an audition by Mozart, and who improvised so beautifully at the piano that Mozart predicted a remarkable career for him.

One of the best proofs that Mozart was a true prophet occupied the greater part of the program. It was the fifth symphony of Beethoven. Miss Baird played themes from it on the piano, and had the audience "la-la" them—which the audience did with enthusiasm, once it was used to the sensation. Beethoven's more imaginative use of the doublebasses was mentioned by Miss Baird, and she remarked on other interesting features of the work, told what to look for, and in general took care that the music should not be to the listeners simply a random collection of sounds.

The young people seemed quite as well able to come to grips with an entire symphony as they have been with shorter pieces. They were attentive, and they applauded with sincerity the smooth performance of the orchestra. There were pauses between the first and second, and second and third movements for Miss Baird to give the themes on the piano. Dr. Leps brought the whole orchestra to its feet to share in the applause.

The concert was ended with the last movement from the concerto in C-major for piano and orchestra, Miss Baird playing the piano. She again played the themes and told the story of the first performance of the concerto, when Beethoven himself was the pianist, and transposed the entire work half a tone in order to overcome a low-pitched piano.

The rondo was performed with fine vigor and rhythmic power, and gave a delightful flourish to the afternoon. Soloist, conductor and orchestra were showered with applause.

The third concert of the series will be given March 12. A Bach concerto for three pianos will be played by Miss Baird, Arthur Hitchcock of the Brown University department of music and Lee Pattison of New York.

The concerts are under the auspices of the Parents' League of Providence and the public schools.

The complete program for the March concert:

Bach, J. S. ...Chorale, "Jesu, Joy of Man's Desiring"
(1685-1750)
Bach, J. S. ...Concerto, in C Major, for Three Pianos and Orchestra
Allegro
Adagio
Allegro
Two Short Piano Pieces by Bach's Sons:
Ph. Em. Bach....Andantino, B Minor
W. Fr. Bach....Allegro, A Major
Tschaikovsky....Allegro con grazia (514), from Symphony No. VI (Second movement)
(1840-1893)
Pierne....''March of the Little Fauns"
(1863-1937)
Ravel....''Pavane of the Sleeping Beauty" "Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas" (1875-1937)
(From "Mother Goose" Suite)
Stravinsky....Russian Dance from "Petrouchka"
(1882-)

Works of Ravel Holiday Feature

Orlando Barera to Play Mozart Violin Concerto With Boston Orchestra

N. Bedford Mercury Feb 21/38

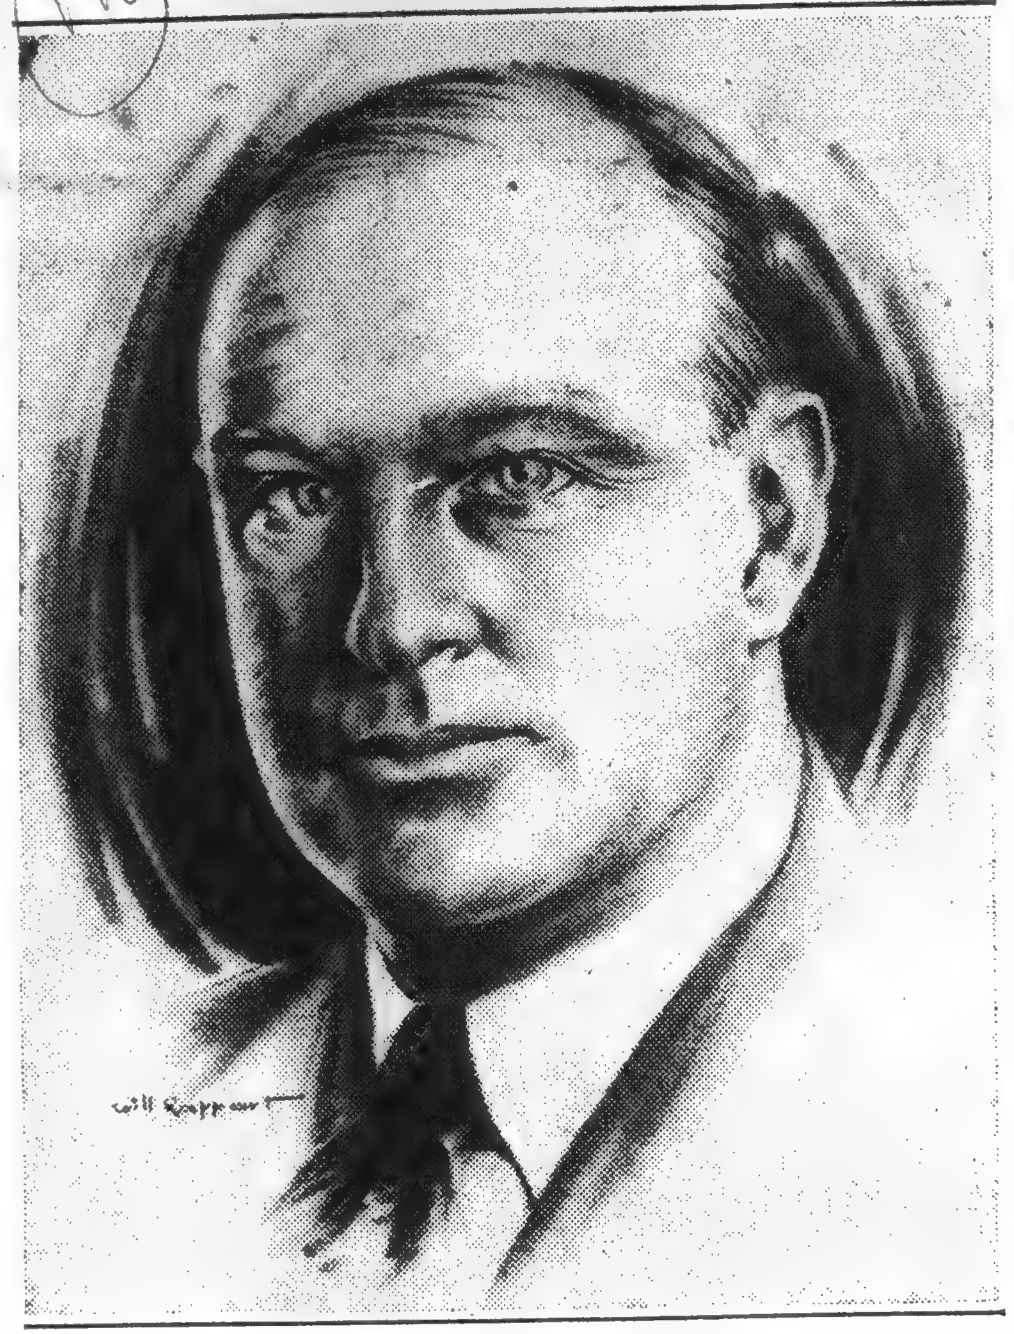
The so-called "Commuters' Matinee," which for six afternoons in the season gives opportunity for non-residents to secure seats for representative performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, comes upon Washington's Birthday this month. As a special holiday treat, Ravel's "Bolero" is to be presented by Koussevitzky, good friend and admired interpreter of the late Maurice Ravel, and his one hundred and ten world-famous artists. According to reviews of their performance of this work in New York on Feb. 12, the ordinary run of presentations pale beside the Boston Symphony's tense and exciting interpretation.

Another item of Ravel's genius to be played at the 3 o'clock matinee on Tuesday will be the "Mother Goose Suite," with its exquisitely orchestrated presentation of the stories of "The Sleeping Beauty," "Hop o' My Thumb," and "Beauty and the Beast" (the voice of the beast emerging comically from the double-bassoon).

The notable young Italian violinist, Orlando Barera, will be soloist in the D Major Concerto of Mozart, while a different type of concerto, opening the program will be that in D major for stringed instruments which Maximilian Steinberg has arranged for orchestra from C. P. E. Bach.

In the exhibition hall there is on view a collection of rare pieces of American music known to George Washington, or published during his lifetime. Several tunes were battle hymns sung by the soldiers of the Revolution, or marching airs played by their fifes and drums.

Vision Clear and Purposeful



DR. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON
Conducting the combined New England College Glee Clubs in Symphony Hall next Friday evening.

Page Four BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT,

Hindemith's Appearances at the Symphony

Symphony Concert

Nadia Boulanger Conducts the Faure Requiem and Is Organist in Saint-Saens Symphony

By Moses Smith

Nadia Boulanger, who directed the performance of Faure's Requiem at yesterday's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and who thereby became probably the first woman to conduct a major American orchestra, is as self-effacing as she is efficient a musician. She sees, according to repeated expression, no reason for personal glcrification of the performer in music. And she has been perhaps even more insistent that the accident of her sex has nothing whatever to do with her conducting. Things being what they are, though, most people in and out of the concert hall are not going to be depriived so easily of an opportunity to exercise their "human interest." Inevitably Mlle. Boulanger was "the show" yesterday afternoon, as she will be again this evening when the program, of which the only other number was the Saint-Saens C minor Symphony, is repeated. The modest little woman in inconspicuous black thus occupied ironically the center of the stage even when she was seated far off to one side before the organ console that does considerable duty in the Symphony. With gallantry, dignity and unquestioned sincerity Dr. Koussevitzky, coming on stage at the beginning of the concert to conduct the performance of the Symphony, promptly directed the audience's hearty greeting to Mlle. Boulanger. He did so again when the performance had ended. And a demonstration as long and as loud as might have been accorded a celebrated virtuoso soloist indicated here, as at the end of the concert, that the audience had taken Mlle. Boulanger very much to its collective heart.

The Symphony had been played here a little more than three years ago. Yesterday's presentation would have been too soon if it had not obviously been occasioned by an opportunity to complete the testimonial to an eminent musician who includes organ-playing among her accomplishments; and if it had not been marked by magnificent orchestral performance under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. The conductor seemed to have his heart in his work even more than customarily. He and his assisting executants almost succeeded in alleviating the present writer's growing distaste for the Symphony. The audience as a whole went wild.

During the presentation of the ensuing Requiem of Faure it was easy to discover reasons for Mlle. Boulanger's stated high regard for the piece and its composer. The music is not spectacular or showy (in striking contrast with Verdi's Requiem, for example). Its emotional climaxes are not mountain-tops but mere foothills. There is much to be said for such a treatment of a religious text like the Requiem. Moreover, the music has always an inner quality, a sort of emotional undertow, regular and persistent if not forceful. The sentiment might, in the hands of a lesser composer, have degenerated into sentimentalism. Faure fortunately does not slop over.

Nor did Mlle. Boulanger permit the performers at her disposal to do so. She seemed to be neither underscoring nor understating, but rather to be releasing perfectly natural expression. Cheapness of utterance would ruin this music. The conductor of yesterday was meticulous in style at the same time that she was spiritually enwrapped.

Her conducting, as such, was also the most natural thing in the world, and indicated the practiced musician. She had the assistance of an expert or exceedingly competent (as the case might be) lot of performers. The beautifully, tastefully scored orchestral parts of Faure emerged impeccably, as far as one could tell. The chorus of the Bach Cantata Club, admirably trained by Mrs. Langdon Warner and previously familiar with the music from a performance under Richard Burgin's direction last year, sang carefully and precisely but also movingly. And the three soloists, Gisele Peyron, soprano, Hugues Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone, similarly combined the desired emotional intensity with the requisite purity of musical utterance.

By no stretch of the imagination is it likely that the Faure Requiem will ever be a popular work, any more than that Faure is likely to be a popular composer. And there is little doubt that much of the success of the Requiem with the audience yesterday was due to the particular presence of Mlle. Boulanger. But there was ample indication, so far as the present attestant is concerned, that there ought to be more room at the symphony concerts for an occasional performance of the Requiem and of other compositions by Faure.

GRACE NOTES - - - - - - By A. C. R.

New Bedford Morning Mercury Feb. 22/38

The choicest snow of this kindly Winter was that of January 13—an exciting dazzle of laden boughs and full moon. On the sparkling way over to the Fall River Civic concert, Mrs. Edna Stoessel Saltmarsh told how her husband had stirred to the wintry scene and entertained the children at luncheon with stories of his boyhood days in New Hampshire, when snow drifted high. The gang would climb a shed roof or seek some upper window and take high leaps into the feathery mass below. The very smallest boy, known as "Pee-Wee," was missing one day during this sport and his pals did some furious digging to reclaim him. Anticipatory gleams in the enthralled faces of the Saltmarsh children halted these tales of other days. Father and mother exchanged alarmed glances and then began a de-jumping campaign—explaining how that was way back in northern New England where the roofs were lower, the snow deeper, the boys tougher and so on.

The Fairhaven-Mattapoisett Teachers Association is bringing Jesus Sanroma of Boston in piano recital, Wednesday evening, March 23. This will be one of the important concerts of our too spare musical season and is emphasized here since last year a concert by the Brown-Pembroke combined orchestras was so little publicized by this same presenting organization that possible concert patrons lost the opportunity of hearing a really charming, well-made program. For advancing the interests of this coming recital, the Teachers Association has called upon Maud Marceau Power to speak before their committee on ticket sales. Mrs. Power has coached with Sanroma and her former pupil, Martha Broughton, is having lessons regularly with the brilliant young Porto Rican. A graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, where he was entered by the Porto Rican government, Sanroma was winner of the Mason and Hamlin piano for his year, is now on the faculty, and is official pianist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra where he is adaptable for anything from jazz to Mozart.

In the recent Ravel memorial programs, Sanroma was soloist for the concerto on January 28. This must be at least the 24th concerto he has memorized, for when he appeared at short notice for a Mozart concerto in the Newport Civic course last season, he said it was his 23rd. With other symphony men he has been heard here in ensemble.

A portrait head of the late Maurice Ravel, modeled by Madame Serge Koussevitzky, is pedestaled in the first balcony foyer of Symphony Hall, Boston. It has the keen, outreaching air associated with this French composer of everskilful transcription appropriation as well as original creation. The audience for today's "Commuters' Matinee," as they study the cases of Revolutionary airs and of music associated with George Washington, will find the walls of this exhibition foyer hung with a widely representative loan collection of watercolors by Dodge Macknight, who is held by Royal Cortissoz to be "a wholly American type" of painter. These include the Cape Cod dunes and marshes, the Vermont snow scenes, and the Bermuda records for which he has been avidly collected. There are also scenes in the Gaspe Peninsula and the tropics from the vivid brush of our neighbor in Sandwich. Dodge Macknight's son, the late John Macknight, a talented flutist of artistic grace and refinement, has been several times heard here in concert and was entertained on those occasions by Mr. and Mrs. Thomas B. Akin and Mr. and Mrs. George H. Batchelor. One of this writer's pleasantest memories is of a Sunday evening concert program of Christmas carols given in the Copley Theater, Boston, by John Coates, an English singer. John Macknight in the neighboring seat was enraptured with his interpretations. "I taught marksmanship in England during the war," he said, "right in his county, and I am amazed a mere Yorkshireman can sing old French carols so beautifully."

Boston is having varied and stimulating musical visitors these last few weeks. There was guest conductor Amfiteatroff from the Minneapolis Symphony; Rodzinski with the Cleveland; Ormandy with the Philadelphia, and now Nadia Boulanger of Paris, teacher of many American moderns in composition and domiciled till June at Radcliffe. Friday and Saturday's Symphony audiences heard her conducting of Gabriel Faure's pure and spiritual "Requiem" with the Boston Symphony for the first time following the beat of a woman and the Bach Cantata club obedient to a breath on her every shade of expression. In Mlle. Boulanger's honor the Musical Guild of Boston is giving a large luncheon at the Vendome today. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach ("The Year's at the Spring"), considered the foremost American composer, is also honored.

On the guest list are found the names of Mabel Adams Bennett, pianist and accompanist, formerly of this city and Gladys de Almeida, soprano, a cousin of Miss Mercedes Pitta, frequently heard here in recital. In Cambridge, there are all sorts of events concerned with Mlle. Boulanger and with Paul Hindemith who is soloist at Symphony Friday and Saturday.

It was in the atmosphere of collected beauty and well ordered quiet that obtains of a Sunday afternoon in the music room at Fenway Court—crimson curtains drawn, candles glowing. We had happily chanced on one of the occasionally rare programs offered there—the Pasquier Trio: Jean, Pierre, Etienne, who would be going on the same afternoon to the exclusively functioning Flute Players Club at the Vendome. Dark, slender, resembling each other, they were concluding an absorbing performance of the Beethoven trio in G, Op. 9, No. 1. A wicked thought would out. "Don't you prefer them to the Ritz brothers?" we asked the lady in the next chair.

ORCHESTRA CONDUCTORS

B. Trav. Feb. 19/38

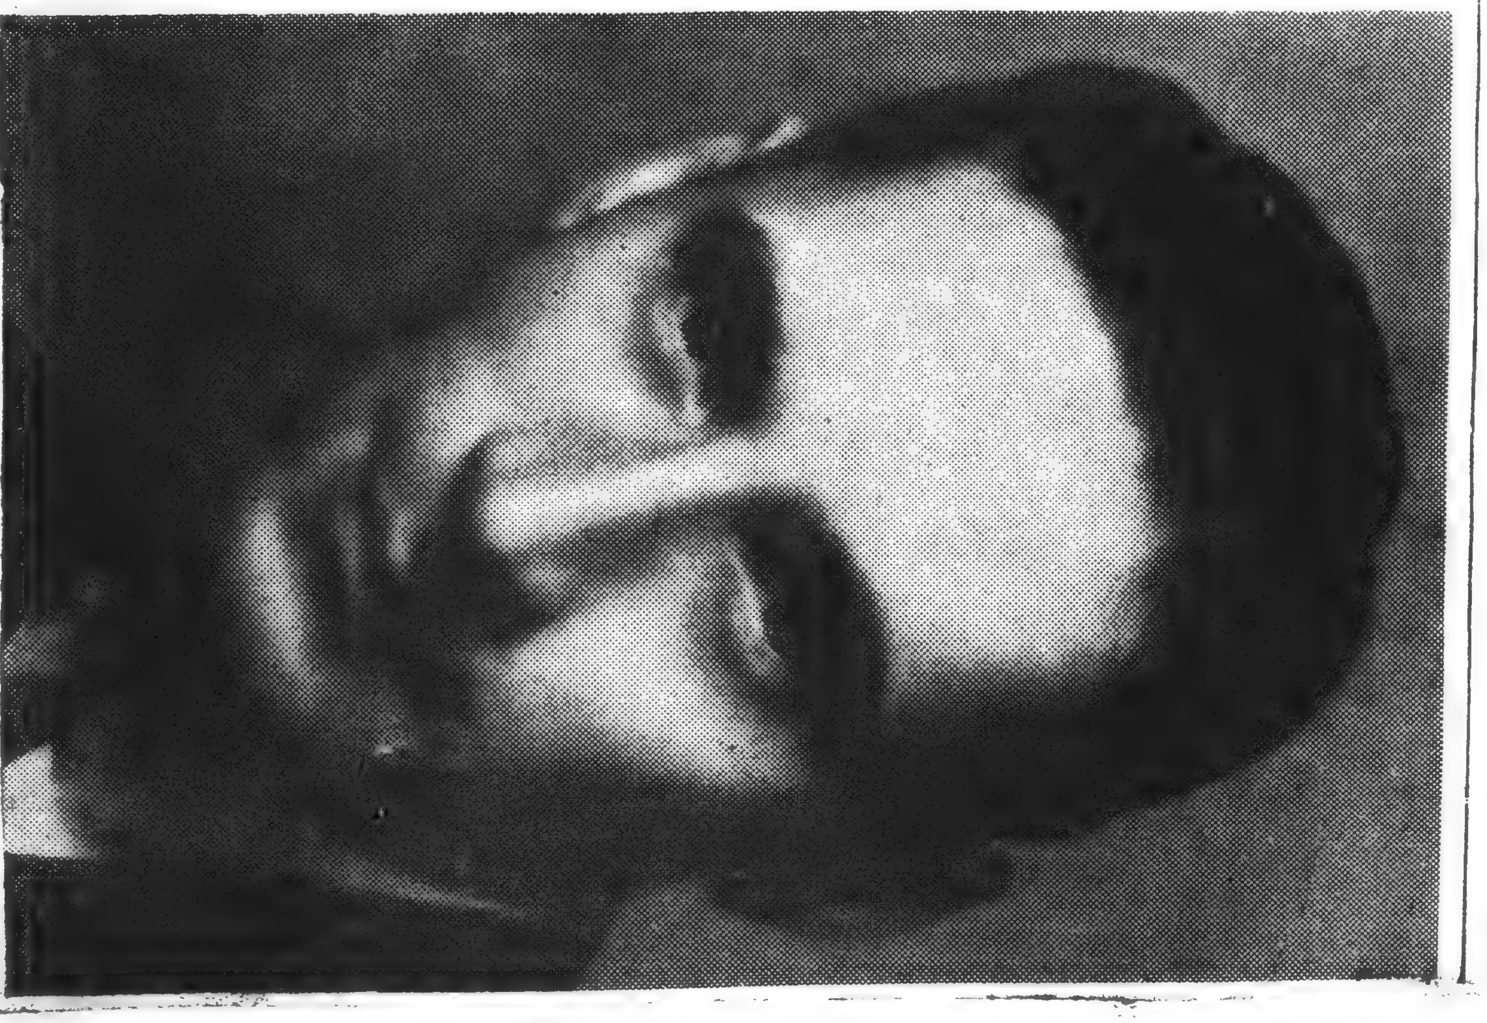
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, pictured with Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, France, famous woman composer and the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She led the orchestra at a performance yesterday afternoon and will repeat the performance this evening.

Paul Hindemith Soloist with the Boston Symphony

Orlando Barera, violinist, who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. He will play Mozart's D major concerto.

A scene from "The Matrimonial Market," an opera bouffe by Rossini, which will be presented by the Salzberg Opera Guild company at the Boston Opera House on Saturday evening, March 6.

Paul Hindemith, German composer and viola player, who will be guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week, assisting in the playing of several of his own compositions.



Leon Barzin, viola player, who will share solo honors with William Kroll, violinist, at the third and final concert to be given by Bernard Zighera's chamber orchestra at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening. They will play in Mozart's Symphonie Concertante for viola, violin and orchestra.

ONDAY—The fourth concert in the subsidiary Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M. Orlando Barera, Italian violinist, will be the soloist in Mozart's Concert in D major No. 4. The program will open with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, and close with Ravel's Suite, Ma Mere l'Oye," and Bolero."

RIDAY—The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 2:30 P. M. The distinguished soloist will be Paul Hindemith, German composer and viola player. He will play in his own concerto for viola and chamber orchestra, known as the Kammermusik No. 5. The program will open with Hindemith's concerto for string and brass instruments, written for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary, and will close with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

The College Glee Club festival will be held in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M. Archibald T. Davison will be guest conductor of these choruses from 15 New England colleges. The program and other details are announced elsewhere on this page.

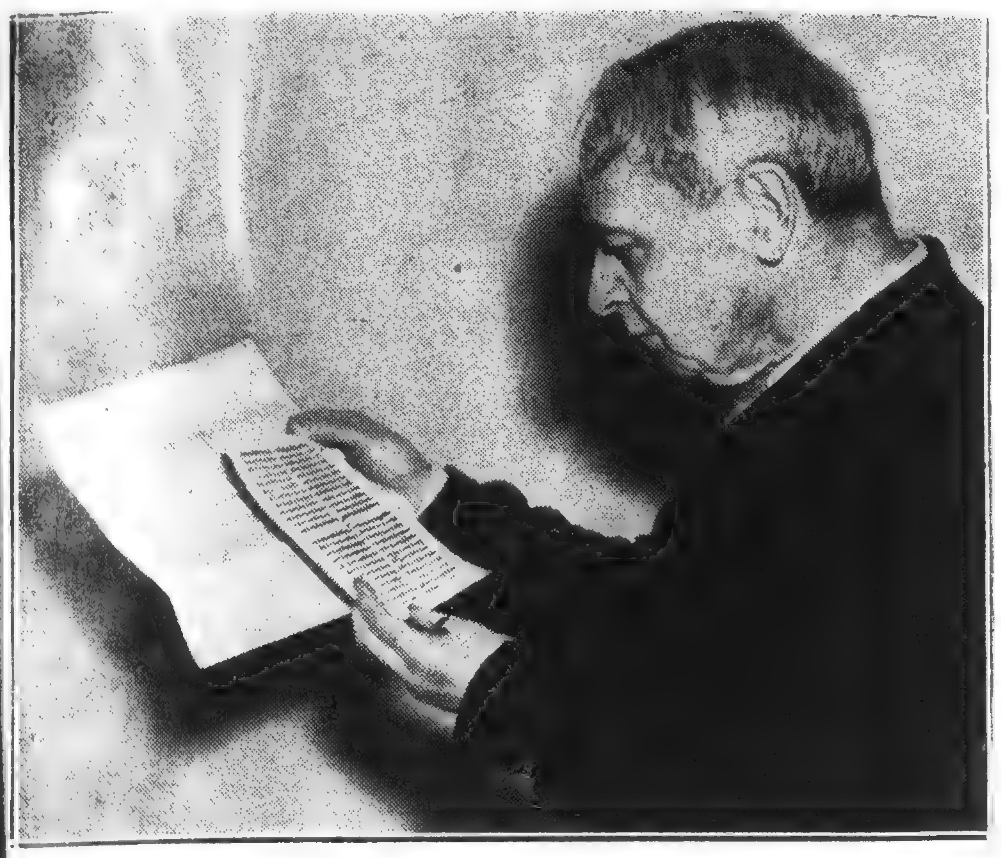
SATURDAY—Repetition of the 17th Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M.

SUNDAY, FEB. 27—The federal music project in conjunction with the Museum of Fine Arts will open a series of oratorio concerts in the museum at 2:30 P. M. A. Buckingham Simson will conduct the project's forces in Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise.

Fritz Fall, conductor of the Volksoper in Vienna, will be guest conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall at 8:15 P. M. Wolfgang Rebner, pianist, will be soloist. The program is not announced.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WAR CRY

FEB 5 - 1938



Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets his first glimpse of the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." The original score of the Finnish composer's little known work was lost in the mail en route to the United States from Germany, so that it was necessary to transmit the score by radio in time for a scheduled performance. WIDE WORLD

Chicago, Ill.
Down Beat

JAN - - 1938

"The Fools Belong Home In Bed"

Serge Koussevitzky

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went on strike for three minutes during a concert at the Syria Mosque here Dec. 13 because late arrivers disturbed him and the orchestra.

While he was directing the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major for an audience of 3500, Koussevitsky stopped briefly because he heard alien noises. He had just continued when two latecomers brushed past ushers and down the aisle. The conductor threw his baton on the music stand and strode from the platform, his face red.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted to someone back stage. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Calming down after three minutes, the famous conductor returned to the stage and presented a concert undisturbed by any interruption.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS

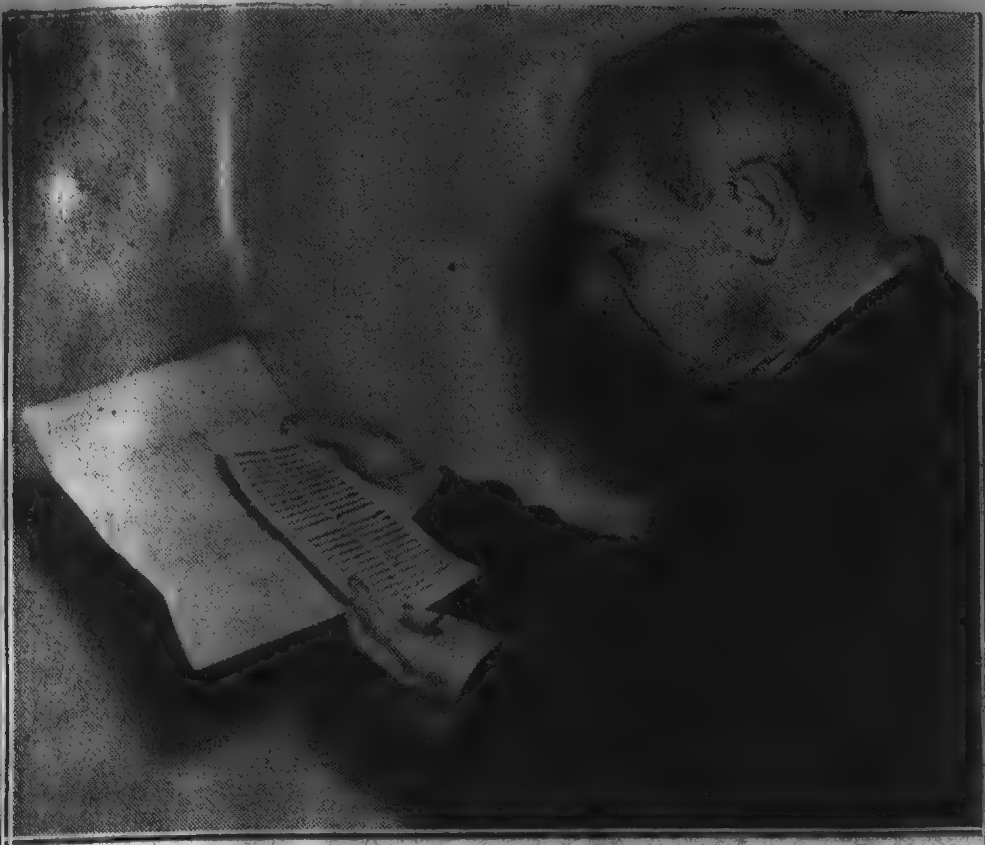
FEB 11 1938

MAJOR MUSIC

Nadia Boulanger, French musi cian-pedagogue, and broadcast o Verdi's "Otello" from the Metro politan Opera House are highlights of Saturday's radio programs. Mll Boulanger, who arrived in the Uni ed States this week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a series of four broadcasts over NBC, devoted to choral music dating from the sixteenth century to the present time. The first broadcast will be heard Saturday at 9:30 a.m. over NBC-WEAF.

176

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WAR CRY
FEB 5 - 1938



Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gets his first glimpse of the radioed score of Jan Sibelius' unpublished "Origin of Fire." The original score of the Finnish composer's little known work was lost in the mail en route to the United States from Germany, so that it was necessary to transmit the score by radio in time for a scheduled performance. WIDE WORLD

Chicago Ill.
Down Beat
JAN - - 1938

"The Fools Belong Home In Bed"

Serge Koussevitsky

Pittsburgh, Pa.—Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, went on strike for three minutes during a concert at the Syria Mosque here Dec. 13 because late arrivers disturbed him and the orchestra.

While he was directing the first movement of Mozart's Symphony in A Major for an audience of 3500, Koussevitsky stopped briefly because he heard alien noises. He had just continued when two latecomers brushed past ushers and down the aisle. The conductor threw his baton on the music stand and strode from the platform, his face red.

"I will not go back there, never," he shouted to someone back stage. "The fools, better they should stay at home in bed. They should have some respect for the art."

Calming down after three mintes, the famous conductor returned to the stage and presented a concert undisturbed by any interruption.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.
NEWS
FEB 11 1938

MAJOR MUSIC

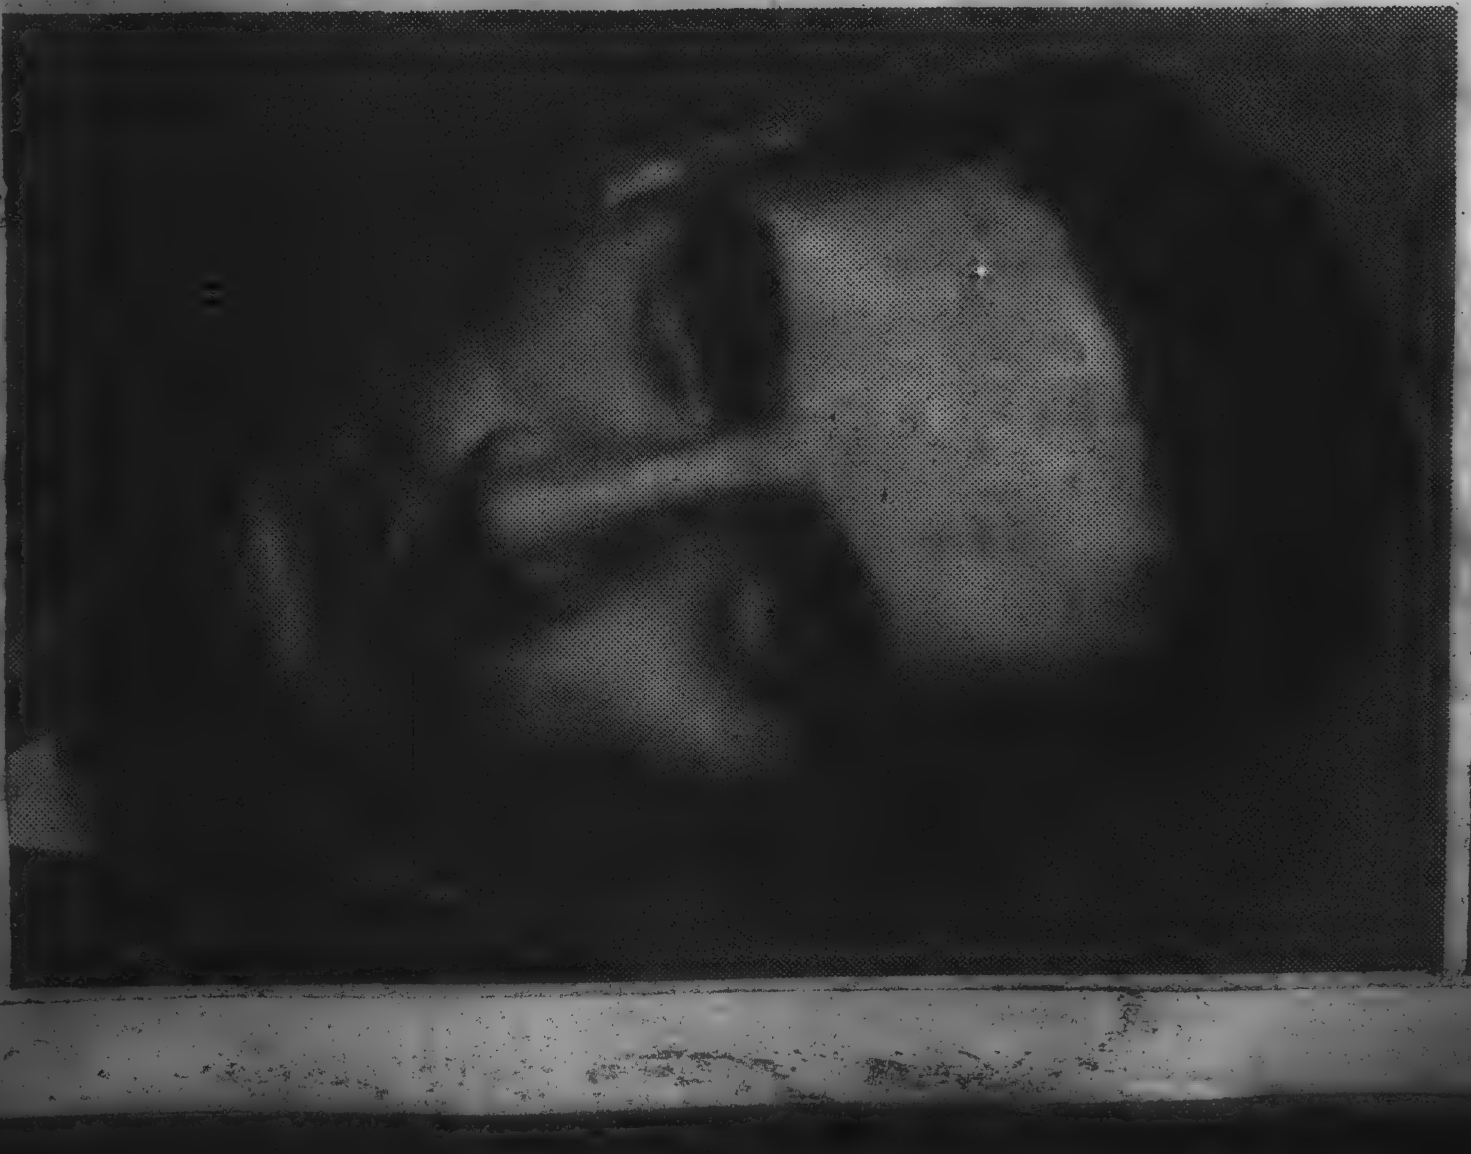
Nadia Boulanger, French musician-pedagogue, and broadcast of Verdi's "Otello" from the Metropolitan Opera House are highlights of Saturday's radio programs. Mlle. Boulanger, who arrived in the United States this week to become the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will conduct a series of four broadcasts over NBC, devoted to choral music dating from the sixteenth century to the present time. The first broadcast will be heard Saturday at 9:30 a.m. over NBC-WEAF.

Paul Hindemith Soloist with the Boston Symphony

Orlando Barera, violinist, who will be soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. He will play Mozart's D major concerto.

A scene from "The Matrimonial Market," an opera bouffe by Rossini, which will be presented by the Salzberg Opera Guild company at the Boston Opera House on Saturday evening, March 6.

Paul Hindemith, German composer and viola player, who will be guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week, assisting in the playing of several of his own compositions.



Leon Barzin, viola player, who will share solo honors with William Kroll, violinist, at the third and final concert to be given by Bernard Zighera's chamber orchestra at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening. They will play in Mozart's Symphonie Concertante for viola, violin and orchestra.

ONDAY—The fourth concert in the subsidiary Monday-Tuesday series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M. Orlando Barera, Italian violinist, will be the soloist in Mozart's Concert in D major No. 4. The program will open with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto, arranged by Maximilian Steinberg, and close with Ravel's Suite, Ma Mere l'Oye," and Bolero."

RIDAY—The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, will be given in Symphony Hall at 2:30 P. M. The distinguished soloist will be Paul Hindemith, German composer and viola player. He will play in his own concerto for viola and chamber orchestra, known as the Kammermusik No. 5. The program will open with Hindemith's concerto for string and brass instruments, written for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary, and will close with Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

The College Glee Club festival will be held in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M. Archibald T. Davison will be guest conductor of these choruses from 15 New England colleges. The program and other details are announced elsewhere on this page.

SATURDAY—Repetition of the 17th Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall at 8:15 P. M.

SUNDAY, FEB. 27—The federal music project in conjunction with the Museum of Fine Arts will open a series of oratorio concerts in the museum at 2:30 P. M. A. Buckingham Simson will conduct the project's forces in Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise.

Fritz Fall, conductor of the Volksoper in Vienna, will be guest conductor of the State Symphony Orchestra in Jordan Hall at 8:15 P. M. Wolfgang Rebner, pianist, will be soloist. The program is not announced.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1938

BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musican, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, February 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem", the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem", which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevitzky will complete the programme, conducing the organ symphony of Saint-Saens.

Saint-Saens Piano Concerto in G minor will be presented by Miss Kassman with the orchestra at the Cambridge concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 99, and close it with two numbers of Ravel: the Suite "Mother Goose", and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orlando Barera, the distinguished Italian violinist, will appear for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra when he plays at the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, in Symphony hall, to be given February 21 and 22. Mr. Barera, born in Ferrarra, Italy, in 1907, has attained an extensive reputation in European cities. He visited this country last season, giving concerts in New York, and in Washington, D. C., at the Library of Congress series. He will be heard on this occasion in Mozart's Concerto in D maor, No. 4.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the Concerto of Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, which Maxmilian Steinberg has arranged for orchestra, and conclude it with two works of Maurice Ravel: the Suite, "Mother Goose',, and "Bolero."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 16 1938

Woman Scolds Hub Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 16 (UP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history last night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 57-year history.

"This may be boring for some of your more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

Friday afternoon she will make more musical history by becoming the first woman to conduct the orchestra in a concert. Asked her reaction, she said:

"What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it be done by a man or a woman?"

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 16 1938

Orchestra Scolded By Woman Leader

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (I.N.S.). Madame Nadia Boulanger, famous French composer who on Friday will become the first woman in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to lead that group in a regular concert, halted a rehearsal of symphony players tonight to scold them for being "lackadaisical."

177

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 13 1938

Random Notes On Music and Celebrities

Artistic Crusader

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

THE week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra engaged the services of a woman conductor for the first time in the history of that eminent ensemble. She is Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, famous composer, Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and a notable figure in the musical life of Paris; wherefore it is just possible that she may not view this latest accolade from the proper perspective.

For the Boston Symphony is not as other American orchestras. In fact, it is not an American orchestra, but an imported body. Citizens are not barred from membership, but mere natives are not encouraged. It is not the nation's oldest orchestra. The symphonic bodies of Chicago, New York and Philadelphia constantly challenge its artistic prestige. Yet it remains a veritable Brahmin among the orchestras, dedicated to the perpetuation of that ideal of the '80's which held that the best in art is barely good enough for Boston and to be sure that it is the best it must be imported.

Mlle. Boulanger conforms to these specifications. Harold Bauer once called her "the most talented woman in music." Her assignment at the week-end concerts in Boston was to conduct the orchestra and the Radcliffe-Harvard chorus in a first American performance of the Faure Requiem and to play the organ part in a Saint-Saens symphony. She is a charming enthusiast, a crusader indeed, for her artistic and pedagogic beliefs. A distinguished figure in any setting, she strikingly resembles the late Vincent d'Indy, who, physically, was a type often repeated in this country among descendants of the Huguenots.

Feminists will glory in her achievements as the first woman composer-conductor to win international recognition in such conspicuous degree. In Boston all doors have been opened to her. While she is lecturing at Radcliffe this week the men of Harvard will be admitted to that carefully patrolled feminine preserve, also for the first time in history.

* * *

MLLE. BOULANGER'S crusade, this season, is in behalf of old music. She contends that though music is the youngest of the arts it is not so young as the world believes. We know only its last three centuries. The art of the preceding three centuries the real background of all that we enjoy, is lost to us. It is as if we believed the heart and mind of the fourteenth century man to have been no fit subject for exploration by the most searching and complete expression that yet has been created.

"This limitation reacts upon the progress of the art in ways too numerous to be catalogued," says Mlle. Boulanger. "It is responsible for the frightful monotony of our concert life. The symphony program of Paris, London, Berlin, New York, Rome, Chicago or Washington are all alike. There may be a little more emphasis of German music in Berlin, or of English music in London and American music in Chicago; but basically they all are the same.

"By strange coincidence, perhaps by a kind of telepathy, conductors elect to play the same programs at the same time. I have traveled from Rome, via Paris, to London, and heard the same symphony of Beethoven in each city. It happens all the time and is most discouraging. Meanwhile there is an untouched mine of great music, hidden in the libraries, gathering dust, quite dead; for music only lives as it is played. We can resurrect it. That miracle man can work in the art of music. We must do it."

The implication, of course, is that this ancient and forgotten music is quite as good as that which we know. Mlle. Boulanger goes about the task of proving her point with a cleverness and resource which, one may be sure, are typical. In Paris she has been preparing her case for several years, training a vocal ensemble (most of this old music being choral) collecting her examples and finding their contemporary parallels, bringing her singers with her.

Claudio Monteverdi she opposes to Claude Debussy and Gabriel Faure, selecting from the works of the latter, compositions similar in dimensions and quality to those of the first successful operatic composer.

The sixteenth century master shows himself in no way inferior to these original and daring exponents of twentieth century art. In fact, the similarities are more striking than the differences. In absolute beauty, in spiritual quality, the kinship is obvious. Monteverdi found love as sweet and death as bitter as did Debussy and hymned joy or tragedy with as much understanding of the human heart as was manifested by Faure.

* * *

"WE MUST know the old to appreciate the new," cries this earnest crusader; and the reflection that we are too prone to deal in quantity and perhaps not so sensitive to quality as were our forgotten musical ancestors is inescapable. This is Mlle. Boulanger's message to America in 1938, together with a few emphatic asides on the value of discipline and some caustic words about our musical history text books.

"The history of music is music—the music of every period. Not names and dates, which mean nothing apart from the art itself, not even the mute symbols that record the composer's thought, but the living music, resurrected, sung and played, its message felt, its impulse shared." For Mlle Boulanger believes, as does every great teacher, that music is not knowledge but experience, not something learned, but something lived.

It is a thought for critics and musicologists and by no chance a comforting one. However, someone must record the names and dates, or must stand, as interpreter, between the artist and his public; and so long as that necessity exists, we will have libraries for the musicologists to fill and keep in order that the critics may learn their unpopular vocation. For example, it is the critic's task to tell those not fortunate to have been present in Boston's Symphony Hall, Friday and Saturday, how Mlle. Boulanger functions as the most eminent of women conductors.

She presents a neat back to her audience, lithe, square-shouldered and erect. She uses no baton, but makes none of the tasteless and detailed manual gesture of the Hollywood school. In fact, she makes no unnecessary gesture. Her beat is all for the performer. Her address is left to the ensemble. She has the score before her, but rarely consults it. She, who might be the only authentic prima donna conductor, is not even so much of a showman as Toscanini, who hates showmanship with a holy hate.

She has one hobby—the final beat. It must have its full value in every measure. As musicians know, it is a common fault to slight it and this irritates her profoundly. A good friend, wishing her success on her present American tour, cabled: "And may you have many long last beats."

MARLBORO, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 16 1938

WOMAN LEADS FAMED SYMPHONY

For the first time in its 57 years of history the Boston Symphony orchestra was led by a woman, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, a slender woman of fifty and she scolded them at the rehearsal yesterday.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

FEB 13 1938

Notes On Music

Is Music Education?

By HELEN JANNETTE

With colleges and schools reaching a half way mark in their yearly sessions, and new semesters already begun, students arrive at general stock taking. The question most often asked is: "What is education? Is it something that leads the way to better living?"

Our question is: "Is music education?"

First we want to quote from writings of a year or two ago of Olin Downes of the New York "Times." He says: "Signs multiply that music is taking its place in the minds of government officials as an educational force to be fostered and encouraged by financial grants and other means."

Then, we want to quote E. E. Whiting of the Boston "Herald" in his comments on the refusal of the Boston City Board to exempt the Boston Symphony orchestra from taxes on the basis that it is not educational. Mr. Whiting writes: "What constitutes giving instructions? You can take a boy or a girl and hammer into his or her head multiplication tables, the precepts and principals of John Stuart Mills, the lines of Virgil and the intricacies of Euclid, or the monstrosities of modern psychiatry and eccentric psychology and you are giving instruction, even though the hapless youth before you cares no more about what you are telling him, than a horse in the field, or an angle worm in the lawn; and gets no more from what you beat into him.

"Yet if this great orchestra by playing week after week, and year after year raised the level of understanding and appreciation of the works of the masters of music, if by its repertoire of musical classics it can enrich the minds and clean the hearts and strengthen the souls of men and women and youths—why is that not instruction?"

If ever in the plans of things eternal we have needed our "minds enriched," our "hearts cleansed" and our "souls strengthened" it is now. For it is only now that we are arising from world conditions that crushed us.

Nothing in all the sciences nor in the other arts is so spiritual as music. It is illusive, we cannot confine it. It knows the freedom of the spirit. It transports us; it moves us as nothing else.

With music holding such beautiful and tremendous educational possibilities, it must belong to the people.

To further quote Mr. Downes: "Too many people are sub-educated even in the use of those natural faculties of which hearing is one." Then he asks, "What is real education? Why do girls and boys, bright, healthy, curious about life, go so often through college, as a celebrated instructor once told us, without having so much as developed intellectual curiosity or found out that it is fascinating to read? It is primarily the fault of the educators and their lack of awareness of life.

"Musical education is in a debatable state over most of our country because of the stereotyped, unimaginative and uncreative attitude of the average teacher. Some teachers are 'thorough' on the technical side, but offer little that interests or stimulates or feeds the minds of their pupils. Other teachers have fascinating theories, lofty enthusiasms, liberality of view and receptiveness of ideas, but do not buckle down to the hard practical work that makes reality of the dream. Most teachers are neither practical nor particularly idealistic, they are too likely to be content with copy book methods, that achieve little or nothing in feeding the minds and the musical nature of the student.

"Humanity is eager to learn. The result of training which does not sink in and does not vitalize thinking and feeling are to be noted in the conventional attitude toward music. Great music was not written for composers, musicians and critics. It was written for human beings who may be untutored in the technical aspects of the art but are alert and receptive to what it expresses."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1938

First Woman in History Scolds Boston Symphony

Boston, Feb. 15.—(AP)—For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman today stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will become the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, Friday, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, raised her hands—she uses no baton and conducts with both hands—and the orchestra went back to work.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

FEB 16 1938

Boston Programs.

The regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring to the platform as the conductor of Faure's "Requiem" Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician and organist who at present is lecturing in the vicinity. It is interesting to notice that the Faure composition was presented in Christ church, Park avenue, New York on Sunday in what was said to be the first performance in that city. It was first heard at the Madelaine in Paris in 1888.

In Boston the soloists will be Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hughes Cuenod, tenor and Doda Conrad, baritone. The chorus will be that of the Bach Cantata Club. The other number on the program will be the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and in which Miss Boulanger will play the organ passages.

For the supplementary concerts Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week Orlando Barera, Italian violinist, will be the soloist in Mozart's D major Concerto. The orchestra will play an arrangement of a concerto Carl P. E. Bach and from Ravel's works the "Mother Goose" suite and the popular 'Bolero."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

F 17 1938

Woman Halts Boston Symphony, Scolds Musicians

BOSTON, Feb. 17.—A woman stopped a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and scolded the musicians.

The woman was Mlle. Nadia Boulanger who will be the first woman to conduct the renowned organization tomorrow. The orchestra was engaged in rehearsing Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" when Mlle. Boulanger called the halt.

In crisp French-accented words she said:

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 13 1938

BOULANGER AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musican, will be the guest of honor at the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, February 18 and 19. On the previous Thursday, February 17, the sixth concert of the series in Sanders theatre, Cambridge, will be given. At this concert, Elly Kassman, the pianist, will appear as soloist.

Mlle. Boulanger will conduct the "Requiem" of Gabriel Faure at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and will play the organ part in the Symphony of Saint-Saens, in C minor. In the performance of the "Requiem", the orchestra will be assisted by the Bach Cantata club, and the following soloists: Soprano, Gisela Peyron; tenor, Hugues Cuenod; baritone, Doda Conrad. The "Requiem", which is to have its first performances at these concerts, was conducted by Mlle. Boulanger at the concerts of the Royal Philharmonic orchestra of London, last November, and in the autumn previous. Faure was the master of this artist in composition at the Paris Conservatory. Serge Koussevitzky will complete the programme, conducing the organ symphony of Saint-Saens.

Saint-Saens Piano Concerto in G minor will be presented by Miss Kassman with the orchestra at the Cambridge concert. Dr. Koussevitzky will open the programme with Haydn's Symphony in E flat, No. 99, and close it with two numbers of Ravel: the Suite "Mother Goose", and the second suite from the ballet "Daphnis and Chloe".

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orlando Barera, the distinguished Italian violinist, will appear for the first time with the Boston Symphony orchestra when he plays at the next pair of concerts of the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts, in Symphony hall, to be given February 21 and 22. Mr. Barera, born in Ferrarra, Italy, in 1907, has attained an extensive reputation in European cities. He visited this country last season, giving concerts in New York, and in Washington, D. C., at the Library of Congress series. He will be heard on this occasion in Mozart's Concerto in D maor, No. 4.

Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with the Concerto of Carl Phillipp Emanuel Bach, which Maxmilian Steinberg has arranged for orchestra, and conclude it with two works of Maurice Ravel: the Suite, "Mother Goose", and "Bolero."

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 16 1938

Woman Scolds Hub Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 16 (UP)—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history last night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 57-year history.

"This may be boring for some of your more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

Friday afternoon she will make more musical history by becoming the first woman to conduct the orchestra in a concert. Asked her reaction, she said:

"What does it matter, if there is a job to be done, whether it be done by a man or a woman?"

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 16 1938

Orchestra Scolded By Woman Leader

BOSTON, Feb. 15 (I.N.S.) Madame Nadia Boulanger, famous French composer who on Friday will become the first woman in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to lead that group in a regular concert, halted a rehearsal of symphony players tonight to scold them for being "lackadaisical."

177

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 13 1938

Random Notes On Music and Celebrities

Artistic Crusader

By Glenn Dillard Gunn

THE week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra engaged the services of a woman conductor for the first time in the history of that eminent ensemble. She is Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, famous composer, Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and a notable figure in the musical life of Paris; wherefore it is just possible that she may not view this latest accolade from the proper perspective.

For the Boston Symphony is not as other American orchestras. In fact, it is not an American orchestra, but an imported body. Citizens are not barred from membership, but mere natives are not encouraged. It is not the nation's oldest orchestra. The symphonic bodies of Chicago, New York and Philadelphia constantly challenge its artistic prestige. Yet it remains a veritable Brahmin among the orchestras, dedicated to the perpetuation of that ideal of the '80's which held that the best in art is barely good enough for Boston and to be sure that it is the best it must be imported.

Mlle. Boulanger conforms to these specifications. Harold Bauer once called her "the most talented woman in music." Her assignment at the week-end concerts in Boston was to conduct the orchestra and the Radcliffe-Harvard chorus in a first American performance of the Faure Requiem and to play the organ part in a Saint-Saens symphony. She is a charming enthusiast, a crusader indeed, for her artistic and pedagogic beliefs. A distinguished figure in any setting, she strikingly resembles the late Vincent d'Indy, who, physically, was a type often repeated in this country among descendants of the Huguenots.

Feminists will glory in her achievements as the first woman composer-conductor to win international recognition in such conspicuous degree. In Boston all doors have been opened to her. While she is lecturing at Radcliffe this week the men of Harvard will be admitted to that carefully patrolled feminine preserve, also for the first time in history.

* * *

MLLE. BOULANGER'S crusade, this season, is in behalf of old music. She contends that though music is the youngest of the arts it is not so young as the world believes. We know only its last three centuries. The art of the preceding three centuries the real background of all that we enjoy, is lost to us. It is as if we believed the heart and mind of the fourteenth century man to have been no fit subject for exploration by the most searching and complete expression that yet has been created.

"This limitation reacts upon the progress of the art in ways too numerous to be catalogued," says Mlle. Boulanger. "It is responsible for the frightful monotony of our concert life. The symphony program of Paris, London, Berlin, New York, Rome, Chicago or Washington are all alike. There may be a little more emphasis of German music in Berlin, or of English music in London and American music in Chicago; but basically they all are the same.

"By strange coincidence, perhaps by a kind of telepathy, conductors elect to play the same programs at the same time. I have traveled from Rome, via Paris, to London, and heard the same symphony of Beethoven in each city. It happens all the time and is most discouraging. Meanwhile there is an untouched mine of great music, hidden in the libraries, gathering dust, quite dead; for music only lives as it is played. We can resurrect it. That miracle man can work in the art of music. We must do it."

The implication, of course, is that this ancient and forgotten music is quite as good as that which we know. Mlle. Boulanger goes about the task of proving her point with a cleverness and resource which, one something learned, but something lived.

It is a thought for critics and musicologists and by no chance a comforting one. However, someone must record the names and dates, or must stand, as interpreter, between the artist and his public; and so long as that necessity exists, we will have libraries for the musicologists to fill and keep in order that the critics may learn their unpopular vocation. For example, it is the critic's task to tell those not fortunate to have been present in Boston's Symphony Hall, Friday and Saturday, how Mlle. Boulanger functions as the most eminent of women conductors.

She presents a neat back to her audience, lithe, square-shouldered and erect. She uses no baton, but makes none of the tasteless and detailed manual gesture of the Hollywood school. In fact, she makes no unnecessary gesture. Her beat is all for the performer. Her address is left to the ensemble. She has the score before her, but rarely consults it. She, who might be the only authentic prima donna conductor, is not even so much of a showman as Toscanini, who hates showmanship with a holy hate.

She has one hobby—the final beat. It must have its full value in every measure. As musicians know, it is a common fault to slight it and this irritates her profoundly. A good friend, wishing her success on her present American tour, cabled: "And may you have many long last beats."

may be sure, are typical. In Paris she has been preparing her case for several years, training a vocal ensemble (most of this old music being choral) collecting her examples and finding their contemporary parallels, bringing her singers with her.

Claudio Monteverdi she opposes to Claude Debussy and Gabriel Faure, selecting from the works of the latter, compositions similar in dimensions and quality to those of the first successful operatic composer.

The sixteenth century master shows himself in no way inferior to these original and daring exponents of twentieth century art. In fact, the similarities are more striking than the differences. In absolute beauty, in spiritual quality, the kinship is obvious. Monteverdi found love as sweet and death as bitter as did Debussy and hymned joy or tragedy with as much understanding of the human heart as was manifested by Faure.

* * *

"WE MUST know the old to appreciate the new," cries this earnest crusader; and the reflection that we are too prone to deal in quantity and perhaps not so sensitive to quality as were our forgotten musical ancestors is inescapable. This is Mlle. Boulanger's message to America in 1938, together with a few emphatic asides on the value of discipline and some caustic words about our musical history text books.

"The history of music is music—the music of every period. Not names and dates, which mean nothing apart from the art itself, not even the mute symbols that record the composer's thought, but the living music, resurrected, sung and played, its message felt, its impulse shared." For Mlle Boulanger believes, as does every great teacher, that music is not knowledge but experience, not

---

MARLBORO, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 16 1938

WOMAN LEADS FAMED SYMPHONY

For the first time in its 57 years of history the Boston Symphony orchestra was led by a woman, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, a slender woman of fifty and she scolded them at the rehearsal yesterday.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM

FEB 13 1938

Notes On Music

Is Music Education?

By HELEN JANNETTE

With colleges and schools reaching a half way mark in their yearly sessions, and new semesters already begun, students arrive at general stock taking. The question most often asked is: "What is education? Is it something that leads the way to better living?"

Our question is: "Is music education?"

First we want to quote from writings of a year or two ago of Olin Downes of the New York "Times." He says: "Signs multiply that music is taking its place in the minds of government officials as an educational force to be fostered and encouraged by financial grants and other means."

Then, we want to quote E. E. Whiting of the Boston "Herald" in his comments on the refusal of the Boston City Board to exempt the Boston Symphony orchestra from taxes on the basis that it is not educational. Mr. Whiting writes: "What constitutes giving instructions? You can take a boy or a girl and hammer into his or her head multiplication tables, the precepts and principals of John Stuart Mills, the lines of Virgil and the intricacies of Euclid, or the monstrosities of modern psychiatry and eccentric psychology and you are giving instruction, even though the hapless youth before you cares no more about what you are telling him, than a horse in the field, or an angle worm in the lawn; and gets no more from what you beat into him.

"Yet if this great orchestra by playing week after week, and year after year raised the level of understanding and appreciation of the works of the masters of music, if by its repertoire of musical classics it can enrich the minds and clean the hearts and strengthen the souls of men and women and youths—why is that not instruction?"

If ever in the plans of things eternal we have needed our "minds enriched," our "hearts cleansed" and our "souls strengthened" it is now. For it is only now that we are arising from world conditions that crushed us.

Nothing in all the sciences nor in the other arts is so spiritual as music. It is illusive, we cannot confine it. It knows the freedom of the spirit. It transports us; it moves us as nothing else.

With music holding such beautiful and tremendous educational possibilities, it must belong to the people.

To further quote Mr. Downes: "Too many people are sub-educated even in the use of those natural faculties of which hearing is one," Then he asks, "What is real education? Why do girls and boys, bright, healthy, curious about life, go so often through college, as a celebrated instructor once told us, without having so much as developed intellectual curiosity or found out that it is fascinating to read? It is primarily the fault of the educators and their lack of awareness of life.

"Musical education is in a debatable state over most of our country because of the stereotyped, unimaginative and uncreative attitude of the average teacher. Some teachers are 'thorough' on the technical side, but offer little that interests or stimulates or feeds the minds of their pupils. Other teachers have fascinating theories, lofty enthusiasms, liberality of view and receptiveness of ideas, but do not buckle down to the hard practical work that makes reality of the dream. Most teachers are neither practical nor particularly idealistic, they are too likely to be content with copy book methods, that achieve little or nothing in feeding the minds and the musical nature of the student.

"Humanity is eager to learn. The result of training which does not sink in and does not vitalize thinking and feeling are to be noted in the conventional attitude toward music. Great music was not written for composers, musicians and critics. It was written for human beings who may be untutored in the technical aspects of the art but are alert and receptive to what it expresses."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 16 1938

First Woman in History Scolds Boston Symphony

Boston, Feb. 15.—(AP)—For the first time in the 57-year history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman today stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will become the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, Friday, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, raised her hands—she uses no baton and conducts with both hands—and the orchestra went back to work.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

FEB 16 1938

Boston Programs.

The regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring to the platform as the conductor of Faure's "Requiem" Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French musician and organist who at present is lecturing in the vicinity. It is interesting to notice that the Faure composition was presented in Christ church, Park avenue, New York on Sunday in what was said to be the first performance in that city. It was first heard at the Madelaine in Paris in 1888.

In Boston the soloists will be Gisela Peyron, soprano; Hughes Cuenod, tenor and Doda Conrad, baritone. The chorus will be that of the Bach Cantata Club. The other number on the program will be the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor which Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct and in which Miss Boulanger will play the organ passages.

For the supplementary concerts Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week Orlando Barera, Italian violinist, will be the soloist in Mozart's D major Concerto. The orchestra will play an arrangement of a concerto Carl P. E. Bach and from Ravel's works the "Mother Goose" suite and the popular "Bolero."

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 17 1938

Woman Halts Boston Symphony, Scolds Musicians

BOSTON, Feb. 17.—A womman stopped a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, and scolded the musicians.

The woman was Mlle. Nadia Boulanger who will be the first woman to conduct the renowned organization tomorrow. The orchestra was engaged in rehearsing Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" when Mlle. Boulanger called the halt.

In crisp French-accented words she said:

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling."

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

FEB 18 1938

Lady Conductor Not Impressed

Boston Dispatch to the New York Sun

SMASHING tradition is such an old story to Mme. Nadia Boulanger that it has lost its thrill. She has been doing it all her life.

Mme. Boulanger is the fragile little French lady who has just arrived here to become visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe.

Boys from Harvard are standing in line to sign up for her classes, which in itself is an upset. Usually it's the other way around. Girls from Radcliffe straining at the leash to get into the classes of some famous Harvard don.

—o—

Before she leaves she will disintegrate still another old Boston custom, for she will be the first woman guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It's the sort of honor that would send most women musicians straight into seventh heaven, but she is matter of fact about it. A Boston reporter asked her how it felt to be the first woman conductor of the famous old orchestra and she said:

"I've been a woman for a little over fifty years and have gotten over my initial astonishment.

"As for conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

—o—

Legends have a way of clustering around this gifted little French woman and she gets a wholesome grin out of reflecting that the most persistent legend simply isn't so.

She did not teach George Gershwin music. She tells the story without emphasis or guile:

"Somebody sent Gershwin to me in Paris with the idea in mind I could teach him something.

"I talked to him for ten minutes. He didn't bring along any score. Although I wasn't well acquainted with his work, I did recognize that he knew music.

"But I had nothing to offer him. He was already quite well known when he came to my house and I suggested that he was doing all right and should continue.

"I told him what I could teach him wouldn't help him much along his own road and he agreed. The interview lasted ten minutes."

—o—

The woman who wouldn't take Gershwin on as a pupil stands around five feet four in her low-heeled shoes. That's only approximate. She has white hair, done into a soft roll piled up on the back of her neck. She has bright, bird-like eyes. Candidly, this interviewer can't say offhand whether they are blue, brown or gray. But they are alert and inquiring.

She wears black shoes and stockings and, usually, black gowns, which manage to give the impression of a uniform. There's usually a silver chain around her neck and an old-fashioned sunburst in her black tie.

Talking to her, you have to watch very closely to observe these things, because you have trouble taking your eyes off her hands. They are the most eloquent hands since Bernhardt's. Swift as swallows, graceful as swans, they express every emotion with a richness and a vigor that makes mere speech seem inadequate.

She can register indifference, indignation, enthusiasm, despair, irritation, without opening her mouth.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
TIMES-HERALD

FEB 19 1938

Boston Orchestra Led First Time by Woman

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, yesterday became the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton and using both hands at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

ENDICOTT, N. Y.
DAILY BULLETIN

FEB 17 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD

FEB 16 1938

First Woman to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER, head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it does not disturb her in the least. While in this country Mlle. Boulanger will lecture at Radcliffe, Wellesley College and the Longy School.—Wide World Photo.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 19 1938

MUSICAL EVENTS

Ravel—Some Singers

CARNEGIE HALL housed a Ravel memorial Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony devoted its concerts chiefly to the French composer, who died last December. Mr. Koussevitzky, who might be regarded as a Ravel specialist if he weren't so accomplished an all-round conductor, offered performances that could be called definitive—including one of the somewhat neglected piano concerto, which had the advantage of a dazzling solo contribution by Jesús-María Sanromá. The concerto may be superficial trickery, but it's the superficial trickery of a composer who, in his own style, was great.

To ask a fashionable question, how long will the music of Ravel survive? To answer it, there are no reliable immortality tables for composers, but so long as it lasts, audiences will have suave and often stimulating entertainment.

Friday evening's Ravel period was prefaced by Mozart's D-major symphony (the "Prague"), which also had a couple of hearings at the Philharmonic sessions, led by Mr. Barbirolli. The Boston version was more expert than that of the home group, but both playings seemed needlessly Big. The Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were stolen by the soloist, Mme. Flagstad, whose singing was incredibly fine, even for her.

OTTAWA, CAN.
EVENING JOURNAL

FEB 1[illegible]

Conductor Scolds Orchestra

BOSTON.—(AP)—For the first time in the 57-year-history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who is the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men", she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, raised her hands—she uses no baton and conducts with both hands—and the orchestra went back to work.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH

B 20 1938

Boston Sees Woman At Symphony Baton

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Music critics today praised the performance of Mlle. Nadi Boulanger of Paris, France, the first woman ever to conduct the 57-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mlle. Boulanger directed the 110-piece orchestra in its first performance of the "Requiem" of her one-time teacher, Gabriel Faure. Then, amid prolonged applause of the audience of 2,700, she kissed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, his wife, and several of the musicians

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

FEB 20 1938

Wide World

Nadia Boulanger

Boston's first conductress.

PEDAGOGY

Wouldn't Teach Gershwin

She's a fragile little French lady with bird-like sharp eyes. She's teaching music at Radcliffe (Cambridge, Mass.) and has Harvard men treading on each other's heels in their anxiety to take her courses. She has hands that speak with Gallic eloquence (they can utter all her moods without a single spoken word). Has white hair, done up in what ladies call "a soft roll." Always wears black shoes, stockings; pretty nearly always, black gowns. Generally has a silver chain around her neck, a sunburst on a black tie. She is Mme. Nadia Boulanger, music teacher from France.

Once she refused to take on George Gershwin as a pupil. Said he came to her in Paris, they talked for ten minutes, she told him to keep on with what he was doing, she couldn't teach him anything. "He died famous," she said, and with French dry wit, added, "I haven't the slightest suspicion he regretted it, either."

One of her pupils was Prof. Walter Piston, head of the Harvard music department. He still calls her "M'am."

And now she's going to be a guest conductor for the Boston Symphony. First time august and ancient organization has ever bowed a fiddle, tooted a French horn, thumped the drum under the baton of a woman.

938

Boston Symphony Gives Concert Here on Feb. 9

Outstanding Musical Ensemble Sponsored by Unity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Montclair High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, at 8:30 o'clock as the extra event in the 1937-1938 Unity Concert Course series. Tickets for this concert, which is not included on a season ticket, are now available at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street.

This appearance of the famous orchestra will be its first in Montclair for seven years and it is expected that the auditorium will be crowded to capacity. Earlier appearances this season have won for the orchestra and for its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, enthusiastic appreciation from both audience and music critics.

Of the latter group, Olin Downes of New York has been unstinting in his prase, writing: "The season's concerts testify equally to the musical excellence of the orchestra and the interpretative powers, which appear constantly greater, of the conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky. No composer and no school of composers seem foreign to his understanding. Classic and ultra-modern composers find in him the intuitive spokesman and propagandist."

178

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 20 1938

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

For friends of modern music there are excellent recordings of Mossolow's "Soviet Iron Foundry," an effective bit of musical realism, and Robert McBride's Fugato on a well known theme by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler's leadership. Minor Sebeliusiana, the Berceuse from "The Tempest" and the "Valse Triste," have been performed and recorded by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. Admirers of Eide Norena's singing, among whom I do not number myself, will enjoy her disk versions of the "King of Thule" ballade and "Jewel Song" from Gounod's "Faust." On the disk sent to me of these arias the labels are reversed. Moriz Rosenthal has played the Schubert-Liszt sixth "Soiree de Vienne" with esprit.

Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in English translation, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists, recorded at a performance in Boston, will be reviewed when the complete recording is available, since it would hardly be just to discuss so important an undertaking after listening only to the first set of disks covering but a portion of the work.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER

FEB 19 1938

Woman Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the fisrt woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seen-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS

[illegible]

Boston Symphony Is Led By Woman

Boston, Feb. 18. —(AP)— An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-yar-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requien," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure.

178

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
FEB 18 1938

Lady Conductor Not Impressed

Boston Dispatch to the New York Sun

SMASHING tradition is such an old story to Mme. Nadia Boulanger that it has lost its thrill. She has been doing it all her life.

Mme. Boulanger is the fragile little French lady who has just arrived here to become visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe.

Boys from Harvard are standing in line to sign up for her classes, which in itself is an upset. Usually it's the other way around. Girls from Radcliffe straining at the leash to get into the classes of some famous Harvard don.

—o—

Before she leaves she will disintegrate still another old Boston custom, for she will be the first woman guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It's the sort of honor that would send most women musicians straight into seventh heaven, but she is matter of fact about it. A Boston reporter asked her how it felt to be the first woman conductor of the famous old orchestra and she said:

"I've been a woman for a little over fifty years and have gotten over my initial astonishment.

"As for conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

—o—

Legends have a way of clustering around this gifted little French woman and she gets a wholesome grin out of reflecting that the most persistent legend simply isn't so.

She did not teach George Gershwin music. She tells the story without emphasis or guile:

"Somebody sent Gershwin to me in Paris with the idea in mind I could teach him something.

"I talked to him for ten minutes. He didn't bring along any score. Although I wasn't well acquainted with his work, I did recognize that he knew music.

"But I had nothing to offer him. He was already quite well known when he came to my house and I suggested that he was doing all right and should continue.

"I told him what I could teach him wouldn't help him much along his own road and he agreed. The interview lasted ten minutes."

—o—

The woman who wouldn't take Gershwin on as a pupil stands around five feet four in her low-heeled shoes. That's only approximate. She has white hair, done into a soft roll piled up on the back of her neck. She has bright, bird-like eyes. Candidly, this interviewer can't say offhand whether they are blue, brown or gray. But they are alert and inquiring.

She wears black shoes and stockings and, usually, black gowns, which manage to give the impression of a uniform. There's usually a silver chain around her neck and an old-fashioned sunburst in her black tie.

Talking to her, you have to watch very closely to observe these things, because you have trouble taking your eyes off her hands. They are the most eloquent hands since Bernhardt's. Swift as swallows, graceful as swans, they express every emotion with a richness and a vigor that makes mere speech seem inadequate.

She can register indifference, indignation, enthusiasm, despair, irritation, without opening her mouth.

NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
TIMES-HERALD
FEB 19 1938

Boston Orchestra Led First Time by Woman

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, yesterday became the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton and using both hands at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capaci-

---

ENDICOTT, N. Y.
DAILY BULLETIN
FEB 17 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
HERALD
FEB 16 1938

First Woman to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

MLLE. NADIA BOULANGER, head of the Department of Music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it does not disturb her in the least. While in this country Mlle. Boulanger will lecture at Radcliffe, Wellesley College and the Longy School.—Wide World Photo.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
FEB 19 1938

MUSICAL EVENTS

Ravel—Some Singers

CARNEGIE HALL housed a Ravel memorial Friday evening and Saturday afternoon, when the Boston Symphony devoted its concerts chiefly to the French composer, who died last December. Mr. Koussevitzky, who might be regarded as a Ravel specialist if he weren't so accomplished an all-round conductor, offered performances that could be called definitive—including one of the somewhat neglected piano concerto, which had the advantage of a dazzling solo contribution by Jesús-María Sanromá. The concerto may be superficial trickery, but it's the superficial trickery of a composer who, in his own style, was great.

To ask a fashionable question, how long will the music of Ravel survive? To answer it, there are no reliable immortality tables for composers, but so long as it lasts, audiences will have suave and often stimulating entertainment.

Friday evening's Ravel period was prefaced by Mozart's D-major symphony (the "Prague"), which also had a couple of hearings at the Philharmonic sessions, led by Mr. Barbirolli. The Boston version was more expert than that of the home group, but both playings seemed needlessly Big. The Philharmonic-Symphony concerts were stolen by the soloist, Mme. Flagstad, whose singing was incredibly fine, even for her.

OTTAWA, CAN.
EVENING JOURNAL
FEB 19 1938

Conductor Scolds Orchestra

BOSTON. — (AP) — For the first time in the 57-year-history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman stopped a rehearsal and scolded the musicians.

In crisp, French-accented words, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who is the first woman to conduct the renowned orchestra, brought a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" to a halt.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men", she said, "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies. You must relax and watch for its depth of feeling. If you play music with an open mind, you will find great beauty and depth behind its simplicity."

Mlle. Boulanger, noted French teacher and organist, raised her hands—she uses no baton and conducts with both hands—and the orchestra went back to work.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
FEB 20 1938

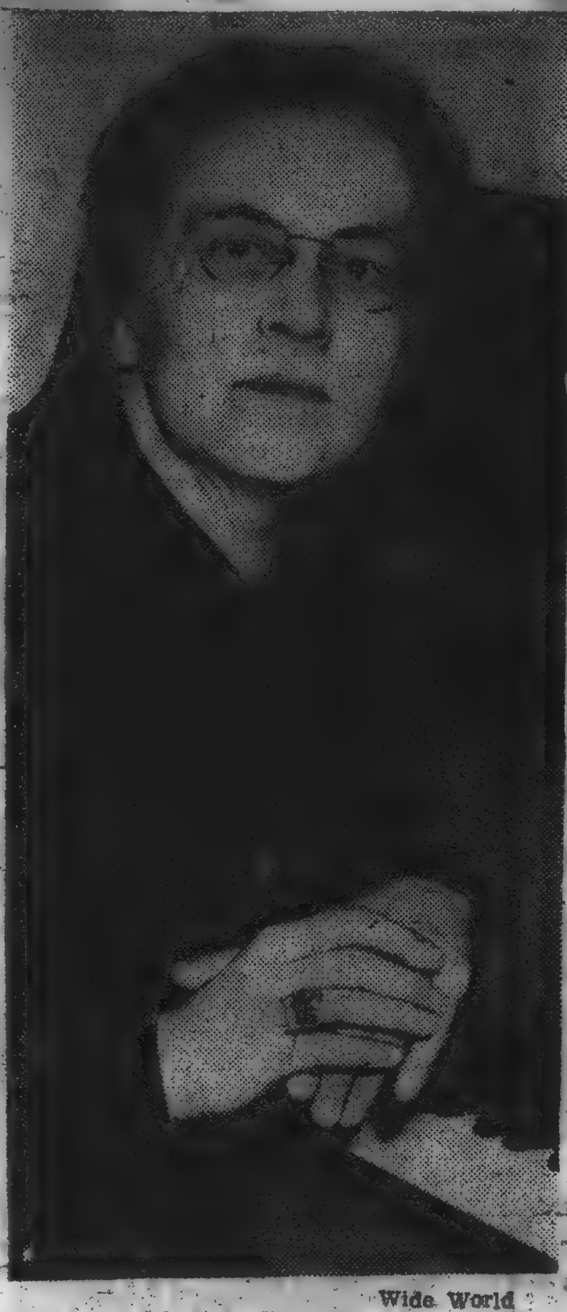
Boston Sees Woman At Symphony Baton

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Music critics today praised the performance of Mlle. Nadi Boulanger of Paris, France, the first woman ever to conduct the 57-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mlle. Boulanger directed the 110-piece orchestra in its first performance of the "Requiem" of her one-time teacher, Gabriel Faure. Then, amid prolonged applause of the audience of 2,700, she kissed Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, his wife, and several of the musicians

---

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
FEB 20 1938



Wide World

Nadia Boulanger

Boston's first conductress.

PEDAGOGY

Wouldn't Teach Gershwin

She's a fragile little French lady with bird-like sharp eyes. She's teaching music at Radcliffe (Cambridge, Mass.) and has Harvard men treading on each other's heels in their anxiety to take her courses. She has hands that speak with Gallic eloquence (they can utter all her moods without a single spoken word). Has white hair, done up in what ladies call "a soft roll." Always wears black shoes, stockings; pretty nearly always, black gowns. Generally has a silver chain around her neck, a sunburst on a black tie. She is Mme. Nadia Boulanger, music teacher from France.

Once she refused to take on George Gershwin as a pupil. Said he came to her in Paris, they talked for ten minutes, she told him to keep on with what he was doing, she couldn't teach him anything. "He died famous," she said, and with French dry wit, added, "I haven't the slightest suspicion he regretted it, either."

One of her pupils was Prof. Walter Piston, head of the Harvard music department. He still calls her "M'am."

And now she's going to be a guest conductor for the Boston Symphony. First time august and ancient organization has ever bowed a fiddle, tooted a French horn, thumped the drum under the baton of a woman.

Montclair, N.J.
Times
JAN 25 1938

Boston Symphony Gives Concert Here on Feb. 9

Outstanding Musical Ensemble Sponsored by Unity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in the Montclair High School auditorium on Wednesday evening, Feb. 9, at 8:30 o'clock as the extra event in the 1937-1938 Unity Concert Course series. Tickets for this concert, which is not included on a season ticket, are now available at Unity Institute office, 67 Church Street.

This appearance of the famous orchestra will be its first in Montclair for seven years and it is expected that the auditorium will be crowded to capacity. Earlier appearances this season have won for the orchestra and for its conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, enthusiastic appreciation from both audience and music critics.

Of the latter group, Olin Downes of New York has been unstinting in his prase, writing: "The season's concerts testify equally to the musical excellence of the orchestra and the interpretative powers, which appear constantly greater, of the conductor, Mr. Koussevitzky. No composer and no school of composers seem foreign to his understanding. Classic and ultra-modern composers find in him the intuitive spokesman and propagandist."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1938

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

For friends of modern music there are excellent recordings of Mossolow's "Soviet Iron Foundry," an effective bit of musical realism, and Robert McBride's Fugato on a well known theme by the Boston "Pops" Orchestra under Arthur Fiedler's leadership. Minor Sebeliusiana, the Berceuse from "The Tempest" and the "Valse Triste," have been performed and recorded by the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. Admirers of Eide Norena's singing, among whom I do not number myself, will enjoy her disk versions of the "King of Thule" ballade and "Jewel Song" from Gounod's "Faust." On the disk sent to me of these arias the labels are reversed. Moriz Rosenthal has played the Schubert-Liszt sixth "Soiree de Vienne" with esprit.

Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" in English translation, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, Radcliffe Choral Society and soloists, recorded at a performance in Boston, will be reviewed when the complete recording is available, since it would hardly be just to discuss so important an undertaking after listening only to the first set of disks covering but a portion of the work.

DANVILLE, VA.
REGISTER
FEB 19 1938

Woman Conducts Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the fisrt woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seen-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

GREENSBORO, N. C.
NEWS
FEB 19 1938

Boston Symphony Is Led By Woman

Boston, Feb. 18. —(AP)— An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure.

B. Am. Feb. 25/38

Composer's Aim To Aid Amateurs

Paul Hindemith For Simplified Music

By RUTH MARSTERS

It occurs to us that there is something rather odd in the fact that the most advanced, and incidentally most important, living German composer should occupy himself with writing music expressly for amateurs. But that is precisely what Paul Hindemith is doing.

He is in Boston to play the viola concerto this afternoon and tomorrow evening with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It is his idea that the composer should reach the public in the language that it understands.

This does not mean to Mr. Hindemith that he, as a composer, must forego atonality, neoclassicism, and the rarifed atmosphere of a simplicity which amounts to shorthand as regards the understanding of the uninitiated.

MUST EDUCATE LISTENERS

It simply means that Mr. Hindemith will educate his listeners along his own line of thought.

This he has undertaken to do by the simplest—and most subtle route. And this is where the music for the amateur comes in. He simply reduced his idiom to a state where the beginner can perform upon it.

On the surface this procedure does not appear as startling, to be sure, as most of Mr. Hindemith's musical innovations.

But think. What if your first introduction to the mystery of music making had been to the 12 tone scale. What if you had never known the dearly familiar do-re-mi-fa-sol-la-ti-do or the sonata form where everything can be depended upon to work out quite as expected.

Isn't it quite likely that if you had been brought up with the 12 tone scale you would find the diatonic scale an extraordinary progression—the sonata form just too ancient a vehicle—a perambulator in which every musical thought is coaxed along. (We hope you wouldn't go so far as this. You might miss a great deal. Such as—oh take Mozart for instance or, if you like, Beethoven.)

FAMILIAR BASS

But the point is that you would probably see what they did in a light of discovery whereas Hindemith, Stravinsky, and their ilk would be reduced in your thought to the most familiar basis.

Hindemith didn't say all this. He is, as a matter of fact, extremely reticent in vouchsafing any remarks concerning himself or his music.

Right now he is concerned with music in Turkey and a new ballet for the Russain Ballet Company under Massine* He is the director of the Turkish music education system under the new regime.

The ballet "Nobilissima Visione" will be given its first performance in April in Monte Carlo with Massine in the leading role. Hindemith will conduct.

PIONEER IN MUSIC

As a composer he has written operas, oratorios, orchestral and chamber music, besides smaller works for solo instruments. He has resuscitated ancient instruments for the performance of works dating from the 13th century. He is a viola virtuoso and founded the very famous Amar String Quartet.

It will take a lot of time—at least another generation to evaluate the importance of what Hindemith has already done. This much we know: He hras been a pioneer in contemporary music advancement; a force which stands companioned with Stravinsky in revitalizing an art which when the twentieth century found it, had all but forgotten Bach in the delirium of romanticism.

A craftsman par example, a master of counterpoint, Hindemith's peculiar idiom might, because of its formality of design, be termed cerebral except for the strong rhythmic impulse which pervades and vitalizes al he does, the mysticism latent in the early string quartets which has to give way before a humanistic tendency. And what next—there is only a question mark.

Genius

Old Instruments His Hobby

Boston Evening American Photo

Paul Hindemith, German composer and musician, who appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon and tomorrow night, is keenly interested in musical instruments and here he is shown with an old viola. He will play a viola concerto with the Symphony Orchestra.

COURIER

FEB 9 - 1938

About Women

The first woman grand jury commissioner in the United States is Mrs. Andrew J. Steelman, who has been active in the New Jersey League of Women Voters.

Nadid Boulanger, who conducted a concert of the Royal Philharmonic Society of London, was the first woman in 124 years to have that honor. She will conduct the Boston Symphony or-

---

Hindemith Delights As Symphony Soloist

B. Am. By RUTH MARSTERS Feb. 26/38

In a manner as engaging as it was unpretentious, Paul Hindemith came upon the stage of Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon to appear for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program devoted to Hindemith and Brahms.

The audience's recognition of his imposing status in present day music was accepted with general nonchalance by the composer-soloist who, with no more than the necessary delay proceeded to play the viola part in his Kammermusik No. 5 for Viola and Chamber Orchestra.

Mr. Hindemith's interest in the viola, and in its predecessor, the viole d'amour has had some fascinating results—none more so than this work of his early period.

If it is true that as a composer he has made exorbitant demands on an instrument certainly not thought of as one of the most brilliant, it is also true that as a virtuoso he wrested the last vestige of its tonal capacities from its delicate frame.

The Kammermusik follows the conventional pattern of four movements but is scored for a most unconventional assortment of instruments — 'celli, basses, and strings.

Much of its texture is fragile stuff—all of it is written with exquisite economy. Rhythmns are incisive and often the tempi are incredibly fleet.

The last movement is a deftly wrought series of variations on a march-theme.

Dr. Koussevitzky mustered the orchestra in brilliant support.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments, with which Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program, was composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and was performed by it both in 1931 and 1932.

It was given a magnificent performance on this occasion—the brilliancy and solidity of the brass choir proving a perfect foil for the warm and rich beauty of the strings in sustained melodic passages

Neither can one forget the performance given Brahms' glowing rhapsodic outburst known as the Second Symphony. But Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra are forever adding new laurels to their already luxuriant store. In order to be factual in reports of their joint music-making from week to week it is necessary to be constantly repetitious on the subject of their combined excellence

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

FEB 17 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTOR SCOLDS ORCHESTRA

Boston, Feb. 16—Mlle Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history last night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston [redacted] orchestra in its 57-year history.

"This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

SYMPHONY PRESENTS HINDEMITH

B. — Post

Composer Plays Own Viola Concerto With Orchestra

Feb. — 26/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the long list of notable composers who have appeared at the Symphony concerts as conductors or performers of their own music—or perchance as both—may now be added the name of Paul Hindemith, who yesterday played under these auspices the solo part in his Kammermusik, No. 5, for viola and chamber orchestra. Mr. Hindemith's Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments began the concert and the Second Symphony of Brahms brought its close.

BANNED BY NAZI

Aside from his prominence as a composer, his virtually undisputed place as the foremost living German music-maker after Strauss, Paul Hindemith, now in his 43d year, is also an interesting figure by reason of the ban placed by the Nazi upon his music and even upon his own public appearances as soloist. Mr. Hindemith happens to be a German of the Germans, but the Reich Musikkammer—Bureau of Music, we should call it—frowns upon musical radicalism. In its opinion the music of Hindemith, which other countries have accepted and praised, is not fit for German consumption.

As originally announced, Dr. Koussevitzky's list of yesterday and this evening joined to the two compositions of Hindemith the Fourth Symphony of Beethoven.

Brahms Gratefully Received

The switch to Brahms, whatever prompted it, was judiciously made. After the severities of Hindemith's music, with its insistence upon line rather than upon color, its lack of warmth and sensuous appeal, as these things are commonly understood, the music of Brahms probably fell gratefully upon many ears. There is, however, a certain irony in the circumstance that the symphonies of Brahms were themselves, once adjudged dry and intellectual, barren of emotional substance. John F. Runciman was quite certain that no one ever received any genuine pleasure from any of them.

Of the two pieces by Hindemith, one was being played for the third time here, the other for the first. Composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary season, this "concert music" proved one of the very best of the several pieces so commissioned from eminent hands, European and American.

Is Absolute Music

In it, as in all of Hindemith's music, there is vigor and momentum and freely dissonant counterpoint. There is also in the slow division, for those that have ear to hear it, broad and moving melody. Here is a modern successor and by no means unworthy one, to the Brandenburg Concertos of Bach, a piece as self-contained as they and a sufficient proof that the writing of absolute music is by no means a lost art.

The applause which followed the masterly performance of this masterly work brought the composer to the stage. Short of stature and quite bald, Mr. Hindemith much resembles Mischa Elman, the violinist. Moreover, in playing, and he plays exceedingly well, he has the same trick of constantly shifting his weight from one foot to the other. Mr. Burk's programme notes contained the following tribute from Ernest Newman: "Our audiences cannot help being prepossessed in favor of this modest and sensible artist who, without any fuss or any pose, always settles down to the plain business of playing chamber music solely for the music's sake. The Viola Concerto is quite an engaging little work."

Skilfully Scored

Although less imposing than the "Konzertmusik," this Viola Concerto, as Mr. Newman choses to call it, is by no means a piece to be lightly dismissed. The scoring for a small and curiously assembled group of instruments is skilful to a degree. The final variations on a military march, are most diverting, and throughout the four movements there is evidence of an inventive fertility that is something quite different from mere fluency.

Mr. Hindemith is prolific, of course, as were Bach and Mozart before him, but it is probably a bit unkind to call him, as did Ernest Newman, "the Hindemith Music Factory Unlimited!"

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Feb. 26/38

The 17th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon [illegible] Symphony Hall. Paul Hindemith, composer and viola player, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Hindemith
Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments Op. 50
Hindemith
Kammermusik No. 5 for viola and chamber orchestra Op. 36 No. 4
Brahms
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 75

Yesterday's concert saw a prodigious amount of barking up the wrong tree on the part of, say for argument, a good half of the audience. It is the old business of taking a dislike to something because it is not something else. Hindemith is not Strauss or Sibelius, Rachmaninoff or Ravel; and therefore—so said the expression on many in the audience—there is no health in him.

Now, the process of listening to Hindemith's music is not that demanded by any of the composers, we have carefully and alliteratively selected above. If we look for harmonic delights, for lyrical melody, for rich polyphony on a firm tonal basis, we are going to be disappointed and shall depart cursing Hindemith and all his works. If, on the other hand, we listen for line, for wealth and elaboration of counterpoint, for a shrewd sense of form and balance, we shall come away refreshed and exhilirated.

Hindemith is one of the few vigorous and invigorating influences in modern music. He is a master of counterpoint; and it is just as difficult to write good dissonant counterpoint, as he does, as it is to compose a fugue that would have satisfied Ebenezer Prout in every last detail. Hindemith is a prolific composer and has also achieved a wide degree of variety. To us he is almost invariably fascinating, though palpably there are plenty who manage to steel themselves against his charms!

The works at yesterday's concert illustrate that Hindemith is not confined to one style; and the "Mathis der Maler" Symphony has proved it, too. Philip Hale regarded the Konzertmusik for strings and brass as one of the most interesting contributions to the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony. It is a work that arouses a sense of power and solid splendor, one that celebrates an intellectual, not an emotional, glory. The concluding fugue, with its quiet middle section, is an exciting piece of workmanship. The brass and string choirs of the orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky, gave it an admirable performance.

It is possible that the Kammermusik for viola and chamber orchestra would have sounded better in a smaller hall and before a more intimate gathering. So many of the audience had clearly been put out by the first work that they were unprepared or unwilling to listen to the ingenuity of this piece. The first movement is uncompromising with its ceaseless activity of the viola part and the fleeting restlessness of the orchestra. The slow movement gives a spare and mournful effect as contrast to the athletic beginning. The third movement, a scherzo, throws together the merest scraps of melody and phrase and then weaves them together with extraordinary skill and neatness. The finale is vastly entertaining and should have been readily appreciated.

Mr. Hindemith played the viola in this with workmanlike dispatch and wasted no time on inessentials of showmanship. It was playing, whatever the homeliness of the tone, that seemed to suit the music. The accompaniment, of the greatest difficulty and requiring absolute precision, was superbly handled by the various instrumentalists and co-ordinated by Dr. Koussevitzky. Those in the audience, who were impressed, gave Mr. Hindemith a cordial reception.

For the others there was balm in the Brahms Second Symphony after the intermission. Dr. Koussevitzky had originally scheduled Beethoven's Fourth, and we believe that his first choice was wiser. For us the Brahms was too different in spirit, and it was with difficulty that we could reorient ourselves to its conception of beauty. That it was well played and generally appreciated goes without saying.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 23 1938

Music Notes

Serge Koussevitzky's Program for the next [redacted] of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, on Thursday night, March 10, will consist of Gustav Mahler's fifth symphony, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol." In this orchestra's Carnegie Hall concert on Saturday afternoon, March 12, Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct Malipiero's second symphony, Saint-Saens's third symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice.

180

B. Globe - Feb 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paul Hindemith, the eminent German composer of the 12-tone faith, appeared for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in his "Kammermusik No. 5." The program began with another work of Hindemith, the "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, composed for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season and first played here in April, 1931. Dr. Koussevitzky ended the concert with Brahms' radiant Second Symphony.

The "Kammermusik No. 5," new to Boston, is actually a species of concerto for viola and a chamber orchestra composed of a small number of woodwinds and brass, and four each of cellos and double-basses. It is the last in the series of works to which Hindemith gave the title "Kammermusik" ("Chamber music"), and was published in 1927. Set in four movements, the second of which is slow and expressive, and the fourth a heavy-footed bit of musical humor based upon the banal characteristics of the military march, the work represents to one listener the lesser Hindemith.

This composer has a fine and adventurous mind, and some of his music, notably the symphonic compositions, is warming to the heart as well as interesting for its unusual contrasts of timbre and its harmonic novelties. The "Mathis der Maler" suite, for example, is first-rate work, and so is much of the "Konzertmusik" for brass and strings. These boast characteristic Teutonic solidity and depth of feeling. But while the technical details of "Kammermusik No. 5" may appeal to the intellect of professional musicians, in performance the music is dry and unpleasant, tracing in tonal acidities a sequence of austere patterns.

Mr. Hindemith was politely applauded by the Friday audience for his playing of the solo viola part. Yet it seemed that his "Konzertmusik" captured more of popular favor.

Dr. Koussevitzky's fervid reading of Brahms' D major Symphony was, despite a lack of finesse in some details, one to bring out the emotional rapture, the sunlit warmth and the melodic beauty which abound from the first notes to the last. Music and performance provided a superb ending to the concert.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will play again the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which the conductor revived just last Fall. The program will otherwise consist of Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the "Spanish Caprice" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

C. W. D.

Advocate Feb 25

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boulanger Upholds Nineteenth Amendment — Tcherepnine Upholds Self — Police Storm Jordan Hall

We must confess to an innocent little deception. Nadia Boulanger did not actually address her Symphony audience with impassioned utterances concerning the general desirability of the woman's right to vote: nor did Alexandre Tcherepnine do a hand-stand on the platform: nor, we might mention in passing, did the vice squad really batter down the doors of Jordan Hall. But in these days of frenzied musical publicity we feel we cannot run the risk of being thought outmoded. After all, who are we to run counter to the example so worthily set forth by musical "greats". Our only regret is that we too have not a lost concerto to discover for our manager and the box-office.

All joking (if you will allow the term) aside, Boulanger's performance was of the utmost interest and importance to American music. For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman directed its forces from the podium, moreover, we believe this to be the first time a woman has conducted a major symphony orchestra in the United States. It was the hope of the proponents of the nineteenth amendment that women would gradually take their rightful place in the modern world. The actual right to vote was considered only a stepping-stone to full equality in every phase of the world's activities. While this state of affairs may be partially realized in business and some of the professions, it is notorious that in music we are still largely back in the days of 1850. Why, for instance, should any discrimination be shown against the employment of women in the more important orchestras? Quite apart from the quality of Miss Boulanger's conducting, the fact that a woman has at last broken through the wall is extremely encouraging to those who are opposed to discrimination in any form for any reason whatsoever.

Regarding Nadia Boulanger herself, she is known to be an extraordinarily talented musician. This is not the time, perhaps, to discuss her abilities as conductor nor need we dwell overlong on her enthusiasms for this composer or that. Every person is entitled to his or her idiosyncracies. The program included the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, with Miss Boulanger playing the organ part, and the Faure Requiem, in a first performance by the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Saint-Saens exceedingly well, the orchestra extended itself to the utmost, the Bach Cantata Club again proved itself to be an excellently trained chorus and the solo singers were adequate.

We were very sorry to have

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

FEB 19 1938

PRAISE WOMAN CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, Feb. 19.(UP)—Music critics today praised the performance of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, France, as the first woman ever to conduct the 57-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mille. Boulanger directed the 110-piece orchestra in its first rendition of the appealing but simple "requiem" of her onetime teacher Gabriel Faure. Then, amid prolonged applause of the audience of 2,700, she kissed conductor Serge Koussevitzky, his wife, and several of the musicians.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 18 1938

Premiere of Concerto By Tansman Listed For Weekend Concert

Ida Krehm Plays Opus With Orchestra; Ormandy Chooses Handel

A program which introduces a piano Concerto by Alexander Tansman with Ida Krehm, winner of the Schubert Memorial Award making her debut as soloist, and the revival of the "Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss which was played here last in 1921, is announced by Eugene Ormandy for the nineteenth pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon, February 25, and Saturday evening, February 26. The opening number will be the six-part Suite from the "Water Music" composed by George Frideric Handel for a royal celebration on the Thames in 1715 or 1717.

Alexander Tansman was born in 1897 in Lodz, Poland, where he received his first musical training and began composing at the age of nine. When he was 22 he won the Grand Prix de Pologne, and a year later took up his residence in Paris where he became identified with the French musical modernists.

In the course of his concert tours, Tansman visited the United States in 1927-28, appearing in New York as soloist with the Boston Symphony on January 5, 1928, in a performance of his second concerto. This work was composed in 1927 and is dedicated to Charlie Chaplin. Tansman has authorized this exposition of the Second Concerto, which, he says, is "conceived in the classic mold with some modifications in the development construction."

"The first part is cast in sonata form," according to the authorized note. "The second is in lied form, and the third in rondo form. The piano is treated as a concerted instrument, its characteristic timbre being utilized occasionally as an orchestral color. As in all the composer's recent works, the concerto is marked by a pronounced lyricism; elements of Polish folk-music play an important part, particularly in the scherzo."

A vivacious and rhythmic theme opens the first movement; the scherzo is a kind of perpetuum mobile in which the orchestra weaves light designs against a ground of piano arabesques. The trio is in the form of a slow mazurka, the theme of which is voiced by the oboe. The Lento opens with a berceuse, and the movement ends pianissimo, passing directly into the finale.

Tansman's "Symphonic Overture" was given a premiere with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concerts of April 12 and 13, 1929, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. Among his other compositions for orchestra are "Promethee," "Impressions," "Elans," "Intermezzo Sinfonico," "Scherzo," "Symphonique," "Legende," "Sinfonietta." He has written music for a ballet, "Le Jardin du Paradis" (after Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale) and for Aristophanes' "Lysistrata."

His Concerto for Piano, No. 1, written in 1925, was produced first at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris the year following. The American premiere of the Concerto on the present program was at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in 1928.

Smaller compositions include instrumental suites, chamber music and numerous works for piano.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

FEB 19 1938

Distinguished Visitor

A FRENCHWOMAN who is so eminent a musician that traditions have been broken right and left, and precedents proudly established for her will spend a day or two in early April as guest of the music department of Ohio State University. She is Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, conductor, teacher, lecturer—a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, head of the Department of Music of the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau.

As for the shattered precedents, Mlle. Boulanger is this week-end conducting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first woman ever to do so. There is precedent for that, however, for last November she was the first woman in 136 years of its history to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society of London. She is teaching at Radcliffe College during this half-year, and special dispensation has been granted Harvard students to attend her classes, it being thought a lesser evil to have men enroll in a woman's college than to have a woman professor on the Harvard faculty.

Mlle. Boulanger is presenting, in a series of four broadcasts over Columbia's network (including WCOL), examples of choral music from the 16th century to the present. The programs are scheduled on Saturday mornings from 10:30 to 11, and the second was given this morning. Participants are a group of singers whom she brought with her from Paris.

She has accepted the invitation of Dr. Royal Hughes, chairman of the music school at Ohio State, to come here on April 6 and 7. On the evening of the latter date she will lecture and conduct a choral concert in the University Hall auditorium. The University Chorus is being prepared by Professor Louis Diercks for the occasion.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 19 1938

Toscanini and Freedom

Arturo Toscanini, the world's pre-eminent symphonic conductor, believes to the depths of his soul that art is universal and should not be subjected to political dictatorship. When Hitler came to power in Germany and banned the playing of music composed by Jews and drove the Jewish instrumentalists out of German orchestras, Toscanini made a simple announcement that he could no longer accept invitations to conduct at the Bayreuth Wagnerian festivals held every summer in Bavaria. Instead he accepted the invitations of the Salzburg Festival in Austria to conduct orchestras and operas in a country where there still was racial equality and where art was considered to transcend national frontiers and the shape of one's nose. Since that day the Salzburg Festival has eclipsed the Bayreuth Festival in prestige and popularity. The public's predilection for hero-worship saw to that.

Now it appears that Austria has been forced to join the so-called axis of the totalitarian states. Fears are expressed that Aryan fanaticism soon will permeate the docile and easy-going nation of Austria, that the blight of racial hatred and flaming nationalism under the Nazis will soon settle over the Danubian country.

Yesterday in New York, in the same quiet manner, Toscanini announced that because of "unsettled conditions" he would not conduct at the Salzburg Festival this summer.

The receipts of a Toscanini-conducted benefit soon to be held at Carnegie Hall, originally earmarked for the Salzburg Festival, will be diverted to other musical causes.

Believers in the freedom of the arts under democracy hail this great and noble gesture. It bespeaks a great and magnificent spirit. But why must Toscanini stop here? Why should he not accept an invitation by Koussevitzky to take his baton this summer as the guest conductor of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra to lead one of the concerts at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. He would be furthering a festival in a democratic country. It would be an eloquent commentary in the pages of artistic freedom.

Hindemith With Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

[illegible]

APPEARING for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts this week-end, Paul Hindemith carried away a rich share of the honors in a program memorable for music making of the first water.

In the works of Hindemith to which Dr. Koussevitzky devoted the first half of the program, and in the Brahms Second Symphony which followed, the several choirs of the orchestra found rare opportunities of displaying their prowess both independently and in the more customary orchestral ensemble.

It is perhaps sufficient to say that everyone appeared at his best—including Dr. Koussevitzky whom we herewith crown "Hindemith expert" just in case nobody has happened to before. (Though in designating Dr. Koussevitzky as an "expert" in the music of practically anybody you can name in the entire repertoire, it does seem a little far fetched to assume that those before us have left the name of Hindemith out.)

* * *

But of Hindemith himself, whom we are not so fortunate in having always with us.

The many faceted genius of the foremost contemporary German composer could only be partially represented in a single program. But there was enough of his personality revealed to remind us of the amazing influence he has exerted on the creative efforts of his time.

The Kammermusick No. 5 for Viola and Chamber Orchestra, in which Mr. Hindemith appeared as soloist, is an early work. Of delicate fabric, it is [illegible] all too brief [illegible]e, the second [illegible]ein of mysticism which pervades the string quartets of the same period. The scherzo is a delightful bit which goes tripping daintily along on its toes at an airy rate of speed The last movement is in the form of a march and variations.

The whole is marked by the deftness and lightness of touch of a master craftsman, and the rhythmic vitality which are always his. In the scoring, which calls for winds, 'celli and basses, is evidenced his early love of experimentation.

As a soloist Mr. Hindemith necessarily distinguished himself. It is remembered that it was as a violinist, later as a viola virtuoso, that Hindemith made his debut before the musical world.

It is also remembered that he was the founder and violist of the celebrated Amar String Quartet, disbanded in recent years because of too pressing duties elsewhere.

* * *

THE AUDIENCE was most enthusiast at Mr. Hindemith's appearance. There is, in his personality, not a vestige of pose, either as a concert artist or as a composer. He appeared as much at home on the stage of Symphony Hall as in the twelve-tone scale, and much less formal.

From the Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments of Hindemith, which opened the program to the Brahms Second Symphony, which brought it to its close, was a broad leap.

However, as has already been intimated, each was brilliantly performed, each occupies in its own sphere a position of sterling worth, and each was enjoyed to the utmost.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

FEB 20 1938

Varied Musical Events

The Philadelphia Phonographic Society announces Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, and assisting artists, in three concerts on March 7, March 21 and April 4, at 1522 Waverly st.

Nelson Eddy, baritone, will give a recital at the Academy of Music on March 17.

MUSIC STUDIO NOTES

The Settlement Music School announces a student recital this afternoon at 3.30. The public is invited.

Leo Ornstein will give the second of 15 lectures entitled "A Critical and Historical Survey of Music" to-

---

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

[illegible]

WOMAN WAVES BATON

Mlle. Boulanger first to conduct orchestra in public

Boston, Mass., Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of The Requiem, a composition by her former teacher, Gabiel Faure. During the first half of the progam, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenches, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

(180)

B. Globe - Feb 24

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paul Hindemith, the eminent German composer of the 12-tone faith, appeared for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in his "Kammermusik No. 5." The program began with another work of Hindemith, the "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, composed for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season and first played here in April, 1931. Dr. Koussevitzky ended the concert with Brahms' radiant Second Symphony.

The "Kammermusik No. 5," new to Boston, is actually a species of concerto for viola and a chamber orchestra composed of a small number of woodwinds and brass, and four each of cellos and double-basses. It is the last in the series of works to which Hindemith gave the title "Kammermusik" ("Chamber music"), and was published in 1927. Set in four movements, the second of which is slow and expressive, and the fourth a heavy-footed bit of musical humor based upon the banal characteristics of the military march, the work represents to one listener the lesser Hindemith.

This composer has a fine and adventurous mind, and some of his music, notably the symphonic compositions, is warming to the heart as well as interesting for its unusual contrasts of timbre and its harmonic novelties. The "Mathis der Maler" suite, for example, is first-rate work, and so is much of the "Konzertmusik" for brass and strings. These boast characteristic Teutonic solidity and depth of feeling. But while the technical details of "Kammermusik No. 5" may appeal to the intellect of professional musicians, in performance the music is dry and unpleasant, tracing in tonal acidities a sequence of austere patterns.

Mr. Hindemith was politely applauded by the Friday audience for his playing of the solo viola part. Yet it seemed that his "Konzertmusik" captured more of popular favor.

Dr. Koussevitzky's fervid reading of Brahms' D major Symphony was, despite a lack of finesse in some details, one to bring out the emotional rapture, the sunlit warmth and the melodic beauty which abound from the first notes to the last. Music and performance provided a superb ending to the concert.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will play again the Fifth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, which the conductor revived just last Fall. The program will otherwise consist of Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals," and the "Spanish Caprice" by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

C. W. D.

Hindemith With Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

APPEARING for the first time as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts this week-end, Paul Hindemith carried away a rich share of the honors in a program memorable for music making of the first water.

In the works of Hindemith to which Dr. Koussevitzky devoted the first half of the program, and in the Brahms Second Symphony which followed, the several choirs of the orchestra found rare opportunities of displaying their prowess both independently and in the more customary orchestral ensemble.

It is perhaps sufficient to say that everyone appeared at his best—including Dr. Koussevitzky whom we herewith crown "Hindemith expert" just in case nobody has happened to before. (Though in designating Dr. Koussevitzky as an "expert" in the music of practically anybody you can name in the entire repertoire, it does seem a little far fetched to assume that those before us have left the name of Hindemith out.)

* * *

But of Hindemith himself, whom we are not so fortunate in having always with us.

The many faceted genius of the foremost contemporary German composer could only be partially represented in a single program. But there was enough of his personality revealed to remind us of the amazing influence he has exerted on the creative efforts of his time.

The Kammermusick No. 5 for Viola and Chamber Orchestra, in which Mr. Hindemith appeared as soloist, is an early work. Of delicate fabric, it is written in four all too brief movements. Of these, the second reveals the same vein of mysticism which pervades the string quartets of the same period. The scherzo is a delightful bit which goes tripping daintily along on its toes at an airy rate of speed. The last movement is in the form of a march and variations.

The whole is marked by the deftness and lightness of touch of a master craftsman, and the rhythmic vitality which are always his. In the scoring, which calls for winds, 'celli and basses, is evidenced his early love of experimentation.

As a soloist Mr. Hindemith necessarily distinguished himself. It is remembered that it was as a violinist, later as a viola virtuoso, that Hindemith made his debut before the musical world.

It is also remembered that he was the founder and violist of the celebrated Amar String Quartet, disbanded in recent years because of too pressing duties elsewhere.

* * *

THE AUDIENCE was most enthusiast at Mr. Hindemith's appearance. There is, in his personality, not a vestige of pose, either as a concert artist or as a composer. He appeared as much at home on the stage of Symphony Hall as in the twelve-tone scale, and much less formal.

From the Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments of Hindemith, which opened the program to the Brahms Second Symphony, which brought it to its close, was a broad leap.

However, as has already been intimated, each was brilliantly performed, each occupies in its own sphere a position of sterling worth, and each was enjoyed to the utmost.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

FEB 20 1938

Varies Music

The Philadelphia Phonographic Society announces Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, and assisting artists, in three concerts on March 7, March 21 and April 4, at 1522 Waverly st.

Nelson Eddy, baritone, will give a recital at the Academy of Music on March 17.

MUSIC STUDIO NOTES

The Settlement Music School announces a student recital this afternoon at 3.30. The public is invited.

Leo Ornstein will give the second of 15 lectures entitled "A Critical and Historical Survey of Music" to-

---

Advocate Feb 25

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boulanger Upholds Nineteenth Amendment — Tcherepnine Upholds Self — Police Storm Jordan Hall

We must confess to an innocent little deception. Nadia Boulanger did not actually address her Symphony audience with impassioned utterances concerning the general desirability of the woman's right to vote: nor did Alexandre Tcherepnine do a hand-stand on the platform: nor, we might mention in passing, did the vice squad really batter down the doors of Jordan Hall. But in these days of frenzied musical publicity we feel we cannot run the risk of being thought outmoded. After all, who are we to run counter to the example so worthily set forth by musical "greats". Our only regret is that we too have not a lost concerto to discover for our manager and the box-office.

All joking (if you will allow the term) aside, Boulanger's performance was of the utmost interest and importance to American music. For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a woman directed its forces from the podium, moreover, we believe this to be the first time a woman has conducted a major symphony orchestra in the United States. It was the hope of the proponents of the nineteenth amendment that women would gradually take their rightful place in the modern world. The actual right to vote was considered only a stepping-stone to full equality in every phase of the world's activities. While this state of affairs may be partially realized in business and some of the professions, it is notorious that in music we are still largely back in the days of 1850. Why, for instance, should any discrimination be shown against the employment of women in the more important orchestras? Quite apart from the quality of Miss Boulanger's conducting, the fact that a woman has at last broken through the wall is extremely encouraging to those who are opposed to discrimination in any form for any reason whatsoever.

Regarding Nadia Boulanger herself, she is known to be an extraordinarily talented musician. This is not the time, perhaps, to discuss her abilities as conductor nor need we dwell overlong on her enthusiasms for this composer or that. Every person is entitled to his or her idiosyncracies. The program included the Saint-Saens Symphony in C minor, with Miss Boulanger playing the organ part, and the Faure Requiem, in a first performance by the Boston Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the Saint-Saens exceedingly well, the orchestra extended itself to the utmost, the Bach Cantata Club again proved itself to be an excellently trained chorus and the solo singers were adequate.

We were very sorry to have

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

FEB 19 1938

PRAISE WOMAN CONDUCTOR

BOSTON, Feb. 19.(UP)—Music critics today praised the performance of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris, France, as the first woman ever to conduct the 57-year-old Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mlle. Boulanger directed the 110-piece orchestra in its first rendition of the appealing but simple "requiem" of her onetime teacher Gabriel Faure. Then, amid prolonged applause of the audience of 2,700, she kissed conductor Serge Koussevitzky, his wife, and several of the musicians.

CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER

FEB 18 1938

Premiere of Concerto By Tansman Listed For Weekend Concert

Ida Krehm Plays Opus With Orchestra; Ormandy Chooses Handel

A program which introduces a piano Concerto by Alexander Tansman with Ida Krehm, winner of the Schubert Memorial Award making her debut as soloist, and the revival of the "Symphonia Domestica" by Richard Strauss which was played here last in 1921, is announced by Eugene Ormandy for the nineteenth pair of concerts by the Philadelphia Orchestra on Friday afternoon, February 25, and Saturday evening, February 26. The opening number will be the six-part Suite from the "Water Music" composed by George Frideric Handel for a royal celebration on the Thames in 1715 or 1717.

Alexander Tansman was born in 1897 in Lodz, Poland, where he received his first musical training and began composing at the age of nine. When he was 22 he won the Grand Prix de Pologne, and a year later took up his residence in Paris where he became identified with the French musical modernists.

In the course of his concert tours, Tansman visited the United States in 1927-28, appearing in New York as soloist with the Boston Symphony on January 5, 1928, in a performance of his second concerto. This work was composed in 1927 and is dedicated to Charlie Chaplin. Tansman has authorized this exposition of the Second Concerto, which, he says, is "conceived in the classic mold with some modifications in the development construction."

"The first part is cast in sonata form," according to the authorized note. "The second is in lied form, and the third in rondo form. The piano is treated as a concerted instrument, its characteristic timbre being utilized occasionally as an orchestral color. As in all the composer's recent works, the concerto is marked by a pronounced lyricism; elements of Polish folk-music play an important part, particularly in the scherzo."

A vivacious and rhythmic theme opens the first movement; the scherzo is a kind of perpetuum mobile in which the orchestra weaves light designs against a ground of piano arabesques. The trio is in the form of a slow mazurka, the theme of which is voiced by the oboe. The Lento opens with a berceuse, and the movement ends pianissimo, passing directly into the finale.

Tansman's "Symphonic Overture" was given a premiere with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concerts of April 12 and 13, 1929, with Leopold Stokowski conducting. Among his other compositions for orchestra are "Promethee," "Impressions," "Elans," "Intermezzo Sinfonico," "Scherzo," "Symphonique," "Legende," "Sinfonietta." He has written music for a ballet, "Le Jardin du Paradis" (after Hans Christian Andersen's fairy tale) and for Aristophanes' "Lysistrata."

His Concerto for Piano, No. 1, written in 1925, was produced first at a Koussevitzky concert in Paris the year following. The American premiere of the Concerto on the present program was at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert in 1928.

Smaller compositions include instrumental suites, chamber music and numerous works for piano.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
COURIER EXPRESS

1938

WOMAN WAVES BATON

Mlle. Boulanger first to conduct orchestra in public

Boston, Mass., Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of The Requiem, a composition by her former teacher, Gabiel Faure. During the first half of the progam, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

NORWICH, CONN.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenches, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN

FEB 19 1938

Distinguished Visitor

A FRENCHWOMAN who is so eminent a musician that traditions have been broken right and left, and precedents proudly established for her will spend a day or two in early April as guest of the music department of Ohio State University. She is Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, conductor, teacher, lecturer—a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, head of the Department of Music of the Ecole Normale de Paris and Professor of Harmony at the American Academy at Fontainebleau.

As for the shattered precedents, Mlle. Boulanger is this week-end conducting the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first woman ever to do so. There is precedent for that, however, for last November she was the first woman in 136 years of its history to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society of London. She is teaching at Radcliffe College during this half-year, and special dispensation has been granted Harvard students to attend her classes, it being thought a lesser evil to have men enroll in a woman's college than to have a woman professor on the Harvard faculty.

Mlle. Boulanger is presenting, in a series of four broadcasts over Columbia's network (including WCOL), examples of choral music from the 16th century to the present. The programs are scheduled on Saturday mornings from 10:30 to 11, and the second was given this morning. Participants are a group of singers whom she brought with her from Paris.

She has accepted the invitation of Dr. Royal Hughes, chairman of the music school at Ohio State, to come here on April 6 and 7. On the evening of the latter date she will lecture and conduct a choral concert in the University Hall auditorium. The University Chorus is being prepared by Professor Louis Diercks for the occasion.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

FEB 18 1938

Toscanini and Freedom

Arturo Toscanini, the world's pre-eminent symphonic conductor, believes to the depths of his soul that art is universal and should not be subjected to political dictatorship. When Hitler came to power in Germany and banned the playing of music composed by Jews and drove the Jewish instrumentalists out of German orchestras, Toscanini made a simple announcement that he could no longer accept invitations to conduct at the Bayreuth Wagnerian festivals held every summer in Bavaria. Instead he accepted the invitations of the Salzburg Festival in Austria to conduct orchestras and operas in a country where there still was racial equality and where art was considered to transcend national frontiers and the shape of one's nose. Since that day the Salzburg Festival has eclipsed the Bayreuth Festival in prestige and popularity. The public's predilection for hero-worship saw to that.

Now it appears that Austria has been forced to join the so-called axis of the totalitarian states. Fears are expressed that Aryan fanaticism soon will permeate the docile and easy-going nation of Austria, that the blight of racial hatred and flaming nationalism under the Nazis will soon settle over the Danubian country.

Yesterday in New York, in the same quiet manner, Toscanini announced that because of "unsettled conditions" he would not conduct at the Salzburg Festival this summer.

The receipts of a Toscanini-conducted benefit soon to be held at Carnegie Hall, originally earmarked for the Salzburg Festival, will be diverted to other musical causes.

Believers in the freedom of the arts under democracy hail this great and noble gesture. It bespeaks a great and magnificent spirit. But why must Toscanini stop here? Why should he not accept an invitation by Koussevitzky to take his baton this summer as the guest conductor of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra to lead one of the concerts at the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. He would be furthering a festival in a democratic country. It would be an eloquent commentary in the pages of artistic freedom.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 15 1938

(181)

Woman Who Refused to Teach George Gershwin First of Her Sex to Conduct Boston Symphony

Mme. Nadia Boulanger, Famous French Musician, Is Being Rushed by Harvard Boys Who Want to Enter Her Classes.

BOSTON, Feb. 15.—Smashing tradition is such an old story to Mme. Nadia Boulanger that it has lost its thrill. She has been doing it all her life.

Mme. Boulanger is the fragile little French lady who has just arrived here to become visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe.

Boys from Harvard are standing in line to sign up for her classes, which in itself is an upset. Usually, it's the other way around. Girls from Radcliffe straining at the leash to get into the classes of some famous Harvard don.

To Conduct Boston Symphony.

Before she leaves, she will disintegrate still another old Boston custom, for she will be the first woman guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It's the sort of honor that would send most women musicians straight into seventh heaven, but she is matter-of-fact about it. A Boston reporter asked her how it felt to be the first woman conductor of the famous old orchestra, and she said:

"I've been a woman for a little over fifty years, and have gotten over my initial astonishment.

"As for conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

A Meeting With Gershwin.

Legends have a way of clustering around this gifted little French woman, and she gets a wholesome grin out of reflecting that the most persistent legend simply isn't so.

She did not teach George Gershwin music. She tells the story without emphasis or guile:

"Somebody sent Gershwin to me in Paris, with the idea in mind I could teach him something.

"I talked to him for ten minutes. He didn't bring along any score. Although I wasn't well acquainted with his work, I did recognize that he knew music.

"But I had nothing to offer him. He was already quite well known when he came to my house, and I suggested that he was doing all right and should continue.

"I told him what I could teach him wouldn't help him much along his own road, and he agreed. The interview lasted ten minutes.

No Regrets.

"Never have I regretted the outcome. He died famous, and I haven't the slightest suspicion he regretted it, either. Only a waste of money."

The woman who wouldn't take Gershwin on as a pupil stands around five feet four in her low-heeled shoes. That's only approximate. She has white hair, done into a soft roll piled up on the back of her neck. She has bright, birdlike eyes. Candidly, this interviewer can't say offhand whether they are blue, brown or gray. But they are alert and inquiring.

She wears black shoes and stockings, and, usually, black gowns, which manage to give the impression of a uniform. There's usually a silver chain around her neck, and an old-fashioned sunburst in her black tie.

Wonderful Hands.

Talking to her, you have to watch very closely to observe these things, because you have trouble taking your eyes off her hands. They are the most eloquent hands since Bernhardt's. Swift as swallows, graceful as swans, they express every emotion with a richness and a vigor that makes mere speech seem inadequate.

She can register indifference, indignation, enthusiasm, despair, irritation, without opening her mouth.

Mme. Nadia is refreshing. At heart, she is a music teacher. The kind you used to go to. Remember? Walk up and make yo bow and hope you've got the lesson down pat.

Mme. Nadia Boulanger.

Some of her pupils are quite celebrated. Prof. Walter Piston, for instance. He is the head of the music department at Harvard. He still calls her "Ma'am" and bows from the waist when he calls.

Prefers Teaching.

One gathers from a brief talk that Nadia prefers teaching. She remembers her pupils and follows their careers with an Auntie Caroline interest. A Boston reporter made bold to ask her if she didn't found teaching pretty boring, at times. Probably remembering his own music teacher, and his own reactions when he went to take the inevitable and unescapable piano lesson.

"I have been teaching for thirty-four years," she stated, primly. "If I have been boring myself, I have wasted all that time.

"No. I love teaching. Always there is the possibility you will uncover a genius."

She has uncovered a few, even if she did pass up the job of polishing off Gershwin.

10 Monitor Feb 26

—Boston

THE CHRIS

A Hindemith Fes val in Miniature

The Arts in Boston

Paul Hindemith was honored yesterday by a miniature festival, in two parts, of his music. In the afternoon his Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments and his Kammermusik No. 5, for viola and chamber orchestra (with the composer as soloist), constituted the first half of the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This program, which was completed by the Brahms Second Symphony, will of course be repeated tonight in Symphony Hall. Last evening, with the assistance of Jesús María Sanromá, pianist, Mr. Hindemith played works of his own in Cambridge, under the auspices of the music department of Harvard College.

Much has been written of Hindemith and his music. He has so many sides that it is natural there should be many opinions of him. Here in Boston we have heard a number of his orchestral and chamber works, of which perhaps the "Mathis der Maler" Suite has made the strongest popular impression. We know his operas only by reputation. He is very prolific, and he has written much Gebrauchsmusik and occasional music. An example of the latter is the Konzertmusik which was played yesterday. This was written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra. Heard again yesterday, it confirmed the impression that it was one of the most substantial compositions contributed to that celebration.

The Kammermusik No. 5, which yesterday had its first performance in Boston, is characteristic of several of its composer's facets. The first movement recalls the old story that he gets his rhythmic patterns from the clicking of the wheels of the railway trains on which he has ridden so much in the course of his concert tours. The slow movement reveals him in his neo-Wagnerian, early-Schönbergian, Romantic phase. The third and fourth movements introduce something of the humor which is said to characterize his stage works.

On the whole this concerto did not make as favorable an impression as the "Schwanendreher" Concerto heard last spring. This no doubt was due in part to the fact that the Kammermusik No. 5 depends upon the composer's melodic inspiration, which is not one of his strong points, whereas the "Schwanendreher" is based on folk melodies. Moreover, there are dull moments, repetitious moments, in the second and third movements, and there is a lack of unity in the whole composition. The parts are not clearly related. The last movement, a parody on the military march, is amusing, but does not comport with the other sections.

The Cambridge end of the festival developed into a progressive recital, like one of those dinner parties of some years ago, in which you ate soup at one house, fish at another and so on. The affair began in Sanders Theater, on a platform with lots of chairs but no piano. It was nearly 9 o'clock when Walter Piston announced that the piano was on the way, and that Mr. Hindemith meantime would play his Sonata for viola alone (op. 25, no. 1). He did so in his usual efficient manner, and then Mr. Piston confessed that the piano had not arrived, and invited the audience, or as much of it as could get in, to adjourn through the storm to Paine Hall to listen to the Third Piano Sonata and the Sonata for viola and piano. Many started on the trek. Others, including this reporter, departed for Boston instead.

L. A. S.

PLATTSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN

1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN

FEB 19 1938

Boston Orchestra Led First Time By Woman

Mlle. Boulanger, Noted French Composer-Teacher, Conducts "The Requiem"

Boston, Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public peformance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the fifty-seven-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton and using both hands at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER

Feb. 19/38

WOMAN [illegible]S CONCERT

B 19

Boston Symphony Under the Boulanger Baton

Boston, Feb. 18.—(AP): An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, to-

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1938

WOMAN LEADS SYMPHONY

57-Year-Old Boston Tradition Broken by French Composer

Boston, Feb. 19—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger,

---

Boston Herald, Feb. 25/38 Page 1

Harvard Audience, Artists Trek 300 Yds. in Quest of Concert Piano

"If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the mountain."

There was no piano in Sanders Theater at Harvard for last night's recital by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Paul Hindemith under the auspices of the Division of Music. Mr. Hindemith had brought his viola but naturally Mr. Sanroma had not brought his piano.

The audience of 1000 waited, considerably puzzled, because it was quite evident there was no piano, but the gathering was reassured when a professor stepped to the stage and announced the piano was on the way. In the meantime, Mr. Hindemith would play the viola.

But when the viola selection was finished and the applause had subsided, there was still no piano, and the professor announced he had received definite information the piano was not coming.

entire audience, ecitalists and the their wraps and to Paine Music Hall where there was a piano and where the recital took place.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES

FEB 18 1938

Good Radio Music

By JAMES THRASHER

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger has a busy day ahead tomorrow. She will conduct an NBC-Red network program at 9:30 a. m., and a few hours later will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for the second consecutive day. Her scheduled appearance today to conduct the Boston players in Faure's Requiem was the first time that a woman had presided over the famous group.

On her radio program, Mlle. Boulanger will present four of the six singers she brought with her from France on her present tour in a performance of Brahms' "Liebeslieder" Waltzes, which she will conduct from the piano.

This is almost the original form of the "Liebeslieder," which were written for a quartet of solo voices and two players at one piano, and which usually are heard in a two-piano arrangement.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 16 1938

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history Monday night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 57-year history. "This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST

FEB 19 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mlle. Boulanger, First of Sex To Direct It, Draws Loud Applause.

BOSTON, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
FEB 15 1938

(181)

Woman Who Refused to Teach George Gershwin First of Her Sex to Conduct Boston Symphony

Mme. Nadia Boulanger, Famous French Musician, Is Being Rushed by Harvard Boys Who Want to Enter Her Classes.

Mme. Nadia Boulanger.

BOSTON, Feb. 15.—Smashing tradition is such an old story to Mme. Nadia Boulanger that it has lost its thrill. She has been doing it all her life.

Mme. Boulanger is the fragile little French lady who has just arrived here to become visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe.

Boys from Harvard are standing in line to sign up for her classes, which in itself is an upset. Usually, it's the other way around. Girls from Radcliffe straining at the leash to get into the classes of some famous Harvard don.

To Conduct Boston Symphony.

Before she leaves, she will disintegrate still another old Boston custom, for she will be the first woman guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It's the sort of honor that would send most women musicians straight into seventh heaven, but she is matter-of-fact about it. A Boston reporter asked her how it felt to be the first woman conductor of the famous old orchestra, and she said:

"I've been a woman for a little over fifty years, and have gotten over my initial astonishment.

"As for conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part."

A Meeting With Gershwin.

Legends have a way of clustering around this gifted little French woman, and she gets a wholesome grin out of reflecting that the most persistent legend simply isn't so.

She did not teach George Gershwin music. She tells the story without emphasis or guile:

"Somebody sent Gershwin to me in Paris, with the idea in mind I could teach him something.

"I talked to him for ten minutes. He didn't bring along any score. Although I wasn't well acquainted with his work, I did recognize that he knew music.

"But I had nothing to offer him. He was already quite well known when he came to my house, and I suggested that he was doing all right and should continue.

"I told him what I could teach him wouldn't help him much along his own road, and he agreed. The interview lasted ten minutes.

No Regrets.

"Never have I regretted the outcome. He died famous, and I haven't the slightest suspicion he regretted it, either. Only a waste of money."

The woman who wouldn't take Gershwin on as a pupil stands around five feet four in her low-heeled shoes. That's only approximate. She has white hair, done into a soft roll piled up on the back of her neck. She has bright, birdlike eyes. Candidly, this interviewer can't say offhand whether they are blue, brown or gray. But they are alert and inquiring.

She wears black shoes and stockings, and, usually, black gowns, which manage to give the impression of a uniform. There's usually a silver chain around her neck, and an old-fashioned sunburst in her black tie.

Wonderful Hands.

Talking to her, you have to watch very closely to observe these things, because you have trouble taking your eyes off her hands. They are the most eloquent hands since Bernhardt's. Swift as swallows, graceful as swans, they express every emotion with a richness and a vigor that makes mere speech seem inadequate.

She can register indifference, indignation, enthusiasm, despair, irritation, without opening her mouth.

Mme. Nadia is refreshing. At heart, she is a music teacher. The kind you used to go to. Remember? Walk up and make your bow and hope you've got the lesson down pat.

Some of her pupils are quite celebrated. Prof. Walter Piston, for instance. He is the head of the music department at Harvard. He still calls her "Ma'am" and bows from the waist when he calls.

Prefers Teaching.

One gathers from a brief talk that Nadia prefers teaching. She remembers her pupils and follows their careers with an Auntie Caroline interest. A Boston reporter made bold to ask her if she didn't found teaching pretty boring, at times. Probably remembering his own music teacher, and his own reactions when he went to take the inevitable and unescapable piano lesson.

"I have been teaching for thirty-four years," she stated, primly. "If I have been boring myself, I have wasted all that time.

"No. I love teaching. Always there is the possibility you will uncover a genius."

She has uncovered a few, even if she did pass up the job of polishing off Gershwin.

10 Monitor Feb 26

—Boston

THE CHRIS

A Hindemith Fes val in Miniature

The Arts in Boston

Paul Hindemith was honored yesterday by a miniature festival, in two parts, of his music. In the afternoon his Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments and his Kammermusik No. 5, for viola and chamber orchestra (with the composer as soloist), constituted the first half of the seventeenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This program, which was completed by the Brahms Second Symphony, will of course be repeated tonight in Symphony Hall. Last evening, with the assistance of Jesús María Sanromá, pianist, Mr. Hindemith played works of his own in Cambridge, under the auspices of the music department of Harvard College.

Much has been written of Hindemith and his music. He has so many sides that it is natural there should be many opinions of him. Here in Boston we have heard a number of his orchestral and chamber works, of which perhaps the "Mathis der Maler" Suite has made the strongest popular impression. We know his operas only by reputation. He is very prolific, and he has written much Gebrauchsmusik and occasional music. An example of the latter is the Konzertmusik which was played yesterday. This was written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra. Heard again yesterday, it confirmed the impression that it was one of the most substantial compositions contributed to that celebration.

The Kammermusik No. 5, which yesterday had its first performance in Boston, is characteristic of several of its composer's facets. The first movement recalls the old story that he gets his rhythmic patterns from the clicking of the wheels of the railway trains on which he has ridden so much in the course of his concert tours. The slow movement reveals him in his neo-Wagnerian, early-Schönbergian, Romantic phase. The third and fourth movements introduce something of the humor which is said to characterize his stage works.

On the whole this concerto did not make as favorable an impression as the "Schwanendreher" Concerto heard last spring. This no doubt was due in part to the fact that the Kammermusik No. 5 depends upon the composer's melodic inspiration, which is not one of his strong points, whereas the "Schwanendreher" is based on folk melodies. Moreover, there are dull moments, repetitious moments, in the second and third movements, and there is a lack of unity in the whole composition. The parts are not clearly related. The last movement, a parody on the military march, is amusing, but does not comport with the other sections.

The Cambridge end of the festival developed into a progressive recital, like one of those dinner parties of some years ago, in which you ate soup at one house, fish at another and so on. The affair began in Sanders Theater, on a platform with lots of chairs but no piano. It was nearly 9 o'clock when Walter Piston announced that the piano was on the way, and that Mr. Hindemith meantime would play his Sonata for viola alone (op. 25, no. 1). He did so in his usual efficient manner, and then Mr. Piston confessed that the piano had not arrived, and invited the audience, or as much of it as could get in, to adjourn through the storm to Paine Hall to listen to the Third Piano Sonata and the Sonata for viola and piano. Many started on the trek. Others, including this reporter, departed for Boston instead.

L. A. S.

PLATTSBURG, N. Y.
REPUBLICAN

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MORNING SUN
FEB 19 1938

Boston Orchestra Led First Time By Woman

Mlle. Boulanger, Noted French Composer-Teacher, Conducts "The Requiem"

Boston, Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public peformance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the fifty-seven-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton and using both hands at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

CHARLESTON, S. C.
NEWS-COURIER

Feb. 19/38

FEB 19

WOMAN [illegible]S CONCERT

Boston Symphony Under the Boulanger Baton

Boston, Feb. 18.—(AP): An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, to-

---

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 19 1938

WOMAN LEADS SYMPHONY

57-Year-Old Boston Tradition Broken by French Composer

Boston, Feb. 19—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger,

---

Boston Herald, Feb. 25/38 Page 1

Harvard Audience, Artists Trek 300 Yds. in Quest of Concert Piano

"If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet will go to the mountain."

There was no piano in Sanders Theater at Harvard for last night's recital by Jesus Maria Sanroma and Paul Hindemith under the auspices of the Division of Music. Mr. Hindemith had brought his viola but naturally Mr. Sanroma had not brought his piano.

The audience of 1000 waited, considerably puzzled, because it was quite evident there was no piano, but the gathering was reassured when a professor stepped to the stage and announced the piano was on the way. In the meantime, Mr. Hindemith would play the viola.

But when the viola selection was finished and the applause had subsided, there was still no piano, and the professor announced he had received definite information the piano was not coming.

With that the entire audience, [illegible]ng with the recitalists and the [illegible]essor, put on their wraps and [illegible]ked 300 yards to Paine Music [illegible] where there was a piano and where the recital took place.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
TIMES
FEB 18 1938

Good [illegible]

By JA[illegible]

7 jewels
2975

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger ha[illegible] day ahead tomorrow. She will conduct an NBC-Red network program at 9:30 a. m., and a few hours later will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony for the second consecutive day. Her scheduled appearance today to conduct the Boston players in Faure's Requiem was the first time that a woman had presided over the famous group.

On her radio program, Mlle. Boulanger will present four of the six singers she brought with her from France on her present tour in a performance of Brahms' "Liebeslieder" Waltzes, which she will conduct from the piano.

This is almost the original form of the "Liebeslieder," which were written for a quartet of solo voices and two players at one piano, and which usually are heard in a two-piano arrangement.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
FEB 16 1938

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French conductor, organist and teacher, made musical history Monday night by becoming the first woman to scold the Boston Symphony orchestra in its 57-year history. "This may be boring for some of you more experienced men," she said during a rehearsal of Gabriel Faure's "Requiem," "but please do not take this music for granted. Many of you think the music is too simple, but that is where the difficulty lies."

JAMESTOWN, N. Y.
POST
FEB [illegible] 1938

WOMAN CONDUCTS BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mlle. Boulanger, First of Sex To Direct It, Draws Loud Applause.

BOSTON, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

Trans Feb. 36

182

Nadia Boulanger to Le

Symphony Concert

Paul Hindemith Plays the Viola in a Program Honoring Him and His Works

Paul Hindemith's appearances at the symphony concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening are not to be described as merely two opportunities to hear and see in action an exceptionably able viola soloist, who has, however, not a smack of the conventional virtuoso about him. They are rather occasions for greeting an eminent composer, who, for a decade and a half, must inevitably have been included in any list of the five outstanding contemporary musicians. More recently that list might easily be reduced while still including the noted German, still a relatively young man. (He was forty-two a few months ago.) Whether or not political persecution finally drove Hindemith, like many Germans engaged in the arts, from a country in which his roots were so deep, his coming here has enriched our own artistic life. Hindemith had never been in this country before last year, when he made a semi-private appearance in Boston. Yesterday's concert was therefore for him a Boston public debut.

Hindemith's influence on the contemporary stream of music has been great—too great to be discussed here. His more positive contributions, in the form of his own creative endeavors, have been noteworthy. In assembling the current symphony program Dr. Koussevitzky filled the first half with two of them, the Concert Music for string and brass instruments and the Viola Concerto, which Hindemith describes more accurately as "Chamber Music No. 5 for Viola and Chamber Orchestra." The latter work had not previously been heard in this city.

These two compositions would have established Hindemith's position, if there had been any doubt about it. The first was composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Orchestra, to which it consequently "belongs." Hearing it again in yesterday's exuberant performance one was tempted to place it among the notable music of our day. The composition's rhythmic vitality and energy are characteristic of an age of machines and speed. Yet here is no machine-music, no sedulous imitation of the drone of an airplane motor or the roar of a locomotive. Here is rather the spirit of man in the presence of machines he has wrought, the spirit which made possible the creation of those machines. The tautness of the drive is relieved only temporarily in the middle of the second movement, when the tempo is slow and the mood more contemplative. Then, as though one had fulfilled the required rest period, the robust activity is resumed.

The Viola "Kammermusik" is of a different sort, while still contemporary in feeling. The activity is still incessant, except for a longish slow movement. But it is lighter in substance and in mood. This is a smaller work than the "Konzertmusik," even though its four movements take longer to play than the other's two. It shows another aspect of Hindemith, softer, more playful and more humorous. The viola part is written with extraordinary virtuosity, and weaves its complicated thread almost continuously either alone or against the orchestral voices, which are economically scored. The single line of the solo instrument is most happily employed in parts of the third movement, an ingenious scherzo, and in the finale, which, more frankly humorous, is a sort of parody on a military march.

Hindemith's playing was such as was to be expected from his high reputation as master of his instrument and from his devotion to chamber music, wherein the highest ideals of performance are cultivated. With nothing of the mountebank or showman about him, with no attempt at a merely ingratiating tone, he apparently devoted all his attention to the "simple" business of making music.

The little orchestra under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky seemed to be keeping company with him at every turn, to play as spiritedly, persuasively and brilliantly as a larger group had previously done for the "Konzertmusik" and as the customary band was to do, during the second half of the program, in the Second Symphony of Brahms. That Symphony, substituted during the week for the previously announced and relativiely neglected Fourth Symphony of Beethoven, naturally provoked warmer applause from the matinee than had been accorded the unassuming Hindemith, either at the end of the Viola "Kammermusik" or after the "Konzertmusik," when Dr. Koussevitzky had led him on stage. There will be an ampler if not more friendly greeting, it is to be hoped, this evening.

LEOMINSTER, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

FEB 19 1938

Woman Is Conductor

BOSTON, Feb. 19 (AP)—An inter-ationally known French composer-eacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, yes erday became the first woman eve o conduct the Boston's Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently be ame the first regularly appointed voman lecturer at Radcliffe College ed the 57-year-old orchestra in the resentation of "The Requiem," a omposition by her former teacher abriel Faure. During the first half f the program, she was organ olcist.

Without a baton, and using both ands, at times in a graceful sweeping movement and again with fists lenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orhestra through the seven-part eligious concert in a manner that xcited the spontaneous applause of capacity audience.

The orchestra was assisted by the ach Cantata Club chorus and three olcists, who came here from France ith Mlle. Boulanger. They were isele Peyron, soprano; Hughes uenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad aritone.

Mlle. Boulanger wore a becoming lack gown with a floor-length cirular skirt and a lacy, transparent louse. Her hair was pulled tightly ack from her forehead, over her ars and caught behind in a soft ell.

An organ soloist, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction, Mlle. Bouanger assisted the orchestra in the resentation of Saint-Saens' "C Mi- er Symphony No. 3," or "Organ Symphony."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 19 1938

Festival of American Music to be Given by Federal Music Project.—Emma Beldan in Recital Monday Night.—Nadia Boulanger to Lecture in Alumnae Hall Friday Night

Lecture for Friday

Mlle. Boulanger will lecture in Alumnae Hall on Friday night under the auspices of Brown University and the Alliance Francaise. She will discuss "French Vocal Music, 16th Century and Modern."

The Rhode Island Concert Orchestra's last concert of the festival will be given the same night in Hugh B. Bain junior high school, Cranston.

The program:

At the Court of Kublai Kaan	Emerson Whithorne
Peil Street	Emerson Whithorne
Mountain Song	Lamar Stringfield
Cripple Creek	Lamar Springfield
Appalachian Fantasy	Elna Sherman
Two pieces for Orchestra: 1. Legend. 2. Rhapsode	David Stackhouse
Alley Tunes	David Guion
Canonicus	John B. Archer
Mississippi Suite	Ferdie Grofé
Rhapsody in Blue	George Gershwin

A famous woman musician, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, of Paris, will come here to give a lecture Friday night in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College. Mlle. Boulanger is teaching at Radcliffe this year. She conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon and will conduct it again this evening.

Boston Symphony

Tuesday evening, March 1, will bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra here again, with Raya Garbousova, 'cellist, as soloist.

The program will include the Saint-Saens symphony in C minor, with organ. Albert W. Snow will be organist.

The program:

Symphony in E flat, No. 99 I. Adagio; Vivace assai II. Adagio III. Menuetto (Allegretto) IV. Vivace	Haydn
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello With Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 33	Tchaikovsky
Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Opus 78 I. Adagio. Allegro moderato; Poco adagio II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Mastoso; Allegro	Saint-Saens

The Rhode Island Chapter of the American Guild of Organists will conduct a contest for young organists in April. The preliminaries will be April 9, the finals April 23. Any organist in the State not 26 years of age by April 23 is eligible. The contestants will have to play the E-minor prelude and fugue from Bach's "Eight Short Preludes and Fugues" and any one of the following 10 works:

LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

FEB 19 1938

Music and The Drama

WOMAN LEADS BOSTON SYMPHONY; BIG AUDIENCE ACCLAIMS MLLE. BOULANGER

BOSTON, Feb. 18-(AP)-An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

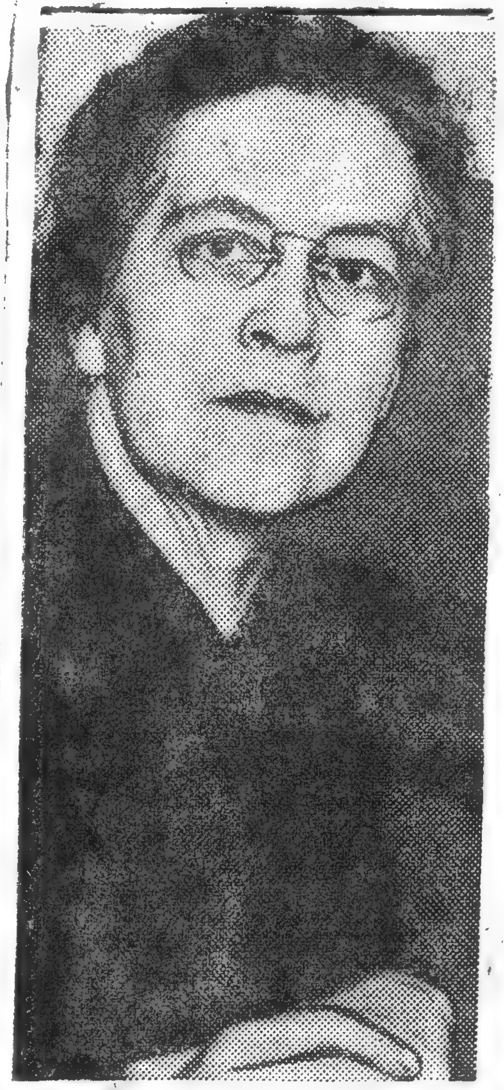
Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem", a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

The orchestra was assisted by the Bach Cantata Club chorus and three soloists, who came here from France with Mlle. Boulanger. They were Gisele Peyron, soprano; Hugues Cuenod, tenor; and Doda Conrad, baritone.

GADSDEN, ALA.
TIMES

FEB 19 1938



WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

CHARLOTTE, N. C.
OBSERVER

1938

NOTED COMPOSER LEADS SYMPHONY

Mlle. Boulanger First Woman Ever to Direct Famous Boston Orchestra.

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, to-

---

GLENS FALLS, N. Y.
TIMES

French Woman First of Her Sex to Lead Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 21 (AP) — An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, has

---

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

FEB 18 1938

Recorded M

The Passion

THE Victor releases for February include the first half of Bach's "Passion of Our Lord according to Saint Matthew"; a second album will be released next month. The recording was made on the afternoon and evening of Good Friday, last year, at an actual performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra, assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, with Jeannette Vreeland, Kathryn Meisle, John Priebe, Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner as the vocal soloists and with Dr. Koussevitzky conducting. The seating arrangement for large forces arranged upon different planes and at divergent distances, offered some technical problems in recording beyond those to be met with even in the recording of operatic performances and have been solved in this release with distinguished success. The ten disks included in the first of three albums are quite clear, the tone is mellow and quiet; there is to be sensed a dignity and a solemnity in the performance quite in accord with the reverent nature of one of the monumental masterpieces of choral and of sacred literature.

* * *

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 19 1938

Woman Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem", a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful, sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part, religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

BANGOR, ME.
NEWS

FEB 19 1938

First Woman to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

BOSTON, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulan-

---

LYNCHBURG, VA.
NEWS

19 1938

Boston Symphony Led By Woman First Time In Public Performance

Boston, Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

FEB 19 1938

Woman for First Time Leads Boston Symphony

Boston, Feb. 18.—(AP.)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, to-

---

AUGUSTA, ME.
KENNEBEC JOURNAL

FEB 19 1938

Woman Composer Leads Symphony

Boston, Feb. 18—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, to-

---

GREENVILLE, S. C.
NEWS

FEB 19 1938

CONDUCTS ORCHESTRA

BOSTON, Feb. 18.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston symphony orchestra in a public performance. Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe college, led the 57-year old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," composition by her former teacher Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program, she was organ soloist.

183

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 19 1938

Boston Symphony Conducted By Woman For First Time

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, French Composer-Teacher, Leads Orchestra in Presentation of "The Requiem"

Boston, Feb. 18.—(AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointed woman lecturer at Radcliffe College, led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," a composition by her former teacher, Gabriel Faure. During the first half of the program she was organ soloist.

Without a baton, and using both hands, at times in a graceful sweeping movement and again with fists clenched, Mlle. Boulanger led the orchestra through the seven-part religious concert in a manner that excited the spontaneous applause of a capacity audience.

The orchestra was assisted by the Bach Cantata Club Chorus and three soloists, who came here from France with Mlle. Boulanger. They were Gisele Peyron, soprano; Hughes Cuenod, tenor, and Doda Conrad, baritone.

Mlle. Boulanger wore a becoming black gown with a floor-length circular skirt and a lacy, transparent blouse. Her hair was pulled tightly back from her forehead, over her ears and caught behind in a soft roll.

As organ soloist, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's direction, Mlle. Boulanger assisted the orchestra in the presentation of Saint-Saens' "C Minor Symphony No. 3," or "Organ Symphony."

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

FEB 19 1938

AROUND NEW ENGLAND

First Woman Conducts Boston Symphony

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (AP)—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woman ever to conduct the Boston's Symphony Orchestra in a public performance.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Hindemith

Symphony Reception Cool but Harvardians Atone

The Nazis have an almost studied genius for alienating all that is best in German artistic life. Witness Paul Hindemith, remarkable composer and musician, who is forced to leave the rather strangling confines of his native land in order to gain public hearing for his works. Not that Hindemith is anything but 100 per cent Aryan. The difficulty in his case is that the man believes in a practical use of his music, that is, he is ready to write music for any legitimate and practical occasion. So was Mozart.

Of course, the faint possibility exists that the Nazis are not wild with joy over the fact that Hindemith is married to a Jewess. But whatever the reason or reasons, it's an ill wind, etc., and so the world at large is the gainer.

Judging by the reaction of the audience at last week's Boston Symphony concert, there is considerable reason to believe that, as far as this distinguished segment of America's concert-going public is concerned, it is a matter of supreme indifference whether Hindemith performs in Germany or in America or in Timbuktoo or in the Australian Bush. The reception accorded Hindemith's "Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments" scarcely exceeded the dictates of politeness, while his appearance as soloist in his "Kammermusik No. 5, for Viola and Chamber Orchestra," could not by any stretch of imagination be termed an overwhelming ovation.

Yet the very least one can say about Hindemith is that he is always interesting. The Concert Music abounds in rhythmic subleties and contapuntal skill. The Chamber Music, in concertante style, effectively weaves in the solo viola through an unusual combination of four celli, four basses, woodwinds and brass. Was Hindemith paying his respects to glorious militarism in the parody of a military march which makes up the fourth movement of this piece?

Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent reading of the Second Brahms Symphony, however, gave the audience a chance to exercise its collective palms.

Over at Harvard on Friday evening, it was a different story. Scheduled for Sanders Theatre was a sonata recital with able Jesus Sanroma assisting the composer. There was, however, a slight though unsurmountable difficulty. Briefly, the piano had managed to get lost. As a result, Boston was treated to its first progressive concert. The concert opened at Sanders with a Sonata for Viola alone, and then adjourned to Paine Hall where a Piano Sonata No. 3 and a Sonata for Viola and Piano received excellent treatment in spite of the rigors of the great trek through snow and ice. To reward the perambulatory audience for its fidelity, Mr. Hindemith performed as encore his sonata for viola d'amore and piano.

The audience was enthusiastic in its recognition of the merits of the compositions, the abilities of Mr. Hindemith as violist and the excellent pianism of Mr. Sanroma.

Now the question is, which of these two audiences, Symphony or Sanders-Paine, was most correct in its valuation? Our money goes to Harvard.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 27 1938

Today—Public lecture, Mr. John B. Archer on Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

FEB 20 1938

club.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAMMES

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give the fourth pair of concerts of the shorter series in Symphony hall, next Monday evening at 8.15, and Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock The 17th pair of the longer serie will take place on Friday afternoon at 2.30, and Saturday evening a 8.15. Orlando Barera, the young Italian violinist, will be the soloist at the Monday and Tuesday concerts, and Paul Hindemith, the outstanding German composer, will be he guest artist on Friday and Saturday, appearing as soloist in his wn Concerto for Viola and Chamber orchestra.

Serge Koussevitzky announces the following programme for Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon: Philip Emanuel Bach's String Concerto, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg; Mozart's Violin Concerto in D major, K. 218; and two works of Maurice Ravel, the French composer who died December 27th last. These will be the suite "Mother Goose," and, "Bolero." The "Mother Goose" suite consists of the following movements: Pavane of Sleeping Beauty; Hop o' my Thumb; Laideronette, Empress of the Pagodas; Beauty and the Beast Converse; The Fairy Garden. Orlando Barera, born in Ferrara, Italy, in 1907, attained a very high reputation in European cities before he made his first visit to this country early in 1936. He then gave recitals in New York and appeared in the Library of Congress series in Washington.

Paul Hindemith will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will open the programme with Hindemith's Concerto for string and brass instruments, which Hindemith composed especially for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra and which was first played here in 1931. The concerto has since been performed by orchestras of America and Europe. Hindemith, who has been a viola player for years, making many concert appearances as soloist and as a member of the Amar String Quartet of which he was a co-founder, has written several concertos for the instrument of his choice. He will on this occasion appear in his Concerto for Viola and Chamber orchestra, known as the "Kammermusik" No. 5.

The closing number will be Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

AUSTIN, TEXAS
TEXAN

FEB 20 1938

Piano Virtuoso To Appear Here

Winifred Christie, famed English virtuoso of the double keyboard piano, will be presented by the Student Cultural Entertainment Committee on March 2 in Hogg Memorial Auditorium.

Miss Christie will give a varied program of classics with representations from all "schools," including the modern.

Already acclaimed as an outstanding piano virtuoso, Miss Christie while visiting her London home made the acquaintance of Emanuel Moor, Hungarian pianist-composer and the inventor of the double keyboard piano. As a pianist of interpretative ability, Miss Christie was immediately interested with the potential richness, sonority, variety, and novelty of effect obtainable on this instrument. As a result of her adoption of the double keyboard as her medium of musical expression, Miss Christie has been recognized as a recreator of the classics.

Known as the "Poetess of the Piano," Miss Christie is noted for interpretative ability and the novelty of her renditions of the works of the old music masters, made possible through the broad scope of the double keyboard piano. She has played with leading European orchestras, including the London Philharmonic, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in America.

VARIETY
NEW YORK, N. Y.

FEB 23 1938

Paul Hindemith, German composer, over here. His second visit.

Mme. Nadia Boulanger conducted the Boston Symphony at a concert in the home town Friday. First woman to shake a stick at 'em.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST - STANDARD

FEB 20 1938

New Phonograph Recordings

BY WILLIAM HENRY TUCKLEY

One of the finest recordings of a public performance we have ever heard is the Bach "St. Matthew Passion," the first 10 discs of which are found in the Victor Album M-411, recently released. The second section of the work will be issued next month and the conclusion, we understand, will be available before Easter.

Considering the magnitude of the work and the large forces employed in its presentation, the tonal fidelity of voices and instruments, the ensemble balance and the clarity of diction on the part of soloists and chorus, particularly in the numerous chorales, as revealed on these records, is quite remarkable.

The performance was given in Symphony hall, Boston, March 26 of last year, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. Five competent soloists, Jeanette Vreeland, soprano, Kathryn Meisle, contralto, John Priebe, tenor, Keith Faulkner, bass and Fritz Lechner, bass, assisted the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society in presenting the vocal parts.

On the instrumental side were the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. V. Ernst Wolff, harpischord, Carl Weinrich, organ, and a group of solo instruments including violins, viola da gamba, flute, English horns and oboi d'amore. And of course there was an audience of more than 2,500 persons to be considered. In view of all this, the success of the undertaking reflects the highest credit on the Victor recording staff.

Approximately one-third of the score is covered in the first album. Later, when the other albums are released, we will have something to say about the work of soloists and chorus.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

FEB 20 1938

In The World Of Music . . . .

By H. Earle Johns

DISCIPLINE is the greatest need of the composer today, according to Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, the teacher of prominent composeds, as she assumed a visiting Professorship of Composition and Orchestration this week at Radcliffe College. The pupil of Gabriel Faure, and teacher of Americans as well as Europeans, she is the first woman to lift a baton over the 110 men of the Boston Symphony; this was done at the pair of concerts concluding yesterday at which time the Bach Cantata Club assisted in presenting Faur'es "Requieum." Mlle. Boulanger urges Americans to pay more attention to our own talented young people, to give them a chance, and to respect them as creative figures of importance for the world to come.

A slight person with strong hands of an organist, Mlle. Boulanger considers teaching a great privilege: "It is a great thing to watch the development in ideas, to see people do what you have not done yourself." Among those whom she has guided as representative of America are Aaron Copland, Ross Lee Finney, Roy Harris, Douglas Moore, Virgil Thomson, and Walter Piston; the last-named was responsible for the invitation which brings this distinguished teacher to America; she came here a decade ago as organist when the same orchestra played Copland's Concerto.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
Hearld Advertiser

FEB 20 193

Symphonists Get Off-Season Work

NEW YORK, Feb. 19. (AP)—It's not how much you can get a week, but how many weeks you can get it, so far as Boston Symphony orchestra men are concerned.

Boston, almost alone of the great orchestras, has from the beginning worked on the assumption that it owed its players enough work at their type of music to support themselves through the year.

A fancy salary, for half a year, has never been considered enough—in Boston. Now the Boston symphony player who needs and wants the work can have 46 weeks of employment, all of it playing music of high type.

When, October first of each year, Serge Koussevitzky calls together his orchestra, the men do not emerge from honky-tonk back doors and dance palaces, where they have been keeping the wolf off the summer doorstep.

They emerge from congenial summer employment, after reasonable rest, ready for work and with nothing disadvantageous to unlearn.

Oldest in Country

This policy is as old as the orchestra, and that began in 1881. This makes the orchestra, as a body of players under a continuing symphony leadership, the oldest in the land. The Philharmonic-Symphony society of New York, as a society devoted to the performance of music, is older.

When Henry Lee Higginson founded the orchestra he specifically pointed out that his men had a right to be cared for through the year. The orchestra was non-union then, of course; it still is, the only non-union first quality orchestra in the country.

The management began at once, according to present symphony officials, to plan for summer work which would employ those men who did not want to spend the summer in teaching, in private musical enterprises, or just loafing.

The plan begun in 1885 was a summer popular series—they called them "promenade concerts" then, and that was before the Queens' Hall "promenades" in London. Technically, they remained promenade concerts for decades, although Boston quickly indicated that when it combined good music and good drink, it wanted to take both sitting down.

Was Named 'Pops'

The public named this 2-month spring series, when old Symphony Hall emerges from the winter belatticed and refurbished, the "pops." They have steadily grown more popular, and steadily better in a musical sense.

Before the war, (but in very few places now) many symphony men could spend their summers in high class ensembles, employed by equally high class hotels. Teaching then was also profitable. These things took the men through the hot months.

Excepting for such old time hotels as the Wentworth North of Boston; the Crawford up in New Hampshire and the Placid in the Adirondacks, these ensembles have been traded for dance bands.

Season Ends May 1

So the esplanade concerts, given on the Charles River bank, were evolved in 1929. These will have it is possible, a very handsome new home this summer. But in any case 50-60 sympathy men will play for a month by the water as usual.

It works so—by May 1 the regular symphony season is done, for the orchestra does not bank around the country playing for spring festivals.

The pops begin after only a 3-day rest, according to George E. Judd, manager of the orchestra. These continue until July 4; Mr. Judd is for those two months, a licensed "common victualler," which is Massachusetts' way of saying restaurant man with a liquor license.

The week after the pops end, the esplanade begins. This closes just in time for the orchestra (all of it this time) to entrain for its August home — "Tranglewood," between Lenox and Stockbridge in the Berkshires, where there is building what many musicians have called potentially the most important music festival in the world.

This takes the orchestra through the middle of August and eventually will, it is believed, continue much longer.

Which is where Colonel Higginson's policy has led, after 57 years of development.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FEB 22 1938

Objects to Orchestra

WILL you inform me why lovers of real music are obligated periodically to come to the financial rescue of the National Symphony Orchestra?

Though labeled "our symphony orchestra," in what way has it contributed to our entertainment and knowledge of real music?

I know such organization during the season has its concerts, to which all and sundry may come if provided with the price of admission. But so, also, do visiting organizations, possibly more effectively.

Competing orchestras long since had discovered there is radio; the National Symphony still insists on personal appearances, with lovers of real music shut out, unless they can show a ticket of admission.

Hitting Radio

Is it necessary to mention that, in addition to performing for the limited number that may be crowded into the largest of our auditoriums, real national orchestras send out again and again concerts over the airways for the vast number who, for a variety of reasons, are unable to attend their concerts?

Will those now angling for public support for the selfish group labeled "our orchestra" indicate, if they can, just when our orchestra made their talents available to those they now turn to for funds via radio? I have a faint recollection of an occasion or two of such appearances, limited in the main to appeals for funds and little else.

Speaking for myself, am sorry to say that while I am measurably obligated to outside symphony orchestras, like the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, the Philadelphia and Pittsburgh orchestras, and numerous others, I owe nothing at all to "our orchestras."

Claims Support

So, I continue deaf to all appeals for contributions to sustaining funds, now and hereafter. You may call me selfish if you wish, not imbued with the proper local spirit, but there I stand: I might mention that I evidently am not alone in this. It has been shown in the past and during the present drive for funds that thousands of music-loving Washingtonians keep me company.

SAM'L SALOMAN,
1519 Upshur St. N. W.

TRENTON, N. J.
STATE GAZETTE

FEB 23 1938

ENESCO WILL GIVE PRINCETON RECITAL

PRINCETON, Feb. 22.—Georges Enesco, famous conductor, composer and violinist, will appear in a recital at McCarter Theatre on Friday evening, March 11, at 8:30 o'clock. Mr. Enesco has appeared this year as guest conductor and soloist with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

His new symphony, nearing completion, will be dedicated to the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York.

The Princeton University Concerts also announces the appearance on Saturday afternoon, February 26, of Heinz and Robert Scholz, duo-pianists, of the Mozarteum, Salzburg, playing Bach's "The Art of Fugue."

WEST WARWICK, R. I.
Pawtuxet Valley Times

FEB 23 1938

MUSIC MENTION

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, Famous French Pianist, To Give Brown Lecture

RECITAL ON FRIDAY EVENING

Teacher-Conductor to Appear at Alumnae Hall.—Performance Free to Public.—First Woman to Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 23—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French pianist, teacher and conductor, will give a lecture-recital in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College, Friday evening, February 25. The lecture, which is open to the public free of charge, is under the auspices of Brown University and the Alliance Francaise of Providence.

Mlle. Boulanger established a precedent when she conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts last Friday and Saturday, the first woman in its long history to lead this orchestra. Not many months ago she broke a similar tradition, of 126 years' standing, when she led the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra of London.

A teacher at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris, and at the American Academy at Fontainebleau, Mlle. Boulanger numbers among her pupils such outstanding American composers as Roy Harris, Aaron Copland, the late George Gershwin, and Walter Piston of the Harvard University department of music.

Her own group of five choral singers, whom Mlle. Boulanger brought to this country with her recently, will illustrate her lecture on French vocal music, ranging from that of the sixteenth century to modern times. She is visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe and Wellesley Colleges this semester.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

FEB 24 1938

RUGGED READING OF BEETHOVEN'S FIFTH IS GIVEN

Ormandy and Philadelphia Symphony Thrill Large Smith Audience

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, Feb. 23 — The Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Eugene Ormandy, played tonight in John M. Greene Hall and thrilled an audience that filled every available bit of room in the auditorium. At the close, Ormandy and his men received a veritable ovation, an ovation such as the Smith College audience bestows very seldom.

Reason for Enthusiasm

There was ample reason for this enthusiasm for the Philadelphia players are as fine a body as may be heard anywhere in the world. With the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic they form the "Big Three" of the orchestra world. Tonight, whether or not one agreed with Mr. Ormandy's interpretations, one could bestow only praise for the magnificence of orchestral tone. The superb string section and almost equally fine wind and brass sections formed an amazing ensemble.

The program, with the exception of one number, was as routine and solid as the most old-fashioned concert attendant could desire. The exception was the brilliant transcription of the Bach "Prelude and Fugue in B Minor,' by Cailliet. The remainder of the program was given over to the Beethoven "Symphony No. 5 in C Minor"; "The Afternoon of a Faun" by Debussy and excerpts from "Siegfried" by Wagner.

Unlike many who have made transcriptions of Bach's works, Mr. Cailliet has not overdone it. He has kept the line and spirit of the composer and yet provided an exceptionally brilliant orchestration. One never forgets that it is the music of Bach one is hearing.

Provides Rugged Reading

Mr. Ormandy provided a rugged reading of the Fifth Symphony. The opening movement was taken at an extraordinary fast pace and the work as a whole was played considerably faster than one usually hears it. However, this pace matched the vitality and ruggedness of the reading. The andante was played with an exquisite sense of rhythm and beauty of tone. The profound utterance of the finale was never more keenly realized and it almost brought the audience to its feet.

The dream of the faun and his rude awakening brought out quite another side of the orchestra. In this one heard shimmering tones of myriad colors, so smoothly uttered as to seem almost ethereal. Seldom does one have the opportunity to hear so entrancing a performance of this work. The beauty of the solo flute and violin would be difficult to equal. Light as the work is, it held the audience through its sheer beauty.

One hears the music of Wagner's "Siegfried" less often than the music of "Die Walkure" or "Goetterdammerung." Yet in the music of "Siegfried" is the promise of the final two dramas of the "Ring." Mr. Ormandy appears to be completely happy in the interpretation of the works of Wagner. With the exception of an unfortunate incident during the off-stage horn solo, the excerpts were played with notable brilliance.

In response to applause Mr. Ormandy made a graceful speech in which he reminded the audience that last year Charles O'Connell shared the program as conductor. He said that in response to many requests last year and tonight he would play "Clair de Lune" by Debussy, so once again one heard the wonderful tapestry of tone which this orchestra can weave.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

FEB 26 1938

The Choir Loft

Bach's 'B Minor Mass' and Oratorios by Haydn and Rossini Will Be Heard Tomorrow—Bach's 'St. Matthew Passion' Is Recorded by Koussevitzky.

By WILLARD IRVING NEVINS.

Recent Recordings.

Few recordings equal in importance that of Bach's "The Passion According to St. Matthew" which is now issued in its complete form by the Victor Company in three volumes, M-411-12-13. This recording was made during the actual performance of the work by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society in Symphony Hall, Boston, Mass., on March 26, 1937. Distinguished vocal and instrumental soloists assisted the orchestral and choral forces and the Victor company has succeeded admirably in preserving in these three volumes the remarkable performance of that occasion. In the booklet accompanying the records Prof. Archibald T. Davison has contributed a discussion of the Passion form and Bach's work itself.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 27 1938

Tuesday—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre. Ladies luncheon and bridge, social committee of the Metacomet Golf Club, clubhouse, 1:30.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 27 1938

Tuesday—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Raya Garbausova, violon-cellist, soloist; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 27 1938

THE ORCHESTRAS

Boston Symphony Programs

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon, March 10 and 12. Both programs will include works which he has not conducted here before. Mahler's fifth symphony in the evening concert and Saint-Saens's C minor symphony, No. 3, in the afternoon program.

The rest of the Boston Symphony program for March 10 includes Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol." Malipiero's second symphony and Prokofieff's Classical Symphony also will be heard on March 12.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 26 1938

'Cellist with Symphony

Raya Garbousava will be soloist with the Boston Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday ever

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 27 1938

RAYA GARBOUSOVA, beautiful young Russian musician, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert here Tuesday evening.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

FEB 26 1938

185

Pembroke Honors Famous Woman Lecturer

AT RECEPTION

After her lecture-recital at Pembroke last night, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger was the guest of honor at a reception in the Crystal Room of Alumnae Hall. Above, the receiving line—(left to right) Professor and Mrs. Arlan R. Coolidge, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, Mrs. Robert J. Beede and Mrs. E. Nicholson White. Below, Mrs. Julius H. Preston pours for Mrs. Herbert G. Beede (left) and Mrs. Harcourt Brown.

TEA IS SERVED BY MRS. JULIUS H. PRESTON

'EVERYONE SHOULD SING,' SAYS TUTOR

Mlle. Boulanger Gives Views on Music After Recital at Pembroke College.

By G. Y. Loveridge

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger grasped her left ear and exclaimed with electric sincerity: "Train the ear! Train the ear! I say to people 'You have eyes and you see, you have ears but you don't hear!'"

She smiled. The smile reflected the enthusiasm for music that has guided her whole life and the enthusiasm for teaching that has made her internationally celebrated.

Mlle. Boulanger was standing backstage in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College, last night. She and a group of five singers had just brought to an enchanted audience some of the exquisite vocal music that was written in France during the Renaissance and that is being written there today.

Likes Questions

Mlle. Boulanger was delighted because the audience had enjoyed the lecture-recital so deeply. There was only one thing more that she would have desired: She would have liked the audience to ask questions.

"I sometimes say to my classes, 'You ask for freedom, and now you have it, you don't know what to do with it. Ask questions. Ask. Ask.'"

A not-so-innocent bystander was waiting to do just that. He obtained an introduction to Mlle. Boulanger, but knowing that she was opposed to speaking for publication (the first and only interview of her life took place a week ago) he confessed that he was a reporter. She expressed good-natured alarm, and reiterated her stand against interviews, against publicity. However, a compromise was arranged, whereby Mlle. Boulanger would talk for publication provided she talked about music and not about herself.

Cont.

English Picturesque

When she talks about music, her English is picturesque and poetic, and her sincerity charms and overpowers.

"Train the ear!" she commands, and one feels compelled to rush out into the storm immediately and get some ears and train them.

Ought Brown University to have the same kind of choral work that is given at Radcliffe College, where Mlle. Boulanger is at present a guest teacher?

Everybody Should Sing

"If they have it not, certainly!" she said. "Everybody should sing. Everybody should be trained for music. The ears should be trained as well as the eyes. Especially should children be trained, when they are from five to eight years old. That is the time. And do not make the teaching easy for them. There is too much making things easy. Make the teaching hard. That way they will get something out of it. They will learn to confront life. It is by doing things that they learn and that they get the most enjoyment. I can go out and get food put up in a little box, but no, I would rather cook something myself."

As she speaks, she makes expressive movements with her hands, and her eyes sparkle behind the pince-nez. She urges the beauties of music and is diligent in helping others, but she says nothing about herself, although she is the only woman who has ever conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, her knowledge of music is vast and her teaching has influenced some of the foremost composers of the day.

Cont

Eager To Praise Singers

She was eager to give credit to her singers, all of whom came from France with her, not to make money—this isn't the sort of thing that makes money—but because they have the same love for music that Mlle. Boulanger has.

In her lecture, she spoke of the 16th century as "one of the most glorious periods" in art, whatever may have been its character in other respects. She showed how the pendulum is swinging back to the simplicity that marked the musical composition of those times, not an empty simplicity but a skilled simplicity.

Composers of today, tired of complexity, are seeking smaller forms and smaller orchestrations to express themselves. She mentioned Stravinsky and his complex masterpiece "The Rite of Spring," and said that he is one of those returning to a plainer style.

Mlle. Boulanger said the tendency is now to appeal to the taste and culture of the listener, as the composers of the French Renaissance did, rather than to try to assault the listener's nervous system as vigorously as possible.

Singers Illustrate

In illustration she had the singers give some of the compositions of the old and the new masters. She stood at the piano, sometimes playing with one hand, sometimes with both, or conducting without accompaniment. The songs included: "Ce moys de may," Clement Janequin; "La reine de Saba," Francis Poulenc; "Quand mon mary vient de dehors," Orlande de Lassus; "Au joly bois," Claudin; and songs by Debussy and Faure.

There was a reception afterwards in the Crystal Room. In the receiving line were Mlle. Boulanger, Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, head of the university department of music, and Mrs. Coolidge, Mrs. Robert J. Beede and Mrs. E. Nicholson White. Mlle. Boulanger wore a gown with a black lace skirt and black chiffon bodice with flowing sleeves, and a corsage of gardenias and red roses.

The singers who accompanied her were Mme. Giselle Peyron, Mme. Nathalie Kedroff, Miss Margaret Warner, Hughes Cuenod and Doda Conrad.

The lecture-recital was under the auspices of the music department and the Alliance Francaise.

END

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 23 1938

Noted French Woman Musician at Pembroke

PROVIDENCE, Feb. 23 — Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, first woman to direct the Boston Symphony orchestra, and leader of the Singers of Paris, will give a lecture-recital under the auspices of Brown University and the Alliance Francaise, in Alumnae Hall, Pembroke College, Friday evening at 8:15. Her subject is "French Vocal Music, 16th Century and Modern."

Mlle Boulanger brought to this country six of the eight French soloists who form the nucleus of her group. In the lectures the six singers are the soloists.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

FEB 27 1938

Symphony to Play Saint-Saens Work

Boston Orchestra Coming Tuesday for Next To-Last Concert of Season.—Brown-Pembroke Orchestra to Play

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will return for its fourth and next-to-the-last concert of the season in the Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday evening. Raya Garbousova, brilliant young Russian 'cellist, will be the soloist, playing Tschaikowski's Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello, With Orchestral Accompaniment. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen symphonies by Haydn and Saint-Saens for his other numbers.

Another orchestral concert of the week will be presented by the Brown-Pembroke Orchestra, Prof. Arlan R. Coolidge, director, in Faunce House, Thursday evening. Albert A. Mell, violinist, of the class of '39, will be the soloist.

This afternoon there will be a benefit concert for the St. Vincent Infant Home, in the Metropolitan Theatre. A miscellaneous program of vocal and orchestral selections has been arranged, with Frank Crumit as master of ceremonies.

A Saint-Saens "First"

In addition to introducing the Russian 'cellist, Raya Garbousova, as soloist of its concert Tuesday night, in the Metropolitan Theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its first performance in Providence of Saint-Saens's Third Symphony which was recently played in the Boston series with great success. The symphony is described as a large scale work using the full sonority of the orchestra and including an organ. Albert W. Snow will be the organist. Dr. Koussevitzky will also conduct Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, No. 99 of the series which the composer wrote for performance in London. The order follows:

Symphony in E-flat, No. 99........Haydn
  I. Adagio; Vivace assai
  II. Adagio
  III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
  IV. Vivace
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello, with Orchestral Accompaniment, opus 33 ....Tschaikowski
Symphony in C-minor, No. 3, opus 78 ....Saint-Saens
  I. Adagio, Allegro moderato. Poco adagio
  II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

Miss Garbousova played with the Boston Symphony when she first came to this country in the season of 1934-'35. She also had engagements as soloist with the Philadelphia and Detroit orchestras and gave recitals in New York and other cities. She was born in Caucasia and as a young graduate from the Conservatory of Tiflis made concert tours of Russia which were gradually extended to take in the principal cities of Europe.

To Lecture on Symphony

John B. Archer will give a lecture on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program this afternoon at 4 o'clock in the Providence Public Library. Beatrice Warden Roberts, pianist, will assist with musical illustrations. The lecture is one of the series under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club and is open to the public without charge.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

FEB 27 1938

MEMORIES OF MAHLER—II

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

GUSTAV MAHLER and his music refuse to become dead issues. The recent performance by the Philadelphia Orchestra of Mahler's "Lied von der Erde"—not soon to be forgotten by responsive listeners among the audience—and the promised performance here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, give especial timeliness to the new book* on the composer just published by his most devoted and informed disciple, the eminent conductor Bruno Walter—now, alas, no longer an active figure in the American scene.

It is likely that the majority of New York music-lovers first felt themselves drawn to Mahler's deeply personal art on the occasion when "Das Lied von der Erde" was introduced to this public by Artur Bodanzky at a concert of the Society of the Friends of Music in Carnegie Hall on February 1, 1922. "Das Lied von der Erde" was a new chapter in Mahler's art, a new self-revelation; and it was probably the first expression of his esthetic personality which made an immediate and lasting contact with many of those who had found themselves disaffected by such very different products of Mahler's imagination as the much earlier First and Second Symphonies, which were among the first of his works to be heard in New York.

* * *

Abschied

"DAS LIED VON DER ERDE" is deeply enmeshed with the inner experiences of Mahler's last years, and it is of those years that Bruno Walter writes with special sympathy and vividness. The briefness of his meetings with Mahler during the final years of his life, he tells us, is compensated in his recollections of them by the intensity of what Mahler had to say and the weightiness of experience with which their conversations were fraught. "Just as in Nature, twilight is followed by the brightness of the sunset glow, so the world, after the initial sinking of his vitality, now lay before him in the dimming light of an inevitable farewell."

"The 'dear Earth,' whose song he had written, looked so beautiful to him in that light that everything he thought or uttered was mysteriously permeated with a feeling of surprise at the new charm of the old life. I shall never be able to forget his expression when he told me how, on the occasion of a country visit in Moravia, he had found the world to be more beautiful than ever before, and what a peculiarly fervent happiness he had derived from the smell of the soil arising from the fields. In the background of his conversation there was now a constant spiritual upheaval, his mind ever striving, almost as in the Hamburg days, to take flight from its manifold intellectual themes to problems of a metaphysical nature—only now the urge and the agitation were more intense. I am tempted to compare this restlessness of the soul with the excitement preceding a journey, a condition which only occasionally yielded to a touching repose when, in our conversations, we would make plans for the future. We would talk of a house and garden on the Hohe Warte or in Grinzing, or discuss the choice of a coffe-house where we could meet of an afternoon. But, as a rule, his mental excursions into idyllic realms ended in a gesture of the hand or a look of incredulity."

* * *

The Dark Horror

IT WAS during the last summer which Mahler was permitted to witness that a strangely terrifying occurrence depressed his thoughts. As he related the incident to Bruno Walter, he was at work in his composing-cottage in Toblach when he was suddenly frightened by an indefinable noise. "All at once something 'terribly dark' came rushing in by the window, and, when he jumped up in horror, he saw that he was in the presence of an eagle which filled the little room with its violence. The fearsome meeting was quickly over and the eagle disappeared as stormily as it had come. When Mahler sat down, exhausted by his fright, a crow came fluttering from under the sofa and flew out. The peaceful abode of musical absorption had become a battle-ground upon which one of the innumerable fights of 'all against all' had taken place. Mahler's account of it still tingled with the horror of so striking a demonstration of that cruelty of Nature which had ever been one of the reasons for his deep world-sorrow."

In the autumn of 1910, Mahler went to New York again to resume his activities as conductor of the Philharmonic Society. In February of 1911 news of his seyere illness was received by his friend. "When, in April, he arrived in Paris to submit to a serum treatment," writes Bruno Walter, "I decided to visit him there. There he lay, a tortured victim of an insidious illness, his very soul affected by the struggle of the body, his mood gloomy and forbidding. A careful allusion to his work, made with the intention of leading his thoughts to a comforting subject, elicited, for the first time, only pessimistic utterances. I therefore avoided touching upon serious matters and confined my conversation to an endeavor to divert and entertain his mind by talks on a variety of subjects. In this I succeeded, on the whole, and I even recall that my account of some remarks concerning art from the mouth of a well-known Philistine caused a chuckle in which traces of his one-time humor could be recognized. Upon one other occasion I was gladdened by a similar flash of good humor; feeling that he needed a shave, we summoned a young French barber in whom all the elegance of his profession and that of his nation seemed to be united. While he attended to his job with exaggerated finesse I saw in the eye of the patient something akin to amusement. Perhaps there rose to the surface of his memory the figure of some fantastic barber from a fairy-tale. When the young man had taken his leave with a graceful bow, Mahler gazed after him and murmured softly, but in a highly animated tone: 'Farewell, oh scraper of beards!' "

* * *

Finale

OFTEN, however, Walter's endeavors to amuse him were useless, and on his face there would be an expression of indifference. "I am mindful of a sad reply he made when I tried to describe to him the future house and garden of which we had talked in Vienna in former days. He was silent for a while and then said: 'That would be quite nice, but, as a matter of fact, I have now but one desire—to take enough digitalis to support my heart.' Then, again, his deadly sadness would leave him for a while, and he would listen with interest to what I had to tell him about Vienna and its musical happenings. In spite of an occasional manifestation of irritability at the mention of Vienna, the old attachment would come to the fore again and again, and, when all is said, he liked nothing so much as to listen to tales of the familiar haunts. I had to leave after a few days, and never exchanged another word with him. When I saw him again he was dying.

"He was brought to Vienna in May. The resentment, the residue of quite a number of disappointments during his days in Vienna, had not been able to stand up against the desire, in his serious condition, to get 'home.' Messages of friendship and reverence which found their way to his sick-bed gave him great pleasure. He died on May 18, 1911. When, on the following evening, we transported the coffin to the chapel of the Grinzing cemetery a storm was raging and the rain came down in torrents, so that we could scarcely proceed. The funeral took place in the presence of an immense crowd and in hushed silence. As we stood beside his grave, the sun burst through the clouds."

* * *

It is easy to imagine Bruno Walter remembering at that moment the final canto of "Das Lied von der Erde," with its prophetic implications, and looking away toward the Vienna countryside on that afternoon in May, thinking of his friend who had come and gone again for the last time, and of the bourgeoning Spring earth, and the deep blue of distant space and the everlastingness of beauty.

Symphony Concert

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, Remarkably Played, Takes Up Most of the Program

B. Trans Mar. 5/38

BY MOSES SMITH

Mahler's Fifth Symphony, the principal item on the current program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, required several minutes over an hour in the presumably cut version performed at yesterday afternocn's concert under the directiton of Serge Koussevitzky. To have offered the Symphony as a complete program would have been reasonable satisfaction of the dictates of length, quality and quantity of musical enjoyment. It would even have been a pleasant variation from the usual routine. But that routine being as rigid as it is, Dr. Koussevitzky did not deprive the members of the audience of their customary interval for lobby-promenading, and appended thereto the two familiar Nocturnes of Debussy ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and the "Spanish" Caprice of Rimsky-Korsakov.

Almost anything was likely to be an anti-climax after the performance of the Symphony in C-sharp minor. The two Nocturnes were beautifully set forth, as we have come to expect from conductor and orchestra. If the orchestral playing of "Nuages" was perhaps a shade less sensitive than it has been in the past, the brilliance of the presentation of "Fetes" was compensation. Rimsky's orchestral tour de force has frequently served as a battlehorse for Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston orchestra; and they rode it imperiously yesterday. But it did not matter. Nothing mattered after the length and concentration, the ardor and intensity, the grandeur and humanity of the Symphony and of the magnificent performance.

It is difficult to justify the neglect of this Symphony by the Boston Orchestra for almost a quarter of a century, from 1914, when it was played under Karl Muck, until early in the present season, when Dr. Koussevitzky revived it. It "exploits" the varied resources of a great orchestra such as Boston possesses. Its five movements, subdivided in turn, traverse many moods, rarely the trivial. Its length is, if anything, in its favor. There is opportunity for the composer to probe the innermost implications of the subjects, and, at the opposite extreme, to establish the tonal edifice in sweeping architectural lines. The customary objections to the length of the symphonies of Mahler (and even more, of Bruckner) do not seem to be applicable here. Prolixity is not a vice of the Fifth Symphony.

The opening of the Funeral March, the first movement, might have been as innocuous as the Mendelssohn Song without Words which it resembles. Instead, it has enormous power and majesty before a dozen measures have elapsed. Through all the storm and stress of the movement that majesty somehow is never sacrificed. The second movement and the extraordinary scherzo both have a kind of excitement that no other composer has yet quite attained. Nothing in the Symphony better illustrates the artist than the Adagietta, fourth movement, wherein, with an enormous orchestra at his disposal, Mahler limits the instrumentation to strings and harp, because they are all he requires, because he is an economical craftsman and because, as it seems, any addition would have robbed the music of its characteristic beauty. The last movement is a miracle of construction; and the finale, second part of it, a miracle within a miracle. The musician may admire here, as in the case of the scherzo, the wonderful polyphonic web. The layman is bound to be moved by the music's elemental force.

Mahler was not mistaken in regarding this Symphony as a new departure in his art. Even today it sounds new. If there are passages, here and there, which have more than a suggestion of the derivative it is because Mahler's imitators (conscious or unconscious) have learned their lessons too well. It is scarcely necessary now to emphasize the more specific—and perhaps more important—influence of the composer on Schoenberg and his followers. But one could not help being reminded of it again while listening to the Symphony yesterday.

The performance was worthy of the composition. For Dr. Koussevitzky, the repetition after only a few months was clearly a labor of love and as such not a mere restatement. There were evident at every stage his enkindling imagination, his high seriousness and continuous refusal to rely on mere routine. Yet the presentation was at no point fussy. Its remarkable quality was, on the other hand, possible only because the conductor had at his disposal a surpassingly great orchestra, playing at its best.

It was good to see again, in the seat of the second concert-master, Julius Theodorowicz, returned after a long and serious illness.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

MAR 6 - 1938

Symphony Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its fourth Brooklyn appearance of the season at the Academy of Music on Friday. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, has announced the program will include compositions of Brahms, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Prokofieff.

Her. Mar 5/38

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 18th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5 in C sharp minor . . Mahler
Two Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" Debussy
Capriccio Espagnol Op. 34 . . . . . . Rimsky-Korsakov

A second performance of Mahler's 5th Symphony in one season is justified on the grounds of the difficulty of rehearsing so long and unfamiliar a work in the first place. Artistically the repetition is wise in that it gives people an opportunity to reflect on one of the large compositions of a very controversial figure in music. The actual interpretation of this symphony was again faithfully and eloquently set forth. Dr. Koussevitzky clearly was fascinated by the music and through the excellence of the orchestral playing communicated its message to an enthusiastic majority—as it appeared—of the audience.

We must confess that we do not share that fascination beyond the first movement or first two sections. We once again, only with more acute boredom, found the scherzo inept, the adagietto inexpressibly tedious and the finale sententious and empty. With the exception of the first movement, we should not in the least care whether the symphony were revived again for another 20 years.

This opinion may appear harsh; but a second full-dress performance ought to allow complete liberty of expression, since it affords time to make up one's mind. Mahler, for all his skill and taste as a conductor, was an inartistic composer. His ideas were vast without being profound, indeed they were often astonishingly trivial. When he girded his loins to write a scherzo he could only emerge with a laborious approximation of lightness. Bruckner, with whom he is so idiotically coupled, could have shown him some pointers in the writing of a scherzo.

Unfortunately there are many who confuse long-windedness with profundity. Mahler was inartistic because he was unable to select the moments when he was composing music of real interest and originality and when he was merely expatiating on platitudes. To this is due the lopsidedness of even such a work as "Das Lied von der Erde," which is far greater than the 5th Symphony.

Well, there was obviously a sharp difference of opinion among yesterday's audience; and such arguments are not settled by blasting away along one front. It is possible that we are warped by the wrong historical perspective. A taste for the taut, athletic, ironic art of a Hindemith or a Prokofieff among the moderns does not jibe very well with an admiration for Mahler.

It was a pleasure to listen to the subtleties of Debussy's imaginative Nocturnes after the intermission. Debussy made no attempt to create symphonic music in Mahler's huge designs. But with what precise and perfect art did he accomplish what he set out to do! It was also interesting to compare Rimsky-Korsakov's frankly brilliant evocation of Spain with that of Debussy, that is if we have a right to consider "Fetes" suggestive of Spanish atmosphere. Both performances were beautifully achieved yesterday.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. At the concerts of March 18 and 19 Georges Enesco will be the guest composer and conductor.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

FEB 23 1938

Boston Programs.

Guest artists in two capacities with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be Paul Hindemith, composer and expert performer on the viola. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct his Concerto for strings and brass instruments which was written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston orchestra. The guest artist will also be heard in his Concerto for viola and chamber orchestra. To round out the program the orchestra will play Beethoven's Fourth Symphony.

Mention of Beethoven is a reminder that the orchestra plans to present his "Missa Sollennis" at its pension fund concert on April 26 in which the choruses from Harvard and Radcliffe will assist.

Mar 5/38

OSTON GLOBE—SA

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Little by little, the music of Gustav Mahler makes its way. His cause is still disputed, to be sure, and a good deal of effort must yet be spent before public apathy yields to general favor. But by various accounts, the battle is slowly being won. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has commendably chosen to repeat at the Symphony concerts this week Mahler's Fifth Symphony, which the illustrious conductor revived last October after an unaccountably long Bostonian silence. At that time the work was well received. Yesterday afternoon it seemed that the applause of the Friday audience was warmer than before. To that extent let Mahlerites rejoice.

This gigantic and terribly difficult Symphony could have been in no better hands, for yesterday's performance was simply stunning. The orchestra was at its best, and from first to last exhibited all the long-sung virtues of magnificent tone, sensitivity, precision and unity, and the thousand-and-one fine shades of playing which have elevated the Boston Symphony to the world's symphonic peak. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as well, is one that causes the music to sound for itself. He forces no points nor does he undervalue Mahler's intense expression of a complex and misunderstood personality.

Say what you will about Mahler's weaknesses—and he, like many another hero of the tonal world, had weaknesses—his music is nevertheless noble and aspiring. What has probably checked Mahler's success as a composer is the fact that he wrote at such length and in such a personal rhapsodic style. Mahler had no concern whatever with the classical proportions of an art-work, with detail finely adjusted to the whole. The conventional principles of symphonic structure, with all the carefully-detailed rules and procedures—especially as they were applied in German music—evidently meant nothing to him. Mahler was intent upon creating what he considered beauty, and his music came from his heart and his imagination. If he saw fit to invent melodies that seem banal to a good many of us, he did so because he felt that they expressed his thought.

In other words, Mahler's music may be accepted or rejected on the spot. One cannot be half-hearted about it, nor can any make intellectual objections where intellect as a governing force of discipline doesn't exist. This, in a word, is what largely sets Mahler apart from other creative musicians of the late 19th century. This and the fact that he had grander visions than some of his contemporaries.

The very positive merits of Mahler lie in his counterpoint, his astounding treatment of the orchestra and the overwhelming force of his emotion. The second of the Fifth Symphony's five movements is, in the belief of this recorder, some of the most remarkable music that has ever been created. With the vast resources of the large orchestra broken into many voices sounding plangently against each other, Mahler wrote pages of extraordinary breadth.

Where other composers would have saved certain contrapuntal and harmonic effects for grand climaxes, Mahler fabricated a continuous web of counterpoint rich in passing dissonance and full of abrupt modulations. As a technician Mahler was, if not a child of the 20th century, at least its prophet.

After the hour-long Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky placed the two Nocturnes of Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's luscious "Spanish Caprice." The orchestra treated both Debussy and Rimsky as well as it had treated Mahler, but for this listener there was a feeling of anticlimax. Clouds, festivals and dancing are rather tame after a long-range glimpse of the cosmos itself.

Next week the orchestra goes on tour. A fornight hence the Boston concerts will be conducted by the Rumanian musician, Georges Enesco.

C. W. D.

ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

FEB 19 1938

French Woman Leads Orchestra at Bosto

BOSTON, Feb. 18 (AP).—An internationally known French composer-teacher, Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, today became the first woma ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra in a public performance.

Mlle. Boulanger, who recently became the first regularly appointec woman lecturer at Radcliffe college led the 57-year-old orchestra in the presentation of "The Requiem," composition by her former teacher Gabriel Faure. During the first hal of the program, she was organ soloist.

(187

Post mar 5

BO

MAHLER'S FIFTH BY SYMPHONY

Gigantic Work Given Brilliancy by Orchestra

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Mahler's mighty Fifth Symphony, which filled the greater part of yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, has been played at Symphony Hall only seven times in 32 years, but six of these performances have been at the rate of two a season. No other piece, large or small, has been at once so shabbily neglected and so peculiarly favored. Mr. Ripley should take notice.

REVIVED IN OCTOBER

When Dr. Koussevitzky revived this symphony, unheard here for 23 years, at the concerts of Oct. 22 and 23 last, even the 100 per cent Mahlerites were a little fearful of the outcome. Things may happen to music, even in two decades. But, happily, the result was a triumph for composer, conductor and orchestra. The inevitable protests merely added to the excitement. As the magazine Time recently put it, "No one is lukewarm about the music of Bruckner and Mahler; either he admires it fervently or it makes him sick."

Yesterday, as before, the audience received this gigantic symphony, which severely taxes listeners as well as players, with unmistakable enthusiasm. Even for those who had had a previous acquaintance with the work this second performance was illuminating and clarifying, and more would be necessary before the full implications of the score, the relations of its smaller details to its larger outlines, could be fully grasped.

Whole Work a Unit

Last fall, individual opinion differed as to which were the stronger movements; but, in the light of yesterday's performance, such evaluation and discrimination seems futile and beside the point. The symphony is a unit, for all its tremendous proportions. The end may be foreseen in the beginning, and it is safe to say that no one of the five movements would make quite the effect that it does if any of the other four were in any way different.

One problem which faces the conductor is to decide what music to place with this C-sharp minor Symphony. Last October, Dr. Koussevitzky devoted the first part of the programme to this work, which, even with a few cuts, runs over an hour in performance, and followed it with short excerpts from "Die Meistersinger" and "Die Walkuere." But the choice of Wagner's music did not prove a wholly successful one. The speech of the two composers, despite certain fundamental differences, was too much the same, and more than one listener felt that Mahler quite disconcertingly took the wind out of Wagner's sails.

Debussy for Contrast

Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky went to the other extreme and sought the sharpest of contrasts. To Mahler's titanic Finale, there now succeeded the Nocturnes of Debussy. After the press and turmoil of life at its fullest and richest, the tower of ivory. And those who complain that Mahler's music, with its terrific vigor, its vast lengths and sonorities, its occasional melodic obviousness is not quite "nice," could rejoice in the French composer's ultra-refinement. With "Festivals" the concert might well have ended, since the hour was late; but to the Nocturnes Dr. Koussevitzky added Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice." Even after its Herculean accomplishment with Mahler's Symphony, the orchestra could still bring Rimsky's clever, if superficial, score to an unusually brilliant performance.

To return to Mahler, it is once more in order to suggest that if the Fifth Symphony can win such favor with our audiences it should be worth Dr. Koussevitzky's while to give us the as yet untried Third, Fourth, Sixth and Seventh.

Its exorbitant instrumental and choral demands probably make the colossal Eighth out of the question here. And more's the pity, for many have rated the hearing of it an experience of a lifetime.

And Again the Mahler Fifth

The Arts in Boston

Evidently Dr. Koussevitzky is bent on promoting the cult. Having revived Mahler's Fifth Symphony last fall, after an interval of 23 years, he is repeating it at this week's concerts, the eighteenth pair. Next week he will play it in New York.

It is doubtful if this repetition will convert many listeners. The music demands as complete a surrender of the critical faculty on the listener's part as it did on the composer's when he wrote it. Here are fine pages, interspersed with material of the most commonplace description. One is given as much prominence, is as much insisted upon, as the other. Nothing could restrain the garrulity of the composer.

Mahler's life was tragic. He suffered much. The cause of not a little of his suffering lay in his own character. He was unable to stand aside and examine himself objectively. His heart was on his sleeve. His musical expression of grief was as naïve as that of a child. When he was hurt he cried. When he was hurt badly he cried louder. He told of his grief at great length. He did not realize that it was inevitably of greater interest to him than to others. He ended by becoming tiresome.

Nor is much of the material in this symphony of an originative inspiration. There is a theme reminiscent of "Tristan," and a melody that cries out for a musical comedy tenor; a theme of sorrow, and a common dance tune; and then a phrase from which "Bei Mir Bist Du Schön" might have been taken. Mahler makes no distinction among them. If he likes a theme or a device he repeats it endlessly.

The symphony is theatrical, and Dr. Koussevitzky made the most of its theatricalism. He obtained a performance of astonishing brilliance (with the exception of a mishap in the horn section). Mr. Mager played the trumpet part with an incomparable virtuosity and grace of phrasing. Probably the eloquence of the performance underlined the tawdriness of much of the music.

It is a pity that Mahler could not have learned something from Debussy as well as from Wagner and Bruckner. His artistic anschluss with the Teutonic genius was too unreserved. He could have done with a little discipline. We need profound emotion in music, but we need also, to make a work of art, some self-control. Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes," which followed Mahler on this oddly contrived program have perhaps too much restraint—it becomes self-conscious. Mahler has not enough. Whatever the reason for putting them on the same program, the conjunction emphasized Dr. Koussevitzky's versatility.

So also did the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Spanish Caprice," the final number. This piece, which even its composer admitted wasn't up to much, seems out of place nowadays at a symphony concert. For once, Dr. Koussevitzky's talent for program making failed him. But not his talent for eliciting the utmost from the orchestra. The playing, as playing, was thrilling.

L. A. S.

A Succession of Conductors

Monitor Mar. 1/38

By L. A. Sloper

A succession of conductors has walked of late across the platform of Symphony Hall in Boston. First among the visitors, in point of time, was Daniele Amfitheatrof, the Russo-Italian from Turin who is associate conductor with Dimitri Mitropoulos of the Minneapolis Orchestra. Following in the footsteps of his chief, Mr. Amfitheatrof took over the direction of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the fortnight of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation.

Mr. Amfitheatrof undoubtedly has conspicuous gifts as a conductor. Technically, he is well equipped. He makes a good appearance on the platform. At present he does not give evidence of having progressed very far as an interpreter. Regrettably, he seemed more devoted to effects than to musical values. Yet he did, in his brief stay in Boston, show a capacity to learn. At his first concert he permitted himself extravagances of behavior on the platform that did not make the expected impression. He was received with reserve by the audience and was taken to task by the press. The following week these mannerisms had disappeared. We saw a dignified and businesslike figure on the podium.

* * *

Quite possibly Mr. Amfitheatrof may eventually grow musically as in that week he grew in stage deportment. In his two programs in Boston he gave little indication of having penetrated deeply below the surface of a musical score. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony under his hand lacked realization of the long line. It was full of violent contrasts in pace and dynamics, but was wanting in clarity and proportion. Scriabin's "Divin Poème" was more within his range. He gave it a reading that was vivid and at the same time literal, full of color but lacking in the architectural quality. Beethoven's Overture "Leonore" No. 3 was surprisingly unexciting, in view of its dramatic character.

Otherwise Mr. Amfitheatrof's programs contained Italian works, including an "American Panorama" of his own. This work, which calls for a steel bar and an automobile siren, among other odd instruments, was written several years before its composer saw America. It is a synthetic work, already out of date, which does not need to be heard at a symphony concert, though it might serve on a popular program.

Artur Rodzinski brought his Cleveland Orchestra here for a single concert. The organization had not visited Boston before in 12 years. Mr. Rodzinski's reputation as a conductor does not need to be stressed; he is known in New York and in Salzburg as well as in Cleveland, and as an operatic as well as a symphonic conductor. He took over the direction of the Cleveland Orchestra several years ago. It is a well-drilled body which plays with precision and incisiveness. Having fewer than the standard number of players, it naturally cannot muster the fullness of tone of the eastern orchestras, nor has it attained the utmost in beauty of tone, or in flexibility.

Mr. Rodzinski led clean-cut performances of a Bach transcription, the Shostakovich First Symphony and two Strauss items, scenes from "Salome" and "Till Eulenspiegel." In the final scene from "Salome" Rose Pauly revealed to the Bostonese for the first time her powerful voice, which is dramatically expressive though not without flaws from the viewpoint of pure vocalism. Mr. Rodzinski's Dance of the Seven Veils was barbaric but remarkably chaste; his "Till" was a little mechanical.

Eugene Ormandy, another newcomer to Boston, led the Philadelphia Orchestra through two programs, in both of which it was assisted by the distinguished pianist Jan Smeterlin. This orchestra maintains its position in the first rank. It is a superb instrument, tonally brilliant and interpretatively eloquent.

* * *

Mr. Ormandy is an interesting conductor. As a program maker he rather studiously follows the example of his co-conductor, Mr. Stokowski. Like Mr. Rodzinski (also a Stokowski protégé) he opened each program with a transcription. The major items of his two lists were the Brahms First Symphony and the Beethoven Seventh. Mr. Smeterlin played the Mozart A major Concerto at one concert and the Strauss "Burlesque" at the other. Mr. Ormandy gave vigorous and virtuosic performances of the symphonies, but permitted himself certain liberties in interpretation which marred them. On the whole he gave the impression that he was more interested in details than in the works as a whole. The most satisfying item in performance was Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," to which, with the help of some magnificent playing, particularly by Mr. Kincaid the flutist, he gave an exceptionally poetic realization. He treated this music as pure fantasy of a dream world, making no effort to invest it with an emotional depth which does not belong to it.

Another guest, who made a profound impression, was Nadia Boulanger from Paris, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first performance of Fauré's Requiem, with the Bach Cantata Club supplying the chorus. This exalted score, which seems to go straight back to the true sources of modern French music in Rameau and Couperin, with no concessions either to Wagner or to the anti-Wagnerians, came to moving utterance under the direction of this able musician, who is utterly free of mannerisms and completely devoted to the revelation of a musical message.

* * *

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor of the Boston orchestra, also led a pair of concerts, in which the Chausson Symphony and a symphony by the Belgian Marcel Poot were the chief items. The Poot opus proved to be unimportant, but amusing and charming.

Dr. Koussevitzky has given us several new works in the course of the regular concerts. Edward Burlingame Hill's Symphony No. 3, in G major, was very welcome. This Harvard professor has written many agreeable scores in the French manner, but this time he has added to his technical and scholarly accomplishments a new vigor and freedom of expression, a substance and an emotional depth that on a first hearing seemed destined to place the work in the front rank of American compositions in this form.

At another concert Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Starokadomsky's Concerto for orchestra, classic in form, romantic in mood, more Russian than Marxian. Yehudi Menuhin played the Schumann Concerto, which left the same impression in Boston as it had in other cities, namely that it would have been better to leave it in the Berlin archives.

First "Matthew" Passion Records; Some Other Recent Vocal Releases

Mar. 1/38

In sheer size as well as musical importance the Victor recording of the Bach "St. Matthew Passion," which is now being released in sections, is probably the outstanding achievement in the history of phonograph records. It requires a total of twenty-seven twelve-inch records (fifty-three sides). An adequate performance of the masterpiece requires orchestra, two choruses and a quintet of expert solo singers, not to mention harpsichordist and organist.

Victor seized on the occasion last spring when the work was produced at a Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor). The recording was picked up from the actual concert-hall performance. (A performance especially for the records would have been, it is said, prohibitively expensive.)

The first album (M-411), containing ten records, reveals certain faults in reproduction that are inevitable when the recording is made under the stated circumstances — things like audience noises poor management of the breaks at the end of the several sides, and so forth. Similarly the musical performance is not impeccable, especially in the case of the uneven solo-singers, who include Jeannette Vreeland, Kathryn Meisle, John Priebe, Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner. But these detractions, serious or not, as the case may be, can be reserved for later discussion, when the whole recording shall have been released. For the present it is sufficient to hail Victor and the performers dynamically led by Dr. Koussevitzky for a notable enterprise.

Melchior, singing with almost as much conviction as in Wagnerian music-drama Strauss' "Zueignung," "Caecilie" and "Heimliche Aufforderung" (Victor ten-inch). And there is Marian Anderson, not perhaps at her best in "Die Mainacht" by Brahms and "Der Nussbaum" by Schumann (Victor 14610), but an engrossing singer still.

The Westminster Choir, directed by John Finley Williamson, sings Bach's Motet, "Singet dem Herrn" (Victor 1845, ten-inch, and 14613, twelve-inch). The work deserves recording, but the result is not too happy, whether because of faulty singing, lack of clarity in reproduction or both.

M. S.

Prov Journal Mar 2

MUSIC

Fine Concert Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra

By G. Y. Loveridge

A magnificent concert (that is to say, one that fell in rather well with this department's prejudices) was given in Metropolitan Theatre last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Raya Garbousava, young Russian 'cellist, was soloist.

The orchestra's facets were made to glitter in a program requiring virtuoso work in all directions. Haydn, Tchaikovsky and Saint-Saens were the composers chosen. The Saint-Saens symphony No. 3, in C-minor, was given its first performance in this city.

Haydn opened the program, and nobody can do it better. His symphony No. 99 (composers had plenty of breath in his day) was the selection. The orchestra was whittled down to a size that would make a modern composer feel handcuffed, but the music was excellent. For these men a Haydn symphony is no work at all, but Dr. Koussevitzky does not approach such a symphony less respectfully or less enthusiastically than he does a more complicated score. He draws from it all the grace and good humor and abundant spirits that it possesses, and makes one wonder just what is meant by "progress" in music.

The menuetto with its hearty accents was delightful, and the swift dancing of the strings in the vivace was probably far beyond what Papa Haydn himself ever heard or even imagined.

Very few persons seemed to be looking at the orchestra after Miss Garbousava arrived on the stage. She is a blonde young lady, wore an orchid gown and silver slippers, and played the 'cello with style and agility. The variations on a rococo theme, by Tchaikovsky, were performed by her. She has a light but songful tone and a nimble left hand that is accurate. Now and then an harmonic was not clear, and there was occasional lack of clarity in passages requiring the bow to bounce, but the general polish and verve of the performance impressed the audience so strongly that Miss Garbousava was applauded into view half a dozen times.

The Saint-Saens symphony appealed to this listener a good deal. In contrast to the meager instrumental requirements of the Haydn opus, this work adds the organ, the piano and other trifles. But it does not add them at random or simply to increase the noise. The instrumentation throughout is adept, the transformations of the principal theme are very ingenious, and the variations in rhythm are skillful.

The second theme of the finale is especially charming and was sung by the strings with fine effect. The weaving of the various orchestral voices, the brisk utterances of the trumpets, the delicate voice of the piano and the full, assertive chords on the organ rouse an inescapable excitement in the listener, and one perceives everywhere a hand that had both judgment and imagination.

Dr. Koussevitzky thundered farewell with one of the famous fortissimos that no other orchestra seems to equal. How we enjoy them! Yet sometimes the inevitability of them dilutes the power, just as when the good people always win in the movies.

The program:

Haydn ....Symphony in E-flat, No. 99
I. Adagio; Vivace assai
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
IV. Vivace
Tchaikovsky—Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 33
Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78
I. Adagio. Allegro moderato; Poco adagio
II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
Feb. 25/38

WOMAN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY—Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, head of the department of music at the Ecole Normale in Paris and professor of harmony at the American academy at Fontainebleau, is pictured in Boston where she conducted the Boston Symphony orchestra in a concert. No woman ever had conducted the Boston orchestra previously.

THE ORCHESTRAS

N.Y. Tribune - March 6/38

Three Boston Concerts

Serge Koussevitzky will devote Thursday night's program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall to Mahler's fifth symphony, in C sharp minor; Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice. Saturday afternoon's program will close with Saint-Saens's symphony in C minor, with Albert W. Snow as assisting organist. The first half of the program, changed from the original announcement, includes Haydn's symphony in E flat, No. 99, and Hindemith's "Concert Music" for strings and brass instruments, Op. 50. This was composed in 1930 for the Boston Symphony's fiftieth anniversary, and has been played here by this orchestra on March 5, 1932, and April 5, 1934.

The Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakoff works will also be heard Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music in a program including Prokofieff's Classical Symphony and Brahm's second symphony.

Neither the Mahler nor the Saint-Saens symphonies have been played here before under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. The Mahler symphony was last played here in full by the Philharmonic-Symphony under Bruno Walter in February, 1932. The Saint-Saens symphony was performed here under Mr. Toscanini in January, 1934; it had two performances here in 1937 by Federal Music Project Orchestras.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

FEB 22 1938

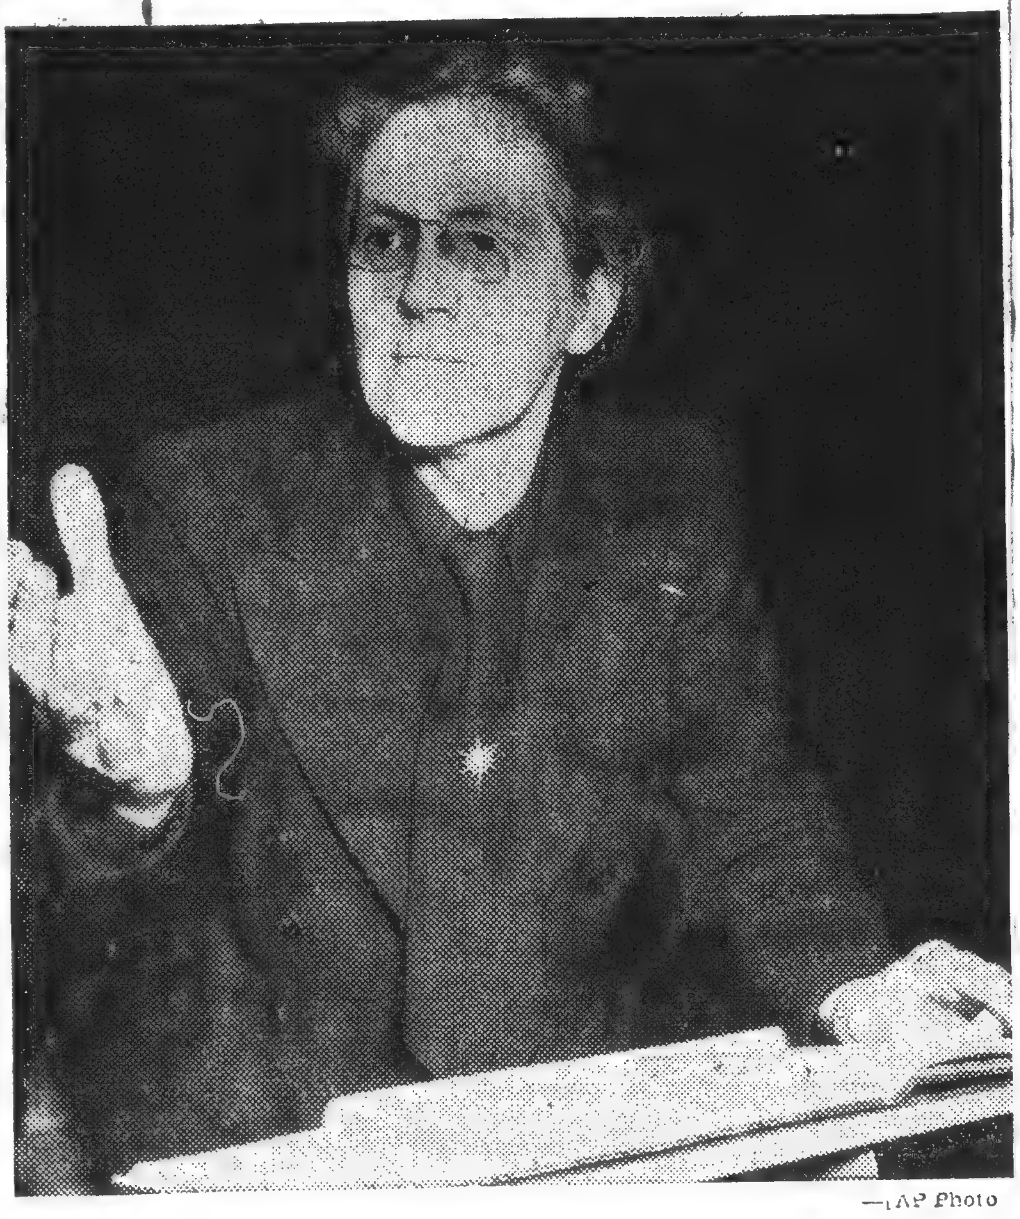
Boston is having varied and stimulating musical visitors these last few weeks. There was guest conductor Amfiteatroff from the Minneapolis Symphony; Rodzinski with the Cleveland; Ormandy with the Philadelphia, and now Nadia Boulanger of Paris, teacher of many American moderns in composition and domiciled till June at Radcliffe. Friday and Saturday's Symphony audiences heard her conducting of Gabriel Faure's pure and spiritual "Requiem" with the Boston Symphony for the first time ~~following~~ the beat of a woman and the Bach Cantata club obedient to a breath on her every shade of expression. In Mlle. Boulanger's honor the Musical Guild of Boston is giving a large luncheon at the Vendome today. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach ("The Year's at the Spring"), considered the foremost American composer, is also honored.

On the guest list are found the names of Mabel Adams Bennett, pianist and accompanist, formerly of this city and Gladys de Almeida, soprano, a cousin of Miss Mercedes Pitta, frequently heard here in recital. In Cambridge, there are all sorts of events concerned with Mlle. Boulanger and with Paul Hindemith who is soloist at Symphony Friday and Saturday.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 19 1938

188

Woman Leads Boston Symphony



—(AP Photo

Nadia Boulanger, famous French music teacher and organist, who directed the Boston Orchestra yesterday afternoon. Mlle. Boulanger is the first woman to conduct the 57-year-old organization. She uses no baton. At her first rehearsal she scolded the musicians for lack of feeling.

Music

Hartford Composer's Work to Be Played

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.
GAZETTE

FEB 21 1938

THE MUSIC BOX

Mme. Boulanger Still Loves Her Teaching

Mme. Nadia Boulanger, who recently arrived in Boston, from Paris, has been spoken of as the woman who was going to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra but a Boston reporter, correspondent of the New York Sun, found she almost was more interested in teaching. He says:

"Mme. Boulanger is the fragile little French lady who has just arrived here to become visiting lecturer in music at Radcliffe. Boys from Harvard are standing in line to sign up for her classes, which in itself is an upset. Usually, it's the other way around; girls from Radcliffe straining at the leash to get into the classes of some famous Harvard don.

"Before she leaves, she will disintegrate still another old Boston custom, for she will be the first woman guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"That's a Job"

"It's the sort of honor that would send most women musicians straight into seventh heaven, but she is matter-of-fact about it. A Boston reporter asked her how it felt to the first woman conductor of the famous old orchestra, and she said:

"'I've been a woman for a little over 50 years, and have gotten over my initial astonishment.

"'As for conducting an orchestra, that's a job. I don't think sex plays much part.'

"Legends have a way of clustering around this gifted little French woman, and she gets a wholesome grin out of reflecting that the most persistent legend simply isn't so.

"She did not teach George Gershwin music. She tells the story without emphasis or guile:

"'Somebody sent Gershwin to me in Paris, with the idea in mind I could teach him something.

"'I talked to him for 10 minutes. He didn't bring along any score. Although I wasn't well acquainted with his work, I did recognize that he knew music.

"'But I had nothing to offer him. He was already quite well known when he came to my house, and I suggested that he was doing all right and should continue.

"'I told him what I could teach him wouldn't help him much along his own road, and he agreed. The interview lasted 10 minutes.

"'Never have I regretted the outcome. He died famous, and I haven't the slightest suspicion he regretted it, either. Only a waste of money.'

Five Feet Four

"The woman who wouldn't take Gershwin on as a pupil stands around 5 feet four in her low-heeled shoes. That's only approximate. She has white hair, done into a soft roll piled up on the back of her neck. She has bright, birdlike eyes. Candidly, this interviewer can't say offhand whether they are blue, brown or gray. But they are alert and inquiring.

"She wears black shoes and stockings, and, usually, black gowns, which manage to give the impression of a uniform. There's usually a silver chain around her neck, and an old-fashioned sunburst in her black tie.

"Talking to her, you have to watch very closely to observe these things, because you have trouble taking your eyes off her hands. They are the most eloquent hands since Bernhardt's. Swift as swallows, graceful as swans, they express every emotion with a richness and a vigor that makes mere speech seem inadequate.

"She can register indifference, indignation, enthusiasm, despair, irritation, without opening her mouth.

Piston Among Pupils

"Mme. Nadia is refreshing. At heart, she is a music teacher. The kind you used to go to. Remember? Walk up and make your bow and hope you've got the lesson down pat.

"Some of her pupils are quite celebrated. Prof. Walter Piston, for instance. He is the head of the music department at Harvard. He still calls her "ma'am" and bows from the waist when he calls.

"One gathers from a brief talk that Nadia prefers teaching. She remembers her pupils and follows their careers with an Auntie Caroline interest. A Boston reporter made bold to ask her if she hadn't found teaching pretty boring, at times. Probably remembering his own music teacher, and his own reactions when he went to take the inevitable and unescapable piano lesson.

"'I have been teaching for 34 years,' she stated, primly. 'If I have been boring myself, I have wasted all that time.

"'No. I love teaching. Always there is the possibility you will uncover a genius.'

"She has uncovered a few, even if she did pass up the job of polishing off Gershwin."

PAGE INDEX TO FEATURES

Classified	17	Screen Gossip	10
Cross Word	15	Serial Story	16
Editorials	6	Shipping News	15
Financial	14, 15	Sports	12, 13
Radio	15	Theatres	10

EIGHTEEN PAGES—TWO CENTS

Entered as 2d Class Matter at Boston P. O.
Copyright, 1938, by Post Pub. Co.

The Boston Post

TUESDAY, MARCH 1, 1938 **

Established 1831.

EIGHTEEN PAGES—TWO CENTS

THE GREAT
Breakfast Table Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND

Art has nothing whatsoever to do with social troubles. Real art is abstract with no relation to material things.—Serge Koussevitzky.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

FEB 26 1938

..Music and Other Notes..

The Boston Symphony orchestra will present its 245th concert in Providence at the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening at 8:15. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct an unusual and very interesting program which opens with the Haydn Symphony in E flat, No. 99, of the series written for performance in London. The brilliant young Russian 'cellist, Raya Garbousova, as soloist, will play the Rococo Variations of Tschaikowsky. Born in Caucasia and graduated from the Conservatory of Tiflis, she has toured extensively in Russia and played in all the principal countries of Europe. Her American debut was made in the 1934-35 season when she appeared with the Philadelphia and Detroit orchestras. She appeared with the Boston Symphony orchestra in Boston in the autumn of 1935 and again this season. The program closes with the Third Symphony in C minor, opus 78, by Saint-Saens, which will be the first performance of this composition in Providence by this orchestra. This symphony, written on a large scale and using the full sonority of the orchestra added to that of the organ, was recently performed with outstanding success in Boston. The organist on Tuesday will be Albert W. Snow.

The Haydn symphony was written in 1793 and is No. 10 in a series of symphonies which he was commissioned to write during his two visits to London. It is No. 99 in a list of 104 authentic symphonies. Some of these have names such as the Surprise (No. 94), the Military (No. 100) the Clock (No. 101) and the Drum Roll (No. 103).

Haydn was a devout Christian and on all his scores may be found written "In nomine Domini" at the beginning and "laus deo" at the end. His manuscripts are remarkable for their neatness and have few corrections. Haydn is quoted as saying: "I never put anything down till I have quite made up my mind about it." He did much of his composing at the piano. He once said, "the invention of a fine melody is a work of genius." His compositions are strong in their framework and rich in their design. Their themes and melodies are original and Haydn's music is above all, spontaneous and cheerful. This Symphony in E flat has the usual four movements, first an adagio which soon swings into a vivace, then a typical Haydn adagio with a serenely beautiful melody. The third movement is a menuetto (allegretto) which is dainty and crisp and the last movement is a vivace, tossed off in the jolly manner of writing in which Haydn excelled.

The variations on a Rococo theme for violoncello and orchestra are opus 33 in the list of Tschaikowsky's compositions. They come directly after the symphonic fantasy, Francesca da Rimini and only three numbers before the great Symphony No. 4, which is Opus No. 36. The title of these Variations (there are seven) suggests the florid decoration of the Louis XV period. They become increasingly formidable.

Camille Saint-Saens was born in Paris, Oct. 9, 1835 and died in Algiers, Dec. 16, 1921. He was a pianist, organist, composer and author. He was also a great traveler and especially enjoyed trips to northern Africa. He came to United States in 1906 and again in 1915 when he represented France at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco. On his first concert tour here his five piano concertos were heard in New York with Walter Damrosch conducting the orchestra and the composer playing the solo piano. He was then over 70. At the first New York performance of this symphony No. 3, Damrosch conducted and Saint-Saens played the organ.

At Cambridge University in May 1892, the honorary degree, doctor of music was conferred on a group of five composers of different countries. The group included Saint-Saens of France, Boito of Italy, Grieg of Norway, Bruch of Germany and Tschaikowsky of Russia. In his book, "My Musical Life," Walter Damrosch speaks of a thrilling performance of this Third Symphony which he conducted at the Salle du Conservatoire on July 14, 1919. Bastille Day is exciting enough in Paris any year but at the time of the World war to have an American conduct an orchestra hastily assembled from all parts to perform a concert of French music was thrilling and significant. At this performance Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who visited Providence last evening, played the organ and M. Longy who had played oboe in the Boston Symphony for many years, came into the group to play oboe.

In 1921 Saint-Saens was made honorary director of Conservatoire American at Fontinebleau. He held this post for less than a year for his death occurred in December of that first year. He was succeeded by Widor and at Widor's death Ravel was appointed to the position. Saint-Saens is credited with keeping French music safe from the influence of Wagner and to him fell that task rather than that of blazing new trails. His technical command of orchestration and sense of form are very fine. His organ symphony is considered his masterpiece. It is scored for three flutes, two oboes, one English horn, two clarinets and one bass clarinet, two bassoons and one double bassoon, four horns, thre trumpets, three trombones, one tuba, three kettledrum, organ, piano (sometimes for two hands and sometimes for four) one triangle a pair of cymbals a bassdrum and the usual number of strings.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS

FEB 27

The long awaited recording of the first part of Bach's St. Matthew Passion proves an admirable addition to discology. This tremendous composition, probably the foremost work of its kind in the history of musical art, is a distinct achievement in the annals of recording.

It was recorded from an actual performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, G. Wallace, conductor.

The participating soloists are Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priebe, tenor; Keith Faulkner and Fritz Lechner, bassos.

The recitatives are played in emeinent fashion on the harpsichord by Dr. V. Ernst Wolff, and Carl Weinrich is at the organ.

The orchestra instrumental soloists include Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz, violins; Alfred Zighera, viola da gamba; Louis Speyer and Henry Stanislaus, English horns and oboi da caccia; George Laurent, flute, and Jean Devergie and Louis Speyer, oboi d'amore.

The recorded section of this mighty work embraces the first 32 numbers of the total 78, the remainder of which will be released before Easter. The playing of the 20 sides of ten 12-inch discs requires approximately 12 minutes.

The commendable co-operation of the audience at the time of recording accounts for remarkable absence of extraneous sounds.

Every detail of the score requirements has been dealt with in a manner that exalts artistic expression of its content. The single and double choruses, the individual efforts of the soloists are beautifully merged with the orchestral part to produce a memorable performance a large share of which is due to the incomparable leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The text, sung in English, approximates that which accompanies the records. Since at least three different texts were used in the performance by various soloists and the choruses, it has been necessary to prepare the present version, a combination of several, from the recorded performance. Therefor, the text, as contained in the accompanying booklet does not correspond with any other published version, but does correspond with the records.

Professor Archibald T. Davison, of the Division of Music, Harvard University, contributes to the booklet an informing discussion of the Passion form and Bach's work itself.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
March 2/38

Koussevitzky Would Rather Save His Neck

It wasn't until Robert Bacon, Young Boston artist, sketched Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the world discovered the famous conductor has long flouted social tradition by wearing a soft collar with full dress.

Officials explained that Dr. Koussevitzky is not attempting to start a new style trend, but merely to ease his neck during concerts, when his head is almost constantly in motion.

SYRACUSE, N. Y.
POST - STANDARD

FEB 27 1938

'BOX OF WIRES,' HARPSICHORD, IN COMEBACK

NEW YORK, Feb. 26. (AP)—The "box of wires" is making a comeback, after a century. But Ernst Victor Wolff, one of its most illustrious propagandists, doesn't want it to be too popular.

The box of wires is, more properly, the harpsichord, and it looks like a slightly shrunken piano, with a double row of keys and a cluster of seven or more pedals instead of the piano's three.

And Dr. Wolff is one of the many gifted German Jews for whom the present German regime has no further use. Dr. Wolff plays piano as well as harpsichord, is one of the most widely known of European vocal coaches, is a musicologist with many discoveries to his credit, and plays, in off moments, a good deal of table tennis.

Dr. Wolff has been in this country only a couple of years this trip. But he attended Harvard, and his English is probably better than yours.

EARS CAN'T STAND WHOLE PROGRAM

"I don't think," he says, "that our modern ears can stand a whole program of harpsichord music. That is why, when I play recitals, I always insist on doing half of the program on the piano.

"The point is that the harpsichord sounds right in the music written for it—music of the 18th century, for example. Somebody says the tone is like a scratch with a whine on the end of it, and there is something in the description. Nowadays, it is a kind of musical confection, not to be over-indulged in."

But Dr. Wolff finds a lot to do with the instrument, just the same.

For example, he will go to the Bethlehem Bach festival in May, because Bach wrote harpsichord parts into the accompaniment of many of his cantatas and so forth, and these sound better on the harpsichord than on a piano.

DOES RECORDING

When Koussevitzky gives such a work as the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" Dr. Wolff goes to Boston. He does a good deal of recording; when, however, he records a Schubert sonata as he did recently, he changes his harpsichord for a piano, because the music was written for that instrument.

There's really only one difficulty about playing a harpsichord these days, Dr. Wolff thinks. It's that you have to take your instrument with you—you can't telegraph a music store and have a box of wires sent to the hall.

Which is why an express truck is backed up to the Wolff apartment much of the time. Originally Dr. Wolff had the harpsichord carried all the way up to his apartment each time; there's a vacant suite on the first floor now, however, and between journeys the expressmen just stand it there.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
MAR 2 - 1938

Concert in Providence

Society Hears Boston Orchestra; Richmonds, Allens Give Dinner

PROVIDENCE, March 1.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert tonight was preceded by dinners given by Mrs. Frank E. Richmond, of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. Arthur M. Allen (Martha Baird).

Colonial Dames in Rhode Island including Mrs. Walter S. Ball, Mrs. Henry S. Chafee, Mrs. Ivory Littlefield, Miss Margaret Stearns and others will motor to Boston Thursday to be guests of Mrs. Henry Endicott at luncheon at her home, preceding the unveiling of a tablet in Old North Church. Officers of Colonial Dames societies in the thirteen original states also will attend.

Mrs. Harold W. Clapp, of Melbourne, Australia, is here visiting her brother-in-law and sister, Mr. and Mrs. Harold C. Field.

Mrs. W. Harold Hoffman has returned from Sea Island, Ga.

Mr. and Mrs. Emerson P. Smith and Miss Elizabeth Wheeler Innis are at Lovett's, Franconia, N. H., for skiing The Misses Nancy Peck and Harriet Binney Richmond also are in New Hampshire.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

FEB 28 1938

COMPOSER AIDS AMATEURS.—Paul Hindemith, considered by many to be the most important living German composer, now with the Boston Symphony orchestra, says his greatest interest is simplifying music for amateurs.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

1938

Raya Garbousava, 'Cellist, to Play

The next-to-the-last of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts here will take place in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night, with Raya Garbousava, 'cellist, as soloist. She will play the variations on a rococo theme by Tchaikovsky.

For the rest of the program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the Symphony No. 99, in E-flat, by Haydn, and the Saint-Saens Symphony in C-Minor, with organ. Albert Snow will be organist. It will be the first hearing of the symphony in this city.

The Haydn symphony, with which the concert begins, is the 10th of his 12 "London" symphonies. They were written for the subscription series arranged by Salomon and were first performed in London. The one to be heard tomorrow night was composed in Vienna in 1793 and was first played in London in 1794 or 1795, while Haydn was on his second visit to that city. The four movements are adagio, vivace assai; adagio, menuetto and vivace. The London symphonies are commonly judged to be the best of the more than 100 written by this first master of the form.

The Tchaikovsky variations for 'cello were written in December, 1876, the year before he composed his fourth symphony and the opera "Eugene Onegin." The variations were dedicated to Wilhelm Karl Friedrich Fitzenhagen, an instructor at the Moscow Conservatory and first 'cellist of the Imperial Musical Society.

Miss Garbousava was born in Caucasia. When still a girl she graduated from the Conservatory of Tiflis. After tours in Europe she came to this country in the season of 1934-35 and was soloist with the Detroit and Philadelphia Orchestras. She played with the Boston Orchestra in the next season, and also last December.

Saint-Saens composed the organ symphony for the London Philharmonic Society and conducted the first performance of it in London on May 19, 1886. It is dedicated to the memory of Franz Liszt.

"This symphony is divided into two parts, after the manner of Saint-Saens' fourth concerto for piano and orchestra and sonata for piano and violin," the composer wrote in an analysis for the first London performance. "Nevertheless, it includes practically the traditional four movements: the first, checked in development, serves as an introduction for the adagio, and the scherzo is connected, after the same manner, with the finale. The composer has thus sought to shun in a certain measure the interminable repetitions which are more and more disappearing from instrumental music.

"The composer thinks that the time has arrived for the symphony to benefit by the progress of modern instrumentation, and he therefore establishes his orchestra as follows: three flutes, two oboes, English horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, three kettledrums, organ, pianoforte (now for two hands and now for four), triangle, a pair of cymbals, bass drum and the usual strings."

G. Y. L.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

No 'Choker' Collar For Koussevitzky

Boston, March 1—(AP.)—It took an artist's keen eye to reveal that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, long has sacrificed style for comfort in his evening attire.

Robert Bacon, young Boston artist, sketched the famous conductor in full evening dress, but wearing a soft collar with his white tie. Style-startled skeptics checked up with photographs over a long period, and found it was true.

Orchestra officials hastened to explain that Koussevitzky wasn't attempting to start a new style trend. Directing partly by movement of his head, he found that the "choker" type of hard collar hurt his neck.

198

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Concert on Friday To Be Society Highlight in Brooklyn

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, is a highlight in the borough's social picture next week. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the orchestra in a program in which Brahms' Second Symphony and Prokofieff's Classical Symphony are featured.

The women's committee, which will aid in the twenty-second annual campaign of the Brooklyn Boy Scouts Council to raise $50,000 for the 13,000 local scouts, will launch its drive at a luncheon Monday at the Bossert. The committee, the first women's group to work for the Brooklyn scouts, is headed by Mrs. Earle Phinias Huff.

Mrs. Leighton Palmer Coleman, new chairman of production of the Brooklyn Red Cross, will be honored at a tea to be given Thursday by Miss Grace Stuart Murty, of 351 Macon St. Chairmen of Red Cross church auxiliaries in the borough have been invited.

Next Saturday evening will be a gala occasion for members of Packer Collegiate Institute's junior class, when their annual play, "The Goose Hangs High," is presented at Packer Chapel. In the cast are Helen Nagle, Muriel Maas, Janet Swan, Charlotte Crawford, Margretta Love, Vivian Hannabergh, Virginia Leppold, Marjorie Callahan and Virginia Shatara. Ushers will be Marion Sherwood, Elda Montesi, Miriam Lashley, Elizabeth Bowers, Aline Mahnken, Muriel Leonsi, Elinor Conley and Betsy Clarke.

Today the Pratt Institute Kindergarten Training School is holding its annual luncheon at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, with Miss Alice Fitts, former director, as honor guest.

The world premiere of James Bridie's "The Black Eye," in which the Brattleboro Players appear tonight at the St. Felix Street Theater, will be a benefit for the Brooklyn Children's Society. Mrs. Earl D. Harris and Mrs. Bruce D. Bromley are in charge.

The Chaminade's second musicale of the season will be held Wednesday morning at the Towers Hotel. Guest artists will be Alice Erickson, violinist; Virginia Peterson, 'cellist; John Seagle, baritone, with Nathan Price accompanist, and the Beaux Art Trio, composed of Edith Schiller, Alice Erickson and Virginia Peterson. Vivian Gustavson Smith, contralto and member of the Chaminade Choral, will represent the Chaminade.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y.
REPORTER
MAR 3 - 1938

"Requiem" To Be Sung Here

Gabriell Faure's Masterpiece Will Be Heard At M. E. Church

At the 4 o'clock vesper service in Memorial Methodist Episcopal Church on Sunday, March 13th, Gabriel Faure's "Requiem" will be presented for the first time in this city. The Memorial Church choir, under the direction of Theodore Schaefer, will sing this work, which has seldom been heard in this country.

The "Requiem" which offers fine opportunities in both choral and solo singing was recently performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Nadia Boulanger, the eminent French musician, as conductor.

Faure, a contemporary of Debussy, was particularly noted for his songs, and this "Requiem" is one of his few outstanding religious works.

This will be the third musical vesper service to be given by the Memorial Methodist choir this season.

All are invited to attend the service.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 2 - 1938

Smith College

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

Will Conclude Series at Smith College

NORTHAMPTON, March 1—The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a concert at Smith College in John M. Greene Hall at 8 p. m. Tuesday. This concert is the sixth and last of the Smith College concert series.

The program, subject to revision, includes pieces by modern composers, "Classical Symphony, Op. 25" by Prokofieff; "Symphony No. 2 'Elegiaca,'" by Malipiero; and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 6 - 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA TO APPEAR FRIDAY

Fourth Concert of Season to Be at Brooklyn Academy—Dancer Listed Tuesday

ARION MUSICALE TONIGHT

Society to Honor Late Singer—Ballet Russe to Give Final Program Today

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will include Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25; Debussy's Nocturnes, Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34, and Brahms's Symphony 2 in D major, Op. 73.

The Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra are under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn and the Brooklyn committee. Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman of the Brooklyn committee, said the response to the Brooklyn concerts has been enthusiastic.

Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock will be the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee. Other boxholders will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Miss Florence Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 5 - 1938

Next Week's Program Of Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, led by Serge Koussevitsky, makes it fourth visit of the season to New York next week with a pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall. The program Thursday evening includes Mahler's Fifth Symphony, Debussy's nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes; Rimsky Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol, and Saturday afternoon Saint Saens' C Minor Symphony, Haydn's E flat major symphony (No. 99) and Paul Hindemith's Konzert Musik.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

Boston Symphony To Play Tuesday

Will Conclude Series at Smith College

NORTHAMPTON, March 2 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a concert at Smith College in John M. Greene Hall at 8 p. m. Tuesday. This concert is the sixth and last of the Smith College concert series.

The program, subject to revision, includes pieces by modern composers, "Classical Symphony, Op. 25" by Prokofieff; "Symphony No. 2 'Elegiaca,'" by Malipiero; and Sibelius' "Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 26 1938

• Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins next ~~week's music~~ activities, with a concert in Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has selected the following program:

Symphony in E-flat, No. 99 .... Haydn
I. Adagio: Vivace assai
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
IV. Vivace
Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello, with Orchestral Accompaniment, opus 33 .... Tschaikowski
Symphony in C-minor ...o. 3, opus 78 .... Saint-Saens
I. Adagio. Allegro moderato. Poco adagio
II. Allegro moderato; Presto, Maestoso; Allegro.

The variations will be performed by Raya Garbousava, a young Russion who first came to this country in 1934. She was born in Caucasia and is a graduate of the Conservatory of Tiflis. She has been soloist with the Philadelphia, Boston and Detroit orchestras.

The Saint-Saens symphony makes use of an organ.. Albert Snow will be organist. The symphony has not been performed in this city.

The Haydn symphony is one of the dozen written for performance in London in the Saloman series..

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 28 1938

MUSIC

Garbousava, 'Cellist, with Symphony Here Tomorrow Night

The next-to-the-last of the season's Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts ~~here will~~ take place in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night, with Raya Garbousava, 'cellist, as soloist. She will play the variations on a rococo theme by Tchaikovsky.

For the rest of the program, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen the Symphony No. 99, in E-flat, by Haydn, and the Saint-Saens Symphony in C-Minor, with organ. Albert Snow will be organist. It will be the first hearing of the symphony in this city.

The Haydn symphony, with which the concert begins, is the 10th of his 12 "London" symphonies. They were written for the subscription series arranged by Salomon and were first performed in London. The one to be heard tomorrow night was composed in Vienna in 1793 and was first played in London in 1794 or 1795, while Haydn was on his second visit to that city. The four movements are adagio, vivace assai; adagio, menuetto and vivace. The London symphonies are commonly judged to be the best of the more than 100 written by this first master of the form.

The Tchaikovsky variations for 'cello were written in December, 1876, the year before he composed his fourth symphony and the opera "Eugene Onegin." The variations were dedicated to Wilhelm Karl Friedrich Fitzenhagen, an instructor at the Moscow Conservatory and first 'cellist of the Imperial Musical Society.

Miss Garbousava was born in Caucasia. When still a girl she graduated from the Conservatory of Tiflis. After tours in Europe she came to this country in the season of 1934-35 and was soloist with the Detroit and Philadelphia Orchestras. She played with the Boston Orchestra in the next season, and also last December.

Saint-Saens composed the organ symphony for the London Philharmonic Society and conducted the first performance of it in London on May 19, 1886. It is dedicated to the memory of Franz Liszt.

"This symphony is divided into two parts, after the manner of Saint-Saens' fourth concerto for piano and orchestra and sonata for piano and violin," the composer wrote in an analysis for the first London performance. "Nevertheless, it includes practically the traditional four movements: the first, checked in development, serves as an introduction for the adagio, and the scherzo is connected, after the same manner, with the finale. The composer has thus sought to shun in a certain measure the interminable repetitions which are more and more disappearing from instrumental music.

"The composer thinks that the time has arrived for the symphony to benefit by the progress of modern instrumentation, and he therefore establishes his orchestra as follows: three flutes, two oboes, English horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, three kettledrums, organ, pianoforte (now for two hands and now for four), triangle, a pair of cymbals, bass drum and the usual strings." G. Y. L.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
MAR 2 - 1938

Koussevitzky Ignores Style for Comfort In Dressing for Concert

Boston, March 1—(AP)—It took an artist's keen eye to reveal that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, long has sacrificed style for comfort in his evening attire.

Robert Bacon, young Boston artist, sketched the famous conductor in full evening dress, but wearing a soft collar with his white tie. Style-startled skeptics checked up with photographs over a long period, and found it was true.

Orchestra officials hastened to explain that Koussevitzky wasn't attempting to start a new style trend. Directing partly by movement of his head, he found that the "choker" type of hard collar hurt his neck.

WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
MAR 2 - 1938

Conductor of Orchestra Sacrifices Style for Comfort

BOSTON, March 1—(AP)—It took an artist's keen eye to reveal Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Bos

---

Woman Thrills Music Lovers

Boston Evening American Photo

Praise of the highest. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra, congratulating Mlle. Nadia Boulanger of Paris after she had led his famous musical group at a special concert. This exclusive photo was taken just after Mlle Boulanger had been hailed at completion of her performance. She was the first woman to serve as a conductor of the organization. (Read Ruth Marsters' review on page 14.)

191

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

MAR 2 - 1938

Russian 'Cellist Plays With Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky conducting, presented another superb concert last evening at Metropolitan Theatre. Raya Garbousova, a brilliant young Russian cellist, made her first appearance here playing Tschaikowsky "Variations on a Rococo Theme" and the orchestra played the "Symphony in C-Minor" by Saint-Saens for the first time. A delightful Haydn "Symphony in E-Flat" opened the program.

When the Boston Symphony plays Haydn or Mozart it is worth a month at a conservatory to a student who listens intently. Every tempo mark is accurately appraised, every bit of phrasing is perfectly executed and all the ornaments are so gracefully precise that it is something at which to marvel. The strings play with the faultless ensemble of a fine string quartet. The form of the composition is delightfully unfolded as the wind instruments answer phrases given out by the strings and the whole symphony is made pleasurably comprehensible. In last night's Haydn especially fine work was done by the strings at the opening of the second Adagio by the answering reeds. The flute and bassoon were eloquent also. The Minuet was played with the typical robust German style and was especially pleasing in the trio. The Vivace went along at a swift pace and sparkled with its color contrasts.

Miss Garbousova plays her cello with artistry and musicianship. Her choice of the Rococo variations is proof that she is technically proficient. Her tone was vibrant and colorful. Her exposition of the theme left no doubt that her playing would be interesting. We liked very much the variation V where she trilled on every possible tone in the range of her instrument (or so it seemed). The orchestra gave most artistic support to the solo instrument and the audience recalled her several times in appreciation of her artistic playing.

Koussevitsky plans programs with the utmost skill and his choice of the Saint-Saens organ symphony as a companion to Haydn was a happy one. In present day orchestral writing Saint-Saens is generally considered to be pre-eminent in his grasp of the technique of form. His orchestration is clear and concise even though his score has twice as many staves per page as that of Haydn. An electric organ, played by Albert Snow, made possible the presentation of this work here. Not content with adding an organ to the full score, the composer also uses the piano for a few swift arpeggios and scales in the last movement and as the tone builds up, he makes a piano duet for a little way. This symphony is most assuredly a grand composition and as the tonal volume increased and the tonality changed to the major it became something exalted and utterly satisfactory. Surely Saint-Saens must have known and loved Browning's "Abt Vogler" and the finale of this symphony is beautifully expressed by the lines "for my resting place is found, The C Major of this life: So, now I will try to sleep." This is Saint-Saens orchestral masterpiece and Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony interpreted it superbly.

R. T.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Gives Fourth Concert of Season Next Friday

With memories still ringing fresh of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's all-Ravel concert during its last appearance in New York, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns again to conduct the orchestra in its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season, next Friday evening at 8:30 o'clock, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program Dr. Koussevitzky has selected draws from many sources, and includes: Prokofieff's Classical Symphony; Debussy's Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes"), Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful "Capriccio Espagnol,' and the Second Symphony in D Major by Johannes Brahms.

The Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president. This season's series consists of five concerts, the final one to be held on Friday evening, April 1.

NORWALK, CONN.
HOUR

MAR 2 - 1938

IN THE FEMININE WORLD—(1) Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Friedman, America's only woman cryptanalyst, who recently helped break up one of the biggest smuggling rings on the Pacific Coast, by translating twenty-seven Chinese code cablegrams. (2) Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (3) Miss Patty Berg, 19-year-old Minneapolis golfer, who has won the Grace Doherty trophy for the third consecutive year.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 2 - 1938

Swing of Fashion Makes 'Cello Favored Hobby of American Women, Artist Says

$35,000 Stradivarius of Raya Garbousova Brings Own Worries

By Gladys Van Egmond

Dear, dear, fashions in music as in other things!

It is beginning to be "very fashionable" for women, especially Americans, to play the 'cello. So says Raya Garbousova, a blonde young Russian who touched the hearts of a Providence audience with her 'cello last night.

Valued at $35,000

"There are more women in America playing the 'cello than in Paris," Miss Garbousova told the reporter in an installment interview at the Metropolitan Theatre.

But rare, indeed, are women (and men) with the agility and the opportunity to make music on an instrument like Garbousova's.

That was a Stradivarius, valued at $35,000, which was carried as carefully as a baby to the centre of the stage last night. Playing as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Miss Garbousova wore an orchid gown that seemed a pale flower against the black-suited orchestra. Only the neckline, sleeves and glimpses of skirt showed around the large instrument as the musician made it sing a Tchaikovsky theme.

Hurries After Instrument

Bowing many times in answer to applause, Miss Garbousova hurried into the wings after her Stradivarius.

Backstage assistants were cautioned to carry it with the greatest of care to the soloist's dressing room. Attendants kept a watchful eye there as Miss Garbousova joined the audience for the Saint-Saens Symphony.

"I promised Dr. Koussevitzky to listen; it's such a magnificent composition," Miss Garbousova said to the pursuing reporter at this point.

The concert at an end, Miss Garbousova returned to the wings and got herself and the Stradivarius ready for a journey. She encased it first in a huge green bag, tied at the top. Then it was laid tenderly in the ponderous case.

Never Out of Sight

To all the lackeys, carrying it down the stairs from the dressing room, out to the taxi, into the Biltmore Hotel, out again—there was the same admonition, "Please be very careful."

It was never out of her sight. Beside her in the cab, in the room, and probably at hand's reach on the sleeper back to New York, the priceless 'cello was treasured.

If you had a Stradivarius, one of six of its kind in all the world, wouldn't you ensure the same veneration and watchfulness? It carries insurance, to be sure, but if lost or stolen, only its monetary value could be regained.

"It's 200 years old," Miss Garbousova said, stroking the 'cello to demonstrate its beauty of wood and tone. "And it's as fine as ever."

Was it a gift?

"Oh, no," she answered sadly, "there are no such gifts."

RAYA GARBOUSOVA DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

The blonde Russian, 'cello soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, bade farewell to its famed conductor at the Metropolitan last night. She will return to America next year.

It came into Miss Garbousova's ownership two months ago, while less valuable 'cellos have been played by her since childhood.

Began at Seven

Snatches of the life and education of the soloist were caught in the wake of Miss Garbousova at the theatre, in the taxi and later at the hotel.

She began to play the 'cello when she was seven; the piano when she was four. She was born in 1909 in Tiflis, Caucasia. Music came naturally into her environment for her father was Professor of the Tiflis Conservatory of Music, and a member of its symphony orchestra.

The young Raya was graduated with honors from the State Conservatory in Russia and continued her studies in Moscow under a Georgian scholarship.

The rush, rush, rush of the concert tour has been her life since she was nine. From the time she finished the Conservatory at the age of 14, she has made the "long tour" as she phrased it.

Miss Garbousova remained in Russia through the Revolution and until 1925 when her concert work carried her into a larger field.

Painting "Second Passion"

She plays the piano now for her amusement only and "all the best composers are my favorites." After music, the history of painting serves as her "second passion."

Walking is the only exercise that she dares to practice since manual sports are banned to a musician chary of using her hands for anything but music.

Miss Garbousova is the wife of a Russian engineer living in Paris, and their home at 3 Rue Narcisse Diaz finds her "just sometimes" in residence.

Children?

"Only my 'cello," she said with a smile. "It is my 10 children."

Rehearses on Trains

Last night she started for New York; this morning she sailed on the Normandie for Paris. Two days after arrival, the musician will appear with a symphony orchestra and then leave Paris for the Baltic and Scandinavian countries.

"I rehearse even on the train, when it is possible," Miss Garbousova said as she packed her evening clothes at the Biltmore.

She delights in appreciation of music wherever it comes, she said, citing the story of the woman attendant on a Pullman near California. "I took a compartment and played for hours," she said. "The maid asked permission to come in and hear me. A long time I played and when I was done, my audience of one, sensitive but uneducated, said simply, 'You are really very gifted'."

That was as much as a critic's pean of praise to Raya Garbousova.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
HERALD

FIRST LADY PATRON OF VOCAL CONCERT

Mrs. Roosevelt and the new ambassador of France, Count Doynal de Saint-Quentin, are patrons for the concert to be given by the Nadia Boulanger Group of Singers at the Sulgrave Club Sunday evening at 8:45 o'clock.

Others sponsoring the musicale are Mr. and Mrs. Robert Woods Bliss, Mrs. Eugene Byrnes, Mrs. Winthrop Chanler, Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Hesselbach, Mrs. Walter E. Hilton, Capt. and Mrs. Owen C. Holleran, Miss Harriet Winslow, Mr. and Mrs. Walter Bruce Howe, Dr. and Mrs. Hans Kindler, Mrs. Hugh Roberts, Miss Julia Schelling, Dr. and Mrs. Harold Spivak, Mr. and Mrs. L. Corrin Strong and Mrs. Lawrence Townsend.

The program will present "Historical Types of Vocal Music." Mlle. Boulanger is one of the most distinguished musicians of France, and the only woman who has ever conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

192

ALEXANDRIA, INDIANA
TIMES-TRIBUNE
MAR 4 - 1938

IN THE FEMININE WORLD

(1) Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Friedman, America's only woman cryptanalyst, who recently helped break up one of the biggest smuggling rings on the Pacific coast, by translating twenty-seven Chinese code cablegrams. (2) Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra. (3) Miss Patty Berg, 19-year-old Minneapolis golfer, who has won the Grace Doherty trophy for the third consecutive year.

CITIZEN

[illegible]

3/14/38

Boston Symphony Will Appear Tuesday Nite For Rutgers Concert

Making its fourth appearance on the Rutgers campus, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play in the University gymnasium in New Brunswick next Tuesday evening at 8:30 in the fourth presentation of the current Rutgers Concert Series.

The world famous symphonic group, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, has become one of the chief attractions of the series. Dr. Koussevitzky was awarded the honorary degree of Doctor of Music by Rutgers University at the conclusion of the concert last year and responded by departing from precedent to play an encore.

The program for next Tuesday's concert will include music by Maurice Ravel, the great French composer who died last month, and to whose memory the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and New York have been dedicated for the past two weeks. Dr. Koussevitzky will present the Second Suite from "Daphnis et Chloe" which has often been mentioned as Ravel's masterpiece.

Also on the program will be the Second Symphony of Siberlius in D major, which was recently called by Lawrence Gilman, critic "one of the most exciting and extraordinary achievements of the modern musical mind;" and Mozart's Symphony in D Major, K 504, known as the "Prague Symphony."

The Boston Symphony, now recognized as one of the world's greatest musical organizations, is in its 57th season, having been founded in 1881 by Major Higginson.

The last concert in the Rutgers series for this season, on February 21, will feature a string trio composed of Harold Bauer, pianist, Albert Spalding violinist, and Gaspar Cassado, 'cellist.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 5 - 1938

Boston Symphony Concert Friday To Be Fourth in Borough Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give the fourth in a series of five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Friday evening. The program will include Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol and the Second Symphony in D. Major of Brahms.

The orchestra will close its fifty-second borough season on Friday evening, April 1. The concerts are given under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Committee, and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 5 - 1938

MUSIC EVENTS IN BROOKLYN

The following music and dance events will be presented this coming week at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences: Tuesday, March 8, 8:15, recital by Lotte Goslar, European dancing mime; Wednesday, 8:00, Layman's Music Course, Harriet Johnson, instructor; Friday, March 11, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky conducting, in Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Debussy's "Nocturnes," Rimsky - Korsakoff's Spanish Caprice, Brahms' Second Symphony.

PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN - TELEGRAPH
MAR 5 - 1938

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Artur Schnabel, the pianist, showed their displeasure at noise in Pittsburgh auditoriums this season by stopping their concerts until quiet was assured. A device has been invented by which theatergoers can be protected against noise in the audience, so that they will hear what goes on on the stage, and that alone. It is described in tomororw's issue of the American Weekly, the Magazine Section of the Sunday Sun-Telegraph.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Will Give Concert Friday; Mrs. McClintock Hostess

MRS. THOMAS H. McCLINTOCK will be the hostess in the box of the Brooklyn committee at the next to the last in the series of five concerts comprising the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music Friday evening. The final concert of the season will be Friday evening, Aprli 1.

For the program Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has selected for the first number Prokofieff's Classical Sympohny, continuing with Debussy's Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful Capriccio Espagnol, and concluding with the Second Symphony in D Major by Johannes Brahms.

Dr. and Mrs. McClintock will entertain at dinner at their home, 158 Rutland Road, before the concert. Their guests will include Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. and Mrs. John L. Bauer and Mrs. L. Parker McKinley.

Other boxholders at the concert will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Miss Florence Logan, the Adelphi Alumnae Association of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

The appearances in Brooklyn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman.

Officers of the Brooklyn committee for the 1937-38 season in addition to Mr. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenport are: Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

Members of the Junior League Committee include: Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
[illegible]

IN RADCLIFFE CONCERT

Mrs. Hannah V. Timm of 1897 Chapel Street, New Haven, a freshman at Radcliffe, took part in the Harvard Glee Club-Radcliffe Choral Society joint concert, which Mlle. Nadia Boulanger conducted on Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mass. Mlle. Boulanger, teacher of musical composition at the Ecole Normale at Paris and the American Conservatory of Fontainebleau, came to this country to be visiting lecturer on music at Radcliffe College, where she is giving courses to Harvard as well as Radcliffe students. As the first woman to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra she directed them recently in the Faure Requiem.

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 6 - 1938

#1

MONDAY-TUESDAY SERIES

Robert Casadesus, the distinguished French pianist, will make his first appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra when he is heard as soloist at the next pair of concerts in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, in Symphony hall, to be given on March 21 and 22. Mr. Cassadesus will appear with the orchestra in Vincent d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air, and Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.

Boston American [illegible], Mar. 7/38

GIRL About TOWN

By ANN MARSTERS

In a little room off the first balcony of Symphony Hall, you may see a collection of odd and ancient musical instruments.

The instruments were assembled, originally, as a hobby of a noted French musician, Henri Casadesus, and some were placed in actual concert use by him and his family. (They became experts at playing obsolete instruments.)

Ann Marsters

It was Dr. Koussevitsky who suggested Boston should have the collection, since it outlines the evolution of the modern orchestra. So the money was raised, and "presented on October 23rd, 1926, by Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in loving memory of its founder, Henry L. Higginson."

There are 145 pieces in the collection, and its value is between $40,000 and $75,000.

You wouldn't imagine, by looking at some of them, that they are the ancestors of present familiar instruments. There is, for one, the Serpent, which resembles its name. It's the forerunner of the bassoon and had quite a vogue in the 17th century.

Then there's the Hurdy-Gurdy and, although the name survived, the instrument did not. It looks like a large mandolin.

One of the oldest string instruments is called the "Nun's Fiddle." There are two reasons for its name. One is that its scale corresponds with the range of the female voice. Then, too, it had only one string and was extremely easy to play. So easy, in fact, that even a mere female could play it.

* * *

To have a steeple or not to have a steeple seems to be the question that is troubling a lot of persons.

A great many of us have never seen or heard of a Christian Science church with a spire—but the First Church of Newton is this week completing a spire on the church at Walnut and Cabot streets in Newtonville.

COLUMBUS, O.
CITIZEN
[illegible]

* * *

British Baritone

IT has been my pleasure to hear Keith Falkner in the Cincinnati May Festival performances of 1935 and 1937, and to have heard a number of his recordings, most notably those of Bach's Matthew-Passion made by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last spring in which he sang the lines allotted to Christ. It is with unusually keen anticipation, therefore, that I look toward his Columbus appearances, next week at Mees Hall, as soloist with the Chapel Choir of Capital University.

His voice is a bass-baritone of notable richness and warmth. No singer has visited our platforms who has more of the many-sided artistry expected and too seldom found in recitalists. By dint of simple and beautiful singing, with no non-musical distractions, he is able to hold his hearers in the hollow of his hand.

The program which he will share with the Chapel Choir, of which Ellis E. Snyder is director, will be given Sunday afternoon, March 13, at 2:30, Sunday and Monday evenings at 8:30. Its details are as follows:

* * *

We Worship Thee	Ancient Chant Louvain
Ich lasse Dich nicht	J. C. Bach
Ave verum	Bailey
Awake, Awake	Christiansen
The Choir
Evening Hymn	Purcell
Vittoria, vittoria	Carissimi
Komm, susser Tod; How Jovial Is My Laughter	Bach-Daymond
Verrath; Wie bist du, meine Konigin	Brahms
The Inn	Francis Tove
I Got Me Flowers	Howells
Mr. Falkner
Laudate Dominum (Psalm 150)	Lockwood
Carol of the Doves	Gaul
Jesus and the Traders	Kodaly
Easter Bells	Christiansen
A Mighty Fortress Is Our God	C. Muller
The Choir
Lord, Make Me to Know (Requiem)	Brahms
Song of the London Watchman	Whitehead
An Abraham Lincoln Song	Damrosch
Mr. Falkner and the Choir

* * *

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 5 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY BILLS NEXT WEEK

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, will make its fourth visit, and last but one of the season, to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 10, and Saturday afternoon, March 12. The program announced for the Thursday evening concert will include Gustav Mahler's Fifth Symphony, known as the "Giant" Symphony; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol."

The program for Saturday afternoon will offer the Third Symphony in C minor by Saint-Saens, for orchestra with organ; Haydn's Symphony in E flat major, No. 99, and Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik," for an orchestra of string and brass instruments. This music was composed especially for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary and was performed by the orchestra here at that time.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 6 - 1938

Nuages and Fetes

Boston Symphony Will Play Prokofieff and Debussy Works

With memories still ringing fresh of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's all-Ravel concert during its last appearance in New York, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns again to conduct the orchestra in its fourth Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, March 11, at 8:30 o'clock, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program Dr. Koussevitzky has selected draws from many sources, beginning with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony; continuing with Debussy's Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Rimsky-Korsakov's colorful Capriccio Espagnol, and concluding with the Second Symphony in D Major by Johannes Brahms.

The Brooklyn concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president. This season's series consists of five concerts, the final one to be held on Friday evening, April 1. Response of Brooklyn audiences to the concerts has been highly enthusiastic and promises progressively successful seasons in the future.

36

193

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICL

FEB 20 1938

Berkshire Festival Expects Sellout

Stockbridge, Mass. — (AP) — Six months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. One or two have no more space.

Parallelling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston Symphony Orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will of course be Serge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage may be developed exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows now what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1½ acres; will be 325 feet wide. Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a buliding at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000. The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES

MAR 1 - 1938

Garbousova with Symphony Orchestra at Providence

Raya Garbousova, brilliant young Russian 'cellist, will be soloist at the fourth and next-to-last concert of the season given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Metropolitan Theater, Providence, tonight. Garbousova is to play Tschaikowski's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello with orchestral accompaniment. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen symphonies by Haydn and Saint-Saens for his other numbers. Saint-Saens' Third Symphony, described as a large scale work, using the full sonority of the orchestra, will include an organ. Haydn's Symphony in E-flat No. 99 will be given. The order follows:

I. Adagio; Vivace assai
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
IV. Vivace

Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello, with Orchestral Accompaniment, opus 33 ....Tschaikowski

Symphony in C-minor, No. 3, opus 78 ....Saint-Saens

I. Adagio, Allegro moderato. Pocco adagio.
II. Allegro moderator; Presto; Maestro; Allegro.

RUTLAND, VT.
HERALD

MAR 2 - 1938

Orchestra Leader Scraps 'Choker' Type Hard Collar

Officials Explain Conductor Is N Trying to Start Style Trend.

BOSTON, March 1 (AP).—It took a artist's keen eye to reveal Serg Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra, long ha sacrificed style for comfort in hi evening attire.

Robert Bacon, young Boston artis sketched the famous conductor i full-evening dress, but wearing a sof collar with his white tie. Style-startled skeptics checked up with photographs over a long period, and foun it was true.

Orchestra officials hastened to explain that Koussevitzky wasn't a tempting to start a new style tren Directing partly by movement of h head, he found that the "choker type of hard collar hurt his neck.

RACINE, WIS.
JOURNAL - TIMES

MAR 2 - 1938

Audience Etiquette

The good people of Pittsburgh got a slight jolt not so long ago when Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, stopped his players in the middle of a number and strode indignantly off the stage, because late-comers were bustling in to their seats while the music was being played.

This, probably, was a display of the much talked-of artistic temperament; but it was also a richly-deserved rebuke for the tardy, and if more performers would show the same sort of temperament the lot of the average concert-goer would be much pleasanter.

The starting-time of any concert is always announced in advance. If a patron can't get there in time, it's up to him to stand and wait until there is an intermission before hunting for his seat. By barging in while the music is being played he makes an unmitigated nuisance of himself. Mr. Koussevitzky did a good job in dramatizing the annoyance that the tardy arrival causes.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 2 - 1938

MUSIC

Fine Concert Given by Boston Symphony Orchestra

By G. Y. Loveridge

A magnificent concert (that is to say, one that fell in rather well with this department's prejudices) was given in Metropolitan Theatre last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Raya Garbousava, young Russian 'cellist, was soloist.

The orchestra's facets were made to glitter in a program requiring virtuoso work in all directions. Haydn, Tchaikovsky and Saint-Saens were the composers chosen. The Saint-Saens symphony No. 3, in C-minor, was given its first performance in this city.

Haydn opened the program, and nobody can do it better. His symphony No. 99 (composers had plenty of breath in his day) was the selection. The orchestra was whittled down to a size that would make a modern composer feel handcuffed, but the music was excellent. For these men a Haydn symphony is no work at all, but Dr. Koussevitzky does not approach such a symphony less respectfully or less enthusiastically than he does a more complicated score. He draws from it all the grace and good humor and abundant spirits that it possesses, and makes one wonder just what is meant by "progress" in music.

The menuetto with its hearty accents was delightful, and the swift dancing of the strings in the vivace was probably far beyond what Papa Haydn himself ever heard or even imagined.

Very few persons seemed to be looking at the orchestra after Miss Garbousava arrived on the stage. She is a blonde young lady, wore an orchid gown and silver slippers, and played the 'cello with style and agility. The variations on a rococo theme, by Tchaikovsky, were performed by her. She has a light but songful tone and a nimble left hand that is accurate. Now and then an harmonic was not clear and there was occasional lack of clarity in passages requiring the bow to bounce, but the general polish and verve of the performance impressed the audience so strongly that Miss Garbousava was applauded into view half a dozen times.

The Saint-Saens symphony appealed to this listener a good deal. In contrast to the meager instrumental requirements of the Haydn opus, this work adds the organ, the piano and other trifles. But it does not add them at random or simply to increase the noise. The instrumentation throughout is adept, the transformations of the principal theme are very ingenious, and the variations in rhythm are skillful.

The second theme of the finale is especially charming and was sung by the strings with fine effect. The weaving of the various orchestral voices, the brisk utterances of the trumpets, the delicate voice of the piano and the full, assertive chords on the organ rouse an inescapable excitement in the listener, and one perceives everywhere a hand that had both judgment and imagination.

Dr. Koussevitzky thundered farewell with one of the famous fortissimos that no other orchestra seems to equal. How we enjoy them! Yet sometimes the inevitability of them dilutes the power, just as when the good people always win in the movies.

The program:

Haydn ....Symphony in E-flat, No. 99
I. Adagio; Vivace assai
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
IV. Vivace

Tchaikovsky—Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 33

Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78
I. Adagio. Allegro moderato; Poco adagio
II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso; Allegro.

LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER - CITIZEN

MAR 2 - 1938

Boston Programs.

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week Mahler's Fifth Symphony, played earlier in the season, will be repeated. In addition the programs will include Debussy's two nocturnes "Clouds" and "Festials" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

Patrons of the supplementary series at the concerts of March 21 and 22 will have the privilege of hearing as soloist Robert Cadesus, distinguished pianist. The programs will be conducted by the concert master, Richard Burgin.

At the concerts in this series in February there was an interesting young artist as soloist in Orlando Barera, violinist. There were many fine moments in his sensitive playing of the Mozart Concerto in D major, No. 4. He was born in Ferra, Italy in 1907 and studied first under his father who was professor in the conservatory in the neighboring city of Bologna. He visited this country in 1936 and after his New York debut was chosen to play in the series of concerts in the Library of Congress in Washington.

Nadia Boulanger, who is lecturing in Harvard and Radcliffe is having an active musical life in Boston. Only the other day she conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the first time a woman has done so. This week Thursday at Sanders Theatre in Cambridge she will direct a joint concert of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe chorus which will have the assistance of some of the singers Miss Boulanger brought over with her from Paris.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 2 - 1938

Music

Dr. Koussevitzky Directs Boston Symphony Orchestra in Magnificent Concert at Metropolitan Theatre. Raya Garbousova, Young Russian 'Cellist, is Soloist and Impresses Audience Strongly

By G. Y. Loveridge

A magnificent concert (that is to say, one that fell in rather well with this department's prejudices) was given in Metropolitan Theatre last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. Raya Garbousova, young Russian 'cellist, was soloist.

The orchestra's facets were made to glitter in a program requiring virtuoso work in all directions. Haydn, Tchaikovsky and Saint-Saens were the composers chosen. The Saint-Saens symphony No. 3, in C-minor, was given its first performance in this city.

Haydn opened the program, and nobody can do it better. His symphony No. 99 (composers had plenty of breath in his day) was the selection. The orchestra was whittled down to a size that would make a modern composer feel handcuffed, but the music was excellent. For these men a Haydn symphony is no work at all, but Dr. Koussevitzky does not approach such a symphony less respectfully or less enthusiastically than he does a more complicated score. He draws from it all the grace and good humor and abundant spirits that it possesses, and makes one wonder just what is meant by "progress" in music.

The menuetto with its hearty accents was delightful, and the swift dancing of the strings in the vivace was probably far beyond what Papa Haydn himself ever heard or even imagined.

Very few persons seemed to be looking at the orchestra after Miss Garbousova arrived on the stage. She is a blonde young lady, wore an orchid gown and silver slippers, and played the 'cello with style and agility. The variations on a rococo theme, by Tchaikovsky, were performed by her. She has a light but songful tone and a nimble left hand that is accurate. Now and then an harmonic was not clear and there was occasional lack of clarity in passages requiring the bow to bounce, but the general polish and verve of the performance impressed the audience so strongly that Miss Garbousova was applauded into view half a dozen times.

The Saint-Saens symphony appealed to this listener a good deal. In contrast to the meager instrumental requirements of the Haydn opus, this work adds the organ, the piano and other trifles. But it does not add them at random or simply to increase the noise. The instrumentation throughout is adept, the transformations of the principal theme are very ingenious, and the variations in rhythm are skillful.

The second theme of the finale is especially charming and was sung by the strings with fine effect. The weaving of the various orchestral voices, the brisk utterances of the trumpets, the delicate voice of the piano and the full, assertive chords on the organ rouse an inescapable excitement in the listener, and one perceives everywhere a hand that had both judgment and imagination.

Dr. Koussevitzky thundered farewell with one of the famous fortissimos that no other orchestra seems to equal. How we enjoy them! Yet sometimes the inevitability of them dilutes the power, just as when the good people always win in the movies.

The program:

Haydn ....Symphony in E-flat, No. 99
I. Adagio; Vivace assai
II. Adagio
III. Menuetto (Allegretto)
IV. Vivace

Tchaikovsky—Variations on a Rococo Theme for Violoncello with Orchestral Accompaniment, Op. 33

Saint-Saens—Symphony in C minor, No. 3, Op. 78
I. Adagio. Allegro moderato; Poco adagio
II. Allegro moderato; Presto; Maestoso, Allegro.

HUNTINGTON, W. VA.
HERALD - DISPATCH

MUSIC FESTIVAL TO LURE CROWD

Reservations Already Pouring In For August Symphony Affair

STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., March 3. (AP)—Five months before the first note sounds, hotels in this vacation land have many reservations for the two weeks of the Berkshire symphonic festival. One or two have no more space.

Paralleling this record is the construction of one of the strangest festival buildings in America, which already is taking shape in one of the meadows at "Tanglewood," the estate given the Boston symphony orchestra a year ago by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Boston.

Seats For 4,662

The building, which will seat 4,662 persons under a permanent roof, is to be the shape of a half-opened fan. Where the fan would be held the stage will stand. The sides will be open.

The stage is experimental. It will not be attached to the auditorium at all, and the conductor (who will of course be Sedge Koussevitzky) will stand exactly 160 feet from his most distant auditor.

It is possible that later a permanent stage will be developed, exactly fitted to the need of an orchestra playing out of doors. But since nobody knows what these are, the festival board refuses to authorize a stage construction which may prove a handicap later.

Community Project

The whole "plant" will cover approximately 1½ acres; will be 325 feet wide.

Although 4,662 people will fill the roofed space, extra seats can be placed in a 20-foot wide colonnade, surrounding the sides.

The festival is an experiment in community cooperation. When a building at Tanglewood became necessary, $80,000 was given in a few months by more than 700 people in amounts from $1 to $10,000.

The festival will be held the first two weeks of August this summer.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL - COURIER

Koussevitzky Objects

When folks wouldn't listen and wouldn't even sit in Pittsburgh the other night Sergei Koussevitzky simply up and walked off the stage. He'd asked the audience to subordinate its own noises to the harmonic evocations of the Boston Symphony; but a couple of late-comers who clomped down the middle aisle in the middle of one of Mozart's symphonies, sent him into as fine a passion of artistic indignation as ever appeared upon the podium. Down went his baton on the music rack, and off went one of the world's great symphony conductors, across the stage, and through the door, and mumbling into the corridor.

We don't blame him, of course, a bit. There is a strange and perverse old superstition that a late arrival somehow adds cachet. The idea seems to be that the unanointed may alone be there in time for the curtain or the opening bars of the first selection. Obviously we aren't talking about the devoted music-lovers who have been inescapably delayed; it is the late clomper-down-the-aisle by choice we mean, the stepper-over-sitters to seats invariably in the middle of the row. More power to the Serge Koussevitzkys who can put such concert-goers in their place—and on time!

194

DAYTON, O.
NEWS

MAR 4 - 1938

Conducts Opera At Antioch

DR. WILHELM FIEDLER

Henry Purcell wrote an opera in 1689, named it "Dido and Aeneas" and it has survived the years to be given last year by the Juillard School in New York, and this year by the music department of Antioch college.

Spending the winter at Antioch is Dr. Wilhelm Fiedler of Berlin, Germany, on an exchange fellowship, and it was through his ambitions that the old English opera was prepared for presentation at the Yellow Springs Opera House Friday and Saturday nights.

Fully staged and costumed by the dramatic department of the college, with the cooperation of the Antioch Players, chorus, principals and string orchestra will revive a charming age-old opera in traditional manner.

Dr. Fiedler is the son of Dr. Max Fiedler who was the director of the Boston Symphony orchestra before Dr. Karl Muck. His cousin is now the director of the Boston "Pops" concerts, and has recorded several hundred compositions for a leading record firm.

The performance will start promptly at 8:20 both nights.

This unusual dramatic offering will have a cast of 60. Opposite Miss Folck, in the role of Aeneas, will be Bruce Browning Davidson, Antioch student of Perth Amboy, N. J. Other leading parts will be taken by Miss Josephine Gerhard of Short Hills, N. J.; Miss Antoinette Grandgent of Norris, Tenn.; Miss Joan Kettering of Clarksburg, W. Va.; Jozef Pielage, instructor in aesthetics on the college faculty; Miss Betty Jane Geuder of Olean, N. Y.; Karl Gleeson of Colchester, Conn., and Orville Carr of San Antonio, Tex.

Participating with the chorus of about 50 and small orchestra of 12 strings are several Dayton musicians, Julius Sturm, jr., Bonny Yarger of Fairview high school, and James D. Mitchell of Manette place, a student at Antioch.

WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS

MAR 5 - 1938

Recorded Music

By DISCOPHILE

The second volume of Victor's splendid recording of Bach's "Passion According to St. Matthew" is out this week (M-412). It continues the excellences of the first volume as the music grows even more frighteningly beautiful and impassioned. Here are probably the most subjective pages in all of Bach's writing. This recording, it will be recalled, was made during an actual performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky, with the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society. A third recorded volume, to be released probably on the first of April, will complete the "Passion," certainly the most imposing recording venture ever to be so successfully realized.

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAR 8 - 1938

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will present a program of few selections, but great variety, tonight at John M. Greene Hall. Beginning with a classical symphony, Mozart's sympony in A major, the program will continue with a modern work, Hindemith's Konzertmusik for Strings and Brass Instruments, and will conclude with Sibelius' symphony No. 2 in D major. The Boston symphony thus lives up to its reputation for initiative in introducing new music and unusual programs to American concert audiences. The contrasts of tonight's program distinguish it from the usual symphony offering.

This is a good opportunity to mention another phase of Koussevitsky's enterprising work with the Boston Symphony, the recording of the entire Bach "St. Matthew's Passion" which is being released in sections by Victor. With 53 12-inch sides it will be a landmark in phonograph history. The work was produced last spring at a Pension Fund concert with the Boston Symphony, under Koussevitsky, the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society, and was recorded directly from the concert hall presentation.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR [illegible] - 1938

Smith Students To Hear Boston Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, will give its annual concert at Smith College in Northampton tonight at 8. Wednesday night the orchestra will play in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, Conn., and Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall, New York. Friday there will be a concert at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn.

The program at John M. Greene Hall, Smith College, tonight will be: Mozart, Symphony in A Major; Hindemith, Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments; Sibelius, Symphony No. 2 in D Major.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
SUNDAY HERALD

MAR 6 - 1938

Silk Hat Brigade Hears Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra, highlight of the New Haven Woolsey hall concert series, makes a return engagement to the college town on Wednesday evening, March 9 for their second concert of the season. The famous musicians appeared at Woolsey on November 17 last, at which they were received with the usual cultured gusto.

At the helm will be the orchestra's Russian leader, Serge Koussevitzky, who has conducted the Boston Symphony since 1924 when he first came to America.

Serge was born in 1874 in the small central Russian province of Tver. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away and presented himself at the Philharmonic school in Moscow. Aspiring to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra, Koussevitzky made his first trials in Berlin, and later he established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzy" in Paris with marked success.

It is this maestro and his group of virtuosos who will play to the silk hat brigade next Wednesday.

LOS ANGELES, CALIF.
TIMES

MAR 6 - 1938

"St. Matthew Passion" Recorded in Boston

If you turn to recorded music for that "calm Christian state of mind" you hear so much about but find so seldom in these chaotic days, pick up the Bach "St. Matthew Passion" albums, one and two, issued by Victor. Koussevitsky conducts, uses the Boston Symphony and the college singers from Harvard and Radcliffe. The soloists are not mentioned on the records but we will probably know more about them when the last of the three volumes is issued and a program book with it. Sufficient now is that fact that the soloists are well chosen.

FEAT AND BLESSING

Such a recording of an actual performance in Boston Symphony Hall is a feat and a blessing, too. It is uplifting music and Koussevitsky creates a spiritual grandeur with it that is not to be brought down to words. His orchestra players especially are of one mind with him. The choir is young and eager. The soloists have strong voices and they need to have for the St Matthew. There is a slight weariness in the soprano voice toward the end of this second volume but it is no wonder and not of any consequence. The tenor and baritone are vigorous and they revive the choir on occasions. Hearing this rendition of the Passion will give a clearer understanding of Bach and of the hold he has on music lovers through the years.

FRESH RECORDING

R.C.A. Victor has invited the Philadelphians to make a fresh recording of Beethoven's First Symphony under Eugene Ormandy. The result is brilliant. Ormandy has inherited, or made his own, the theatrical pick-up and fade-out which necessitate constant attendance at the controls. His Beethoven is adjusted to present-day listening in that it centers the interest on contrast and speed. Ormandy will be widely popular if R.C.A. Victor can make him so and this company has usually succeeded in its ventures with conductors.

Stokowski has made a pleasing disk for Victor with an arrangement for orchestra of the Chopin Mazurka in a Minor with the trumpet playing solo. Saul Caston, assistant conductor and first trumpeter of the Philadelphia Orchestra, is a fine artist as he proves conclusively in this recording.

Of the single records this month none will be more welcome than the one that contains Fritz Kreisler's "Caprice Viennois" and "Tambourin Chinois." These numbers will be loved always and it is good to have them played for modern recording by the master himself. Paderewski does something fine for posterity, too, when he records. One of the favorites of his devotees is the Theme and Variations in F Minor on a theme by Haydn. In this European recording Paderewski is himself and his performance perfection.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MAR 6 - 1938

MUSICAL PROGRAMS AT SMITH COLLEGE

String Quartet to Open Week's Activities With Beethoven Works Tonight

Several musical programs are scheduled for Smith college this week, starting tonight with an all-Beethoven program by the Smith college string quartet at 8 at Sage hall. The program, which will be free and open to the public, will include the following two quartets, representing Beethoven's second and middle periods:—

Quartet in D-major, Op 18, No 3
  Allegro
  Andante con moto
  Allegro
  Presto
Quartet in F-major, Op 59, No 1
  Allegro
  Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando
  Adagio molto e mesto
  Theme russe (allegro)

The quartet, which has presented concerts at Northampton, New York and elsewhere, was formerly known as the Northampton string quartet. Gilbert Ross, first violinist, and Marion De Ronde, 'cellist, both members of the Smith college department have continued the quartet, and the two vaccancies have been filled. The viola of the present group is played by Louise Rood, also of the college music department, who joined the faculty last fall, having previously taught at Sweetbriar college, Va. She has studied chiefly at the University of Wisconsin and at the Juilliard school, as well as abroad. Milton Aronson, of the department of music at Mount Holyoke college, and conductor of the Springfield Civic orchestra, returns to the quartet this season, having been absent for two years. He is resident of Springfield, and a pupil of Felix Winternitz and Charles Martin Loeffler.

Boston Symphony

The next in the week's schedule of concerts will take place Tuesday night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra will conclude the college's current series at John M. Greene hall. Dr Serge Koussevitzky will lead a program of three symphonies by contemporary composers, as follows:—

Classical symphony, Op 25	Prokofieff
Symphony No 2, "Elegiaca"	Malipiero
Symphony No 2 in D-major	Sibelius

On Wednesday night at 8 at Sage hall, Aurelio Giorno, pianist, and Gilbert Ross, violinist, will present the following program of sonatas for violin and piano by Beethoven:—

Sonata in D-major, Op 12, No 1
Sonata in C-minor, Op 30, No 2
Sonata in A-major "Kreitzer" Op 49

Next Sunday night at 8, also at Sage hall, Willard MacGregor, pianist, will present the following program:—

Phantasie, Op 17	Schumann
Two Etudes	Chopin
Nocturne in B-major	Chopin
Mazprka in A-minor	Chopin
Scherzo in B-flat minor	Chopin
Etudes Symphoniques	Schumann

One of the last musical events before the spring vacation, from the 23d to April 7, Paul Hindemith, composer-violist will be heard in a lecture-recital with the assistance of Lydia Hoffman-Behrend, pianist. The program will consist of works by Hindemith, and will probably one of the sonatas for viola solo, the sonata for viola and piano, and the piano sonata No 3. It is possible that the German composer will read a paper on his new book "The Craft [illegible] Musi-[illegible]

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

[illegible]

Werner Josten, head of the music department of Smith College, will lecture Friday afternoon at 4.30 o'clock in Technical High School under the auspices of the Junior League of Springfield, Inc. Mr. Josten will analyze the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra here on March [illegible] the last concert of the 1937-1938 Community Chest series.

GREENWICH, CONN.
TIME

MAR 7 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY OBJECTS

(New Haven Journal-Courier)

When folks wouldn't listen and wouldn't even sit in Pittsburgh the other night Sergei Koussevitzky simply up and walked off the staged. He'd asked the audience to subordinate its own noises to the harmony evocations of the Boston Symphony; but a couple of late-comers who clomped down the middle aisle in the middle of one of Mozart's symphonies, sent him into as fine a passion of artistic indignation as ever appeared upon the podium. Down went his baton on the music rack, and off went one of the world's great symphony conductors, across the stage, and through the door, and mumbling into the corridor.

We don't blame him, of course, a bit. There is a strange and perverse old superstition that a late arrival somehow adds cachet. The idea seems to be that the unanointed may alone be there in time for the curtain or the opening bars of the first selection. Obviously we aren't talking about the devoted music-lovers who have been inescapably delayed; it is the late clomper-down-the-aisle by choice we mean, the stepper-over-sitters to seats invariably in the middle of the row. More power to the Sergei Koussevitzkys who can put such concert-goers in their place—and on time!

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN MAGNIFICENT CONCERT TO CLOSE COLLEGE COURSE

Northampton, March 9—A magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony under Koussevitsky ended the Smith college course at the John M. Greene hall last night. Opening with the fragile symphony in A major by Mozart the orchestra once more gave proof of its superlative quality. The A major symphony is an early product of Mozart's genius. Although it is proceeded by nearly 30 orcehstral compositions, it was written in Mozart's 18th year. For all its grace and promise of greater things to come, it is too light, too immature to occupy the place given it at last night's concert. Mr Koussevitsky, however, extracted from it the last ounce of music and since nothing Mozart wrote is either banal or uninspired, the performance was at least interesting.

The delicate lilt of Mozart's final movement had hardly faded from the listener's ear when the orchestra plunged into the brutal dynamics and dissonances of Paul Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass instruments, op. 50. Hindemith, a young German composer, wrote this concert music for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It is an annoying work. Most modern compositions of its type which, like it, employ noise and ugliness when inspiration fails, can be dismissed as gropings more or less sincere but entirely unsuccessful toward a new form. Hindemith is different. Even his strident outbursts of brass dischords suggest an immense musical capacity and in between he has interlarded passages of rare beauty quite irrespective of the idiom in which they are conceived. It is a great pity that the new school of music of whch Hindemith is an outstanding representative should devote its energies to the pursuit of the fascinating phantom, dissonance, and should shun as though it were something cheap and unworthy those pleasant sounds which were once the principal concern of music.

After the intermission Sibelius's tremendous second symphony in D major, op. 43, was played with such power and thorough understanding that criticism can only chew its pencil in humility. No composer, not even Beethoven, has ever surpassed the contemporary Finnish master in orchestration. There is, today, no finer orchestral instrument than the Boston Symphony. As a result last night's concert ended in a burst of glory which no member of the audience is ever likely to forget.

PORTLAND, ME.
EXPRESS

[illegible]

The Cathedral Council at its meeting Tuesday evening in Guild Hall named Mrs. M. J. Carlson and Mrs. Timothy L. Donahue to represent the Cathedral Guild on the committee for the Choristers Concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra May 11. Members of the Council will receive communion in a body Sunday, March 20, it was announced, and plans were presented to send delegates to the district council meeting to be held in Westbrook Friday evening. It was voted to invite the district council to meet with the Cathedral Council May 13. Following the business meeting the Rt. Rev. Msgr. George P. Johnson addressed the members.

194

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Ends Woolsey Series

On Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second local appearance of the season, coming to Woolsey Hall as the sixth and concluding event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky the famous orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians will present one of the finest programs ever arranged for New Haven. Two symphonies will be heard on this auspicious musical occasion, one being the No. 2 in D major by Sibelius, and the other Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25. Two other great works round out the program: Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol," Op. 34.

The program as a whole is probably the most appealing list of compositions ever assembled for an orchestral concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and thus will make the event a brilliant climax to one of the most popular series of concerts in New Haven's long musical history. Wednesday night's audience will be of the usual capacity proportions, thus marking the sixth consecutive sell-out of the season—a new record in concert patronage locally and an excellent barometer by which to judge the great interest that this city and vicinity takes in the premier concert offerings of the day.

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, which will open Wednesday night's program, was written in 1916-17, and was first performed in Petrograd, April 21, 1918, with the composer conducting. Prokofieff arrived in New York in September of that year, and three months later the Russian Symphony Orchestra played this symphony for the first time in America. The work is dedicated to Boris Assafieff, a writer on musical subjects whose pen name is "Igor Gleboff." But 13 minutes are required to present the four movements of the piece, which is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, timpani and strings.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" were completed in 1899, and "Nuages" and "Fetes" were first performed by the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris under Chevillard on December 9, 1900. The first performance of the work in this country was at a Chickering concert in Boston, February 10, 1904, and the following year Vincent d'Indy, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest, introduced the two nocturnes at concerts in Philadelphia, Washington and New York.

Composed in 1887, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol" had its first performance at the "Russian Symphony Concerts" in St. Petersburg, October 31 of the same year—the composer conducting. It was performed at a puoplar concert at Brighton Beach, New York, under the direction of Anton Seidl, in the summer of 1891, and became a part of the Boston Symphony repertory when first played in Boston on February 13, 1908.

Among the various compositions of Sibelius, which include seven symphonies, the Symphony No. 2 in D major is probably the most often played and thus the most popular work of the great composer. It was performed here several years ago by the Boston Orchestra with notable success, and since that time many requests have been made that it be presented here again.

Born in Tavastehus, Finland, in December, 1865, the son of a medical officer in the Finnish army, Jan Sibelius was educated with the idea of taking up law. However, after graduating from the University of Helsingfors, he became more and more interested in the study of music, so that when he became his own master he began to consider music seriously.

In 1889 Sibelius went to Berlin to study composition, and two years later to Vienna, where he became the pupil of Karl Goldmark. It was not long before the individual style that characterizes his music became evident, for although it was an acknowledged fact that Sibelius was distinctly influenced by the Classicists, his compositions are so thoroughly permeated with originality of expression that it is often, on the surface, almost impossible to subscribe to the belief that a relationship to composers of the earlier period exists. In fact, the music of Sibelius does not yield its charm to superficial hearing, but reserves its permanent fascination for those who, through repeated listening, have come to recognize its purport.

Sibelius came to the United States in 1914 and visited several musical centers, including New Haven where he received the degree of Doctor of Music from Yale University. He now lives in a small village near Helsingfors, where, although in close proximity to the capital city, he is as distant from its gaiety as his preference for simplicity and quietude dictates.

The D Major Symphony, often referred to as Sibelius' pastoral symphony, was composed in 1901-02, and performed for the first time at a concert given by the composer in Helsingfors, during the same season. Its first American performance took place in Chicago under the direction of Theodore Thomas in 1904, and through the years has come to occupy a prominent place in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra.

According to Mr. Schneevoight, who is an intimate friend of Sibelius, the composer's intention was to depict in the first movement the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns, undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul. The third, in the nature of a Scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the finale hope enters their breasts, and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as his players see him.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

9 - 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY DIRECTS FINAL SMITH CONCERT

Boston Symphony's Reading of Sibelius Magnificent Achievement

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 8—The Smith College Concert Course closed tonight with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston players are great favorites with the college audience but after the superb reading of the second symphony of Sibelius, the applause seemed to be more spontaneous and to last longer than we ever remember.

Among Rarest Jewels

The reading of the Sibelius symphony was a magnificent achievement. Dr. Koussevitzky has been regarded as the foremost interpreter of the symphonies of the Finnish composer for many years and he has made this second symphony, one of the rarest jewels in the orchestral treasure chest, peculiarly his own. He has played it before at Smith College but seldom with the grandeur of style and straightforward approach he revealed tonight. There was magic in his unfolding of this many-patterned work of the Finnish genius. Here is great music which unfolds without a break, coheres in many parts and mounts with controlled graduation to its climax. Listening to this music one must let it give its own message, or, as Sibelius once said, let the "butterfly" flutter freely, and not pin it down with any factual consciousness.

Music "Barbaric"

There were other exciting moments tonight besides the symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky offered for the first time at the college the "Concert Music for Strings and Brass" by Paul Hindemith. Here was music to stir the pulse, barbaric, unbeautiful music, yet music which commanded attention through its sheer vitality and ugliness. The strings and brasses of this great organization have never sounded more effectively than in this work. There were fleeting moments of beauty in the composition but for the most part the music struck one squarely between the eyes and a little of it went a long way.

No greater contrast could be imagined than the "Mozart Symphony in A Major" Koechel No. 201, which opened the program. Using a reduced orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a delightful reading of this gay, elegant music, the product of Mozart's greatest creative period.

Countless felicitous touches give the symphony its freshness and charm and it is at once vivacious and tender. Once again one could only marvel at the unlimited tonal resources of this orchestra and the greatness of its conductor.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN SCORES IN WOOLSEY CONCERT

There is no novelty in an appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concluding event in the Woolsey Series of Concerts, but there remains a sense of quickened pulse both in anticipation of their arrival and after their departure. Last evening was no exception, for the program again revealed the contemporary interests of Doctor Koussevitsky and the magnificent tonal opulence of the great instrumental body at his command.

The composers represented were all living at the turn of the century and the works were all written within a span of 30 years, between 1887 and 1917; at the outside limits were the Rimsky-Korsakof "Capriccio Espagnol" and the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony;" Debussy's Nocturnes date from 1897-99 and Sibelius' Second Symphony from 1901. Prokofieff has been classified as a 'Cubist' in music; if there is truth in the assertion, he has survived as one of a few which left works of permanent value. The two Russians represent the extremes of the Russian school, for Rimsky-Korsakoff was foremost among the brilliant Nationalist group; with him "all the streams of Russian Nationalism unite in one mighty current;" Prokofieff now speaks eloquently for the Soviet Union.

The "Caprice Espagnol" is one of Doctor Koussevitsky's most successful hobby-horses; he makes it a glittering, dazzling, orchestral tour de force, "a purely external piece, but vividly brilliant for all that," as the composer said of it. Details of the Classical Symphony were often irregular and the finale nearly ran away with the conductor; occassional blurred passages occurred in the opening Nocturne, with some overly fussy details toward the close. The magnificent "Fetes," however, remains a rare delight as it always has been under Doctor Koussevitsky's direction.

All these works are being played in New York this week and are consequently in fine order. Sibelius' Second Symphony was studied by the orchestra earlier in the season and played at home and in New York; since then it has been laid aside. The performance last evening was among the most uneven and disjointed of any given in New Haven by the Bostonians within recent memory; tempos were rushed (the concert was extremely long), co-ordination was often lacking, entrances were bungled, and a general uninspired attitude was constant except as the music gripped all concerned and sailed aloft for a space. Yet, withal the unexpected defects, the performance confirmed the beauty and strength which abounds in every movement; its kinship is with Beethoven, and it seems equal in stature to the Third and Fifth Symphonies of that composer. While conforming to tradition, Sibelius has changed the course of thematic development in sonata form; some go so far as to say he has saved the symphonic form for this century.

It was gratifying to find the audience stirred by this score which has found its way into popular favor only within the last few years; Doctor Koussevitsky has brought us three Sibelius symphonies. There are seven of them.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

NEWS

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAR 8 - 1938

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT ALUMNI SYMPHONY

Arthur Fiedler, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra pop concerts, will appear as guest conductor at the fourth and final concert of the Alumni Symphony orchestra, which will be held in the Oliver school hall, March 27, at 8 o'clock.

Mr. Fiedler needs no introduction to the music lovers of Greater Lawrence and his coming here as guest conductor of the Alumni Symphony orchestra should mark it as an event in the cultural life of the community. His feeling and ability to interpret the classics as well as the lighter chamber music has earned for him an enjoyable reputation. His willingness to serve the local group is a proud distinction to which the local organization can point with pride.

This will be Mr. Fiedler's second appearance in this city and his coming should herald the attendance of a capacity audience. His conducting of the Esplanade concerts in the summer months is another of the great things in music he has accomplished so early in his musical career.

Elizabeth Berube Cookson is a member of the string section of the orchestra and her work and interest in the local organization has been a highlight of the orchestra's career. She is a capable player and has devoted much time and effort to assist in the organization work of the orchestra.

The complete program will be announced shortly and will contain many beautiful pieces of chamber music, classics and some of the more modern type of music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

MAR 11 1938

Mahler's Symphony Opaque

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its fourth visit to New York last evening and gave a concert in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky began his program with Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work consuming an hour and six minutes of doubtful interest.

The listener was enabled to grasp the significance of the opening movement, a Funeral March, but most of the matter of the work's inordinate length seemed like "sound and fury signifying" what!!! Slight rays of light occasionally cast a feeble beam through the maze of intricate and opaque pages, but even these were tenuous and if there were melodious intents on the part of the composer, they were trite and of little distinction.

The single compensation, if there be any such, was the generous use of orchestral effects, complicated in design but devoid of the beguiling quality that marks the symphonies of composers who antedated Mahler.

Matter of greater charm were Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes," in which the orchestra was on familiar ground and offered gratifying substance for the large and distinguished audience. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnole" was the closing number.

Tomorrow afternoon's program consists of Haydn's E flat Symphony; Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass instruments, and Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

KOUSSEVITZKY DIRECTS FINAL SMITH CONCERT

Boston Symphony's Reading of Sibelius Magnificent Achievement

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 9 — The Smith College Concert Course closed last night with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

ETC. like above

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 13 1938

CASADESUS SYMPHONY SOLOIST THIS WEEK

At the fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, to be given March 21 and 22, the distinguished soloist will be Robert Casadesus, the French pianist. This programme, in which Richard Burgin will conduct, will have two works in which M. Casadesus will appear with the orchestra—Liszt's Concerto No. 1 in E flat, and Vincent d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. The purely orchestral works will consist of Moussorgsky's fantastic scherzo, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Golden Cock."

MAN ABOUT MANHATTAN

By George Tucker

New York – The newest French

A little experiment in psychology has helped George Judd, manager of the Boston symphony, solve a vexing problem. For years his telephone was at his elbow, but George hates answering telephones even worse than you and I hate paying the rent. He instructed his men to move the telephone to a table in the far corner of the office. Then he told his friends: "Every time you telephone me I have to leave my desk and walk clear across the room."

Since then his calls have been reduced by 50 per cent.

INCORRECT PAGINATION

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 6 - 1938

Boston Symphony Ends Woolsey Series

ON WEDNESDAY evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its second local appearance of the season, coming to Woolsey Hall as the sixth and concluding event of the Woolsey Hall Concert Series. Under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky the famous orchestra of one hundred and ten musicians will present one of the finest programs ever arranged for New Haven. Two symphonies will be heard on this auspicious musical occasion, one being the No. 2 in D major by Sibelius, and the other Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, Op. 25. Two other great works round out the program: Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol," Op. 34.

The program as a whole is probably the most appealing list of compositions ever assembled for an orchestral concert in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and thus will make the event a brilliant climax to one of the most popular series of concerts in New Haven's long musical history. Wednesday night's audience will be of the usual capacity proportions, thus marking the sixth consecutive sell-out of the season—a new record in concert patronage locally and an excellent barometer by which to judge the great interest that this city and vicinity takes in the premier concert offerings of the day.

Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, which will open Wednesday night's program, was written in 1916-17, and was first performed in Petrograd, April 21, 1918, with the composer conducting. Prokofieff arrived in New York in September of that year, and three months later the Russian Symphony Orchestra played this symphony for the first time in America. The work is dedicated to Boris Assafieff, a writer on musical subjects whose pen name is "Igor Glebboff." But 13 minutes are required to present the four movements of the piece, which is scored for two flutes, two oboes, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, two trumpets, timpani and strings.

Debussy's "Nocturnes" were completed in 1899, and "Nuages" and "Fetes" were first performed by the Lamoureux Orchestra of Paris under Chevillard on December 9, 1900. The first performance of the work in this country was at a Chickering concert in Boston, February 10, 1904, and the following year Vincent d'Indy,, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a guest, introduced the two nocturnes at concerts in Philadelphia, Washington and New York.

Composed in 1887, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol" had its first performance at the "Russian Symphony Concerts" in St. Petersburg, October 31 of the same year—the composer conducting. It was performed at a puoplar concert at Brighton Beach, New York, under the direction of Anton Seidl, in the summer of 1891, and became a part of the Boston Symphony repertory when first played in Boston on February 13, 1906.

Among the various compositions of Sibelius, which include seven symphonies, the Symphony No. 2 in D major is probably the most often played and thus the most popular work of the great composer. It was performed here several years ago by the Boston Orchestra with notable success, and since that time many requests have been made that it be presented here again.

Born in Tavastehus, Finland, in December, 1865, the son of a medical officer in the Finnish army, Jan Sibelius was educated with the idea of taking up law. However, after graduating from the University of Helsingfors, he became more and more interested in the study of music, so that when he became his own master he began to consider music seriously.

In 1889 Sibelius went to Berlin to study composition, and two years later to Vienna, where he became the pupil of Karl Goldmark. It was not long before the individual style that characterizes his music became evident, for although it was an acknowledged fact that Sibelius was distinctly influenced by the Classicists, his compositions are so thoroughly permeated with originality of expression that it is often, on the surface, almost impossible to subscribe to the belief that a relationship to composers of the earlier period exists. In fact, the music of Sibelius does not yield its charm to superficial hearing, but reserves its permanent fascination for those who, through repeated listening, have come to recognize its purport.

Sibelius came to the United States in 1914 and visited several musical centers, including New Haven where he received the degree of Doctor of Music from Yale University. He now lives in a small village near Helsingfors, where, although in close proximity to the capital city, he is as distant from its gaiety as his preference for simplicity and quietude dictates.

The D Major Symphony, often referred to as Sibelius' pastoral symphony, was composed in 1901-02, and performed for the first time at a concert given by the composer in Helsingfors, during the same season. Its first American performance took place in Chicago under the direction of Theodore Thomas in 1904, and through the years has come to occupy a prominent place in the repertory of the Boston Orchestra.

According to Mr. Schneevoight, who is an intimate friend of Sibelius, the composer's intention was to depict in the first movement the quiet, pastoral life of the Finns, undisturbed by thought of oppression. The second movement is charged with patriotic feeling, but the thought of a brutal rule over the people brings with it timidity of soul. The third, in the nature of a Scherzo, portrays the awakening of national feeling, the desire to organize in defense of their rights, while in the finale hope enters their breasts, and there is comfort in the anticipated coming of a deliverer.

Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as [illegible] players see him.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

MAR 8 - 1938

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT ALUMNI SYMPHONY

Arthur Fiedler, noted conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra pop concerts, will appear as guest conductor at the fourth and final concert of the Alumni Symphony orchestra, which will be held in the Oliver school hall, March 27, at 8 o'clock.

Mr. Fiedler needs no introduction to the music lovers of Greater Lawrence and his coming here as guest conductor of the Alumni Symphony orchestra should mark it as an event in the cultural life of the community. His feeling and ability to interpret the classics as well as the lighter chamber music has earned for him an enjoyable reputation. His willingness to serve the local group is a proud distinction to which the local organization can point with pride.

This will be Mr. Fiedler's second appearance in this city and his coming should herald the attendance of a capacity audience. His conducting of the Esplanade concerts in the summer months is another of the great things in music he has accomplished so early in his musical career.

Elizabeth Berube Cookson is a member of the string section of the orchestra and her work and interest in the local organization has been a highlight of the orchestra's career. She is a capable player and has devoted much time and effort to assist in the organization work of the orchestra.

The complete program will be announced shortly and will contain many beautiful pieces of chamber music, classics and some of the more modern type of music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING JOURNAL

MAR 11 1938

Mahler's Symphony Opaque

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra paid its fourth visit to New York last evening and gave a concert in Carnegie Hall. Serge Koussevitzky began his program with Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a work consuming an hour and six minutes of doubtful interest.

The listener was enabled to grasp the significance of the opening movement, a Funeral March, but most of the matter of the work's inordinate length seemed like "sound and fury signifying" what!!! Slight rays of light occasionally cast a feeble beam through the maze of intricate and opaque pages, but even these were tenuous and if there were melodious intents on the part of the composer, they were trite and of little distinction.

The single compensation, if there be any such, was the generous use of orchestral effects, complicated in design but devoid of the beguiling quality that marks the symphonies of composers who antedated Mahler.

Matter of greater charm were Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes," in which the orchestra was on familiar ground and offered gratifying substance for the large and distinguished audience. Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnole" was the closing number.

Tomorrow afternoon's program consists of Haydn's E flat Symphony; Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass instruments, and Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

9 - 1938

KOUSSEVITZKY DIRECTS FINAL SMITH CONCERT

Boston Symphony's Reading of Sibelius Magnificent Achievement

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 8—The Smith College Concert Course closed tonight with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston players are great favorites with the college audience but after the superb reading of the second symphony of Sibelius, the applause seemed to be more spontaneous and to last longer than we ever remember.

Among Rarest Jewels

The reading of the Sibelius symphony was a magnificent achievement. Dr. Koussevitzky has been regarded as the foremost interpreter of the symphonies of the Finnish composer for many years and he has made this second symphony, one of the rarest jewels in the orchestral treasure chest, peculiarly his own. He has played it before at Smith College but seldom with the grandeur of style and straightforward approach he revealed tonight. There was magic in his unfolding of this many-patterned work of the Finnish genius. Here is great music which unfolds without a break, coheres in many parts and mounts with controlled graduation to its climax. Listening to this music one must let it give its own message, or, as Sibelius once said, let the "butterfly" flutter freely, and not pin it down with any factual consciousness.

Music "Barbaric"

There were other exciting moments tonight besides the symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky offered for the first time at the college the "Concert Music for Strings and Brass" by Paul Hindemith. Here was music to stir the pulse, barbaric, unbeautiful music, yet music which commanded attention through its sheer vitality and ugliness. The strings and brasses of this great organization have never sounded more effectively than in this work. There were fleeting moments of beauty in the composition but for the most part the music struck one squarely between the eyes and a little of it went a long way.

No greater contrast could be imagined than the "Mozart Symphony in A Major" Koechel No. 201, which opened the program. Using a reduced orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a delightful reading of this gay, elegant music, the product of Mozart's greatest creative period.

Countless felicitous touches give the symphony its freshness and charm and it is at once vivacious and tender. Once again one could only marvel at the unlimited tonal resources of this orchestra and the greatness of its conductor.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

KOUSSEVITZKY DIRECTS FINAL SMITH CONCERT

Boston Symphony's Reading of Sibelius Magnificent Achievement

By Willard M. Clark

NORTHAMPTON, March 9 — The Smith College Concert Course closed last night with a magnificent concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

ETC. like above

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 13 1938

CASADESUS SYMPHONY SOLOIST THIS WEEK

At the fifth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, to be given March 21 and 22, the distinguished soloist will be Robert Casadesus, the French pianist. This programme, in which Richard Burgin will conduct, will have two works in which M. Casadesus will appear with the orchestra—Liszt's Concerto No. 1 in E flat, and Vincent d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air. The purely orchestral works will consist of Moussorgsky's fantastic scherzo, "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Golden Cock."

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN SCORES IN WOOLSEY CONCERT

There is no novelty in an appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as concluding event in the Woolsey Series of Concerts, but there remains a sense of quickened pulse both in anticipation of their arrival and after their departure. Last evening was no exception, for the program again revealed the contemporary interests of Doctor Koussevitsky and the magnificent tonal opulence of the great instrumental body at his command.

The composers represented were all living at the turn of the century and the works were all written within a span of 30 years, between 1887 and 1917; at the outside limits were the Rimsky-Korsakof "Capriccio Espagnol" and the Prokofieff "Classical Symphony;" Debussy's Nocturnes date from 1897-99 and Sibelius' Second Symphony from 1901. Prokofieff has been classified as a 'Cubist' in music; if there is truth in the assertion, he has survived as one of a few which left works of permanent value. The two Russians represent the extremes of the Russian school, for Rimsky-Korsakoff was foremost among the brilliant Nationalist group; with him "all the streams of Russian Nationalism unite in one mighty current;" Prokofieff now [illegible] strongly for the Soviet Union.

The "Caprice Espagnol" is one of Doctor Koussevitsky's most successful hobby-horses; he makes it a glittering, dazzling, orchestral tour de force, "a purely external piece, but vividly brilliant for all that," as the composer said of it. Details of the Classical Symphony were often irregular and the finale nearly ran away with the conductor; occassional blurred passages occurred in the opening Nocturne, with some overly fussy details toward the close. The magnificent "Fetes," however, remains a rare delight as it always has been under Doctor Koussevitsky's direction.

All these works are being played in New York this week and are consequently in fine order. Sibelius' Second Symphony was studied by the orchestra earlier in the season and played at home and in New York; since then it has been laid aside. The performance last evening was among the most uneven and disjointed of any given in New Haven by the Bostonians within recent memory; tempos were rushed (the concert was extremely long), co-ordination was often lacking, entrances were bungled, and a general uninspired attitude was constant except as the music gripped all concerned and sailed aloft for a space. Yet, withal the unexpected defects, the performance confirmed the beauty and strength which abounds in every movement; its kinship is with Beethoven, and it seems equal in stature to the Third and Fifth Symphonies of that composer. While conforming to tradition, Sibelius has changed the course of thematic development in sonata form; some go so far as to say he has saved the symphonic form for this century.

It was gratifying to find the audience stirred by this score which has found its way into popular favor only within the last few years; Doctor Koussevitsky has brought us three Sibelius symphonies. There are seven of them.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

NEWS

MAN ABOUT MANHATTAN

By George Tucker

New York — The newest French

A little experiment in psychology has helped George Judd, manager of the Boston symphony, solve a vexing problem. For years his telephone was at his elbow, but George hates answering telephones even worse than you and I hate paying the rent. He instructed his men to move the telephone to a table in the far corner of the office. Then he told his friends: "Every time you telephone me I have to leave my desk and walk clear across the room."

Since then his calls have been reduced by 50 per cent.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Great Concert

Playing of Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 Especially Magnificent and Overwhelming Music

It seems impertinent to attempt an evaluation of last evening's glorious concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Those who were fortunate enough to be present heard, in the playing of Sibelius' symphony No. 2, what was probably the most magnificent, overwhelming music that had ever fallen upon their ears.

There is nothing that even approaches the grandeur of the finale of this symphony, as it was performed last night; its passionate voices, its power and impressiveness, its vastness of implication sweep the listener away from all that is superficial or commonplace. It has the might and the mystery of an elemental force.

As the inspired conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, turned, upon occasion, to draw all possible musical strength from the first violinists, one noted an expression of triumph and exalted majesty—rightly so, for this was a triumph of heroic measures. The performance was the product of an interpreter who had but one concern, a free and complete presentation of the Sibelius spirit.

An appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall is always an exhilarating occasion for music-lovers of Northampton. There are memories of splendid concerts by this virtuoso orchestra, dazzling and electric, under their wide-visioned masterful leader. Last evening, a large audience gathered to renew the spirit of these memories. To say that it was an evening to be remembered is not enough; it is to be cherished as a deeply significant and rich experience.

As one considers the program in retrospect, one realizes that Mr. Koussevitzky could not have made a happier selection for the beginning than the delicate, flowing symphony in A major of Mozart. It had the buoyant quality of youth, with all tis freshness and gaiety. Written for strings with two oboes and two horns, it revealed, in its quiet melodic simplicity, the singing loveliness of the orchestra's strngs, without interference from the brasses. The truly remarkable pianissimo effects attained by the Philadelphia orchestra, in a recent concert here, are not realized by the Boston orchestra. Their whole performance is thereby louder throughout, they being accustomed to Boston's large Symphony hall, explaining frequent criticism by Northampton's audiences that this is a "noisy" orchestra. The inclusion of this delightful work, which was played with great sensitivity, was therefore welcofed by those present.

Then came the "Concert Music for String Orchestra and Brass Instruments" of Paul Hindemith. The brasses introduce, in this work, a strident, throbbing theme which seems to have little connection with the opening bars played by the strings. It is noisy, disturbing and, to some, upsetting. But no matter what the sound may be, to our ears so conditioned by accepted harmonic formulae, one can but thrill to the embodied power and intensity. Its rhythm is tremendously exciting. Then, too, there are moments of harmonic beauty as themes meet and diverge. A fugue theme, of enormous proportions, is interrupted by a viola passage of deep emotional expression, full of yearning passion and despairing tenderness. The return of the fugue is accompanied by a feeling of dreadful dramatic disturbance with only momentary calms, leading to a climax of tremendous excitement.

The contrapuntal skill of the composer, his adroit calcuation of dynamic effects, are qualities not to be denied. Some may feel, on the other hand, that he is striving, with little success, to achieve new modes of expression. At any rate, the Northampton audience is again indebted to Mr. Koussevitzky for thinking it to be of such superior intelligence that it likes to hear, with some evening. They played both the novel and familiar music for all it was worth. The listener was made breathless with the playing of the Sibelius symphony, and when the last overwhemmng chord of the finale had crashed the audience applauded clamorously. The sage master answered the continued homage with several reappearances, but no encore. It was a rich, balanced program, not to be upset. Mr. Koussevitzki had thrown himself with whole-hearted devotion into the task of re-creating the music in the image embedded in his thoughts, and he had completed a masterpiece.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 11 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitsky Revives Mahler's Fifth Symphony at Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Evening Concert at Carnegie Hall

Bringing the complex and ponderous score of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in E Sharp minor for New York consideration, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Dr. Koussevitsky revived the work last October after it had languished in the archives for almost a quarter century since Dr. Muck's performances of it in 1913 and 1914.

That Mahler had something substantial to say in this symphony is reflected again and again in the music but that he could say it only in an inarticulate fashion is equally obvious. There is no doubt that he has recorded here the stream of consciousness as it surged through his mind. Things are left half uttered, awkwardly expressed, and inadequately proportioned, yet the music carries the feeling of deep emotion, absolute sincerity, and glowing desire. It is something to listen for well over an hour and though recognizing at times that things are becoming more involved than they should, to be unaware that so much time has passed. Therein lies a certain fascination in this music, but it remains nevertheless inartistically ordered. Inspiration is not sustained (though that was just what Mahler was trying to express in a way) and consequently it remains a great expression of sonorous struggle.

Most ingratiating is the Adagietto scored for strings and harp alone. It is like an oasis in a desert of mental and musical groping for the unknown, serving to emphasize that here is music like an uncut diamond, needing proportioning to reveal its true beauty.

Also on the program were Debussy's two nocturnes "Nuagaes" and "Fetes," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnole. The performance of the Mahler was probably as fine as will be heard in many a day. That of the Debussy one of refinement without bringing out all the transparency of the music. The crescendo of the procession in "Fetes" was perfectly timed. The Rimsky-Korsakov had rough spots both in the execution of the orchestra and the conducting.

Walkuere

For the last time this season, the Valkyrie Bruennhilde was put to sleep on the rock of fire by Wotan as "Die Walkuere" was sung with a familiar cast headed by Elizabeth Rethberg, Kirsten Flagstad, Lauritz Melchoir. Ludwig Hofmann was Wotan; Mr. Leinsdorf conducted.

* *

Jascha Fastofsky and Abraham Goetz

After an absence of eight years, Jascha Fastofsky, violinist and conductor of the Queens Symphonic Orchestra reappeared as violin virtuoso in a joint sonata recital with Abraham Goetz, pianist, who made his debut in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music last night.

The worth-while program commenced with Beethoven's "Sonata No. 2," the "Allegro" of which was disappointing in tempi, phrasing and tone. In the "Andante" movement more fluency and interpretation was apparent. Mr. Fastofsky's tone was full and vital in the Brahms "Sonata No. 2"; his phrasing and thematic treatment clearer in detail. Mr. Goetz is technically well equipped and played with considerable feeling for tonal quality and gradation of dynamics. Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" closed the recital. The Adagio movement was particularly persuasive in its individuality and dynamic shading. The good-sized audience was enthusiastic.

F. G. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 12 1938

Bostonians Play Prokofieff Work

At the fourth concert this season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky, repeated three numbers heard at its Carnegie Hall concert the previous night—Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." The rest of the program was given over to Prokofieff's "Classical" symphony and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

The Prokofieff work is one of the most delightful entries in the orchestra's repertory. It is charming, brisk, tuneful and deftly wrought music, running its brief course in thirteen minutes, and the Bostonians cover themselves with technical glory every time they play it. Every phrase in it was crisply turned and the whole thing bubbled along with captivating lightness.

The Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakoff numbers again gave the orchestra ample opportunity for showing its wonted virtuosity and fine response to Mr. Koussevitzky's subtle scheme of dynamics. The clean, resounding brilliance of the Fandango in the "Caprice" brought down the house.

As for the Brahms battlehorse, the performance boasted broad utterance, sustained expressiveness, and a transparency of tone that emphasized every detail keenly.

L. B.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
MAR 11 1938

Mrs. McClintock Hostess For Concert in Brooklyn

Boston Symphony Program Tonight Is Next to Last

Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock will be hostess tonight in the Brooklyn committee's box in the Brooklyn Academy of Music for the last concert but one in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. This series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, with Edward Blum as president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and a special Brooklyn committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen as chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as acting chairman. Other officers of the Brooklyn committee include Mrs. Edward Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice-chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton C. Badger, chairman of the Junior League Committee. The Junior League Committee also includes Miss Helen Adams, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

Among the boxholders tonight will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence Logan, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. Roy M. Hart, president; Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
... 9 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT SMITH COLLEGE COLOSSAL

Orchestra Conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky Stirs Audience With Second Symphony by Sibelius

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 8—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, appeared tonight at John M. Greene hall in the Smith college course, in a concert made notable by a thrilling performance of the second symphony by Sibelius. This eminent Finnish composer is steadily rising to a place among the acclaimed masters of the symphonic form. Some of his works which had been neglected are beginning to become familiar, but this D major symphony, opus 43, still leads in popularity. Mr Koussevitzky has been giving it much attention, and evidently finds it a work of fascinating possibilities; the performance tonight was colossal.

This is the more important because the strength of this imposing work lies largely in its cumulative effect. The blocks of which it is built are not of very precious material, but they are put together in a mighty edifice of tone. When given, as was the case tonight, by one of the world's greatest orchestras, led by a director of masterly skill and masterful power who is warmly appreciative of its quality, the effect is tremendous. In this respect a comparison might be drawn with the symphonies of Tschaikowsky, otherwise very dissimilar, which stirred audiences so deeply when they began to be generally known a generation ago.

Not Altogether Felicitous

Aside from this symphony, which was enough to make the concert memorable, the program was not altogether felicitous. The charming Mozart symphony in A major with which it opened is an early work, composed when the composer was but 18, and when the symphonic form (1774) was hardly more mature. It was played with a reduced orchestra to fit the slim score, and was too light, too small and too delicate for its place in this program. Something with the weight, say, of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, might have kept the ship in better trim, but both the symphony and the playing of it were exquisite.

It may be doubted, also, whether so cyclopean a work as the Sibelius symphony should have been preceded by so rough and noisy a composition as the "Concert Music for String and Brass Instruments" which Paul Hindemith composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, seven years ago. This music is strong, original, and full of interesting matter, but it unquestionably gives an answer to the old conundrum "What kind of a noise annoys an oyster?" Even after the intermission one was left rather stunned by Hindemith's rugged music; a more suave approach might have made still greater the effect of the symphonic climax. In all these works the orchestra played magnificently, and its superlative quality could be the better appreciated by tonight's audience because of the other fine orchestras which have been heard this season in the Smith college concert course.

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 12 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Leads Fourth Brooklyn Concert

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last night the fourth concert of its current series in Brooklyn before a capacity audience in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, continued with Debussy's Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful Capriccio Espagnol and concluded with the Second Symphony in D major by Johannes Brahms.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 11 1938

Mahler Symphony Played

Led by Koussevitzky, Boston Visitors Give Two Debussy 'Nocturnes.'

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy and Nicholas Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakoff had undertaken to compose music for the specific purpose of exhibiting the most splendid and distinctive qualities of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra, they could scarcely have achieved that purpose more strikingly than was done by a program of their compositions conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mahler's Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimksy's "Capriccio Espagnol" served, each in turn, and each in its differing manner, to glorify the ensemble. In sheer brilliance of playing this was one of the most stimulating concerts of the orchestral season. In basic substance, it was more debatable. The Debussy "Nocturnes" remain masterpieces of musical impressionism. But Mahler's tortuous symphony is as vacuous for some as it is prophetic for others. Rimsky's purely external set of Spanish sketches is an orchestral tour de force and little else.

The Mahler work occupied the entire first half of the concert. It has not grown shorter since Wilhelm Gericke and the Boston Symphony introduced it to New York more than thirty years ago. From the opening "Traeuermarsch" to the Rondo-Finale it heaps ideas, effects, reminiscences, climaxes, recessions and fresh climaxes with that prodigality which Mahler shared with Bruckner. Torment follows torment, in alternation with the naive. The total effect is that of a vast expenditure of technic, energy and emotion, dissipated to the four winds and ending in frustration.

But this is "conductor music" of the first order. In the manner of his writing, Mahler's own mastery of the orchestra as the most marvelous musical instrument created by man has been placed at the disposal of his interpreters. His scoring invites the most brilliant playing in every choir. In the gloomy fanfares of the opening the brasses gave the cue for the virtuosity that was to follow. The sentimental and almost Straussian adagietto summoned from the famous strings their utmost sheen and glow. The enormously complicated conclusion was an orgy of tonal contrasts and plunging, exultant momentum. Mahler's inability to avoid mixing the banal with the recondite defeats him many times in this symphony just when he has lifted his tortured spirit to the height of some very personal emotional communication. But his orchestral technic challenges attention even when his inspiration is at its lowest ebb.

The finely powdered sonorities of the two Debussy evocations—which, strangely enough, the composer originally conceived as works for solo violin and orchestra—were exquisitely projected. Seldom has Debussy's own description of the phantom procession midway in "Fetes" as "luminous dust" seemed more precisely the right one, though on this occasion Mr. Koussevitzky forced his climax a little too far The orchestra made a sonorous carnival of the Capriccio. Shouts were heard in the applause at the end of the concert.

NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
GAZETTE
MAR 9 - 1938

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Great Concert

Playing of Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 Especially Magnificent and Overwhelming Music

It seems impertinent to attempt an evaluation of last evening's glorious concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra. Those who were fortunate enough to be present heard, in the playing of Sibelius' symphony No. 2, what was probably tne most magnificent, overwhelming music that had ever fallen upon their ears.

There is nothing that even approaches the grandeur of the finale of this symphony, as it was performed last night; its passionate voices, its power and impressiveness, its vastness of implication sweep the listener away from all that is superficial or commonplace. It has the might and the mystery of an elemental force.

As the inspired conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, turned, upon occasion, to draw all possible musical strength from the first violinists, one noted an expression of triumph and exalted majesty —rightly so, for this was a triumph of heroic measures. The performance was the product of an interpreter who had but one concern, a free and complete presentation of the Sibelius spirit.

An appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in John M. Greene hall is always an exhilarating occasion for music-lovers of Northampton. There are memories of splendid concerts by this virtuoso orchestra, dazzling and electric, under their wide-visioned masterful leader. Last evening, a large audience gathered to renew the spirit of these memories. To say that it was an evening to be remembered is not enough; it is to be cherished as a deeply significant and rich experience.

As one considers tne program in retrospect, one realizes that Mr. Koussevitzky could not have made a happier selection for tne beginning than the delicate, flowing symphony in A major of Mozart. It had the buoyant quality of youth, with all tis freshness and gaiety. Written for strings with two oboes and two horns, it revealed, in its quiet melodic simplicity, the singing loveliness of the orchestra's strngs, without interference from the brasses. The truly remarkable pianissimo effects attained by the Philadelphia orchestra, in a recent concert here, are not realized by tne Boston orchestra. Their whole performance is thereby louder throughout, they being accustomed to Boston's large Symphony hall, explaining frequent criticism by Northampton's audiences that this is a "noisy" orchestra. The inclusion of this delightful work, which was played with great sensitivity, was therefore welcofed by those present.

Then came the "Concert Music for String Orchestra and Brass Instruments" of Paul Hindemith. The brasses introduce, in this work, a strident, throbbing theme which seems to have little connection with the opening bars played by the strings. It is noisy, disturbing and, to some, upsetting. But no matter what the sound may be, to our ears so conditioned by accepted harmonic formulae, one can but thrill to the embodied power and intensity. Its rhythm is tremendously exciting. Then, too, there are moments of harmonic beauty as themes meet and diverge. A fugue theme, of enormous proportions, is interrupted by a viola passage of deep emotional expression, full of yearning passion and despairing tenderness. The return of the fugue is accompanied by a feeling of dreadful dramatic disturbance with only momentary calms, leading to a climax of tremendous excitement.

The contrapuntal skill of the composer, his adroit calculation of dynamic effects, are qualities not to be denied. Some may feel, on the other hand, that he is striving, with little success, to achieve new modes of expression. At any rate, the Northampton audience is again indebted to Mr. Koussevitzky for thinking it to be of such superior intelligence that it likes to hear, with some understanding, music of the modern school. No other orchestra is capable of such stirring interpretations of this music; so whatever it has to say was said last night. The score of this work is not easy to project, yet the orchestra's conveyance of Hindemith's music was worthy of the score itself. No higher praise could be given.

Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were at their best last evening. They played both the novel and familiar music for all it was worth. The listener was made breathless with the playing of the Sibelius symphony, and when the last overwhelming chord of the finale had crashed the audience applauded clamorously. The sage master answered the continued homage with several reappearances, but no encore. It was a rich, balanced program, not to be upset. Mr. Kousevitzki had thrown himself with whole-hearted devotion into the task of re-creating the music in the image embedded in his thoughts, and he had completed a masterpiece.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 1 1 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitsky Revives Mahler's Fifth Symphony at Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fourth Evening Concert at Carnegie Hall

Bringing the complex and ponderous score of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 in E Sharp minor for New York consideration, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth evening concert in Carnegie Hall last night. Dr. Koussevitsky revived the work last October after it had languished in the archives for almost a quarter century since Dr. Muck's performances of it in 1913 and 1914.

That Mahler had something substantial to say in this symphony is reflected again and again in the music but that he could say it only in an inarticulate fashion is equally obvious. There is no doubt that he has recorded here the stream of consciousness as it surged through his mind. Things are left half uttered, awkwardly expressed, and inadequately proportioned, yet the music carries the feeling of deep emotion, absolute sincerity, and glowing desire. It is something to listen for well over an hour and though recognizing at times that things are becoming more involved than they should, to be unaware that so much time has passed. Therein lies a certain fascination in this music, but it remains nevertheless inartistically ordered. Inspiration is not sustained (though that was just what Mahler was trying to express in a way) and consequently it remains a great expression of sonorous struggle.

Most ingratiating is the Adagietto scored for strings and harp alone. It is like an oasis in a desert of mental and musical groping for the unknown, serving to emphasize that here is music like an uncut diamond, needing proportioning to reveal its true beauty.

Also on the program were Debussy's two nocturnes "Nuagaes" and "Fetes," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnole. The performance of the Mahler was probably as fine as will be heard in many a day. That of the Debussy one of refinement without bringing out all the transparency of the music. The crescendo of the procession in "Fetes" was perfectly timed. The Rimsky-Korsakov had rough spots both in the execution of the orchestra and the conducting.

Walkuere

For the last time this season, the Valkyrie Bruennhilde was put to sleep on the rock of fire by Wotan as "Die Walkuere" was sung with a familiar cast headed by Elizabeth Rethberg, Kirsten Flagstad, Lauritz Melchoir, Ludwig Hofmann was Wotan; Mr. Leinsdorf conducted.

Jascha Fastofsky and Abraham Goetz

After an absence of eight years, Jascha Fastofsky, violinist and conductor of the Queens Symphonic Orchestra reappeared as violin virtuoso in a joint sonata recital with Abraham Goetz, pianist, who made his debut in the Music Hall of the Academy of Music last night.

The worth-while program commenced with Beethoven's "Sonata No. 2," the "Allegro" of which was disappointing in tempi, phrasing and tone. In the "Andante" movement more fluency and interpretation was apparent. Mr. Fastofsky's tone was full and vital in the Brahms "Sonata No. 2"; his phrasing and thematic treatment clearer ni detail. Mr. Goetz is technically well equipped and played with considerable feeling for tonal quality and gradation of dynamics. Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata" closed the recital. The Adagio movement was particularly persuasive in its individuality and dynamic shading. The good-sized audience was enthusiastic.

F. G. H.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 1 2 1938

Bostonians Play Prokofieff Work

At the fourth concert this season in the Brooklyn Academy of Music last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra led by Serge Koussevitzky, repeated three numbers heard at its Carnegie Hall concert the previous night — Debussy's "Clouds" and "Fetes" and Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." The rest of the

:45—WMCA—Dancing lessons.
WNYC—News.
WHN—Amourette.
WNEW—Safety campaign.

4 P. M. TO 6 P. M.

:00—WEAF—Stamp collectors.
WOR—Swing time.
WABC—Charles Paul, organ.
WMCA—Alice Breese, talk.
WNYC—Keith Taylor, others, talk.
WHN—Backstage interviews.
WNEW—Kay Reed, organ.
WEVD—Polish music.
WQXR—Debussy-Schumann concert.
:15—WEAF—Walter Kelsey's Orchestra.
WOR—Glee Club concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
MAR 1 1 1938

Mrs. McClintock Hostess For Concert in Brooklyn

Boston Symphony Program Tonight Is Next to Last

Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock will be hostess tonight in the Brooklyn committee's box in the Brooklyn Academy of Music for the last concert but one in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series of five under Serge Koussevitzky's direction. This series is sponsored by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, with Edward Blum as president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and a special Brooklyn committee headed by Adrian Van Sinderen as chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport as acting chairman. Other officers of the Brooklyn committee include Mrs. Edward Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice-chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League Committee. The Junior League Committee also includes Miss Helen Adams, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

Among the boxholders tonight will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray jr., Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Miss Florence Logan, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. Roy M. Hart, president; Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT AT SMITH COLLEGE COLOSSAL

Orchestra Conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky Stirs Audience With Second Symphony by Sibelius

By FRANCIS REGAL

Northampton, March 8—The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky, appeared tonight at John M. Greene hall in the Smith college course, in a concert made notable by a thrilling performance of the second symphony by Sibelius. This eminent Finnish composer is steadily rising to a place among the acclaimed masters of the symphonic form. Some of his works which had been neglected are beginning to become familiar, but this D major symphony, opus 43, still leads in popularity. Mr Koussevitzky has been giving it much attention, and evidently finds it a work of fascinating possibilities; the performance tonight was colossal.

This is the more important because the strength of this imposing work lies largely in its cumulative effect. The blocks of which it is built are not of very precious material, but they are put together in a mighty edifice of tone. When given, as was the case tonight, by one of the world's greatest orchestras, led by a director of masterly skill and masterful power who is warmly appreciative of its quality, the effect is tremendous. In this respect a comparison might be drawn with the symphonies of Tschaikowsky, otherwise very dissimilar, which stirred audiences so deeply when they began to be generally known a generation ago.

Not Altogether Felicitous

Aside from this symphony, which was enough to make the concert memorable, the program was not altogether felicitous. The charming Mozart symphony in A major with which it opened is an early work, composed when the composer was but 18, and when the symphonic form (1774) was hardly more mature. It was played with a reduced orchestra to fit the slim score, and was too light, too small and too delicate for its place in this program. Something with the weight, say, of Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, might have kept the ship in better trim, but both the symphony and the playing of it were exquisite.

It may be doubted, also, whether so cyclopean a work as the Sibelius symphony should have been preceded by so rough and noisy a composition as the "Concert Music for String and Brass Instruments" which Paul Hindemith composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, seven years ago. This music is strong, original, and full of interesting matter, but it unquestionably gives an answer to the old conundrum "What kind of a noise annoys an oyster?" Even after the intermission one was left rather stunned by Hindemith's rugged music; a more suave approach might have made still greater the effect of the symphonic climax. In all these works the orchestra played magnificently, and its superlative quality could be the better appreciated by tonight's audience because of the other fine orchestras which have been heard this season in the Smith college concert course.

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 1 2 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Leads Fourth Brooklyn Concert

With Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last night the fourth concert of its current series in Brooklyn before a capacity audience in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The program began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, continued with Debussy's Nocturnes ("Nuages" and "Fetes") and Rimsky-Korsakoff's colorful Capriccio Espagnol and concluded with the Second Symphony in D major by Johannes Brahms.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 1 1 1938

Mahler Symphony Played

Led by Koussevitzky, Boston Visitors Give Two Debussy 'Nocturnes.'

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy and Nicholas Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakoff had undertaken to compose music for the specific purpose of exhibiting the most splendid and distinctive qualities of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra, they could scarcely have achieved that purpose more strikingly than was done by a program of their compositions conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mahler's Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimksy's "Capriccio Espagnol" served, each in turn, and each in its differing manner, to glorify the ensemble. In sheer brilliance of playing this was one of the most stimulating concerts of the orchestral season. In basic substance, it was more debatable. The Debussy "Nocturnes" remain masterpieces of musical impressionism. But Mahler's tortuous symphony is as vacuous for some as it is prophetic for others. Rimsky's purely external set of Spanish sketches is an orchestral tour de force and little else.

The Mahler work occupied the entire first half of the concert. It has not grown shorter since Wilhelm Gericke and the Boston Symphony introduced it to New York more than thirty years ago. From the opening "Traeuermarsch" to the Rondo-Finale it heaps ideas, effects, reminiscences, climaxes, recessions and fresh climaxes with that prodigality which Mahler shared with Bruckner. Torment follows torment, in alternation with the naive. The total effect is that of a vast expenditure of technic, energy and emotion, dissipated to the four winds and ending in frustration.

But this is "conductor music" of the first order. In the manner of his writing, Mahler's own mastery of the orchestra as the most marvelous musical instrument created by man has been placed at the disposal of his interpreters. His scoring invites the most brilliant playing in every choir. In the gloomy fanfares of the opening the brasses gave the cue for the virtuosity that was to follow. The sentimental and almost Straussian adagietto summoned from the famous strings their utmost sheen and glow. The enormously complicated conclusion was an orgy of tonal contrasts and plunging, exultant momentum. Mahler's inability to avoid mixing the banal with the recondite defeats him many times in this symphony just when he has lifted his tortured spirit to the height of some very personal emotional communication. But his orchestral technic challenges attention even when his inspiration is at its lowest ebb.

The finely powdered sonorities of the two Debussy evocations—which, strangely enough, the composer originally conceived as works for solo violin and orchestra—were exquisitely projected. Seldom has Debussy's own description of the phantom procession midway in "Fetes" as "luminous dust" seemed more precisely the right one, though on this occasion Mr. Koussevitzky forced his climax a little too far The orchestra made a sonorous carnival of the Capriccio. Shouts were heard in the applause at the end of the concert.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 11 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Orchestra Plays Mahler's Fifth Symphony

Koussevitzky Enjoys His Favorite Piece —Uses Debussy as a Sort of Chaser

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

Mahler's Fifth Symphony occupied the place of honor on the Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night, with Debussy's Two Nocturnes and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Cappriccio Espagnol" bringing up the rear. This was the Bostonians' fourth visit to Carnegie Hall this season and a large audience endured, vibrated to, or slept through the lengthy opening symphony, according to the indifference to, love of and aversion for Mahler of its individual members.

It was obvious that Dr. Koussevitzky approached the symphony in the spirit of a lover, for his face and his gestures during its performance were indicative of transfixed partisanship. For me the experience was painful, for the conversion I always long for at every hearing of the works of Mahler was again denied me. Not that the conversion of an individual doubter can matter. But the music of Mahler is still a controversial subject and the recording of my own perplexities may be of help to others who are similarly afflicted.

Listening with the greatest concentration the only new impressions I was able to garner from the familiar work related to Mahler's technique in writing and scoring. In construction, development and in orchestration the symphony reveals a kind of desperate, humorless cleverness. At many points the music seems about to end conclusively, almost as if the composer found himself at the end of his resources. Yet at these very moments something unexpected happens, some modulation, a new turn of an oft-repeated phrase, a new orchestral alignment. The movement goes on and on, not through the compulsion of natural evolution but by the aid of continual re-enforcements brought up in desperation at the last moment.

The old impressions gathered from many hearings of the Fifth Symphony were only strengthened by the great clarity of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the superb playing of the orchestra. Again the themes seemed bloated or merely sentimental. Again Verdi elbowed Strauss and Strauss elbowed Wagner. The spirit of impotent giantism filled the hall. Lamentation, passion, contemplation, delight in nature and in the simplicity of innocent emotion were blown up to unnatural dimensions, towering like the enormous, inflated balloon figures in Macy's children's parade.

Or so it appeared to the unregenerate. There were faces in the audience last night that looked transfigured with the wonder of a revelation. This revelation may some day be vouchsafed to one who has often failed to discern musical truth and beauty only to discover them suddenly and unaccountably years later. But for the moment Mahler's Fifth Symphony remains for him the intellectual attempt of a sincere and expert musician to dramatize in tone the travail and the aspirations of mortal man.

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 11 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

Mahler's Fifth Symphony Is Played Under Direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

DEBUSSY MUSIC FOLLOWS

Two Nocturnes Are Highlights of Night Which Also Features Rimsky-Korsakoff Works

By OLIN DOWNES

The qualities of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, may be begged for the moment, because the predominating impression of the performance was the extraordinary qualities of the leader and the orchestra.

The symphony impresses us mightily, yet leaves us cold. It whips up superb masses of sound, and unfolds a gigantic architecture. The style of it is dramatic, and its sincerity unquestionable. But it does not rate as inherently great music.

On the other hand, it touches off the orchestra. If the Mahler instrumentation is agreeable to the listener's taste, if the immense masses of tone and marshaling of whole brigades of instruments, appeal to the love of the sonorous, then a performance such as that of last night is sheer fascination. It is tumult of sound, and lordly splendor. Its power lies in its tone-painting.

Monumental Conclusion

This is so, at least of the first movement, with the solemn preluding of trumpets which usher in the funeral march, with its heavy tread and wild lamentations. The scherzo is professedly demoniac, but more in the vein of piquant orchestral effects and moods of the dance. The most exalted pages are undoubtedly those rapt measures which precede the finale, when a vast tonal design draws all its parts together and welds them into a monumental conclusion.

The thunderous, clamoring symphony served that glowing, shimmering thing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to display anew its splendors. Dr. Koussevitzky must believe profoundly in this composition. Brilliant as he is in interpretation, and of a unique sensitiveness to every phase, old and new, of musical thought, he could not have done so much with the score if he did not believe in and love it. The music could not have had more passionate conviction or emotional stress. It, nevertheless, remains a vehicle for a virtuoso leader and not, in itself, an absolute creation. The audience applauded rapturously at the end of this performance, but it was applause for orchestral oratory of the most convincing kind and not applause for music.

Debussy Music Follows

If it were necessary to prove this, the proof was immediately forthcoming in the instance of the two Debussy "Nocturnes," which, after the intermission, followed the symphony. Of course, it would be illogical to compare music of Latin and Teutonic tradition, and decide upon the relative values of the works involved. Mahler is dominated by the German model, which is a bad one, of late nineteenth century symphonic music.

Debussy is a much stiller and smaller voice, yet the infinite is cradled in his miraculous tone-fantasies. The languor of the slow-moving clouds, their shapes shifting and melting one into the other, and the languorous voice of the English horn singing its strange, haunting song; the dance of the creatures of air, interrupted by the classic procession! It might be a bacchanale danced by Greeks. Or it might, as the composer's explanation suggests, be a vision of the sun on its thunder-march across the skies. There is infinite beauty, a faultless truth, a natural pagan joy in this music. Debussy says more in two pages than Mahler in forty.

This performance, so delicately poised, ushered in the third feat of the evening. Dr. Koussevitzky's list bore testimony to his skill as a program-maker, for the concert ended with one of the most scintillating performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" that has been heard here within memory. The "Caprice" is pure color, instrumentation. It displayed every part and most of the solo players of the orchestra. They outdid themselves. Such was the spirit of the conductor's reading that trivialities of the music passed unheeded. We know how Tchaikovsky admired this "colossal piece of instrumentation." Why, was demonstrated by last night's performance.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 11 1938

Mahler Music Played by Boston Orchestra

By PITTS SANBORN.

In a way that seems both naive and out of date a New York audience still fights shy of Gustav Mahler. In Carnegie Hall last evening Serge Koussevitzky had the temerity to devote the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert to Mahler's Fifth Symphony, in C sharp minor, and in the intervals the usual questions were asked:—"How do you like this symphony? How do you like Mahler?"

Well, this symphony was completed in 1902 and introduced to New York (by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as it happens, in Carnegie Hall, Wilhelm Gericke conducting) on February 15, 1906. By this time both it and its composer might be taken somewhat for granted, even as we take Beethoven and Brahms.

* * *

And why should the work be deemed either fearsome or a curiosity? Long it unquestionably is, and not, I believe, an example of sustained and overtopping inspiration. But its vastness has as concomitant accomplished and ingenious facture, rare mastery of orchestration; and you needn't be a specialist to recognize the technical advantages.

What is more to the point from the popular angle, however, is the unmistakable tunefulness that prevails in much of this symphony. Such is the case in the opening funeral march and, differently, in the dance measures of the scherzo. The ensuing Adagietto, scored only for strings and harp, is a delicate, expressive lyric interlude of melodious tranquillity that nobody could fail to find beguiling, and the Rondo-Finale abounds in tune from the initiatory moment when horn and bassoon and oboe contend for primacy on to the end.

All told, Mahler-fear seems now a bit grotesque.

The magnificent qualities of the Boston orchestra and the devotion of Mr. Koussevitzky as its conductor found ample scope in the performance of the symphony. The second half of the concert, given over to Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice," was a further, and more familiar, field for orchestral virtuosity.

In consideration of all and sundry, the reception accorded Mahler's symphony by the large audience was even more than cordial.

* * *

Mahler Symphony Played

Led by Koussevitzky, Boston Visitors Give Two Debussy 'Nocturnes.'

N. Y. Sun March 11/38

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy and Nicholas Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakoff had undertaken to compose music for the specific purpose of exhibiting the most splendid and distinctive qualities of the present Boston Symphony Orchestra, they could scarcely have achieved that purpose more strikingly than was done by a program of their compositions conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall.

Mahler's Symphony No. 5, in C-sharp minor, Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimksy's "Capriccio Espagnol" served, each in turn, and each in its differing manner, to glorify the ensemble. In sheer brilliance of playing this was one of the most stimulating concerts of the orchestral season. In basic substance, it was more debatable. The Debussy "Nocturnes" remain masterpieces of musical impressionism. But Mahler's tortuous symphony is as vacuous for some as it is prophetic for others. Rimsky's purely external set of Spanish sketches is an orchestral tour de force and little else.

The Mahler work occupied the entire first half of the concert. It has not grown shorter since Wilhelm Gericke and the Boston Symphony introduced it to New York more than thirty years ago. From the opening "Traeuermarsch" to the Rondo-Finale it heaps ideas, effects, reminiscences, climaxes, recessions and fresh climaxes with that prodigality which Mahler shared with Bruckner. Torment follows torment, in alternation with the naive. The total effect is that of a vast expenditure of technic, energy and emotion, dissipated to the four winds and ending in frustration.

But this is "conductor music" of the first order. In the manner of his writing, Mahler's own mastery of the orchestra as the most marvelous musical instrument created by man has been placed at the disposal of his interpreters. His scorwas to follow. The sentimental and almost Straussian adagietto summoned from the famous strings their utmost sheen and glow. The enormously complicated conclusion was an orgy of tonal contrasts and plunging, exultant momentum. Mahler's inability to avoid mixing the banal with the recondite defeats him many times in this symphony just when he has lifted his tortured spirit to the height of some very personal emotional communication. But his orchestral technic challenges attention even when his inspiration is at its lowest ebb.

The finely powdered sonorities of the two Debussy evocations—which, strangely enough, the composer originally conceived as works for solo violin and orchestra—were exquisitely projected. Seldom has Debussy's own description of the phantom pro-

---

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES - STAR
MAR 17 1938

W. A. Musical Club Concert March 24

Thursday evening, March 24th the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club will present Keith Falkner, English baritone, at Central High school. One of the biggest box office names in England today, Falkner, was soloist in Bach's St. Matthew's Passion appearing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting, with the St. Louis Symphony in Verdi's Requiem under the direction of Vladimir Golschmann, the Cleveland Orchestra under Arthur Rodzinski in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He has been soloist for two successive seasons at the Cincinnati May Festival singing the role of Christ in Elgar's oratorio "The Apostles" also the Bethlehem Bach Festival and the Ann Arbor Festival.

Immediately upon completion of his six weeks concert tour, Falkner will go to Hollywood to begin work on his second movie. His success was so great in his first picture "Mayfair Melody" that Warner Brothers signed him for three more productions.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
[illegible]

Huge Shipment of Steel For Festival Shed Arrives

Establishes Some Kind of Record According to Charles E. Williams, New Haven Road Passenger Agent

STOCKBRIDGE, March 12.—Charles E. Williams of Pittsfield, district passenger agent for the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, went into the records today and discovered that the shipment of 10 carloads of steel consigned to the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., was the largest single shipment of steel ever to arrive in the county and it was the largest single shipment of freight consigned to one party in Stockbridge in 21 years.

The steel, weighing 170 tons, arrived this morning from the Bethlehem Steel Company and starting Monday will be transported to "Tanglewood" on Route 183 where the steel company will take over its erection on concrete foundations built by Graves & Hemmes of Great Barrington. Another shipment of almost an equal tonnage will arrive later this month. To transfer the tremendous girders and beams from the flat cars to Carl B. Lindholm's trucks will require the services of a crane with a 60-foot beam.

The Festival shed will accommodate more than 5000 persons and will be ready for the six concerts to be given in August by the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 12 1938

Music Notes

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ACADEMY

Visit Here Another Auspicious One—Koussevitzky Conducts, as Usual

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned to Brooklyn last night and made its visit to the Academy of Music another auspicious one. With two rather brief, although important exceptions, the program which Dr. Sege Koussevitzky and the orchestra, presented to the almost capacity audience at the Academy was unusually on the light and gay side. To that extent it may not have been a stimulating or engross-one, but it was very definitely a pleasant one, a concert which permitted relaxation, rather than one that demanded concentration or compelled attention.

The program opened with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, which is both lighter and gayer than "classical" symphonies and, while in symphony form, only half as long as the usual symphony. Then there followed Debussy's two "Nocturnes," called "Nuages" and "Fetes." The former, the translation of which is "Clouds," is the musical equivalent of those physical phenomena and almost as unsubstantial. "Fetes," on the other hand, is lively and cheering with the first deep tonal effects of the evening. Also preceding the intermission the orchestra played Rimsky Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol," a return to the light mood.

The post-intermission was filled by Brahms' No. 2 Symphony in D major, which for three-fourths of its way was as light as the general theme of the evening, but in its last movement it attoned in scope and tonality for the lack of them in its and the rest of the programs earlier parts, for the allegro con spirito movement is stirring.

The concert was well-played, and excellently interpreted. The fact that the applause was only moderately enthusiastic was probably due to the fact that the audience wanted at least a greater proportion of emotional music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 12 1938

Boston Symphony Is Heard Here; Dinners Given by Boxholders Preceding Fourth Concert

A large and appreciative audience crowded the Brooklyn Academy of Music last evening for the season's fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, included Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes." Rimsky Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol and the Second Symphony in D Major of Johannes Brahms completed the program.

Many of the boxholders gave dinners before the concert. Among the hostesses was Mrs. Thomas H. McClintock, who entertained in the box of the Brooklyn Committee for the borough appearances of the orchestra. Attending a dinner at Mrs. McClintock's home, No. 158 Rutland road and later her guests at the concert were: Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. and Mrs. John L. Bauer and Mrs. L. Parker McKinley

Colonel and Mrs. F. D.Carlock entertained in their box for Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mrs. Albert G. Wing, Major and Mrs. Hugh A. Wear and Captain and Mrs. John A. Weeks.

In the box with Mrs. Benjamin Prince were Mr. and Mrs. B. Meredith Langstaff, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff and Miss Irene Miles. Mrs. Prince entertained at dinner at her home, No. 376 Park avenue, Manhattan before the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart had as their guests in the box of the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association Mrs. Frank B. Graff, Miss Jane Hart, William Stab. Earlier in the evening Mr. and Mrs. Hart were hosts at a dinner at their home, No. 1246 Dean street.

Other boxholders were: Mrs. Thomas R. Murray, Jr., Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Miss Florence Logan, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

The concerts are given here under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president of the board of trustees. The Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger heads a Junior League Committee for the series. The final concert will be given on Friday evening, April 1.

B.
March 13/38

Music Events

GEORGES ENESCO, distinguished Rumanian composer and conductor, will serve in both capacities as guest with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular pair of concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall and in a program in Sanders Theater on Thursday evening.

Enesco will present his second Suite for the first time in Boston on the occasion of these concerts, and in addition will conduct his very popular Rumanian Rhapsody, No. 1.

The program will open with Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104, and will also include the Symphonic Poem, "Actaeon," by the Rumanian composer, Alfred Alessandresco.

* * *

RICHARD BURGIN will conduct the fifth pair of Boston Symphony concerts in the Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series to be given on March 21 and 22.

Robert Cassdesus, French pianist, will appear as soloist in the performance of Liszt's Concerto No. 1 in E flat, and Vincent d'Indy's Symphony on a Mountain Air.

For the rest the program will include Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," and the Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Golden Cock."

NEW YORK
TIMES
MAR 12 1938

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

Mahler's Fifth Symphony Is Played Under Direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

DEBUSSY MUSIC FOLLOWS

Two Nocturnes Are Highlights of Night Which Also Features Rimsky-Korsakoff Works

By OLIN DOWNES

The qualities of Mahler's Fifth Symphony, played by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, may be begged for the moment, because the predominating impression of the performance was the extraordinary qualities of the leader and the orchestra.

The symphony impresses us mightily, yet leaves us cold. It whips up superb masses of sound, and unfolds a gigantic architecture. The style of it is dramatic, and its sincerity unquestionable. But it does not rate as inherently great music.

On the other hand, it touches off the orchestra. If the Mahler instrumentation is agreeable to the listener's taste, if the immense masses of tone and marshaling of whole brigades of instruments, appeal to the love of the sonorous, then a performance such as that of last night is sheer fascination. It is tumult of sound, and lordly splendor. Its power lies in its tone-painting.

Monumental Conclusion

This is so, at least of the first movement, with the solemn preluding of trumpets which usher in the funeral march, with its heavy tread and wild lamentations. The scherzo is professedly demoniac, but more in the vein of piquant orchestral effects and moods of the dance. The most exalted pages are undoubtedly those rapt measures which precede the finale, when a vast tonal design draws all its parts together and welds them into a monumental conclusion.

The thunderous, clamoring symphony served that glowing, shimmering thing, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to display anew its splendors. Dr. Koussevitzky must believe profoundly in this composition. Brilliant as he is in interpretation, and of a unique sensitiveness to every phase, old and new, of musical thought, he could not have done so much with the score if he did not believe in and love it. The music could not have had more passionate conviction or emotional stress. It, nevertheless, remains a vehicle for a virtuoso leader and not, in itself, an absolute creation. The audience applauded rapturously at the end of this performance, but it was applause for orchestral oratory of the most convincing kind and not applause for music.

Debussy Music Follows

If it were necessary to prove this, the proof was immediately forthcoming in the instance of the two Debussy "Nocturnes," which, after the intermission, followed the symphony. Of course, it would be illogical to compare music of Latin and Teutonic tradition, and decide upon the relative values of the works involved. Mahler is dominated by the German model, which is a bad one, of late nineteenth century symphonic music.

Debussy is a much stiller and smaller voice, yet the infinite is cradled in his miraculous tone-fantasies. The languor of the slow-moving clouds, their shapes shifting and melting one into the other, and the languorous voice of the English horn singing its strange, haunting song; the dance of the creatures of air, interrupted by the classic procession! It might be a bacchanale danced by Greeks. Or it might, as the composer's explanation suggests, be a vision of the sun on its thunder-march across the skies. There is infinite beauty, a faultless truth, a natural pagan joy in this music. Debussy says more in two pages than Mahler in forty.

This performance, so delicately poised, ushered in the third feat of the evening. Dr. Koussevitzky's list bore testimony to his skill as a program-maker, for the concert ended with one of the most scintillating performances of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice" that has been heard here within memory. The "Caprice" is pure color, instrumentation. It displayed every part and most of the solo players of the orchestra. They outdid themselves. Such was the spirit of the conductor's reading that trivialities of the music passed unheeded. We know how Tchaikovsky admired this "colossal piece of instrumentation." Why, was demonstrated by last night's performance.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PROGRAM

An analytical talk on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra to be presented in Springfield, March 30, was given this afternoon by Dr Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith college.

The program consists of the Concerto in D Major by C. Philip Emanuel Bach. Dr Josten illustrated this selection with piano arrangements emphasizing the various themes.

Recordings were used in illustrating the Three Orchestral Sketches of Debussy entitled "La Mer," as well as the Fifth Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E Minor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in Springfield at the Auditorium as the last in a series of concerts given by the Community Concert association and sponsored by the Springfield Junior League.

Announcement of the artists for the next year's series will be made at this concert. At the last Community concert given by Kirsten Flagstad, some 1500 ballots were cast registering the choice of the public for the series to be presented next year, and the committee has analyzed and tabulated these so that the series may be of as high caliber and of the same appeal as heretofore presented.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR

Society Fills Boxes at Boston Symphony Concert At the Academy of Music

Mrs. Thomas H. McClintoc represented the Brooklyn committee in their box at the fourth concert of the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music. Mrs. McClintock's guests at dinner at her home 158 Rutland Road, before the concert, and in the box, were Dr. and Mrs. Robert Franklin Ives, Dr. and Mrs. John L. Bauer and Mrs. L. Parker McKinley.

With Mrs. Benjamin Prince in her box were Mr. and Mrs. Meredith Langstaff, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikalenkoff and Miss Irene Miles. Mrs. Prince entertained the group at dinner at her residence, 876 Park Ave., Manhattan, before the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Roy M. Hart were hosts in the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association box to Mrs. Frank B. Graff, Miss Jane Hart and William Staab. Mr. and Mrs. Hart entertained at dinner at their home, 1246 Dean St.

In another box were Mr. and Mrs. Dermod Ives of Garden City, whose guests were Mr. and Mrs. Fred Vogel, Mr. and Mrs. Julien T. Davies Jr. of Flower Hill and Mr. and Mrs. Frank W. Crowell of Rockville Centre.

Colonel and Mrs. F. D. Carlock entertained in their box Mrs. Fay W. Brabson, Mrs. Albert G. Wing, Major and Mrs. Hugh A. Wear and Captain and Mrs. John A. Weeks.

Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Miss Florence Logan, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay were other box hostesses.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky conducted the well-rounded program which had been selected from many sources. It began with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, continued with Debussy's Nocturnes "Nuages" and "Fetes" and Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol, concluding with the Second Symphony in D Major by Johannes Brahms. The large audience showed great appreciation for the colorful program.

The orchestra's final concert of the season will be given Friday, April 1. The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president of the board of trustees; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman, sponsor the series of concerts each year. Mrs. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good are vice chairmen of the Brooklyn committee; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League Committee.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 12 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra Stirs Large Audience Attending Fourth Program at the Academy of Music

America's first orchestra gave its fourth Brooklyn concert at the Academy of Music last night with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting a program calculated to suit the taste of the most casual as well as the most discriminating lover of the finest music. For sheer orchestral performance it was a display of the height of refinement, brilliance of execution and balance of ensemble.

With a passing bow to the classic tradition, there was Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony to begin the concert. It proved to be a delightful composition conceived in the fashion of the present day abridgements of the "classics," and was only as eighteenth century as its twentieth century composer would allow himself to be. Within the formal structure of the symphony there was much to indicate that Prokofieff gave traditional form a graceful if somewhat curt bow, for his music is smart in a modern way. Witty, bright and occasionally impudent, it was played with classic taste and restraint in the best of Bostonian tradition.

Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," which grow more perfect on better acquaintance, brought forth exquisite tonal texture in the former and well modulated crescendos in the latter. The procession and the final measures were a triumph of dynamic control. The first half of the concert ended with a brilliant and colorful performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnole, which is not so much from the point of view of musical content as of scintillating orchestration.

The symphony of the evening was Brahms remantic Second in D Major. The familiar music took on a certain warmth of sonority, flow of melody, and graciousness of manner under Koussevitzky's baton though the performance did not strike the fire nor the full spirit of the score in the refinement of playing that it received. The Adagietto grazioso was beautifully fashioned and the final Allegro brought the concert to a brilliant close.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 14 1938

TWO ORCHESTRAS GIVE CONCERTS

Hofmann Again Soloist With Philharmonic.

BY IRVING KOLODIN.

The implacable, imperturbable Josef Hofmann strolled to the center of the Carnegie Hall stage yesterday afternoon and proceeded to give, with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, as fine a performance of the Chopin E minor piano concerto as has been heard here in years. It was playing of extraordinary distinction in its own right; magnificently effortless in its technical dexterity, superb in its finesse and discrimination—but it was even more remarkable if mentally contrasted with the thundering Rubinstein concerto he had played earlier in the week. In particular, the whispering confidences of the Romanza were delivered with a refinement of tone and phrasing that were eloquent reminders of Mr. Hofmann's musical culture.

As well as providing an able accompaniment for Mr. Hofmann's performance, the orchestra, under the direction of John Barbirolli, presented a suite of dances from Purcell's "Fairy Queen," Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Balfour-Gardiner's gay "Shepherd Fennel's Dance" and the "Theme and Variations" from Tschaikowsky's G major suite. In addition to the wholehearted applause of an unusually large audience, Mr. Hofmann received a manuscript of the G minor trio by Anton Rubinstein, the gift of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society and the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Whether by intention or accident, the program of Saturday afternoon's Boston Symphony concert offered examples of the orchestra's skill in the treatment of music from three historic epochs: the contemporary (Paul Hindemith's music for brass and string instruments), the late romantic (Saint-Saens's C minor symphony) and the early symphonic (Haydn's E flat symphony No. 10 in the Salomon set). There was especial interest in the performance of the Hindemith music, which had not been heard here since its introduction in 1932. At a second hearing, it impressed one as an uncommonly durable piece of writing, finely organized and possessed of more than ordinary individuality. The orchestra was also at its remarkable best in the Haydn symphony, which was read with insinuating grace and loveliness by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky. Of the Saint-Saens symphony, the only noteworthy fact was the presence of a portable electrical organ, utilized because the permanent organ of the hall is below the pitch used by the Boston players.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
MAR 13 1938

Philharmonic Young People's Season Closes

Ganz Awards Prizes for Writers of Notebooks at Carnegie Hall; Barbirolli Takes Part in Program

By Francis D. Perkins

The fifteenth season of the Phil-

More Saint-Saens, the third symphony, in C minor, closed the afternoon's Carnegie Hall program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under [redacted] Serge Koussevitzky, who began the concert with Haydn's symphony in E flat, No. 99, and Hindemith's "Concert Music" for brass and strings, which was composed in 1930 for the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial season, and has been played here by this orchestra in 1932 and 1934.

All three works illustrated convincingly the excellence of this orchestra as a whole and of its component choirs, while the two more recent compositions served, by contrast, to call attention to the time-defying nature of Haydn's genius; his symphony, in a performance of delectable tone quality, clarity and polish, gave a striking impression of perennial freshness.

Hindemith's "Concert Music" has some interesting moments in its combination and contrast of instrumental timbres, and the composer, on several occasions, is not averse to lyricism, but its muscial ideas were not particularly persuasive and their development is rather discursive. Even more than six years ago it seemed an intellectually conceived experiment rather than a mode of emotional expression, interesting at times, but not consistently so.

The Saint-Saens symphony, in which Albert Snow played a Hammond organ, had a carefully wrought performance with a proclamative and sonorous climax, but this once popular work seemed yesterday to be distinctly dated, at least for some of its hearers, who found it lengthy, derivative and conventional in its musical speech, with meditative measures whose melodiousness now sounds sentimental, and a peroration which, despite its striving, did not duplicate the effective grandiosity of Liszt's best efforts in this vein. On the whole, the heroes of the occasion were the conductor, the orchestra and Joseph Haydn, rather than Paul Hindemith or Camille Saint-Saens.

At the Metropolitan Opera House a capacity audience heard, "Lucia di Lammermoor" for the last time this season yesterday afternoon, with Lily Pons again in the title role, Frederick Jagel as Edgardo, Carlo Morelli [redacted] and Ezio Pinza as Raimondo. Gennaro Papi [redacted]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

MAR 12 1938

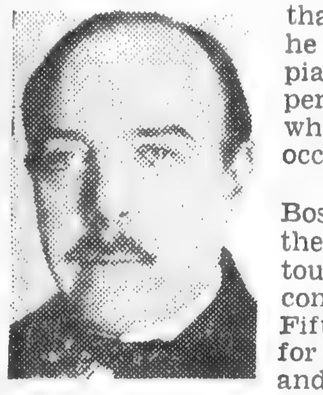
Neglected Composers Offered by Visitors

Mahler's Rare Fifth Symphony Rendered by Boston Orchestra To Delight of Concert Patrons

By Pitts Sanborn.

For the unhackneyed in music to vary the routine of symphonic concerts we look with confidence and gratitude to our visitors from Philadelphia and Boston. Mr. Ormandy and Mr. Koussevitzky have a gratifying way of spicing their programs with new or at least unfamiliar works.

Thus when the Philadelphia Orchestra visited Carnegie Hall on Tuesday Mr. Ormandy revived for us the "Symphonia Domestica" of Richard Strauss, which is a much more poetic and beautiful composition than it is usually credited with being hereabouts, and he also gave us a chance to hear again the second piano concerto of Alexander Tansman, something that perhaps does not deserve a further rehearing, but which at least merited the favor shown it on this occasion.



Pitts Sanborn.

This week we have also Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony as guests of Carnegie Hall and from their neo-Athenian fastness has come with them that touch of novelty which Aristotle once praised. The conductor for his Thursday program selected Mahler's Fifth Symphony, a great rarity in this vicinity, and for today Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments" and the Third Symphony, in C minor, with organ, of Saint-Saens.

Anything by Mr. Hindemith is at present worth performance because of his prominent position in contemporary music and the scarcity of chances to hear any of his work performed. This "Konzertmusik," by the way, was expressly composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gave it its world premiere on April 3 of the anniversary season (1930-31).

* * *

Mahler Still a Bugaboo.

Although the Saint-Saens symphony with organ ranks as a standard work, it is seldom given in New York. But of the absurd prejudice prevailing against Saint-Saens in some quarters more may be said presently. From Mr. Barbirolli directing the Philharmonic-Symphony we can apparently look now for little unfamiliar music not of English origin. His worth-while revivals of last season, especially of overtures by Rossini, Mehul and Reznicek, seem to be relegated to a dead past.

There is no denying that the name of Mahler remains a bugaboo in New York. How wrong such an attitude is can be easily seen. The concert repertory cannot consist of the C minor symphony of Beethoven and the C minor symphony of Brahms, repeated ad infinitum. Other works have to be performed whether they measure up to the stature of those two compositions or not. Mahler was incontestably one of the most important composers of the late nineteenth century and early twentieth. He left ten symphonies (the last unfinished), as well as the symphonic "Das Lied von der Erde."

As I have said once and again for years, we have an inalienable right to become acquainted with those symphonies before we reject them. Nevertheless, when Mahler himself conducted in New York he scarcely dared put a work of his own on any of his programs, and when much later that high priest of Mahler, Willem Mengelberg, conducted here, there was a chorus of objections whenever he had the temerity to list his divinity.

Doubtless, Mr. Bodanzky, Bruno Walter, and still others have met with the same discouraging response. Yet, at least enough has been done by conductorial champions of Mahler to diminish the taboo on the First Symphony and to obtain something like a following for "Das Lied von der Erde."

And now comes a confession, damaging or not, of my own. I am by no means a Mahlerite, as far as my personal taste goes, but I do like enough of his music, and I still feel sufficient curiosity about music of his that I have not come to like, to continue to urge the frequent performance of his works. Not until we know them well, to repeat, shall we be in a position to reject. Consequently, all praise to Mr. Ormandy for recently giving us "Das Lied von der Erde" again and to Mr. Koussevitzky for bringing forward the neglected Fifth Symphony.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 13 1938

CONTRAST FEATURE OF SYMPHONY BILL

Boston Orchestra, Conducted by Koussevitzky, Is Heard at Carnegie Hall

HINDEMITH WORK PLAYED

Compositions by Saint-Saens in C Minor and Haydn in E Flat on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who performed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, were able to offer their audience a program of exceptional contrasts. For it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary commissioned Paul Hindemith, among other composers, to write one of the most interesting of his later compositions for that occasion.

Yesterday this composition of Hindemith figured between the delightful E flat symphony of Joseph Haydn, No. 99, and a work which has been considered by some people a kind of an anachronism of modern music, the Saint-Saëns C minor symphony for organ and orchestra. As it developed, each of these works, approached in a singularly sympathetic and creative spirit, yielded a vitality and significance of its own and exploited musical tendencies of different eras in a remarkably interesting manner.

The Haydn Symphony was played by an orchestra pre-eminent for its finish and transparent tone-quality. It was played, moreover, in a truly eighteenth century vein—brilliantly, though formally, with the courtliness and swing which made Haydn's masculine and boldly scored music a delight to his generation as to ours.

The dimensions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are different from those of Haydn's day. Dr. Koussevitzky did not materially reduce his orchestra; he kept the tonal proportion that was the symphony's due by a comparative scale of artistic measurement, which suited our time, considered the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall with so just an estimate of the qualities of the work that it lost not a whit of its style or manner.

Hindemith's music, composed for the Boston Symphony season of 1931, was then and is now provocatively—shall we say speculatively?—modern. It has unquestionable life and also an unquestionable law of procedure. Obviously it harks back to fundamentals of composition unalterably propounded by J. S. Bach. As obviously, it is tinctured with nervous and temperamental characteristics of this era. The composer's boldness and confidence in the new harmonic paths that he breaks are those which often characterize genius.

And the ear accepts these sounds. There is "polytonality," "atonality," if terrifying words are wanted. Superficially, at least, this is a new and bewildering relation of tones. Yet it convinces. One may like it or not; one does not think of questioning it. It would not occur, we believe, to the most soundly schooled composer to say to himself, "If I only could have talked to that wild-eyed experimenter and given him some hints as to harmonic procedure, orchestration, voice-leading." This would not be ventured. Hindemith knows exactly what he is doing, why, and how to go about it. He is jumps ahead of us in his method, in which he is not only assured, but exuberant. This is not, then, a mere prize piece. This is authentic music.

By its performance and the distinguished interpretation of the score on the part of the leader, the Boston Symphony rewarded Hindemith in more ways than one for his contribution. It is not easy to think of this music better performed, if as well performed, by any other agencies.

Then more than one listener asked himself, why the Saint-Saëns C minor symphony? It has stood for some time now as a landmark in the musical history of a nation that has done comparatively little in the symphonic direction. When Saint-Saëns wrote it he profounded to himself certain modern principles of structure having to do with the "cyclic" form and with the inclusion, within single movements, of the elements of more than one of the movements of the classic symphony. Granting all this, it is nevertheless a fact that other composers than Saint-Saëns have written symphonies since he wrote this one, and with more actual originality. Why this symphony?

The performance of the first movement alone can be reported here, but it sufficed to answer the query. The old miracle of creative interpretation was at its work. The symphony was revived with all the dignity, importance, modernity that it had when it was fashioned back in the '80's. The opening phrases were not platitudes. The motive played tremolo fashion by the strings, so important throughout the symphony, was no longer an idea which afforded a chance resemblance to the opening figure of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony or to mystical harmonies with which Cesar Franck introduces his one symphonic achievement.

Saint-Saën's score had identity, meaning all its own. The motive was part of a vast and impressive ground plan. The same impression was conveyed by the very sound of the orchestration, which is fuller and more grandiose than is customary with this Frenchman. There was the sensation of spaciousness, of a composer, often distinguished principally for style, finish, wit, now addressing us about weightier matters. In the performance of this work, a composition of the poet made an astonishing impression. A Hammond organ was used.

on one. The audience, however, found the Ravel "Bolero," played almost too slowly, and even then with some special retards, more to its liking. Barring a slip by the first trombone, in a difficult place, the general level of the orchestral playing was very high. At the end Mr. Chavez was applauded long and loud, and cheered. O. D.

NEW YORK
TIMES

MAR 14 1938

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

CONTRAST FEATURE OF SYMPHONY BILL

Boston Orchestra, Conducted by Koussevitzky, Is Heard at Carnegie Hall

HINDEMITH WORK PLAYED

Compositions by Saint-Saens in C Minor and Haydn in E Flat on Program

By OLIN DOWNES

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who performed yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, were able to offer their audience a program of exceptional contrasts. For it was the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which on the occasion of its fiftieth anniversary commissioned Paul Hindemith, among other composers, to write one of the most interesting of his later compositions for that occasion.

Yesterday this composition of Hindemith figured between the delightful E flat symphony of Joseph Haydn, No. 99, and a work which has been considered by some people a kind of an anachronism of modern music, the Saint-Saëns C minor symphony for organ and orchestra. As it developed, each of these works, approached in a singularly sympathetic and creative spirit, yielded a vitality and significance of its own and exploited musical tendencies of different eras in a remarkably interesting manner.

The Haydn Symphony was played by an orchestra pre-eminent for its finish and transparent tone-quality. It was played, moreover, in a truly eighteenth century vein—brilliantly, though formally, with the courtliness and swing which made Haydn's masculine and boldly scored music a delight to his generation as to ours.

The dimensions of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are different from those of Haydn's day. Dr. Koussevitzky did not materially reduce his orchestra; he kept the tonal proportion that was the symphony's due by a comparative scale of artistic measurement, which suited our time, considered the size of the orchestra and the dimensions of the hall with so just an estimate of the qualities of the work that it lost not a whit of its style or manner.

Hindemith's music, composed for the Boston Symphony season of 1931, was then and is now provocatively—shall we say speculatively?—modern. It has unquestionable life and also an unquestionable law of procedure. Obviously it harks back to fundamentals of composition unalterably propounded by J. S. Bach. As obviously, it is tinctured with nervous and temperamental characteristics of this era. The composer's boldness and confidence in the new harmonic paths that he breaks are those which often characterize genius.

And the ear accepts these sounds. There is "polytonality," "atonality," if terrifying words are wanted. Superficially, at least, this is a new and bewildering relation of tones. Yet it convinces. One may like it or not; one does not think of questioning it. It would not occur, we believe, to the most soundly schooled composer to say to himself, "If I only could have talked to that wild-eyed experimenter and given him some hints as to harmonic procedure, orchestration, voice-leading." This would not be ventured. Hindemith knows exactly what he is doing, why, and how to go about it. He is jumps ahead of us in his method, in which he is not only assured, but exuberant. This is not, then, a mere prize piece. This is authentic music.

By its performance and the distinguished interpretation of the score on the part of the leader, the Boston Symphony rewarded Hindemith in more ways than one for his contribution. It is not easy to think of this music better performed, if as well performed, by any other agencies.

Then more than one listener asked himself, why the Saint-Saëns C minor symphony? It has stood for some time now as a landmark in the musical history of a nation that has done comparatively little in the symphonic direction. When Saint-Saëns wrote it he profounded to himself certain modern principles of structure having to do with the "cyclic" form and with the inclusion, within single movements, of the elements of more than one of the movements of the classic symphony. Granting all this, it is nevertheless a fact that other composers than Saint-Saëns have written symphonies since he wrote this one, and with more actual originality. Why this symphony?

The performance of the first movement alone can be reported here, but it sufficed to answer the query. The old miracle of creative interpretation was at its work. The symphony was revived with all the dignity, importance, modernity that it had when it was fashioned back in the '80's. The opening phrases were not platitudes. The motive played tremolo fashion by the strings, so important throughout the symphony, was no longer an idea which afforded a chance resemblance to the opening figure of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony or to mystical harmonies with which Cesar Franck introduces his one symphonic achievement.

Saint-Saën's score had identity, meaning all its own. The motive was part of a vast and impressive ground plan. The same impression was conveyed by the very sound of the orchestration, which is fuller and more grandiose than is customary with this Frenchman. There was the sensation of spaciousness, of a composer, often distinguished principally for style, finish, wit, now addressing us about weightier matters. In the performance of this work, a composition of the poet made an astonishing impression. A Hammond organ was used.

[From Late Editions of Yesterday's TIMES.]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 14 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY EXCELS IN HAYDN

A thrilling performance of Haydn's E flat Symphony (the tenth of the Salomon series) was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program also included Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, written for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony, and Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony, Opus 78, with organ.

Koussevitzky has repeatedly shown us that he stands among the greatest living interpreters of Haydn. Perhaps the most astonishing aspect of Saturday's performance was his penetration of the Haydn style. He gave this symphony its own wit, fire and concision, a carefully controlled emotion which was none the less intense and deep for being controlled. Happily Koussevitzky does not conceive Haydn merely as something that came between Beethoven and Mozart; neither as a quaint forerunner of the "Eroica" nor as the jovial, periwigged Papa the story books tell us about, but as the music of a mind and a world that are unique and great.

The balance and precision of the orchestra were a continual delight to the ear. For tonal epicures there were wood-wind passages of ravishing beauty in the Adagio and again in the final Vivace. It was a performance of memorable distinction.

In spite of its modern idiom, the Hindemith had certain qualities in common with the preceding work: the objective clarity of line and design, the controlled emotion. But there the resemblances stop. The "Konzertmusik" is still vital and effective; whatever else it may be, time must show.

Saint-Saens' C minor Symphony, though it had a sympathetic performance, seemed of greater historic interest than immediate artistic importance.

E. D.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

MUSIC LECTURE

The analytical talk on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given [redacted] Werner Josten today at 4.30 at the Technical High School Auditorium. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Springfield March 30 as the final concert in the Community Concert series. Dr. Werner Josten since 1923 has been a teacher of composition and fugue at Smith College.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 19 1938

JACQUES HOFFMANN DIES

Conductor, 70, Succumbs in Boston After Fall Down Stairs

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, March 18.—Jacques Hoffmann, violinist, teacher and conductor, died last night at Beth Israel Hospital at the age of 70, following a fall downstairs earlier in the evening at the Malkin Conservatory of Music, where he had been teaching.

Mr. Hoffmann joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1890, when Artur Nikisch was conductor, coming from the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. He remained a member of the Boston orchestra until 1926, when he [redacted] devote himself entirely to teaching and other activities. The Hoffmann String Quartet, which he organized and conducted, was long an important institution here. For many years he had been conductor of the Lincoln House orchestra.

He had been on the faculty of Wellesley College, and at the time of death was on the faculties of the Boston University College of Music and Malkin Conservatory.

Philharmonic Young People's Season Closes

N. Y. Tribune

Ganz Awards Prizes for Writers of Notebooks at Carnegie Hall; Barbirolli Takes Part in Program

March 13/38

By Francis D. Perkins

The fifteenth season of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's Young People's Concerts closed yesterday morning in Carnegie Hall, where Rudolph Ganz, who has been deputizing this season for Ernest Schelling, conducted a program mainly composed of works which had been chosen by ballot for repetition after their performance in the previous five concerts of the series. He also bestowed three medals, five special prizes and twenty-four ribbons signifying honorable mention on the writers of the best note books of comments on this season's concerts.

Mr. Ganz also took part in the program as a pianist, playing the second and third movements of Saint-Saens's seldom heard piano concerto No. 5, in F, while Mr. Barbirolli, the Philharmonic-Symphony's regular conductor, directed the orchestra. Mr. Barbirolli and Mrs. Melvin E. Sawin, chairman of the committee in charge of the Young People's Concerts, also took part in the distribution of the awards, which came after the audience had sung "America" and before it had listened to the final number, Johann Strauss's "Emperor" waltz.

Winners of Medals

The three medal winners were Jerome T. Davis, nine years old, Toby Schwartz, thirteen, and Leonard S. Weber, eleven. As a special prize William Nicoll, nine, who has won several awards in the last few years of this series, received a book, Mr. Ganz did not reveal the nature of the prizes awarded in a special class for the youngest children. The youngest winner in this class was Philippa Schuyler, six, daughter of George S. Schuyler, Negro writer and teacher, who, despite her few years, has become well known for musical and orthographical talents. The others were Arthur Dercksen, Pandora Hopkins and Jacqueline Macmillan, all seven years old.

The conductor also called for bows from several children who, while not winning prizes, had done exceptionally meritorious work, praised the general high standard of this season's note-books, and announced that the prize winning books would be on display for the next week in the window of Steinway & Sons. He also thanked his collaborators, especially Maurice Van Praag, personnel manager of the orchestra, and the members who had served as soloists, and read a congratulatory cable from Mr. Schelling, now returning after a winter abroad, recovering from an eye injury. The display of Mr. Schelling's picture on the screen was the occasion for much applause, cheers and enthusiastic whistling. Mrs. Sawin, in a short speech, thanked Mr. Ganz and Mr. Barbirolli, who have been known this season to their youthful patrons as Uncle Rudy and Cousin John. Plans for next season will be announced later.

Saint-Saens Excerpt Played

Besides Mr. Ganz, the instrumental soloists were Vincenzo Vanni, the orchestra's expert tuba player, in Schumann's "Jolly Farmer," and Saul Goodman, who played all manner of percussion instruments in Schreiner's "The Worried Drummer." Mr. Ganz played with notable polis hand brilliance in the excerpt from the Saint-Saens concerto, which has not been played here for many years. The second movement, with its quasi-Oriental melodies, and the third with elegance and momentum, have their appealing moments, but both have paled with the passage of time.

More Saint-Saens, the third symphony, in C minor, closed the afternoon's Carnegie Hall program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, who began the concert with Haydn's symphony in E flat, No. 99, and Hindemith's "Concert Music" for brass and strings, which was composed in 1930 for the Boston Symphony's semi-centennial season, and has been played here by this orchestra in 1932 and 1934.

All three works illustrated convincingly the excellence of this orchestra as a whole and of its component choirs, while the two more recent compositions served, by contrast, to call attention to the time-defying nature of Haydn's genius; his symphony, in a performance of delectable tone quality, clarity and polish, gave a striking impression of perennial freshness.

Intellectual Experiment

Hindemith's "Concert Musik" has some interesting moments in its combination and contrast of instrumental timbres, and the composer, on several occasions, is not averse to lyricism, but its muscial ideas were not particularly persuasive and their development is rather discursive. Even more than six years ago it seemed an intellectually conceived experiment rather than a mode of emotional expression, interesting at times, but not consistently so.

The Saint-Saens symphony, in which Albert Snow played a Hammond organ, had a carefully wrought performance with a proclamative and sonorous climax, but this once popular work seemed yesterday to be distinctly dated, at least for some of its hearers, who found it lengthy, derivative and conventional in its musical speech, with meditative measures whose melodiousness now sounds sentimental, and a peroration which, despite its striving, did not duplicate the effect garndiosity of Liszts best efforts in this vein. On the whole, the heroes of the occasion were the conductor, the orchestra and Joseph Haydn, rather than Paul Hindemith or Camille Saint-Saens.

At the Metropolitan Oper House a capacity audience heard, "Lucia di Lammermoor' for the last time this season yesterday afternoon, with Lily Pons again in the title role, Frederick Jagel as Edgardo, Carlo Morelli as Enrico and Ezio Pinza as Raimondo. Gennaro Papi conducted.

Monitor March 17/38

—Boston News—

u in Local Dét

The Arts in Boston

Renato Toppo, N. Y.

Georges Enesco

Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at This Week's Concerts

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.

NEWS

DR JOSTEN TO TALK ON SYMPHONY WORK

The analytical talk on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given by Dr Werner Josten tomorrow at 4.30 at the Technical high school auditorium. The Boston Symphony orchestra will appear in Springfield March 30 as the final concert in the Community Concert series.

Dr Werner Josten since 1923 has been a teacher of composition and fugue at Smith college. He received his training in harmony and counter-point from Dr Rudolf Siegel in Munich, and also studied with Jaques Dalcroze at Geneva. Before coming to America, Dr Josten was the assistant conductor at the Munich opera house. Ten years ago he became interested in the revival of ancient operas and made a study of them. He is a composer of note, and many of his compositions have been played by the Boston, Chicago, and Philadelphia orchestras. Dr Josten is also the conductor of the Smith college string orchestra.

All subscribers of the Community Concert series are cordially invited to attend this talk, which is being sponsored by the Springfield Junior league. Admission may be made with the Community Concert series ticket.

ENESCO WILL LEAD LOCAL SYMPHONY

B. Post

News and Views About Music Matters Here and Elsewhere

March 13/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

"NOT long ago, at a public luncheon," writes Deems Taylor in his "Of Men and Music," already reviewed in these columns, "I was sitting at a table that included the musical director of a motion-picture company, a radio commentator on music, a music critic, a member of the board of directors of a great orchestra, and a famous flautist. By a quaint coincidence, we were discussing music and musicians. In the course of the discussion, the motion-picture director said, 'Of all the composers now living, who, in your opinion, will be remembered a hundred years from now as the greatest of our time?' We all had our opinions, with which nobody else, of course, agreed. Finally, the flautist said, 'If you'll broaden that definition and make it the greatest all-round musician of our time, I can tell you who the man will be. It will be Georges Enesco.' "

* * * *

The above is apropos the fact that the eminent Rumanian will be guest-conductor at the symphony concerts of this week. Mr. Enesco is no stranger to Boston. In 1933 he conducted his First Suite, that of the curious Prelude in Unison, at a pair of symphony concerts, at which he also appeared as violin soloist. Three years later he was soloist again. For half a season he served as exchange professor of music at Harvard.

We have Mr. Taylor's word for it that Mr. Enesco, if he took the trouble, could be a pianist of the first rank. But apparently he does not sing. As a student in Vienna he was allowed to sit among the singers at choral concerts, but did not raise his voice. Mr. Taylor also recalls that when Enesco Senior took his 7-year-old son to the Vienna Conservatory he was told by the director, Joseph Hellmesberger, that the place was not a nursery. But that was before he had heard the boy play.

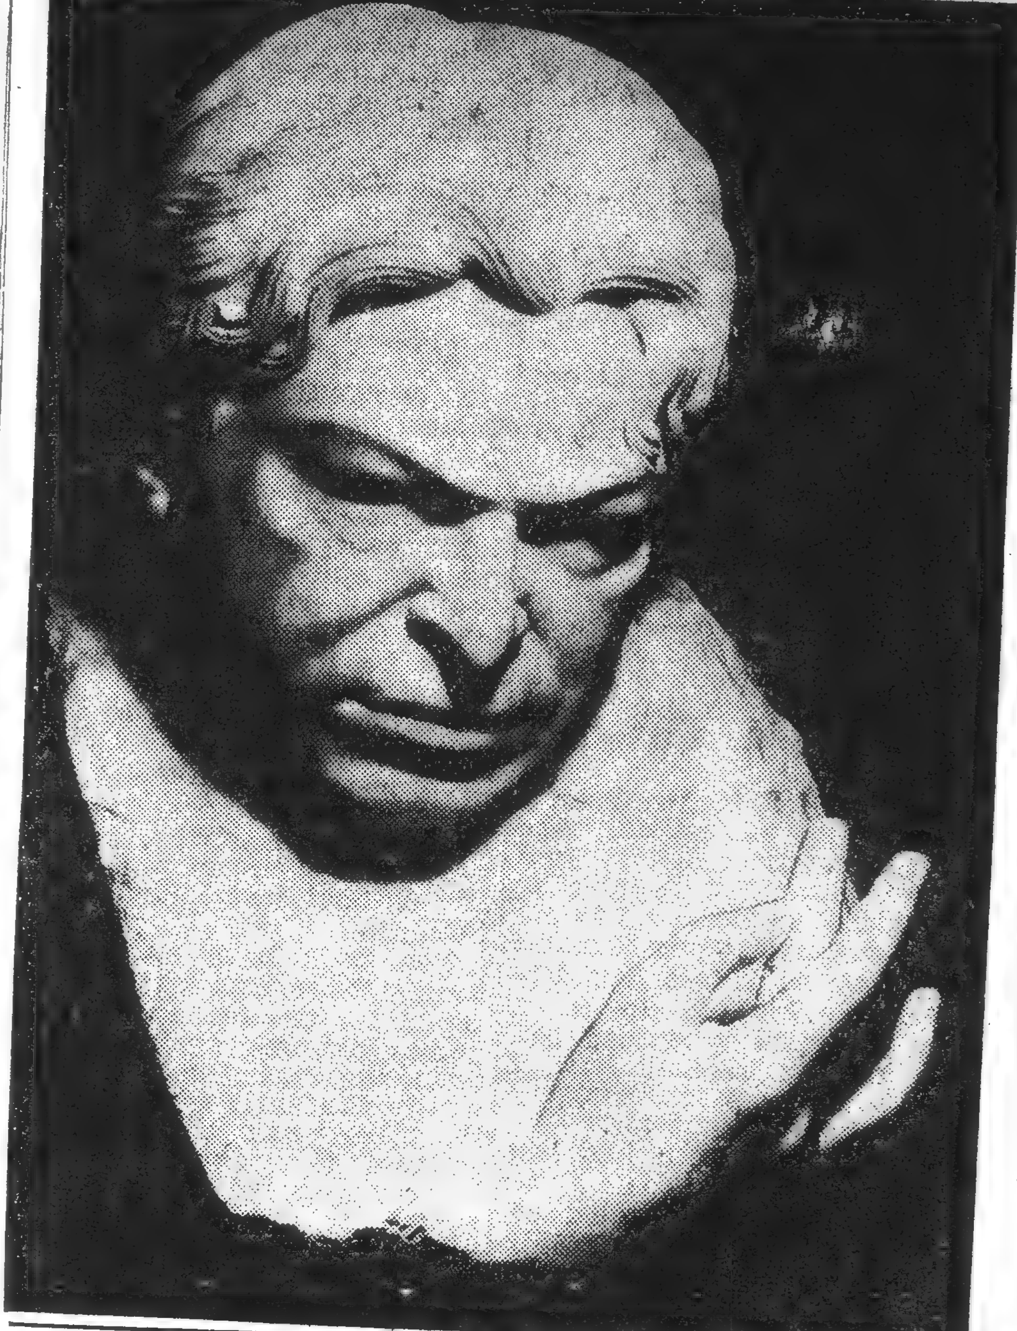
There is now a Second Suite for Orchestra, and Mr. Enesco will make it known to us next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will also conduct his brilliant and familiar Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1 and a tone poem "Actaeon" by his fellow countryman, Alfred Alessandresco. Haydn's Symphony in D Major, No. 104, completes the programme.

When the opera season begins on Thursday evening of next week, concert giving will be in large measure suspended for the duration of its visit. The more crowded, then, will be the Boston concert calendar until that date. Three events are scheduled for today. This afternoon at Jordan Hall Emanuel Mansfield, tenor, will be heard at recital, accompanied by Walter S. Roberts. His programme ranges from ancient airs to songs by contemporary composers and a group of colored spirituals. The concert will benefit the Health Guild Camp Fund of the Prendergast Preventorium.

This afternoon at the Museum of Fine Arts the Federal Music Project will present Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," under the direction of A. Buckingham Simson. Joan Ruth, George Wheeler and Melvin Crowell will be the solo singers.

200

Tonal Artist Transferred to Clay



GEORGES ENESCO

From a portrait bust by Korczak Ziolkowski. Mr. Enesco conducts the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, this evening and in Symphony Hall tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

Transcript, Thu, Mar. 17, 1938

Trans. March 18/38

the Motion Pictures

Enesco Greeted as Conductor and Composer

First of His Appearances With Boston Orchestra In Sanders Theater

By Moses Smith

Georges Enesco, an eminent musician more familiar as performer to audiences elsewhere than he is hereabouts, led the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last night through a program to be repeated this afternoon and tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall. Before the audience had departed the hallowed academic walls had resounded to cheers and stamping of feet.

The program, containing Alfred Allesandresco's Symphonic Poem, "Acteon" and the conductor's own Second Suite and First "Rumanian" Rhapsody, missed being all-Rumanian only by beginning with Haydn's Symphony in D major (No. 104). The juxtaposition plus the kind of performance accorded the Symphony did more than all the scholarly treatises to show how deep is the gypsy strain in Haydn's music.

Neither the Symphonic Poem nor Enesco's Second Suite had been previously performed hereabouts. They are from the same period (written in the early years of the Great War), but they have more important points of difference. Detailed discussion of both pieces and of other matters may be reserved for this place tomorrow. The Rhapsody is, of course, an older story hereabouts, as it also the Symphony. But both works were favored with performances of exceptional vitality and flavorsome style.

The superb Boston Symphony Orchestra sounded, indeed, like a different instrument last night—a statement that is not meant to convey the idea that Enesco is a better conductor than Serge Koussevitzky. It means rather that in his own right he, too, is a commanding personality, and that inevitably the orchestra will sound different under his ministrations. There were last night occasional lapses from the virtuoso precision that is a commonplace at a Boston Symphony concert, though they were slight. But the music-making had a compensating warmth and vigor of expression.

TERRE HAUTE, IND.

TRIBUNE

MAR 15 1938

LIBRARY STORES MODERN MUSIC

Work of American Composers Are Being Preserved By Federal Project.

PHILADELPHIA. — (UP) — Orchestral works of contemporary American composers are being preserved for posterity by the federal music copying project here, only one of its kind in the nation according to WPA officials.

Orchestral scores are copied on pure rag paper, double checked with the original, and then filed in specially constructed dust-proof boxes at the Free Library of Philadelphia as part of the Edwin A. Fleisher music collection, said to be the largest orchestral collection in the world.

A complete set of orchestral parts, enough for the largest symphony orchestra, are copied from the composer's original score. Many of the works prepared by the project have had premieres by the Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and other symphony orchestras, according to Arthur Cohn, director.

The staff of 52, all trained musicians and expert copyists, are occupied almost entirely with the works of contemporary Americans, many of whom do not have sufficient funds to pay for the copying that is necessary before their compositions may reach the public.

More than 200 composers, from every section of the nation, are represented among the 502 works completed by the project between November, 1934, and January, 1938. Approximately 70,000 pages have been copied by hand, and 135,000 more reproduced from them.

Fleisher, Philadelphia manufacturer, musician and patron of the arts who presented his own collection of more than 7,000 orchestral scores and several thousand pieces of chamber music to the Free Library several years ago, has given time and financial aid to the project.

Cont.

Mon Gl.

MUSIC
SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Georges Enesco, who is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts this week, was given a rousing reception by the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. At the end of the concert there was prolonged handclapping, a good deal of stamping and some cheers. The orchestra seemed to adore him and handsomely showed their regard.

The tribute from all sides was well deserved because Mr. Enesco is not only a great musician but probably the most versatile one of first rank in the world today. He is noted equally for his genius and his modesty. The latter takes the form, when Mr. Enesco is conducting, of rigid abstinence from displayful gestures and of an intense but unobtrusive devotion to the muisc in hand. As it happens, his first appearance here in some years comes during a season when the Boston Symphony subscribers have been treated to more guest conductors than usual; Amfitheatroff and Mlle. Boulanager already have directed the orchestra and Serge Prokofieff will have his turn next week.

Mr. Enesco happily put upon his program two of his own compositions, the Second Suite for orches- was new "at these concerts," and the superb "Rumanian Rhapsody" No. 1 that, unaccountably, had not figured on a "regular" Symphony program since 1920. He began with Haydn's last Symphony, in D major, No. 104. The tone poem "Actaeon" by his fellow Rumanian, Alfred Alessandresco, was likewise introduced to the repertory of this orchestra.

Mr. Enesco seems to shun what are known as personal readings (save, of course, in the case of his own work), and instead endeavors to do complete justice according to the general principles of a particular composer's style, and according to the written evidence of the notes themselves. Thus, his Haydn was beautifully clear, balanced, precise and in the right spirit, though traditional rather than distinctive.

He is evidently a splendid technician of the orchestra, both as conductor and composer. There is always something going on in his orchestral tissues; his music is robust and outspoken, the work of an esthetically strong man unconcerned with theory or fashion, a man whose creative spirit lies close to his own soil and his own people. Yet he is certainly no artistic provincial.

Deems Taylor has recorded a discerning prophecy of long life for the music of Georges Enesco. That is likely to be borne out; Enesco's work stands by itself. It exhibits the emotional depth and the solidarity of Teutonic models, the vivacity and the proverbial logic of the Latins. Yet its inner qualities, defying a characterizing phrase, are much more personal. The "Rumanian Rhapsody" No. 1 is a masterly example of the use of folk melody. Enesco has done this with absolute freedom and without any of the self-conscious benevolence to be found in some of Brahms' Hungarian dances. The performance yesterday was one of the most exciting experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed. The Second Suite, more a charming tour de force than a masterpiece, consists of highly original and spicily dissonant music set in 18th-century forms.

Alessandresco's "Actaeon" was hardly worth the excellent playing it received. It was written in 1914, when Alessandresco was 21; as a specimen of how much a clever young student had learned, "Actaeon" has its merits. The literary basis is the familiar myth of Actaeon, the hunter, who inadvertently saw the unclothed beauty of Diana while that goddess was bathing in the forest. The outraged Diana transformed Actaeon into a stag and he was soon killed by his own dogs. Since Actaeon by all accounts did not mean to see what he did, Diana's revenge was unreasonable in the first place. Alessandresco's windy and naive treatment has made it unreasonably long, as well. "Actaeon" is manufactured mostly of second-hand Debussy, with some Ravel and samplings of Rimsky-Korsakoff and even of Wagner.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Prokofieff will conduct three of his own compositions and will be soloist in a fourth.—C. W. D.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 19 1938

Jacques Hoffman, Violinist, Dies

Special to the World-Telegram.

BOSTON, March 19. — Jacques Hoffman, 81, a violinist and conductor, died Thursday night here after a fall at the Malkin Conservatory of Music, where he had been teaching.

Mr. Hoffman joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the '90s on his arrival in this country from the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. He remained a member of the Boston Symphony until 1926, when he resigned to devote himself to teaching. He for many years was conductor of the Lincoln House Orchestra. He also had been a member of the faculty of Wellesley College.

Post

ENESCO AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

His Second Suite and First Rhapsody Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Only the presence of a Symphony by Haydn prevented the programme of yesterday afternoon's concert from being all-Roumanian. As guest conductor, Georges Enesco, led the orchestra through Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; Alfred Alessandresco's symphonic poem, "Actaeon," and his own Second Suite and First Roumanian Rhapsody.

LEADS WITH AUTHORITY

No stranger to Symphony Hall is Mr. Enesco. At a pair of concerts in 1923 he conducted his First Suite and appeared as violin soloist in the Concerto of Brahms, while in 1926 he took part in a performance of Chausson's Concerto for Violin, Piano and String Quartet. One authority, at least, has pronounced him the greatest all-round musician of our time. To dub him, therefore, a musical Jack-of-all-trades, and hence good at none, would be glaringly inaccurate; yet some might still call him eminent rather than pre-eminent as composer, violinist and conductor.

In the last-named capacity Mr. Enesco again showed himself yesterday a leader of absolute authority and withal one who had won the warm support of the orchestra. In the applause which greeted him when he first appeared upon the platform the orchestra joined, and not content with clapping, stamped its collective feet, an unconventional but significant sign of approval. With his bulky figure, rounded shoulders and shock of black hair, Mr. Enesco is far from your prima donna conductor who is a cross between a dancing master and a tailor's dummy. Hollywood could use him only in a "character part."

Haydn Read Well

The performance of Haydn's Symphony was a fine one. If there was an absence of the lightness we are prone to associate with this composer's music, it must be remembered that the Symphony itself, the last of them all, is more solid, more Beethovenish, as we might say from our point of vantage, than any of its predecessors. Especially memorable was the playing of the Andante, in which Haydn attained a warmth of expression, even a romantic feeling, which help to give this Symphony its particular position.

From this point on one heeded more the music than the conducting. An act of friendship, possibly, or perhaps of patriotism, the performance of the symphonic poem, which Mr. Enesco's lesser compatriot composed at the age of 21, consumed a great deal of time and profited the listener but little. Essentially derivative, leaning heavily upon what were then (1914) the modern French composers, this tonal telling of the tale of the luckless hunter who encountered Diana and her nymphs at their woodland bath is no more than conventionally effective, though soundly made.

Of far more import was Mr. Enesco's Suite, also heard here for the first time. Like Ravel in "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and Prokofieff in his "Classical" Symphony Mr. Enesco has here poured new wine into old bottles, albeit with less harmonic spicing. The Overture, Sarabande and Bourree proved, for this hearer, the most engaging of the Suite's six divisions. In the last-named, which makes brilliant conclusion to the whole, comes a striking anticipation of the Polka from Weinberger's "Schwanda": the Suite was composed in 1915.

It was good to hear again the Rhapsody, which had not been played at the regular Symphony Concerts for 17 years, though it achieved four performances in the preceeding eight. That of yesterday, it is quite safe to say, was the most vivid, the most intoxicating presentation that the music had yet received here. The audience, enthusiastic throughout the afternoon, applauded it rapturously.

Herald

ew's State

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Georges Enesco was the guest conductor. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major No. 104	Haydn
Symphonic Poem, "Actaeon"	Alessandresco
Suite for Orchestra No. 2	Enesco
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major	Enesco

Mr. Enesco, who has too long been absent from Boston, won an ovation yesterday for his conducting of the Boston Symphony, and for his own music which occupied the last part of the program. He is a musician of great versatility. He has excellent taste, is extremely modest in demeanor and has the ability to get just the results and effects that he wants from the orchestra. Earlier in the season we heard him conduct the New York Philharmonic in the first half of this program; but the performances yesterday seemed to us much more alive and much more in the spirit of each composer.

The Haydn symphony, another of those of his later works that always has the power to astonish us by its originality, was superbly played. The tempi were exact, the phrasing beautifully wrought. A full orchestra was employed, but there was no lack of lightness. Moreover we could appreciate Haydn's robust humor in the minuet and the finale. This was a fine, classical performance, not cut and dried, but expressing all the vitality which was in Haydn's individual conception.

Alessandresco's "Actaeon," which was heard for the first time at these concerts, has pages of evocative beauty, pages undoubtedly inspired by the pre-war French school. But the symphonic poem as a whole is a tedious, imitative work. It is long and has no conscience whatever about repeating thematic material until we are ready to expire with boredom. And this is the more the pity in that some of the best music comes towards the end. Today the music dates, for we have heard the same kind of thing done so much better.

Mr. Enesco's own second suite, also heard here for the first time, is music in old forms of considerable ingenuity. The music may be repetitious, but one feels that it is inherent in the composer's scheme, as it most emphatically is in the Roumanian Rhapsody. One or two of the movements give the impression of overworking the material; but by and large the suite is a highly successful pouring of new wine into old bottles.

What of the Roumanian rhapsody, which we know so well through the medium of the Pops? Well, as was to be expected with the inspiration of the composer's conducting at hand, the rhapsody outshone itself. It is a brilliant show piece, the best of popular music; and it came off magnificently yesterday. Mr. Enesco was recalled again and again to the platform, receiving applause which he richly deserved. His visit has been stimulating, and we may hope that it will be repeated in another season. What a pleasure, for a change, to find a conductor who uses both a score and a baton! There is altogether too much magic-spell-weaving and shadow-boxing in modern conducting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Prokofieff will be guest conductor and soloist in a program of his own works.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

* * *

Mrs Edward Ballantine of Cambridge, ofrmerly of this city, is a member of the committee arranging for the violin recital which Georges Enesco, noted guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give April 8 for the benefit of the Cambridge chapter, MacDowell Colony league, which helps maintain the famed MacDowell colony at Peterborough, N. H. Prof Ballantine of the Harvard university music department is vice-presicent of the league.

Enesco Conducts at Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

OF THE many brilliant personalities who have appeared as guests with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, none has proved more interesting than Georges Enesco who contributed to the regular pair of concerts this weekend in the double capacity of conductor and composer.

The distinguished Roumanian musician, lately conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, had not appeared with the Boston orchestra since 1926, when he played in a performance of the Chausson's "Concert" for Violin, Piano, and String Quartet.

As was to be expected, both orchestra and audience were enthusiastic at his return. So shy is Enesco of any demonstration on his behalf, however, and so effectively did he defer applause that is was considerably less prolonged than it might otherwise have been.

The Haydn Symphony in D major, No. 104 numbered the seventh in the twelve London symphonies, though in fact the last that Haydn ever wrote, was accomplished in a straightforward, lucid fashion that wedded nicety of style to faultless precision.

There is no stuff and nonsense about Enesco's conducting. His is a technique which combines economy of means with exactitude of import. And his readings are as concisely patterned as is his manner of bringing them into effect.

Following the Haydn, Enesco introduced his young countryman, Alessandresco, to these audiences for the first time in a symphonic poem, "Actaeon."

A pupil of d'Indy, Alessandresco's music proved more French than Roumanian. If "Actaeon" does not bear the stamp of striking originality, it is none the less tone painting of an exceedingly pleasant variety. It is based on the Greek myth of the unfortunate hunter Actaeon and the avenged goddess Diana and in 1915 won the Roumanian National composition prize established by Enesco.

The last part of the program was devoted to works of Enesco, the Second Suite for Orchestra, which had not been previously performed at these concerts, and the popular Rhapsody, No. 1 in A major, Op. 11.

It would be difficult to find [illegible] are [illegible] a magnificently [illegible] from the robust, vibrant Overture, through the glorious Sarabande, the gaily inspired Gigue, the Menuetto grave, and finally the [illegible] Air and Brilliant Bourree.

Enesco's knowledge of the orchestra is sure, his use of it imaginative, his inspiration authentic.

The orchestra performed superbly throughout the program which was brought to a close with the Roumanian Rhapsody. The latter, constructed on folk melodies which are elaborated in a manner refreshingly free from sophistry, grows increasingly popular.

Enesco Guest of Boston Symphony

The Arts in Boston

Georges Enesco, infrequently seen and heard in Boston of late years, returned to act as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in this week's pair of concerts. Yesterday's appearance was, we believe, his first as conductor in Boston, though he had played the violin here, and several of his compositions were familiar to local audiences. The Friday subscribers welcomed the distinguished visitor cordially and applauded him with enthusiasm at the close of the concert.

The program was unusual in construction, consisting of the Haydn Symphony in D major, no. 104, Alfred Alessandresco's symphonic poem, "Actaeon," and Enesco's Second Suite and Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1. All guest composer-conductors feel obliged to give publicity to their own works and to those of compatriots. This list obviously was designed with a view more to such patriotic motives than to good program making. Still, if it was on the light side, it gave a great deal of pleasure.

For the Haydn symphony Mr. Enesco used the full complement of strings of the modern orchestra against the customary Haydn quota of wind, yet he was able, with the virtuosic band under his baton, to maintain balance. His reading of the symphony had rather more of the romantic quality than is usually associated with it.

Alfred Alessandresco, born at Bucharest in 1893, was new to Boston Symphony programs. He is said to have written no more music since "Actaeon," which was first played in 1915; not because he thought this score constituted the last word in music, but because he was out of sympathy with modern experimentation. After hearing this music, it is easy to understand his feeling. He has dealt with the legend of Actaeon and Diana in a conventional manner reminiscent of various predecessors, Russian, French and Austrian. The piece is agreeable enough, but wanting in originality or even a definite individuality.

For Mr. Enesco, no doubt, it was a labor of love, but actually he did his native country more honor with his own works. Boston must be nearly the last musical capital in America to hear his Second Suite, but it was pleasant to hear it at last. It consists of five dance movements in the old forms—sarabande, gigue, bourrée—but infused with a national flavor and enlivened by firm construction, rhythmic variety and orchestral color.

The Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 of course has long been familiar, mostly on popular programs, but under the composer's authoritative guidance it took on new vitality. The same authority informed his conducting throughout, and he and the men exchanged felicitations on a happy meeting.

L. A. S.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Iris, Paris

Serge Prokofieff

Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Friday and Saturday

French Pianist Sees Old Friends

"Why, I used to play on those two little drums when I was a child," Robert Casadesus, French pianist, exclaimed today when he was brought into the Casadesus collection of old musical instruments in Symphony Hall. Mr. Casadesus is in Boston to play tonight and tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony collection was gathered by Henri Casadesus, uncle of the pianist, member of this well-known musical family, and presented to the directors of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Casadesus, who recently was heard over the radio when he was soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, had both a bouquet and a brickbat for American radio. He was impressed, he said, with the careful manner in which his piano playing was handled from an engineering standpoint. In Europe he said radiocasters are apparently indifferent to such details. On the other hand he decried the habit of radiocasting jazz on radio studio organs, claiming that the organ not only was not suited to jazz but also that the music was not even composed for or suited to organ technique.

Tran Gl. 201

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Georges Enesco, who is guest conductor of the Boston Symphony concerts this week, was given a rousing reception by the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. At the end of the concert there was prolonged handclapping, a good deal of stamping and some cheers. The orchestra seemed to adore him and handsomely showed their regard.

The tribute from all sides was well deserved because Mr. Enesco is not only a great musician but probably the most versatile one of first rank in the world today. He is noted equally for his genius and his modesty. The latter takes the form, when Mr. Enesco is conducting, of rigid abstinence from displayful gestures and of an intense but unobtrusive devotion to the muisc in hand. As it happens, his first appearance here in some years comes during a season when the Boston Symphony subscribers have been treated to more guest conductors than usual; Amfitheatroff and Mlle. Boulanager already have directed the orchestra and Serge Prokofieff will have his turn next week.

Mr. Enesco happily put upon his program two of his own compositions, the Second Suite for orches- was new "at these concerts," and the superb "Rumanian Rhapsody" No. 1 that, unaccountably, had not figured on a "regular" Symphony program since 1920. He began with Haydn's last Symphony, in D major, No. 104. The tone poem "Actaeon" by his fellow Rumanian, Alfred Alessandresco, was likewise introduced to the repertory of this orchestra.

Mr. Enesco seems to shun what are known as personal readings (save, of course, in the case of his own work), and instead endeavors to do complete justice according to the general principles of a particular composer's style, and according to the written evidence of the notes themselves. Thus, his Haydn was beautifully clear, balanced, precise and in the right spirit, though traditional rather than distinctive.

He is evidently a splendid technician of the orchestra, both as conductor and composer. There is always something going on in his orchestral tissues; his music is robust and outspoken, the work of an esthetically strong man unconcerned with theory or fashion, a man whose creative spirit lies close to his own soil and his own people. Yet he is certainly no artistic provincial.

Deems Taylor has recorded a discerning prophecy of long life for the music of Georges Enesco. That is likely to be borne out; Enesco's work stands by itself. It exhibits the emotional depth and the solidarity of Teutonic models, the vivacity and the proverbial logic of the Latins. Yet its inner qualities, defying a characterizing phrase, are much more personal. The "Rumanian Rhapsody" No. 1 is a masterly example of the use of folk melody. Enesco has done this with absolute freedom and without any of the self-conscious benevolence to be found in some of Brahms' Hungarian dances. The performance yesterday was one of the most exciting experiences this reviewer has ever enjoyed. The Second Suite, more a charming tour de force than a masterpiece, consists of highly original and spicily dissonant music set in 18th-century forms.

Alessandresco's "Actaeon" was hardly worth the excellent playing it received. It was written in 1914, when Alessandresco was 21; as a specimen of how much a clever young student had learned, "Actaeon" has its merits. The literary basis is the familiar myth of Actaeon, the hunter, who inadvertently saw the unclothed beauty of Diana while that goddess was bathing in the forest. The outraged Diana transformed Actaeon into a stag and he was soon killed by his own dogs. Since Actaeon by all accounts did not mean to see what he did, Diana's revenge was unreasonable in the first place. Alessandresco's windy and naive treatment has made it unreasonably long, as well. "Actaeon" is manufactured mostly of second-hand Debussy, with some Ravel and samplings of Rimsky-Korsakoff and even of Wagner.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Prokofieff will conduct three of his own compositions and will be soloist in a fourth.—C. W. D.

Post

ENESCO AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

His Second Suite and First Rhapsody Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Only the presence of a Symphony by Haydn prevented the programme of yesterday afternoon's concert from being all-Roumanian. As guest conductor, Georges Enesco, led the orchestra through Haydn's Symphony in D major, No. 104; Alfred Alessandresco's symphonic poem, "Actaeon," and his own Second Suite and First Roumanian Rhapsody.

LEADS WITH AUTHORITY

No stranger to Symphony Hall is Mr. Enesco. At a pair of concerts in 1923 he conducted his First Suite and appeared as violin soloist in the Concerto of Brahms, while in 1926 he took part in a performance of Chausson's Concerto for Violin, Piano and String Quartet. One authority, at least, has pronounced him the greatest all-round musician of our time. To dub him, therefore, a musical Jack-of-all-trades, and hence good at none, would be glaringly inaccurate; yet some might still call him eminent rather than pre-eminent as composer, violinist and conductor.

In the last-named capacity Mr. Enesco again showed himself yesterday a leader of absolute authority and withal one who had won the warm support of the orchestra. In the applause which greeted him when he first appeared upon the platform the orchestra joined, and not content with clapping, stamped its collective feet, an unconventional but significant sign of approval. With his bulky figure, rounded shoulders and shock of black hair, Mr. Enesco is far from your prima donna conductor who is a cross between a dancing master and a tailor's dummy. Hollywood could use him only in a "character part."

Haydn Read Well

The performance of Haydn's Symphony was a fine one. If there was an absence of the lightness we are prone to associate with this composer's music, it must be remembered that the Symphony itself, the last of them all, is more solid, more Beethovenish, as we might say from our point of vantage, than any of its predecessors. Especially memorable was the playing of the Andante, in which Haydn attained a warmth of expression, even a romantic feeling, which help to give this Symphony its particular position.

From this point on one heeded more the music than the conducting. An act of friendship, possibly, or perhaps of patriotism, the performance of the symphonic poem, which Mr. Enesco's lesser compatriot composed at the age of 21, consumed a great deal of time and profited the listener but little. Essentially derivative, leaning heavily upon what were then (1914) the modern French composers, this tonal telling of the tale of the luckless hunter who encountered Diana and her nymphs at their woodland bath is no more than conventionally effective, though soundly made.

Of far more import was Mr. Enesco's Suite, also heard here for the first time. Like Ravel in "Le Tombeau de Couperin" and Prokofieff in his "Classical" Symphony Mr. Enesco has here poured new wine into old bottles, albeit with less harmonic spicing. The Overture, Sarabande and Bourree proved, for this hearer, the most engaging of the Suite's six divisions. In the last-named, which makes brilliant conclusion to the whole, comes a striking anticipation of the Polka from Weinberger's "Schwanda": the Suite was composed in 1915.

It was good to hear again the Rhapsody, which had not been played at the regular Symphony Concerts for 17 years, though it achieved four performances in the preceeding eight. That of yesterday, it is quite safe to say, was the most vivid, the most intoxicating presentation that the music had yet received here. The audience, enthusiastic throughout the afternoon, applauded it rapturously.

Herald

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 19th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Georges Enesco was the guest conductor. The program was as follows:

Symphony in D major No. 104……Haydn
Symphonic Poem, "Actaeon". Alessandresco
Suite for Orchestra No. 2……Enesco
Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 in A major ……Enesco

Mr. Enesco, who has too long been absent from Boston, won an ovation yesterday for his conducting of the Boston Symphony and for his own music which occupied the last part of the program. He is a musician of great versatility. He has excellent taste, is extremely modest in demeanor and has the ability to get just the results and effects that he wants from the orchestra. Earlier in the season we heard him conduct the New York Philharmonic in the first half of this program; but the performances yesterday seemed to us much more alive and much more in the spirit of each composer.

The Haydn symphony, another of those of his later works that always has the power to astonish us by its originality, was superbly played. The tempi were exact, the phrasing beautifully wrought. A full orchestra was employed, but there was no lack of lightness. Moreover we could appreciate Haydn's robust humor in the minuet and the finale. This was a fine, classical performance, not cut and dried, but expressing all the vitality which was in Haydn's individual conception.

Alessandresco's "Actaeon," which was heard for the first time at these concerts, has pages of evocative beauty, pages undoubtedly inspired by the pre-war French school. But the symphonic poem as a whole is a tedious, imitative work. It is long and has no conscience whatever about repeating thematic material until we are ready to expire with boredom. And this is the more the pity in that some of the best music comes towards the end. Today the music dates, for we have heard the same kind of thing done so much better.

Mr. Enesco's own second suite, also heard here for the first time, is music in old forms of considerable ingenuity. The music may be repetitious, but one feels that it is inherent in the composer's scheme, as it most emphatically is in the Roumanian Rhapsody. One or two of the movements give the impression of overworking the material; but by and large the suite is a highly successful pouring of new wine into old bottles.

What of the Roumanian rhapsody, which we know so well through the medium of the Pops? Well, as was to be expected with the inspiration of the composer's conducting at hand, the rhapsody outshone itself. It is a brilliant show piece, the best of popular music; and it came off magnificently yesterday. Mr. Enesco was recalled again and again to the platform, receiving applause which he richly deserved. His visit has been stimulating, and we may hope that it will be repeated in another season. What a pleasure, for a change, to find a conductor who uses both a score and a baton! There is altogether too much magic-spell-weaving and shadow-boxing in modern conducting.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Serge Prokofieff will be guest conductor and soloist in a program of his own works.

Enesco Conducts at Symphony

By Ruth Marsters
Music Editor

OF THE many brilliant personalities who have appeared as guests with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, none has proved more interesting than Georges Enesco who contributed to the regular pair of concerts this weekend in the double capacity of conductor and composer.

The distinguished Roumanian musician, lately conductor with the New York Philharmonic Symphony Society, had not appeared with the Boston orchestra since 1926, when he played in a performance of the Chausson's "Concert" for Violin, Piano, and String Quartet.

As was to be expected, both orchestra and audience were enthusiastic at his return. So shy is Enesco of any demonstration on his behalf, however, and so effectively did he defer applause that is was considerably less prolonged than it might otherwise have been.

The Haydn Symphony in D major, No. 104 numbered the seventh in the twelve London symphonies, though in fact the last that Haydn ever wrote, was accomplished in a straightforward, lucid fashion that wedded nicety of style to faultless precision.

There is no stuff and nonsense about Enesco's conducting. His is a technique which combines economy of means with exactitude of import. And his readings are as concisely patterned as is his manner of bringing them into effect.

Following the Haydn, Enesco introduced his young countryman, Alessandresco, to these audiences for the first time in a symphonic poem, "Actaeon."

A pupil of d'Indy, Alessandresco's music proved more French than Roumanian. If "Actaeon" does not bear the stamp of striking originality, it is none the less tone painting of an exceedingly pleasant variety. It is based on the Greek myth of the unfortunate hunter Actaeon and the avenged goddess Diana and in 1915 won the Roumanian National composition prize established by Enesco.

The last part of the program was devoted to works of Enesco, the Second Suite for Orchestra, which had not been previously performed at these concerts, and the popular Rhapsody, No. 1 in A major, Op. 11.

It would be difficult to find anything but enthusiasm for the Suite. The pattern is conventional but its proportions are broadened, and its colors intensified. In short a magnificently wrought structure from the robust, vibrant Overture, through the gracious Sarabande, the gaily inspired Gigue, the Menuetto grave, and finally the ~~nostalgic~~ Air and Brilliant Bourree.

Enesco's knowledge of the orchestra is sure, his use of it imaginative, his inspiration authentic.

The orchestra performed superbly throughout the program which was brought to a close with the Roumanian Rhapsody. The latter, constructed on folk melodies which are elaborated in a manner refreshingly free from sophistry, grows increasingly popular.

Enesco Guest of Boston Symphony

Georges Enesco, infrequently seen and heard in Boston of late years, returned to act as guest conductor of the Symphony Orchestra in this week's pair of concerts. Yesterday's appearance was, we believe, his first as conductor in Boston, though he had played the violin here, and several of his compositions were familiar to local audiences. The Friday subscribers welcomed the distinguished visitor cordially and applauded him with enthusiasm at the close of the concert.

The program was unusual in construction, consisting of the Haydn Symphony in D major, no. 104, Alfred Alessandresco's symphonic poem, "Actaeon," and Enesco's Second Suite and Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1. All guest composer-conductors feel obliged to give publicity to their own works and to those of compatriots. This list obviously was designed with a view more to such patriotic motives than to good program making. Still, if it was on the light side, it gave a great deal of pleasure.

For the Haydn symphony Mr. Enesco used the full complement of strings of the modern orchestra against the customary Haydn quota of wind, yet he was able, with the virtuosic band under his baton, to maintain balance. His reading of the symphony had rather more of the romantic quality than is usually associated with it.

Alfred Alessandresco, born at Bucharest in 1893, was new to Boston Symphony programs. He is said to have written no more music since "Actaeon," which was first played in 1915; not because he thought this score constituted the last word in music, but because he was out of sympathy with modern experimentation. After hearing this music, it is easy to understand his feeling. He has dealt with the legend of Actaeon and Diana in a conventional manner reminiscent of various predecessors, Russian, French and Austrian. The piece is agreeable enough, but wanting in originality or even a definite individuality.

For Mr. Enesco, no doubt, it was a labor of love, but actually he did his native country more honor with his own works. Boston must be nearly the last musical capital in America to hear his Second Suite, but it was pleasant to hear it at last. It consists of five dance movements in the old forms—sarabande, gigue, bourrée—but infused with a national flavor and enlivened by firm construction, rhythmic variety and orchestral color.

The Roumanian Rhapsody No. 1 of course has long been familiar, mostly on popular programs, but under the composer's authoritative guidance it took on new vitality. The same authority informed his conducting throughout, and he and the men exchanged felicitations on a happy meeting.

L. A. S.

The Arts in Boston

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Iris, Paris

Serge Prokofieff

Guest Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Next Friday and Saturday

---

French Pianist Sees Old Friends

"Why, I used to play on those two little drums when I was a child," Robert Casadesus, French pianist, exclaimed today when he was brought into the Casadesus collection of old musical instruments in Symphony Hall. Mr. Casadesus is in Boston to play tonight and tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony collection was gathered by Henri Casadesus, uncle of the pianist, member of this well-known musical family, and presented to the directors of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Casadesus, who recently was heard over the radio when he was soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, had both a bouquet and a brickbat for American radio. He was impressed, he said, with the careful manner in which his piano playing was handled from an engineering standpoint. In Europe he said radiocasters are apparently indifferent to such details. On the other hand he decried the habit of radiocasting jazz on radio studio organs, claiming that the organ not only was not suited to jazz but also that the music was not even composed for or suited to organ technique.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

[illegible] 18 [illegible]

* * *

Mrs Edward Ballantine of Cambridge, ofrmerly of this city, is a member of the committee arranging for the violin recital which Georges Enesco, noted guest conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will give April [illegible] the benefit of the Cambridge chapter, MacDowell Colony league, which helps maintain the famed MacDowell colony at Peterborough, N. H. Prof Ballantine of the Harvard university music department is vice-president of the league.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 19 1938

Jacques Hoffman, Violinist, Dies

Special to the World-Telegram.

BOSTON, March 19. — Jacques Hoffman, 81, a violinist and conductor, died Thursday night here after a fall at the Malkin Conservatory of Music, where he had been teaching.

Mr. Hoffman joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the [illegible] his arrival in this country from the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. He remained a member of the Boston Symphony until 1926, when he resigned to devote himself to teaching. He for many years was conductor of the Lincoln House Orchestra. He also had been a member of the faculty of Wellesley College.

Casadesus, French Pianist, For Tuesday Symphony

Mercury
New Bedford
Jan. 24/38

The fifth Tuesday in the commuters' 3 o'clock matinee series of six concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place this week. A geographical survey of subscribers to the Tuesday Symphony reveals that, scattered throughout New England as far as Castine, Maine, the audience travels an aggregate of 60,000 miles between Symphony Hall and their homes, or, in terms of world news centers, the equal of five round trips from Washington to Moscow via London, Paris, Barcelona, Rome, Vienna, Prague, Berlin, Danzig, Warsaw, Kaunas and Moscow.

Robert Casadesus, member of a French family famous for its abundance of musicians, will be solo pianist on Tuesday. He will play Liszt's First Concerto and d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song." The program also includes two extremely colorful Russian works, Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Introduction and March from "The Golden Cock." Richard Burgin, first violin of the orchestra, will conduct, Serge Koussevitzky being on a brief vacation in Florida.

Mr. Burgin is growing in favorable recognition as assistant conductor.

Music lovers commuting to the four preceding monthly matinees on Tuesday have heard compositions covering every period of orchestral literature from Emanuel Bach, born in 1714, to the contemporary Serge Prokofieff, whose "Lieutenant Kiji" amused one of those audiences.

202

B. Trans

Enesco Conducts at Symphony

Prokofiev Guest at Symphony Concerts

Metropolitan Opera Association Comes to Town

Symphony Concert

Engrossing Program and Performance Under Baton of Georges Enesco, Guest Conductor

BY MOSES SMITH

One had a glow of pleasure to sit by at yesterday's matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra while the audience greeted the guest-conductor, Georges Enesco, with the respect, cordiality and warmth due one of the principal musicians of our times. The successive waves of applause were perhaps not quite so spectacular as they had been in smaller Sanders Theater the night before, but they seemed, in compensation, to be more persistent.

The tribute was the more remarkable in that Enesco did nothing whatever to stimulate it — except make beautiful music. That is to say, he comported himself like an exceptionally modest musician, self-annihilating in the presence not only of the music but also of the audience. Once a performance had been done he seemed almost to retreat from his stand into the company of the orchestra, where he "took his bows" almost with embarrassment and almost invariably in company with the orchestral musicians. The latter, whom he persistently applauded, in turn applauded him. And it would have seemed like a mutual admiration society if the honest affection of each had not been patent.

If the concert, for which the same program had been set as in Sanders Theater, was an even more enjoyable occasion it was because the orchestral playing was even better. The Boston Symphony Orchestra sounded in characteristic glory, modified, naturally, by the nature of the compositions at hand and by the particular temperament and musical complex of Enesco. There was superlative playing from the strings in the opening Haydn Symphony in D major. And the wind instruments, used with considerable freedom in this last of Haydn's symphonies, sounded true and sensitive. The performance was in every way exceptionally clear and apt, without being so "refined" as to lose its specific character.

At the opposite extreme, the playing of Enesco's First "Roumanian" Rhapsody at the end of the concert had wildness without roughness, gypsy abandon without cheapness (which one had considered scarcely possible), fire, so to say, without smoke. As a result the composition, over-familiar from ubiquitous performances if not in concert at least on the radio, emerged as something of a masterpiece of its type rather than merely another instrument for generating specious excitement.

Of a different sort is Enesco's Second Suite. This music can be robust as well as light. With a relatively small orchestra (though with a large percussion section) Enesco evokes considerable sonority. This is healthy music. Consisting of half a dozen movements bearing the designations from the classical suite. It may be said to satisfy the general description of new wine in old bottles. But even the bottles have undergone some transformation. And in general one has the feeling that Enesco has here done with the classical suite what Prokofiev, writing about the same time, did with the eighteenth-century symphony in his own "Classical" Symphony. The experiment is equally successful.

In the Symphonic Poem, "Acteon," Alessandresco writes principally in the language of French impressionism, with which has been amalgamated a degree of Straussian grandiloquence. It is not an original score; but neither is it negligible. Its program may or may not be significant; for this writer it was important only as an excuse for the composer's setting notes to paper. As sheer music "Acteon" says something. It would say more, paradoxically, if it were shorter. There are repetitions and sequences that serve only to postpone the march of ideas. There is perfectly apparent, on the other hand, a genuine youthful talent which, strangely enough, became silent as soon as this work had been written more than twenty years ago.

"Acteon" owed much of its effectiveness to the apparently splendid performance accorded it under Enesco's direction, which wrought similar results with the other music on the program. Enesco is not one of your virtuoso conductors. But neither is he of the usual species of composer-conductor, which can be (and usually is) pretty dull. He not only knows exactly how he wants the music to sound, but also has available the necessary gestures and gesticulations for coaxing the appropriate sounds from the respective instrumentalists. He might be called "conservative" in his taste; but that means here that his sensibilities have the advantage of a catholic, scholarly training, not that he is dry. He indicated—at least in the familiar music on the program—that a conductor does not have to exhibit himself in order to make the music-making convincing and intense. He is a modest musician in the sense that he is humble and unassuming, not in lack of warmth and imagination.

Acclaim Greets Boston Symphony

At the first of the fourth pair of concerts given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall last week the program consisted of the Fifth Symphony of Mahler, Two Nocturnes of Debussy and Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice. For the Saturday matinee Dr. Koussevitzky arranged a list made up of Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for brass and strings and and the Saint-Saens' "Organ" Symphony.

Among the gentlemen of the press the Mahler Symphony, no stranger to New Yorkers, did not stimulate a unified expression of gratitude, while Hindemith's composition evoked more favorable comment. But there was a unanimous chorus testifying to the glories of the Boston Orchestra. Lawrence Gilman of the Herald-Tribune, ending a paean of praise occasioned by the playing of the Mahler Symphony, wrote, "One will not soon forget the beauty and expertness and expressiveness of playing such as this." As for Mr. Koussevitzky, he has seldom put to his credit in New York a more eloquent and masterly performance of any work." Olin Downes of the Times observed that the performance of the Rimsky tour de force explained why Tschaikowsky admired it as a "colossal piece of instrumentation." Probably the finest compliment of all came from Oscar Thompson who began his review of the first concert in the Sun as follows:

"If Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy and Nicholas Andreievitch Rimsky-Korsakov had undertaken to compose music for the specific purpose of exhibiting the most splendid and distinctive qualities of the present Symphony Orchestra, they could scarcely have achieved that purpose more strikingly than was done by a program of their compositions conducted by Serge Koussevitzky last night in Carnegie Hall."

TONIGHT 8:15
SYMPHONY HALL — COM 1492
MONDAY 8:15—TUES. MAR. 22 at 3
BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
RICHARD BURGIN—Conducting
Soloist — ROBERT CASADESUS
FRIDAY, MARCH 25 at 2:30
SATURDAY, MARCH 26 at 8:15
Serge PROKOFIEFF, Conducting

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Richard Burgin conducting, at 8:15 tomorrow evening and at 3 Tuesday afternoon. Fifth program of this series. Robert Casadesus, the high-ranking French pianist, will make his first appearances with the Boston Symphony, playing the solo portions of Liszt's E-flat Concerto, and Vincent D'Indy's "Symphony on a Mountain Air." The purely orchestral music will be "A Night on Bald Mountain," by Moussorgsky, and the Introduction and Wedding March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "The Golden Cock."

The "regular" concerts at 2:30 Friday afternoon and 8:15 Saturday will be conducted by the Russian musician, Serge Prokofieff. While Mr. Prokofieff has appeared several times with the orchestra as soloist in his own piano music, this will be his debut as guest conductor here. The program will consist entirely of Prokofieff's music, two examples of his early work and a brace of comparatively recent compositions. The two former are the "Chout" Suite and the First Piano Concerto, with the composer playing the solo part, the orchestra conducted by Richard Burgin. The Second Suite from the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" will be given first performances in America. There are seven movements, "Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Friar Laurence," "Dance," "The Parting of Romeo and Juliet," "Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls" and "Romeo by Juliet's Grave." The remaining number of the program will be "Peter and the Wolf," a setting of a children's tale in which each character of the story is depicted by a particular instrument. The music is interspersed with a narrative, which will be spoken by Richard Hale.

Her MUSIC Mar 22

MONDAY EVENING SYMPHONY

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, gave the fifth concert in the Monday-Tuesday series last night in Symphony Hall. Robert Casadesus, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Moussorgsky...."A Night on Bald Mountain," Orchestral Fantasy
Liszt....Concerto in E flat major No 1 for piano and orchestra d'Indy....Symphony on a French Mountain Air, for piano and orchestra
Rimsky-Korsakov..Introduction and March from the Opera, "The Golden Cock"

We had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Casadesus in New York on Sunday afternoon play the Mozart A major Concerto and the Ravel Left Hand Concerto with the Philharmonic. Last night he made his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the familiar and effective Liszt E flat major Concerto and the lovely Symphony on a Mountain Air by Vincent d'Indy. This immediate record indicates a pianist of versatility and catholic taste. As a matter of fact, Mr. Casadesus's debut as soloist with the Boston Symphony has been far too long delayed. He is recognized as one of the most interesting and remarkable pianists of the day; and he should have been invited to play with our orchestra before.

Still, better late than never; and Mr. Casadesus's great success last night was none the less for being some years late. There would be no point in writing in this manner about him if he were not one of the great artists on this instrument today. His playing is brilliant and in good taste; he is a perfectionist without being a pedant. His Mozart playing, for example, is beautifully carried out. No less so last night were the fire and spirit in the Liszt and the intelligent merging of piano and orchestra in the d'Indy. We shall not forget the excellence of these performances, and the sooner Mr. Casadesus returns to Boston the better.

The Liszt Concerto needs little comment. There have been people who have carped at it as vulgar. Nowadays, with the works of Richard Strauss ringing in our ears, the adjective seems unfair. The work is really extraordinarily well planned. If it is on the melodramatic side, it is certainly not verbose. People who rave over the interminable lengths of the Faust Symphony sometimes turn up their noses at the Piano Concertos. But it is possible that this showy, attractive work will survive the more pretentious symphony.

D'Indy's music has been unreasonably neglected by the Boston Symphony in recent years. The Symphony on a Mountain Air is a work of rare charm and subtlety of invention. The curious effect of contrast between the brittle tone of the piano and the warm, lyric melodies in the strings and wind is most cleverly executed. There is nothing of the pedagogue, a sneer occasionally directed at d'Indy, in this work. The entire program was well played by the orchestra under Mr. Burgin.

This concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock. The final concerts in this subsidiary series will be given on April 18 and 19.

PROKOFIEFF MOCKS AT HUB

B. Post

Will Present Only "Children's Music," He Says

March 23/38

Because the Boston music public a few years ago failed to display the appreciation he believed due his Fourth Symphony, Serge Prokofieff, who shares with Stravinsky, the top-ranking roles among the modern Russian school of composers, will present what he mockingly described last night on his arrival here as "children's music," Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music, why should I break my baton?" he asked.

He will present an all-Prokofieff programme with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"I'm not going to puzzle them," he said, "but give them simple things."

"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, originally written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of the orchestral instruments, will be included on the programme. Chout, which means "The Buffoon" in English, a harsh satire originally composed for Diaghilev's ballet corps in Paris, and piano concerto No. 1 in D-flat major, opus 10, will also be included in the programme.

Globe Mar 22

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concert last evening of the Monday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra sparkled with brilliance. This was due to those responsible for the concert, to the composers whose works were played, Moussorgsky, Liszt, d'Indy and Rimsky-Korsakov, to the orchestra under the baton of Richard Burgin, and to the soloist, Robert Casadesus.

M. Casadesus, in this, his first appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played Liszt's Concerto in E flat major, No. 1, for Pianoforte and Orchestra. His remarkable virtuosity was eloquently expressed even in the first few measures of this extremely ecstatic and difficult work. His ensuing performance was impressive for beautiful quality of tone, technic outstanding in velocity, dexterous fingering and firm wrists, and interpretation that brought out the vitality and impetuosity of the work. M. Casadesus fairly electrified the audience, which expressed its delight at his gifted achievement with eloquent applause.

The orchestra gave both intelligent and sensitive support to the soloist. M. Casadesus also played the piano part of d'Indy's Symphony for orchestra and Pianoforte on a French Mountain Song, a part which—while too conspicuous to be merely a part of the orchestra, particularly with M. Casadesus' skilled fingers at the keys—still does not contain specifically virtuoso demands. Here the pianist was particularly vivid in his clarity of tone and lightness of touch.

The orchestra played the d'Indy Symphony with deftly colored passages and extremely lucid tones. Although the first two movements, filled with melody of the gentle, nostalgic type, are hauntingly lovely, it is the finale—tremendously vigorous and high-spirited, and achieving almost syncopated rhythm—which is the most memorable of the movements. The orchestra and the soloist played this in flashing form.

The program opened with Mr. Burgin's reading of Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain." This orchestral fantasy was given all its lush and exotic demands. Rimsky-Korsakov's Introduction and March from "The Golden Cock," played exquisitely, closed the program.

D'INDY AGAIN BY SYMPHONY

Casadesus Piano Soloist at Monday Concert

Post Mar 22

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Vincent d'Indy, a composer of whom we hear all too little nowadays, was represented at last evening's Symphony Concert by one of his most invigorating compositions, the Symphony for Orchestra and Piano on a French Mountain Air which, unaccountably, had gone unheard at Symphony Hall for 18 years, though there have been performances by the Conservatory Orchestra in the interim. The occasion for this long overdue revival of one of the finest works of the late nineteenth century was the first appearance at the Symphony Concerts of the eminent French pianist, Robert Casadesus, who was also heard in Liszt's Concerto in E-flat major.

In place of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is now enjoying a brief holiday, Richard Burgin conducted last evening, as he will this afternoon when the programme is repeated. At the head of his list he placed Moussorgsky's essay in diableric "A Night on Bald Mountain," and at the end of it the Introduction and March from Rimsky-Korsakov's opera, "Le Coq d'Or."

Only a performance of the utmost distinction can vitalize a Liszt concerto today, and this saving grace was hardly accorded the E-flat major last evening. Nevertheless the audience was plainly delighted and could not have enough of returning Mr. Casadesus to the platform. The final pages were, as a matter of fact, played with the tumultuous speed and energy which they require and this in itself would have been sufficient to set the audience off. Otherwise Mr. Casadesus and Mr. Burgin achieved no more than routine effectiveness. If nothing was slighted neither was anything greatly enhanced. D'Indy's Symphony is possessed of enough verve and color to make it very nearly go of itself, and go it did last evening. The piano is here not so much a solo instrument as a sort of partner of the orchestra, sometimes it is merely one more orchestral instrument. However, this obligato, if such it may be called, is often exceedingly brilliant, and Mr. Casadesus, who appears to be possessed of a very considerable technique, played it brilliantly.

French Pianist Sees Old Friends

"Why, I used to play on those two little drums when I was a child," Robert Casadesus, French pianist, exclaimed today when he was brought into the Casadesus collection of old musical instruments in Symphony Hall. Mr. Casadesus is in Boston to play tonight and tomorrow with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The Symphony collection was gathered by Henri Casadesus, uncle of the pianist, member of this well-known musical family, and presented to the directors of Symphony Hall.

Mr. Casadesus, who recently was heard over the radio when he was soloist with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, had both a bouquet and a brickbat for American radio. He was impressed, he said, with the careful manner in which his piano playing was handled from an engineering standpoint. In Europe he said radiocasters are apparently indifferent to such details. On the other hand he decried the habit of radiocasting jazz on radio studio organs, claiming that the organ not only was not suited to jazz but also that the music was not even composed for or suited to organ technique.

PLAINSFIELD, N. J.
COURIER - NEWS
MAR 12 1938

Dr. and Mrs. Geoffrey Esty of E. Broad St. will entertain tonight at an hour of music. Jacobus Langendoen, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the guest artist.

g Globe 313

TY-EIGHT PAGES (2) TWO CENTS

UIRY VO

Front page — March 23/38

SEEKS 'REVENGE' ON BOSTON

SERGE PROKOFIEFF

Composer to Give Boston Only "Children's Music"

Russia's Prokofieff to Retaliate For "Insult" His Fourth Symphony Received Here

Nettled at the reception given his Fourth Symphony by Boston's musical public a few years ago, Serge Prokofieff, who with Stravinsky heads the modern Russian school of composers, on his arrival at the Ritz-Carlton last night revealed to reporters a scheme of retaliation that only a temperamental genius could conceive.

Because "Boston does not understand" his serious music, Prokofieff, it turns out, has purposely chosen for his all-Prokofieff program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening pieces which are, as he mockingly phrased it, "children's music."

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music, why should I break my baton?" he demanded indignantly. "That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

Fairy Tale With Narrator

Sure enough, right squat in the middle of his program is a piece called "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale originally written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of the orchestral instruments.

Just to make musical Boston's face even redder—a narrator, Richard Hale, will explain in words of two syllables—in English also—just what instrument is playing and what character it represents in the orchestral fairy tale.

Although this orchestral fairy tale is the crowning indignity that the composer is heaping upon Boston this week, there is no little irony in the other selections from his works chosen for his program for Boston.

For instance, he has chosen "Chout" as his first piece. And "Chout" means "The Buffoon" in English. It is a harsh satire originally composed for Diaghilev's ballet corps in Paris.

Then to give Boston's nose another tweak, his next selection, Piano Concerto No. 1 in D-flat major, opus 10, is the composition which won him the Rubinstein prize when he was only 19!

Having settled the concerto and children's music angles of his unique scheme of revenge, Mr. Prokofieff plans to "honor" musical Boston with a "first performance in America" a presentation of "Romeo and Juliet" Ballet, Second Suite, opus 64.

This ballet he described to reporters last night with a malicious gleam in his eye.

"'Romeo and Juliet'," he explained, "is treated without any complications. The harmonies and tones are treated much more simply than in a symphony."

In other words, he could have written its theme in a symphony but, as he kept reiterating, "Boston wouldn't understand it."

This "first performance in America" ballet composition really is the key to temperamental Mr. Prokofieff's wrath at Boston.

It seems that Dr. Kousseviksky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, commissioned him a year and a half before the 50th anniversary celebration of the orchestra to write a symphony in honor of the anniversary.

"So," said Prokofieff last night, "I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly. But what happened? When it was played, the Boston public and the critics were very insulting. They not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste.

"The fact of the matter is, four of my most important works have never been performed here in Boston. The two serious pieces that have been performed here—my Fourth Symphony in 'Four Portraits'—were not understood.

"So I give them simple things from now on!"

Young French Pianist Gives Fine Program

Lowell "Courier-Citizen"

Robert Casadesus Plays with Boston Symphony Orchestra — Local Music-Lovers Enthusiastic in Praise.

Courier

From all the area around Boston, and from all over New England came the lovers of music who filled Symphony Hall at the matinee in the supplementary series of programs by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Tuesday.

They heard as solo artist an outstanding pianist in Robert Casadesus, young French musician of a famous family which has devoted its interest to the collection and playing of ancient instruments. And they heard him before the patrons of the regular symphony concerts have had an opportuntiy to do so, although his success indicates that he will be drafted for the regular series on the basis of his fine showing.

For his first appearance on the program he had chosen the Liszt Concert- in E-flat major, which the musicologists tell us was neglected for some years after its composition, but which now takes its place in the repertory of many distinguished pianists. Naturally, it has the characteristics that marked the Abbe Liszt. It is frankly a show piece. But in the hands of Mr. Casadesus it goes deeper than that, revealing many passages of tender beauty, heightened by contrast with the more brilliant passage-work which the pianist tossed off with remarkable ease and surety. There was both beauty and thrilling, but always musical, vigor in his playing. And the orchestra under the direction of Concert Master Richard Burgin supplied a colorful harmonic background.

After the intermission Mr. Casadesus returned to play the piano part in the Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte written by d'Indy on a French mountain air. It is doubtful if it has ever had a more scintillating performance in Boston. The piano, to be sure, is treated as a member of the orchestral family. But in this instance it is an important one. Mr. Casadesus knew when to give it full play and when to hold it in check.

The purely orchestral numbers on the program by the Russians Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff were brought to impressive and brilliant performance under Mr. Burgin's really inspiring guidance.

The collection of ancient instruments which is now the property of the Symphony Orchestra is housed on the first balcony floor. It was acquired from the Casadesus family. After the concert Robert Casadesus took the opportunity to see it again. Noticing a pair of ancient little kettledrums, he said that in his childhood those identical instruments were among his cherished playthings. They brought back pleasant memories of his boyhood.—S. R. F.

MEMPHIS, TENN.
COMMERCIAL APPEAL

MAR 13 1938

And, not forgetting St. Patrick's Day, which falls on March 17, Fred Hufsmith and Muriel Wilson will offer a medley of Irish tunes from Victor Herbert's "Eileen." A novel radio act, consisting of a group of humorous variations on the nursery rhyme, "Mary Had a Little Lamb," will be presented by Norman Corwin, author, assisted by Peggy Burt, New York actress. Corwin was familiar to New England radio audiences for several years as a news commentator.

Miss Monath, who is affiliated with the New Friends of Music, was the first American pianist to appear at the Salzburg Festival. She also has played with the Vienna Philharmonic, the Hamburg Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the New York Philharmonic.

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y.
SUNDAY COURIER

MAR 13 1938

MODERN MUSIC IS PRESERVED

Stored In Dust-Proof Boxes At Library In Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA (U.P.)—Orchestral works of contemporary American composers are being preserved for posterity by the Federal Music Copying Project here, only one of its kind in the nation according to WPA officials.

Orchestral scores are copied on pure rag paper, and then filed in specially constructed dust-proof boxes at the Free Library of Philadelphia as part of the Edwin A. Fleisher music collection, said to be the largest orchestral collection in the world.

A complete set of orchestral parts, enough for the largest symphony orchestra, are copied from the composer's original score. Many of the works prepared by the project have had premieres by the Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and other symphony orchestras, according to Arthur Cohn, director.

The staff of 52, all trained musicians and expert copyists, are occupied almost entirely with the works of contemporary Americans, many of whom do not have sufficient funds to pay for the copying that is necessary before their compositions may reach the public.

More than 200 composers, from every section of the nation, are represented among the 502 works completed by the project between November, 1934, and January, 1938. Approximately 70,000 pages have been copied by hand, and 135,000 more reproduced from them.

Fleisher, Philadelphia manufacturer, musician and patron of the arts who presented his own collection of more than 7,000 orchestral scores and several thousand pieces of chamber music to the Free Library several years ago, has given time and financial aid to the project.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD - TIMES

MAR [illegible] - 1938

Zimbalist Will Play In Newport Thursday

Efrem Zimbalist, violinist, will be heard at the concert of Newport Civic Music Association next Thursday night in Rogers High School Auditorium.

The name of Zimbalist has been associated with all that is great in violin playing ever since he was first heard by an American audience on Oct. 27, 1911 as guest soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There is scarcely a city in the world where he has not played or a symphony orchestra of importance with which he has not appeared frequently as soloist. He has made seven tours of the Orient, the only artist ever accorded the distinction of so many reengagements for tours of the East. Zimbalist has also established a reputation as a gifted composer and conductor.

His Newport program follows:

La Folia .... Corelli-Kreisler
Variations on a Theme of Mozart
.... Scalero
Poeme .... Chausson
Tzigane .... Ravel
Intermission
Hark, Hark, the Lark
.... Schubert-Spalding
Hopak ..... Moussorgsky-Dushkin
Lullaby .... Tor Aulin
Non piu Mesta .. Paganini-Kreisler
Vladimir Sokoloff at the Piano.

WATERBURY, CONN.
AMERICAN

MAR 12 1938

Gaucherie

Fashion - conscious Bostonians were "startled", it is reported, on discovering that Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, habitually sacrifices elegance for comfort on his podium by wearing a soft collar with his boiled shirt and swallow-tail. Still, that is a very modest compromise with convention. If the maestro had the full courage of his inclinations, he might conduct (and then the stiffly conforming Bostonians would have some cause to be startled) in a track suit.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 1

Concert Series At Bushnell Is Announced

Six Great Symphonies Again Placed on List By Director Mortensen

Coincident with the visit today of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, William H. Mortensen, managing director of Bushnell Memorial, has announced that the next Bushnell Concert Series will include six evening programs by the same major symphony groups which performed here this season before audiences aggregating 20,000 people.

The course, as outlined by Mr. Mortensen, is as follows:

Boston Symphony
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

National Symphony
Dr. Hans Kindler

Boston Symphony
Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Philadelphia Orchestra
Eugene Ormandy

Cleveland Orchestra
Artur Rodzinski

New York Philharmonic-Symphony
John Barbirolli

Announcements of the new course were mailed today by the Memorial to all persons in this vicinity known to be interested in symphony music. Renewal notices were sent to all old subscribers. These old subscribers have until Friday, April 1, the privilege of continuing their present subscriptions. If a subscriber fails to renew, his seats automatically are released and become available to new applicants.

Mr. Mortensen said that new applications may be sent in right away. They will be filled after April 1 in the order in which they reach the box office, he announced. Each season, through sickness, death or removal from town a small number of seats are given up by old subscribers. It is upon these few releases that the management must depend in filling the applications of the numerous potential subscribers who are expected to apply this season again.

The announcements this year bear on the cover an attractive silhouette of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at rehearsal. This sketch is the work of the Baroness Eveline von Maydell, and was loaned for the use of the Memorial through the courtesy of the Boston Symphony.

Contracts Secured

It had been feared that the Memorial could not twice successively secure a symphony course of the magnitude of the one presented this year, but after prolonged negotiations with the managements of the orchestras in the five cities represented. Mr. Mortensen was eventually able to secure contracts for all. The final aggrements were reached just a day or two ago. The difficulty in securing such major orchestral groups is increased by the problem of transportation. A single artist may shuttle about the country in almost any manner he pleases, but to move a body of 100 men is a costly procedure, and any outside engagement of a major orchestra must be carefully planned.

Prices of subscriptions for the coming season remain the same as before. Seats in the orchestra and first balcony are ten, twelve and fourteen dollars, in the second balcony they are five, six and eight dollars for the course of six concerts. This means that once again Hartford can hear a major orchestra at prices less than are charged in its home city, a policy which the Memorial, dedicated as it is to public service, has consistently pursued.

Dean of Conductors

Dr. Koussevitzky is the dean of conductors in the Bushnell Course. Since the series began in 1930 he has been coming here with the Boston musicians. His presence has been consistent except on occasions when ill-health prevented.

Dr. Rodzinski, Cleveland leader, is next best known to Bushnell patrons, having already led his orchestra for five successive seasons. Dr. Kindler, who has built the National Symphony up to a commanding position, has conducted here three times, while Ormandy and Barbirolli have brought their orchestras here twice.

204

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 18 193

Musician and Russian Wife Enjoy Domestic "Spats" About Which Has Seen More, and Better, Operas

W. A. Cunningham Fears Nazi Control Will Not Help Music in Austria

By G. Y. Loveridge

All happily-married couples need something to dispute about. The Winfield A. Cunninghams dispute about which of them has heard the more operas and the better performances thereof.

Mr. Cunningham is State director of the Federal Music Project. As a musician and as a journalist here and in Europe he has seen productions of more than 100 operas. His wife, who was Natalie Miklaschevska, a member of the Diaghileff Russian Ballet, claims about an equal number, so the argument now will have to be decided—if it ever is to be—on the basis of who saw the more artistic performances.

Met In Belgrade

It was the Russian situation and a few other things that led to Mr. Cunningham, a New Englander, meeting Miss Miklaschevska, who was born in Moscow. They met in Belgrade, where Mr. Cunningham was a correspondent for the Associated Press and Miss Miklaschevska was a member of a ballet touring Europe.

Music has interested Mr. Cunningham as long as he can remember—before that, in fact. His mother has a snapshot of him as a small child, in tears, because he had been prevented from tagging after an organ-grinder. Even a quarter, Mr. Cunningham says, did not solace him. One of the tragedies of his youth is connected with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He had gone from Narragansett to Boston to hear a Friday afternoon performance and intended to buy one of the 25-cent tickets. When he reached the hall, there was already a considerable line. Young Cunningham took his place at the end. When he arrived at about third place from the window, the tickets gave out. As recently as yesterday, Mr. Cunningham was still bitter about it.

A Dispute Worthwhile

It's music they talk about in the home of the Winfield A. Cunninghams. Mr. Cunningham is State director of the Federal Music Project. His wife, formerly Natalie Miklaschevska, once danced with Diaghileff's Russian Ballet.

HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

MAR 16 1938

Fine Concert Series Signed For Bushnell

Orchestral Events of Present Season To Be Duplicated Next Year, Is Announcement

Coincident with the final concert of the Bushnell Concert Series on Tuesday, William H. Mortensen, managing director of the Bushnell Memorial announced that for next season the Memorial would present the same six orchestral events that were secured for the present season. To be able to duplicate a course of the scope and magnitude of this year's series is considered an unusual feat because of the great difficulty of making arrangements with the major orchestra managements for out-of-town engagements.

The course as announced by the managing director for next season, includes the following six evening programs:

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor.

National Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Hans Kindler, Conductor.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor.

Philadelphia Orchestra—Eugene Ormandy, Conductor.

Cleveland Orchestra—Artur Rodzinski, Conductor.

New York Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra—John Barbirolli, Conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky is the orchestra leader best known to Bushnell patrons inasmuch as, except for one or two occasions, he conducted the Boston musicians here steadily since the series was instituted in the fall of 1930. This is the ninth symphony course of its kind at the Memorial.

Rodzinski Ranks High.

Dr. Rodzinski ranks next in point of service at Bushnell concerts having led the Cleveland orchestra here five times. Dr. Kindler has appeared here twice and John Barbirolli three times. Eugene Ormandy has directed the Philadelphia Orchestra twice.

Prices for the coming series remain unchanged: Orchestra and first balcony; ten, twelve and fourteen dollars; second balcony, five, six and eight dollars. This means that for as little as 83 cents a concert, music lovers may hear the events of the Bushnell series.

As in former years, the Memorial is giving old subscribers a prior opportunity to secure seats for the series. Old subscribers have until Friday, April 1, the right to renew their subscriptions for the seats which they now hold, or to apply for different seats. After that date, all seats which remain unrenewed, will be made available to new subscribers.

Seats May Be Available.

How many seats will become available, is not known. The series is now completely subscribed for, but it is expected that again, through sickness, death and removals from town, a limited number will be given up. Although these cannot be distributed to new applicants until after April 1, new applications should be sent in without delay, inasmuch as they will be filled in the order in which they reach the box office.

Audiences aggregating 20,000 persons attended the six events of the current series, a course which, in the opinion of music-lovers, was the finest yet presented here.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Plans for Analytical Talk On Symphony by Dr Josten

MRS CHARLES G. CARTER

Mrs Charles G. Carter, chairman of the education committee of the Junior League is making arrangements for an analytical talk on the program to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at the final Community concert Wednesday evening, March 30, in the Auditorium. The talk will be given by Dr Werner Josten of the music department at Smith college, Friday afternoon, at 4.30 at the Technical high school auditorium. All subscribers to the Community concert series are invited to attend, using their concert ticket for admission.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

MAR 18 193

Junior League Hears Talk by Werner Josten

Professor of Music at Smith College Speaks on Coming Rrogram by Boston Symphony

An analytical talk was given this afternoon by Dr. Werner Josten, professor of music at Smith College on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be presented in Springfield March 30.

The program consists of the Concerto in D Major by C. Philip Emanuel Bach. Dr. Josten illustrated this selection with piano arrangements emphasizing the various themes.

Recordings were used in illustrating the Three Orchestral Sketches of Debussy entitled, "La Mer," as well as the 5th Symphony of Tchaikovsky in E minor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in Springfield at the Auditorium as the last in a series of concerts given by the Community Concert Association and sponsored by the Springfield Junior League.

Announcement of the artists for the next year' series will be made at this concert.

GLOUCESTER, MASS.
TIMES

MAR 19 1938

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONDUCTOR DIES

After he had finished giving a lecture Thursday night, in one of Boston's schools of music, Jacques Hoffmann, musician and conductor well known for many years to music lovers, accidentally fell and suffered injuries which caused his death. Jacques Hoffman was for 47 years first violin for the Boston Symphony orchestra and had acted also as concert-master of the "Pops".

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Famous Pianist To Be Soloist

BOSTON, March 19.—The most brilliant pianist from France, Robert Casadesus, member of a French family famous for its abundance of musicians, will be soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Tnesday at 3 p. m. He will play Liszt's First Concerto and d'Indy's "Symphony on a French Mountain Song."

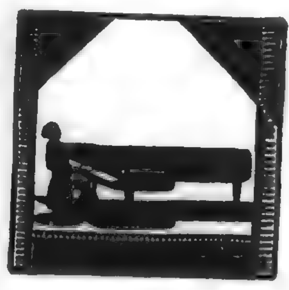
The program also includes two extremely colorful Russian works, Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Introduction and March from "The Golden Cock." Richard Burgin, brilliant first violin of the orchestra, will conduct, Serge Koussevitzky being on a brief vacation in Florida.

Music lovers at the four preceding monthly matinees on Tuesdays have heard compositions covering every period of orchestral literature from Emanuel Bach, born in 1714, to the contemporary Serge Prokofieff.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 19 1938

MUSICAL EVENTS

Vintage Music— Something to Read



TWO piano concerti had revivals in Carnegie Hall last week—the third of Anton Rubinstein, which dates back to the eighties, and the second of Alexander Tansman, composed in 1927. Both compositions did better for their performers than they did for themselves.

Rubinstein's third concerto, which has an odd scenario about the piano trying to prove to the orchestra that it's fit to be in the same composition with other instruments, proved, rather superfluously, that Josef Hofmann is a great pianist. It was interesting to observe the Hofmann magic working on Rubinstein's plushy writing and making it, for the moment, almost convincing. This concerto hasn't had many performances this century, and isn't likely to have many more.

The Tansman concerto presented Miss Ida Krehm, soloist with The Philadelphia Orchestra last Tuesday evening, as a young lady who can operate the piano with skill and humor. It made more of an impression that night than it did ten years ago, when the composer played it here with the Boston Symphony, and Miss Krehm deserved her bows. The music is ingenious, but it outsmarts itself, and while the concerto is no trouble to hear, it also isn't much trouble to forget.

ORCHESTRAL revivals also were the order of the week. Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony offered an immense performance of Mahler's fifth symphony—a rendition so powerful that it may have made converts to the belief that every note of Mahler is a treasure. To the unregenerate, the symphony remains ponderous, and sometimes it hauls an idea around after the idea has had all the handling it can take. Nevertheless, Mr. Koussevitzky made the most of the latent drama in the score, and whether the ovation was for the orchestra's doings or for the music, the adventure was a success.

Eugene Ormandy, with The Philadelphia Orchestra, restored to the repertory Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," once considered somewhat on the

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 17 1938

Concert Seats

IF YOU THIRS
Extr
9
YOU'LL FAVOR THE Dubon
(Say Doo-bo-nay

When pleasure experts treat extra thrills . . . they call for D ingly, this great French appet sations . . . the dry and the s
. . . the puzzling

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
MAR 15 1938

Music Lovers Given Chance To Study Symphonic Workings

Like virtually every conductor ho has come to the New York ilharmonic-Symphony Orches- a during the last 10 years, John rbirolli uses the standard seat- g arrangement for his musi- ans.

As may be seen from the ac- mpanying chart, this arrange- ent places the first and second olins in the two foremost blocs, e to the left and the other to e right of the conductor. The ellos and violas fan out behind e violin choirs. Behind them me the woodwinds and behind ese, the horns, with the percus- on instruments in the rear.

The heavy strings flank the left de, while flanking the right are be found the brasses and harps.

This arrangement has been a andard one for so long that any conductors do not know ex- tly why they use it. Obviously, wever, the placing of the musi- ans in these positions has pro- ced a blending of tone which a eat many conductors, including en the maestro, Toscanini, have und satisfactory.

Younger conductors in recent ars have attempted for reasons their own to vary this seating arrangement. Some have put the first and second violin sections together. Others have brought the violas out in front. Sometimes the bass strings are to be found on the right of the stage, although as one conductor expressed it, he prefers to have them on the left because he can keep them in view more easily.

Music-lovers who are interested not alone in the music will find it a profitable and pleasant experience to study the seating arrangements of the various orchestras which come to the Memorial. They will discover that not all the conductors are willing to stick to the standard arrangement.

At intervals The Times plans to publish other charts and descriptions dealing with the seating arrangements of the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and National symphony orchestras, which, with the New York Philharmonic, discussed here today, make up the Bushnell Concert Series. It is suggested that music-lovers save these charts for study and reference, inasmuch as a knowledge of the inner working of a symphonic organization may be a considerable aid to the appreciation of the orchestra's tonal accomplishments.

GOTHAM LIFE
NEW YORK, N. Y.
MAR 20 1938

By HENRY ALBERTS

We listened to the Music Guild rogram on WEAF last Thursday fternoon and heard the Gertrude onime Piano Quartet play Brahms' minor Quartet. It was most enjoy- ole. We hope to hear this quartet ten . . . The Boston Symphony Or- estra under the direction of Serge oussevitzky performed brilliantly st week, especially delightful was aydn's E flat Symphony no. 99 . . . osef Hoffmann was the soloist with hilharmonic Symphony. He played e Chopin E minor Concerto. The steners were thrilled . . . Rudolph Ganz acted both as conductor and pianist at the final concert of the Philharmonic's Young People's Series. As soloist Mr. Ganz played the Saint-Saens Concerto in F, while John Barbirolli conducted . . . The Federal Symphony Orchestra with Chalmers Clifton conducting at the WPA Federal Music Theatre, started a Sibelius series last Sunday evening. The audience was extremely enthusiastic over the performance . . . Emanuel List, bass, was heard at Town Hall Sunday afternoon. We like him better in

---

Scherzo, Trio
Rondo
Sonata Op. 22—So rasch wie moglich . . . . Schumann
Andantino
Scherzo-sehr rasch und markirt
Rondo. Presto.
Rhapsody No. 2 . . . . Von Dohnanyi
Gavotte—Musette . . . . Sgambati
Nocturne Op. 31 . . . . Sgambati
Prelude en forme de Blues . . . . . Tansman
Etude. D'Execution Transcendante. Lesghinka . . . . Liapounow

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 20 1938

pril 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD- TRIBUNE
MAR 22 1938

Music Notes

Boston Symphony—In its last New York [illegible] season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play symphonies by Brahms in both of its concerts in Carnegie Hall, giving the first symphony on Thursday night, March 31, and the second on Saturday afternoon, April 2. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the evening program to Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and the first New York performance of Prokofieff's second suite from his ballet "Romeo and Juliet." In the afternoon concert he will also conduct a divertimento from Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D, "La Mere," and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be played in the Boston Symphony's last concert of the season on Friday night, April 1.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES - STAR
MAR 16 1938

Q. Please give the particulars of a recent case where a musical score was photographed by radio.

A. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was scheduled to give Sibelius' Choral Symphony, The Origin of Fire, at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Part of the score which had been mailed from Berlin was lost. The Radio Corporation of America had the missing parts photographed in Berlin, put in a transmitting machine, and radioed to New York, where a receiving machine made a copy of the four sheets. The entire transmission took only a few hours.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
MAR 19 1938

PHILA. ORCHESTRA GIVES A PREMIERE

Three Noted Soloists Are Enlisted for Wagenaar Work

PROGRAM

Sibelius . . . . "Pohjola's Daughter"
Wagenaar
Concerto for Flute, Harp, 'Cello
(Georges Barrere, Carlos Salzedo, and Horace Britt, soloists)
Chausson . . Symphony in B-flat major

By LINTON MARTIN

One world premiere, graced by three gifted and distinguished soloists, and two numbers seldom played, were presented by Eugene Ormandy at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert in the Academy yesterday, when the symphony season was resumed after a week's layoff in the stop-go system intermittently adopted for the present period.

The novelty was Bernard Wagenaar's Triple Concerto for Harp, 'Cello, and Flute, with Carlos Salzedo, Horace Britt and Georges Barrere as the respective soloists. The two infrequent symphonic visitors were "Pohjola's Daughter," a Sibelius fantasia last played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little less than a year ago, and the sole symphony by the Wagner-haunted and prematurely killed French composer, Ernest Chausson.

BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In his enterprising and admirable if sometimes rather unrewarding policy of departing periodically from beaten program paths, Mr. Ormandy has been happier on occasion than with the present performance, and so, doubtless, have been some members of his audience. The Sibelius tone poem and the Chausson symphony are admittedly weak sisters in the orchestral repertoire, while the chief appeal of the Wagenaar concerto was its novelty and bizarre effects. These three works on one program unfortunately made for considerable sameness of effect in lugubrious musical moods.

The best and brightest aspects of the offering of the Wagenaar opus were the brilliant performances turned in by the several soloists, and the plentiful applause which followed its performance, though silence reigned after the separate movements. The relatively youthful Dutch composer was present in person yesterday to take a bow with the soloists, and there was a preliminary ripple of laughter when the 'cello part was missing and the flutist retrieved it offstage, placing it on the stand upside down, which might or might not have held some subtle significance about the modernistic music.

MODERNISTIC MUSIC

This flute-harp-'cello concerto is essentially modernistic chamber music placed within an orchestral frame that is often obbligato and most successful when silent, as it was most of the time yesterday.

Employing some remarkable rhythms, syncopated asides, dissonant details, and technical tricks in profusion, the composer affords almost equal opportunity for display to his several soloists, to whom he devoutly dedicated his three-way concerto. The harp gets rather the best of it, which is not unnatural, because the concerto was requested by Mr. Salzedo, who plucked his strings brilliantly yesterday, even including an effect unheard here since John the Baptist was beheaded in "Salome," by running thumb and forefinger down one string, the resultant tone emitting the effect of "u-u-rk."

VIRTUOSO VITALITY

Mr. Salzedo wrote his own cadenza. Messrs. Barrere and Britt arranged or edited theirs from the composer's suggestions or skeletonized idea. Mr. Salzedo came off triumphantly first, with Mr. Britt second, and Mr. Barrere third, which has nothing to do with the classic comment by Berlioz that "the only thing worse than a concerto for one flute is a concerto for two flutes," since only one flute was employed yesterday, and brilliantly at that.

If Mr. Wagenaar's concerto isn't beautiful (and who could say it is?) it is at least bizarre. And its performance was brilliant. What more could anybody ask?

The Chausson and Sibelius works were presented by Mr. Ormandy with fine form and flourish.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
MAR 20 1938

NO CULTURE FOR NAZIS.

NO PLACE for culture exists in the Nazi program arranged for Austria. Except for outspoken worshipers of Hitler and his regimented order, citizens must regard themselves as residents of conquered territory menaced by an army of occupation. After the tumult and the shouting die, even lukewarm supporters of Anschluss may wonder if purported advantages can offset the fear and suspicion of stern Nazi control.

The world-famous Salzburg festival will suffer from the bigotry of the Nazis. Max Reinhardt, a Jew, has been the guiding spirit of the festival since its rebirth 17 years ago. He will not direct the performances which have been a feature of these cultural exhibitions. In compliment to his directing achievements the area in front of the theater had been named Reinhardt plaza. That was offensive to the neopagan conquerors. The street signs have been taken down.

Bruno Walter has conducted some of the world's greatest orchestras in America and the capitals of Europe. As a result of the anti-Jewish campaign which accompanied the invading goose-steppers, Walter has resigned as director of the Vienna opera. Only last month the Vienna State Opera renewed his contract for three years as conductor and artistic adviser. He has been guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston, Cleveland and San Francisco symphonies and the Hollywood orchestra.

When Hitler came into power in 1933 Walter became an exile, the Nazis forbidding him to give a concert at Leipzig on the ground that his appearance would threaten "order and security." Austria received him with open arms. Now he must flee once more, if permitted, to escape an intolerance that does not spare the highest forms of cultural art.

Dr. Hermann Roebbeling has been removed as head of the old Imperial Theater at Vienna, considered one of Europe's best. All opera directors have received a questionnaire regarding ancestry. Any Jewish connection means artistic exile. The city of famous waltzes will yearn for former Austrian culture, ground under the heel of Nazi boors.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 19 1938

bold side, with its baby-bathing episode and other pranks. On Tuesday, it stood up well as music without reference to the plot. The once contentious Strauss scores, operas included, now seem primarily attractive affairs. Some of them, formerly famous for shock, are becoming celebrated for chic.

John Barbirolli and the Philharmonic-Symphony had no revivals of their own, but they did introduce to their trade a set of dances from Purcell's "The Fairy Queen"—charming music, beautifully unheavy, and played with the peculiar charm that Mr. Barbirolli always puts around intimate compositions.

"Opera Front and Back," the new book by H. Howard Taubman of the Times' music battalion, might also be called "Opera On the Record and Off," for it's a fascinating compilation of fact and the things opera people talk about when they have no fear of being quoted. The opera of the title is mostly the Metropolitan, and Mr. Taubman, a capital reporter, has seen all, knows all, and tells almost all. If you care for inside stuff retailed by a shrewd observer, get "Opera Front and Back" and have yourself a good time. If you can't identify the principals in some of the livelier episodes, perhaps you can persuade Mr. Taubman to publish a key to his stories. There are occasional confusions, such as writing "Turandot" when "La Rondine" is meant, but these can be cleaned up in the almost inevitable second edition.

For reference—and for reading—there is a valuable assortment of data on American music in Mrs. Claire Reis's "Composers in America." She writes short, factual biographies of composers, with lists of their works, and the lists themselves are full of stimulating implications. Anybody who has to do with American music ought to write Mrs. Reis a note of thanks, or at least buy her book. —Robert A. Simon erate, the symphony remains ponderous, and sometimes it hauls an idea around after the idea has had all the handling it can take. Nevertheless, Mr. Koussevitzky made the most of the latent drama in the score, and whether the ovation was for the orchestra's doings or for the music, the adventure was a success.

Eugene Ormandy, with The Philadelphia Orchestra, restored to the repertory Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," once considered somewhat on the

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 17 1938

Concert Seats Again Demanded

As if spurred by the unusually beautitful concert with which John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony closed the Bushnell Concert Series Tuesday night, subscribers to the series have sent in their renewals with greater promptness than ever before in the history of the course.

According to reports from the Bushnell Memorial, approximately 1,500 subscription renewals have already been received. Old subscribers have until Friday, April 1, the right to renew their subscriptions for the seats which they occupied this year or to apply for different seating location if they wish. After April 1, all unrenewed subscriptions will be made available to new applicants, in the order in which applications were received. New applications may be sent at any time now to the Bushnell box office.

The management of the Memorial was able to secure for the coming season a symphony course identical to the series arranged for the present season. Five of the world's major orchestras will be brought here for six symphony concerts to be given on weekday evenings at intervals from November to March.

These orchestras are the Boston Symphony (coming here twice again), the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia, Cleveland and national Symphony orchestras. Among the world-famous conductors to be brought here are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, John Barbirolli, Artur Rodzinski, Dr. Hans Kindler and Eugene Ormandy.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 19 1938

Jesus M. Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented in recital by the Fairhaven-Mattapoisett Teachers' Association in Fairhaven high school on Wednesday night at 8:15 o'clock.

Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, pianist, will give a recital in Plantations auditorium a week from Monday night at 8:15 o'clock.

The program:

Ich ruf zu dir, Herr	Bach-Busoni
Prelude in G Minor	Bach
Sonata Op 42, Moderato	Schubert
Andante poco moto
Scherzo, Trio
Rondo
Sonata Op. 22—So rasch wie moglich ...	Schumann
Andantino
Scherzo-sehr rasch und markirt
Rondo. Presto.
Rhapsody No. 2	Von Dohnanyi
Gavotte—Musette	Sgambati
Nocturne Op. 31	Sgambati
Prelude en forme de Blues	Tansman
Etude. D'Execution Transcendante. Lesghinka	Liapounow

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

MAR 20 1938

April 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 15 1938

Music Lovers Given Chance To Study Symphonic Workings

Like virtually every conductor who has come to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra during the last 10 years, John Barbirolli uses the standard seating arrangement for his musicians.

As may be seen from the accompanying chart, this arrangement places the first and second violins in the two foremost blocs, one to the left and the other to the right of the conductor. The 'cellos and violas fan out behind the violin choirs. Behind them come the woodwinds and behind these, the horns, with the percussion instruments in the rear.

The heavy strings flank the left side, while flanking the right are to be found the brasses and harps.

This arrangement has been a standard one for so long that many conductors do not know exactly why they use it. Obviously, however, the placing of the musicians in these positions has produced a blending of tone which a great many conductors, including even the maestro, Toscanini, have found satisfactory.

Younger conductors in recent years have attempted for reasons of their own to vary this seating arrangement. Some have put the first and second violin sections together. Others have brought the violas out in front. Sometimes the bass strings are to be found on the right of the stage, although as one conductor expressed it, he prefers to have them on the left because he can keep them in view more easily.

Music-lovers who are interested not alone in the music will find it a profitable and pleasant experience to study the seating arrangements of the various orchestras which come to the Memorial. They will discover that not all the conductors are willing to stick to the standard arrangement.

At intervals The Times plans to publish other charts and descriptions dealing with the seating arrangements of the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and National symphony orchestras, which, with the New York Philharmonic, discussed here today, make up the Bushnell Concert Series. It is suggested that music-lovers save these charts for study and reference, inasmuch as a knowledge of the inner working of a symphonic organization may be a considerable aid to the appreciation of the orchestra's tonal accomplishments.

GOTHAM LIFE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 20 1938

By HENRY ALBERTS

We listened to the Music Guild program on WEAF last Thursday afternoon and heard the Gertrude Bonime Piano Quartet play Brahms' G minor Quartet. It was most enjoyable. We hope to hear this quartet often . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky performed brilliantly last week, especially delightful was Haydn's E flat Symphony no. 99 . . . Josef Hoffmann was the soloist with Philharmonic Symphony. He played the Chopin E minor Concerto. The listeners were thrilled . . . Rudolph Ganz acted both as conductor and pianist at the final concert of the Philharmonic's Young People's Series. As soloist Mr. Ganz played the Saint-Saens Concerto in F, while John Barbirolli conducted . . . The Federal Symphony Orchestra with Chalmers Clifton conducting at the WPA Federal Music Theatre, started a Sibelius series last Sunday evening. The audience was extremely enthusiastic over the performance . . . Emanuel List, bass, was heard at Town Hall Sunday afternoon. We like him better in

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD- TRIBUNE

MAR 22 1938

Music Notes

Boston Symphony—In its last New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play symphonies by Brahms in both of its concerts in Carnegie Hall, giving the first symphony on Thursday night, March 31, and the second on Saturday afternoon, April 2. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the evening program to Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and the first New York performance of Prokofieff's second suite from his ballet "Romeo and Juliet." In the afternoon concert he will also conduct a divertimento from Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D, "La Mere," and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be played in the Boston Symphony's last concert of the season on Friday night, April 1.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES - STAR

MAR 16 1938

Q. Please give the particulars of a recent case where a musical score was photographed by radio.

A. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was scheduled to give Sibelius' Choral Symphony, The Origin of Fire, at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Part of the score which had been mailed from Berlin was lost. The Radio Corporation of America had the missing parts photographed in Berlin, put in a transmitting machine, and radioed to New York, where a receiving machine made a copy of the four sheets. The entire transmission took only a few hours.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

MAR 19 1938

PHILA. ORCHESTRA GIVES A PREMIERE

Three Noted Soloists Are Enlisted for Wagenaar Work

PROGRAM

Sibelius .... "Pohjola's Daughter"
Wagenaar
Concerto for Flute, Harp, 'Cello
(Georges Barrere, Carlos Salzedo, and Horace Britt, soloists)

Chausson .. Symphony in B-flat major

By LINTON MARTIN

One world premiere, graced by three gifted and distinguished soloists, and two numbers seldom played, were presented by Eugene Ormandy at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert in the Academy yesterday, when the symphony season was resumed after a week's layoff in the stop-go system intermittently adopted for the present period.

The novelty was Bernard Wagenaar's Triple Concerto for Harp, 'Cello, and Flute, with Carlos Salzedo, Horace Britt and Georges Barrere as the respective soloists. The two infrequent symphonic visitors were "Pohjola's Daughter," a Sibelius fantasia last played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little less than a year ago, and the sole symphony by the Wagner-haunted and prematurely killed French composer, Ernest Chausson.

BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In his enterprising and admirable if sometimes rather unrewarding policy of departing periodically from beaten program paths, Mr. Ormandy has been happier on occasion than with the present performance, and so, doubtless, have been some members of his audience. The Sibelius tone poem and the Chausson symphony are admittedly weak sisters in the orchestral repertoire, while the chief appeal of the Wagenaar concerto was its novelty and bizarre effects. These three works on one program unfortunately made for considerable sameness of effect in lugubrious musical moods.

The best and brightest aspects of the offering of the Wagenaar opus were the brilliant performances turned in by the several soloists, and the plentiful applause which followed its performance, though silence reigned after the separate movements. The relatively youthful Dutch composer was present in person yesterday to take a bow with the soloists, and there was a preliminary ripple of laughter when the 'cello part was missing and the flutist retrieved it offstage, placing it on the stand upside down, which might or might not have held some subtle significance about the modernistic music.

MODERNISTIC MUSIC

This flute-harp-'cello concerto is essentially modernistic chamber music placed within an orchestral frame that is often obbligato and most successful when silent, as it was most of the time yesterday.

Employing some remarkable rhythms, syncopated asides, dissonant details, and technical tricks in profusion, the composer affords almost equal opportunity for display to his several soloists, to whom he devoutly dedicated his three-way concerto. The harp gets rather the best of it, which is not unnatural, because the concerto was requested by Mr. Salzedo, who plucked his strings brilliantly yesterday, even including an effect unheard here since John the Baptist was beheaded in "Salome," by running thumb and forefinger down one string, the resultant tone emitting the effect of "u-u-rk."

VIRTUOSO VITALITY

Mr. Salzedo wrote his own cadenza. Messrs. Barrere and Britt arranged or edited theirs from the composer's suggestions or skeletonized idea. Mr. Salzedo came off triumphantly first, with Mr. Britt second, and Mr. Barrere third, which has nothing to do with the classic comment by Berlioz that "the only thing worse than a concerto for one flute is a concerto for two flutes," since only one flute was employed yesterday, and brilliantly at that.

If Mr. Wagenaar's concerto isn't beautiful (and who could say it is?) it is at least bizarre. And its performance was brilliant. What more could anybody ask?

The Chausson and Sibelius works were presented by Mr. Ormandy with fine form and flourish.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

MAR 20 1938

NO CULTURE FOR NAZIS.

NO PLACE for culture exists in the Nazi program arranged for Austria. Except for outspoken worshipers of Hitler and his regimented order, citizens must regard themselves as residents of conquered territory menaced by an army of occupation. After the tumult and the shouting die, even lukewarm supporters of Anschluss may wonder if purported advantages can offset the fear and suspicion of stern Nazi control.

The world-famous Salzburg festival will suffer from the bigotry of the Nazis. Max Reinhardt, a Jew, has been the guiding spirit of the festival since its rebirth 17 years ago. He will not direct the performances which have been a feature of these cultural exhibitions. In compliment to his directing achievements the area in front of the theater had been named Reinhardt plaza. That was offensive to the neopagan conquerors. The street signs have been taken down.

Bruno Walter has conducted some of the world's greatest orchestras in America and the capitals of Europe. As a result of the anti-Jewish campaign which accompanied the invading goose-steppers, Walter has resigned as director of the Vienna opera. Only last month the Vienna State Opera renewed his contract for three years as conductor and artistic adviser. He has been guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston, Cleveland and San Francisco symphonies and the Hollywood orchestra.

When Hitler came into power in 1933 Walter became an exile, the Nazis forbidding him to give a concert at Leipzig on the ground that his appearance would threaten "order and security." Austria received him with open arms. Now he must flee once more, if permitted, to escape an intolerance that does not spare the highest forms of cultural art.

Dr. Hermann Roebbeling has been removed as head of the old Imperial Theater at Vienna, considered one of Europe's best. All opera directors have received a questionnaire regarding ancestry. Any Jewish connection means artistic exile. The city of famous waltzes will yearn for former Austrian culture, ground under the heel of Nazi boors.

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 19 1938

205

bold side, with its baby-bathing episode and other pranks. On Tuesday, it stood up well as music without reference to the plot. The once contentious Strauss scores, operas included, now seem primarily attractive affairs. Some of them, formerly famous for shock, are becoming celebrated for chic.

John Barbirolli and the Philharmonic-Symphony had no revivals of their own, but they did introduce to their trade a set of dances from Purcell's "The Fairy Queen"—charming music, beautifully unheavy, and played with the peculiar charm that Mr. Barbirolli always puts around intimate compositions.

"Opera Front and Back," the new book by H. Howard Taubman of the Times' music battalion, might also be called "Opera On the Record and Off," for it's a fascinating compilation of fact and the things opera people talk about when they have no fear of being quoted. The opera of the title is mostly the Metropolitan, and Mr. Taubman, a capital reporter, has seen all, knows all, and tells almost all. If you care for inside stuff retailed by a shrewd observer, get "Opera Front and Back" and have yourself a good time. If you can't identify the principals in some of the livelier episodes, perhaps you can persuade Mr. Taubman to publish a key to his stories. There are occasional confusions, such as writing "Turandot" when "La Rondine" is meant, but these can be cleaned up in the almost inevitable second edition.

For reference—and for reading—there is a valuable assortment of data on American music in Mrs. Claire Reis's "Composers in America." She writes short, factual biographies of composers, with lists of their works, and the lists themselves are full of stimulating implications. Anybody who has to do with American music ought to write Mrs. Reis a note of thanks, or at least buy her book. —Robert A. Simon

To the unregenerate, the symphony remains ponderous, and sometimes it hauls an idea around after the idea has had all the handling it can take. Nevertheless, Mr. Koussevitzky made the most of the latent drama in the score, and whether the ovation was for the orchestra's doings or for the music, the adventure was a success.

Eugene Ormandy, with The Philadelphia Orchestra, restored to the repertory Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica," once considered somewhat on the

---

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Concert Seats Again Demanded

As if spurred by the unusually beautiful concert with which John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic-Symphony closed the Bushnell Concert Series Tuesday night, subscribers to the series have sent in their renewals with greater promptness than ever before in the history of the course.

According to reports from the Bushnell Memorial, approximately 1,500 subscription renewals have already been received. Old subscribers have untli Friday, April 1, the right to renew their subscriptions for the seats which they occupied this year or to apply for different seating location if they wish. After April 1, all unrenewed subscriptions will be made available to new applicants, in the order in which applications were received. New applications may be sent at any time now to the Bushnell box office.

The management of the Memorial was able to secure for the coming season a symphony course identical to the series arranged for the present season. Five of the world's major orchestras will be brought here for six symphony concerts to be given on weekday evenings at intervals from November to March.

These orchestras are the Boston Symphony (coming here twice again), the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, the Philadelphia, Cleveland and national Symphony orchestras. Among the world-famous conductors to be brought here are Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, John Barbirolli, Artur Rodzinski, Dr. Hans Kindler and Eugene Ormandy.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

Jesus M. Sanroma, pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be presented in recital by the Fairhaven-Mattapoisett Teachers' Association in Fairhaven high school on Wednesday night at 8:15 o'clock.

Mme. Avis Bliven Charbonnel, pianist, will give a recital in Plantations auditorium a week from Monday night at 8:15 o'clock.

The program:

Ich ruf zu dir, Herr .... Bach-Busoni
Prelude in G Minor .... Bach
Sonata Op 42. Moderato .... Schubert
Andante poco moto
Scherzo, Trio
Rondo
Sonata Op. 22—So rasch wie moglich ...
.... Schumann
Andantino
Scherzo-sehr rasch und markirt
Rondo. Presto.
Rhapsody No. 2 .... Von Dohnanyi
Gavotte—Musette .... Sgambati
Nocturne Op. 31 .... Sgambati
Prelude en forme de Blues ...... Tansman
Etude. D'Execution Transcendante. Lesghinka .... Liapounow

---

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

April 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Music Lovers Given Chance To Study Symphonic Workings

Like virtually every conductor who has come to the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra during the last 10 years, John Barbirolli uses the standard seating arrangement for his musicians.

As may be seen from the accompanying chart, this arrangement places the first and second violins in the two foremost blocs, one to the left and the other to the right of the conductor. The 'cellos and violas fan out behind the violin choirs. Behind them come the woodwinds and behind these, the horns, with the percussion instruments in the rear.

The heavy strings flank the left side, while flanking the right are to be found the brasses and harps.

This arrangement has been a standard one for so long that many conductors do not know exactly why they use it. Obviously, however, the placing of the musicians in these positions has produced a blending of tone which a great many conductors, including even the maestro, Toscanini, have found satisfactory.

Younger conductors in recent years have attempted for reasons of their own to vary this seating arrangement. Some have put the first and second violin sections together. Others have brought the violas out in front. Sometimes the bass strings are to be found on the right of the stage, although as one conductor expressed it, he prefers to have them on the left because he can keep them in view more easily.

Music-lovers who are interested not alone in the music will find it a profitable and pleasant experience to study the seating arrangements of the various orchestras which come to the Memorial. They will discover that not all the conductors are willing to stick to the standard arrangement.

At intervals The Times plans to publish other charts and descriptions dealing with the seating arrangements of the Boston, Philadelphia, Cleveland and National symphony orchestras, which, with the New York Philharmonic, discussed here today, make up the Bushnell Concert Series. It is suggested that music-lovers save these charts for study and reference, inasmuch as a knowledge of the inner working of a symphonic organization may be a considerable aid to the appreciation of the orchestra's tonal accomplishments.

GOTHAM LIFE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

MAR 20 1938

By HENRY ALBERTS

We listened to the Music Guild program on WEAF last Thursday afternoon and heard the Gertrude Bonime Piano Quartet play Brahms' G minor Quartet. It was most enjoyable. We hope to hear this quartet often . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky performed brilliantly last week, especially delightful was Haydn's E flat Symphony no. 99 . . . Josef Hoffmann was the soloist with Philharmonic Symphony. He played the Chopin E minor Concerto. The listeners were thrilled . . . Rudolph Ganz acted both as conductor and pianist at the final concert of the Philharmonic's Young People's Series. As soloist Mr. Ganz played the Saint-Saens Concerto in F, while John Barbirolli conducted . . . The Federal Symphony Orchestra with Chalmers Clifton conducting at the WPA Federal Music Theatre, started a Sibelius series last Sunday evening. The audience was extremely enthusiastic over the performance . . . Emanuel List, bass, was heard at Town Hall Sunday afternoon. We like him better in

---

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD- TRIBUNE

Music Notes

Boston Symphony—In its last New York visit of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will play symphonies by Brahms in both of its concerts in Carnegie Hall, giving the first symphony on Thursday night, March 31, and the second on Saturday afternoon, April 2. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the first part of the evening program to Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, and the first New York performance of Prokofieff's second suite from his ballet "Romeo and Juliet." In the afternoon concert he will also conduct a divertimento from Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." C. P. E. Bach's concerto in D, "La Mere," and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony will be played in the Boston Symphony's last concert of the season on Friday night, April 1.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES - STAR

MAR 16 193

Q. Please give the particulars of a recent case where a musical score was photographed by radio.

A. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky was scheduled to give Sibelius' Choral Symphony, The Origin of Fire, at a Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. Part of the score which had been mailed from Berlin was lost. The Radio Corporation of America had the missing parts phtographed in Berlin, put in a transmitting machine, and radioed to New York, where a receiving machine made a copy of the four sheets. The entire transmission took only a few hours.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER

PHILA. ORCHESTRA GIVES A PREMIERE

Three Noted Soloists Are Enlisted for Wagenaar Work

PROGRAM

Sibelius .... "Pohjola's Daughter"
Wagenaar
Concerto for Flute, Harp, 'Cello
(Georges Barrere, Carlos Salzedo, and Horace Britt, soloists)
Chausson .. Symphony in B-flat major

By LINTON MARTIN

One world premiere, graced by three gifted and distinguished soloists, and two numbers seldom played, were presented by Eugene Ormandy at the Philadelphia Orchestra concert in the Academy yesterday, when the symphony season was resumed after a week's layoff in the stop-go system intermittently adopted for the present period.

The novelty was Bernard Wagenaar's Triple Concerto for Harp, 'Cello, and Flute, with Carlos Salzedo, Horace Britt and Georges Barrere as the respective soloists. The two infrequent symphonic visitors were "Pohjola's Daughter," a Sibelius fantasia last played here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra a little less than a year ago, and the sole symphony by the Wagner-haunted and prematurely killed French composer, Ernest Chausson.

BRILLIANTLY PLAYED

In his enterprising and admirable if sometimes rather unrewarding policy of departing periodically from beaten program paths, Mr. Ormandy has been happier on occasion than with the present performance, and so, doubtless, have been some members of his audience. The Sibelius tone poem and the Chausson symphony are admittedly weak sisters in the orchestral repertoire, while the chief appeal of the Wagenaar concerto was its novelty and bizarre effects. These three works on one program unfortunately made for considerable sameness of effect in lugubrious musical moods.

The best and brightest aspects of the offering of the Wagenaar opus were the brilliant performances turned in by the several soloists, and the plentiful applause which followed its performance, though silence reigned after the separate movements. The relatively youthful Dutch composer was present in person yesterday to take a bow with the soloists, and there was a preliminary ripple of laughter when the 'cello part was missing and the flutist retrieved it offstage, placing it on the stand upside down, which might or might not have held some subtle significance about the modernistic music.

MODERNISTIC MUSIC

This flute-harp-'cello concerto is essentially modernistic chamber music placed within an orchestral frame that is often obbligato and most successful when silent as it was most of the time yesterday.

Employing some remarkable rhythms, syncopated asides, dissonant details, and technical tricks in profusion, the composer affords almost equal opportunity for display to his several soloists, to whom he devoutly dedicated his three-way concerto. The harp gets rather the best of it, which is not unnatural, because the concerto was requested by Mr. Salzedo, who plucked his strings brilliantly yesterday, even including an effect unheard here since John the Baptist was beheaded in "Salome," by running thumb and forefinger down one string, the resultant tone emitting the effect of "u-u-rk."

VIRTUOSO VITALITY

Mr. Salzedo wrote his own cadenza. Messrs. Barrere and Britt arranged or edited theirs from the composer's suggestions or skeletonized idea. Mr. Salzedo came off triumphantly first, with Mr. Britt second, and Mr. Barrere third, which has nothing to do with the classic comment by Berlioz that "the only thing worse than a concerto for one flute is a concerto for two flutes," since only one flute was employed yesterday, and brilliantly at that.

If Mr. Wagenaar's concerto isn't beautiful (and who could say it is?) it is at least bizarre. And its performance was brilliant. What more could anybody ask?

The Chausson and Sibelius works were presented by Mr. Ormandy with fine form and flourish.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR

NO CULTURE FOR NAZIS.

NO PLACE for culture exists in the Nazi program arranged for Austria. Except for outspoken worshipers of Hitler and his regimented order, citizens must regard themselves as residents of conquered territory menaced by an army of occupation. After the tumult and the shouting die, even lukewarm supporters of Anschluss may wonder if purported advantages can offset the fear and suspicion of stern Nazi control.

The world-famous Salzburg festival will suffer from the bigotry of the Nazis. Max Reinhardt, a Jew, has been the guiding spirit of the festival since its rebirth 17 years ago. He will not direct the performances which have been a feature of these cultural exhibitions. In compliment to his directing achievements the area in front of the theater had been named Reinhardt plaza. That was offensive to the neopagan conquerors. The street signs have been taken down.

Bruno Walter has conducted some of the world's greatest orchestras in America and the capitals of Europe. As a result of the anti-Jewish campaign which accompanied the invading goose-steppers, Walter has resigned as director of the Vienna opera. Only last month the Vienna State Opera renewed his contract for three years as conductor and artistic adviser. He has been guest conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony, the Boston, Cleveland and San Francisco symphonies and the Hollywood orchestra.

When Hitler came into power in 1933 Walter became an exile, the Nazis forbidding him to give a concert at Leipzig on the ground that his appearance would threaten "order and security." Austria received him with open arms. Now he must flee once more, if permitted, to escape an intolerance that does not spare the highest forms of cultural art.

Dr. Hermann Roebbeling has been removed as head of the old Imperial Theater at Vienna, considered one of Europe's best. All opera directors have received a questionnaire regarding ancestry. Any Jewish connection means artistic exile. The city of famous waltzes will yearn for former Austrian culture, ground under the heel of Nazi boors.

2-26

NEWARK, N. J.
CALL

In the Realm of Music

Jerseyites in Schola Cantorum

By Marguerite Krahenbuhl.

A group of New Jersey men and women will sing with the Schola Cantorum Wednesday night in Carnegie Hall, when the most famous American choral ensemble will perform Bach's "Passion According to St. John." Hugh Ross, completing his 11th season with the chorus, will direct the Passion, sung with great success for the first time last year in New York.

Since membership in the Schola Cantorum is one of the most coveted honors among singers, the presence of New Jersey voices is a considerable compliment to our musical centers. The great Toscanini regards the Schola as the best of choral groups and evidenced his approval of the organization during rehearsals for the recent production of Beethoven's Ninth. At the first hearing of the chorus with his NBC Orchestra the dynamic conductor said simply, "Bon," high compliment from the volatile Italian.

Many of the singers from this state have been with the Schola Cantorum for years, some even sang under Kurt Schindler, the founder. The Jerseymen include Thomas Connell and Mrs. Charles Edsall of East Orange, Mrs. C. D. Decker of Orange, Mrs. William Krebs of Hoboken, Vincent MacDonald of Jersey City, Grace Graves of Rochelle Park, Wilma Baer of Maywood, J. Russell O'Brien of West New York and Mannie Canter of Bayonne.

The Schola Cantorum's reputation for singing out of the ordinary programs, and of recognizing new composers, is no attempt, Mr. Ross insists, to play American music because it is composed by Americans.

"I don't believe in such a practice," he said. "If the music doesn't stand up by itself, it is not good for America. We don't put on certain numbers just for the names, but for their merit."

The director, who is head of the Westchester Music Festival, listed the names of Copeland, Dukelsky, Bingham, Loeffler and Fairchild as examples of modern music that "stands on its own feet." Among outstanding works sung by the Schola have been Stravinsky's "Persepone," Glinka's "Life of the Czar," Walton's "Belchazzaar's Feast," Bloch's "Sacred Service," Seth Bingham's "Wilderness Stone," Percy Grainger's "Tribute to Foster" and Thompson's "Four Odes of Horace."

In the eyes of its director, the Schola Cantorum provides a "colorful kind of existence" for its members. The ensemble is regarded in Manhattan as an asset to musical and civic functions. It sang at the opening of Radio City, has performed great choral works with leading orchestras directed by Toscanini and Koussevitzky and has appeared in memorials like the recent Blair Fairchild program in Town Hall.

The educational values, from a musical standpoint, of singing with the group, thinks Mr. Ross, are incalculable. The singers are always learning something new, they become familiar with works in different languages, besides receiving an intense drilling in musical phrasing and understanding of ensemble singing. Many of the singers, Mr. Ross revealed, would have been unable to obtain any musical training during bad times if they had not been members of the Schola Cantorum.

Not any one is acceptable for the chorus. Every voice is given a severe test and prospective singers must not only qualify in tone production, but must also possess a range of about two octaves, a good ear and must be competent readers. All these are necessary, said Mr. Ross, not only for the general excellence of the group, but because there is often so little time to prepare concert numbers. The Verdi Requiem for instance, of which the Schola gave a stirring rendition under Toscanini recently, was in rehearsal only five weeks. Practice is three times a week in a season that extends from September through April.

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Boulanger At State April 6, 7

NADIA BOULANGER, distinguished French composer, organist, teacher and conductor, will be the guest of the music department at Ohio State university on Wednesday and Thursday, April 6 and 7. On Thursday evening, April 7, she will lecture and conduct a concert by the university's small chorus in University hall chapel.

Of Mlle. Boulanger's unique position in contemporary music, Herbert Elwell, in February issue of Modern Music, has this to say:

"It is not easy to measure or even to define Mlle. Boulanger's influence for it has been manifested in many ways that do not fall within the established categories of musical attainment. But without doubt it is potent, pervasive and altogether exceptional in the revelation of a tremendously vital personality.

HER career is without parallel, not only because it is a woman's but because it embraces such varied and at the same time such positively directed activity. The only figure in music history at all suggestive as a prototype is Clara Wieck Schumann, and even here the differences are probably greater than the similarities."

Mlle. Boulanger has been in the United States since the first of the year lecturing and Radcliffe and Wellesley are giving a series of Saturday morning broadcasts locally over WCOL. Recently she appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Following is the program for her Thursday evening concert at O. S. U.:

I

Palestrina—Adoramus Te
Lotti—Vere Langores Nostras
Gibbons—The Silver Swan
Morley—Fire, Fire My Heart

II

Heinrich Schlutz—Magnificat

III

Lili Boulanger (August 1893-March 1918)—Vielle Priere Bouddhique
Pie Jesu
Psalm XXIV

Mary Davis, senior in the department of music, will sing the soprano solo "Pie Jesu."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 23 1938

Prokofieff to Spare His Baton in Boston

By the Associated Press.

BOSTON, March 23.—Because the public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer said, "why should I break my baton? That's why I'm gonig to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them but give them simple things."

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

A short time after he had given a lecture in one of Boston's schools of music, Jacques Hoffman, musician and conductor, and one of the State's leading musicians, accidentally fell on some steps and suffered injuries which caused his death yesterday. For 47 years he was first violin in the Boston Symphony orchestra and also acted as concert master at the "Pops."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

PROVIDENCE SYMPHONY

The Providence Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Wassili Leps, will give its last program of the season in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Hans Wiener and 38 of his dancers will assist.

The overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," by Glinka, has first place on the program. Lively and melodious, is the composition by which Glinka is most widely known. A poem by Poushkin inspired the opera. The poet was to have written the libretto but he was killed in a duel before he had worked much on it. However, a libretto was prepared and the music was composed. The opera did not succeed, but the brilliant overture finds favor everywhere. Glinka, who lived from 1803 to 1857, was much interested in the folk music of his native Russia.

The next wor kwill be "The Bee," by Pavel Bytovetski, who is one of the violinists of the orchestra.

The overture to "Romeo and Juliet" and excerpts from the "Nutcracker Suite," by Tchaikovsky, will be performed. The overture was written in 1869, and was performed first at a concert of the Musical Society in Moscow, when Nicholas Rubinstein conducted. Subsequently it was revised. The music tells the story of the play—the influence of Friar Laurence, the feud between Montagus and Capulets, the love-scene, the final tragedy.

The "Nutcracker Suite" ballet is based on a fairy tale about a poor girl who dreams on Christmas night that a nutcracker comes to life as a romantic prince, with whom she flies away to the land of the Sugar-Plum Fairy. The orchestra will play the March, the Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy, the Trepak (a Russian dance), the Dance of the Flutes, and the Waltz of the Flower.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" will be performed by the orchestra and the dancers. The music was written by Moussorgsky for the piano, and was orchestrated by Ravel at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work is descriptive of some pictures painted by Victor Hartman, a friend of Moussorgsky. Mr. Wiener has created a choreographic suite in "five promenades and 10 pictures." The pictures are Gnomes, The Old Castle, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of the Chickens in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg, and Schmuyle; Limoges; the Market Place; Catacombs, A Hut on Fowl's Legs, and The Great Gate at Kiev.

Mr. Wiener is head of the dance department at Mary C. Wheeler School. He has studied dancing in Austria, Germany and the Orient. He came to this country in 1928, establishing a school there and later going to Boston. The suite to be danced tomorrow night was originated for the Boston "Pops" concerts three years ago, and was repeated by request last spring.

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
HERALD
MAR 22 1938

MAJOR SYMPHONY BAND SLATED HERE

National Symphony Has a Rating Among Leading U. S. Orchestras

The National Symphony orchestra, which plays a concert here on Thursday is today spoken of as "one of the major American symphony orchestras" not because of a complimentary title given it by friends and backers in Washington but because it has earned and won that designation from admirers in other cities.

Whenever the National Symphony goes on tour it crosses the paths of other great American orchestras, such as the Philadelphia Orchestra, the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and the Boston Symphony. At Hartford, Conn., for example, the National Symphony under its conductor, Dr. Hans Kindler, is playing for the third consecutive year on a series devoted solely to concerts by the high-ranking symphonic organizations of the land. The Washington orchestra's reception there was one of the most enthusiastic it ever received.

The National Symphony played also in Boston's Symphony Hall, home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and achieved a marked success there. It was chosen from among all the symphonies of the land to appear last April in Indianapolis to give a series of concerts before thousands attending the annual convention of the National Federation of Music Clubs.

The effect of the orchestra's playing in Quebec caused one critic to write that "not since Toscanini appeared has an audience in this city offered such acclaim to an orchestra."

Music lovers of Spartanburg will truly hear a "major American symphony" when the National Symphony plays under Dr. Kindler on Thursday. The concert will be given at Converse college.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
21 1938

Music

Melchior Celebrates 48th Birthday by Excellent Program Before Overflow Audience at Fall River. Hans Wiener and Dancers to Assist at Providence Symphony Concert.

By G. Y. Loveridge

Lauritz Melchior, the gigantic Danish tenor, gave a recital in Ste. Anne's auditorium, Fall River, yesterday afternoon. It was the last concert of the Fall River Civic Music Association season; extra chairs were required in the large auditorium, and even then there were many standing.

It was Mr. Melchior's 48th birthday anniversary. He celebrated by giving a fine performance.

Nobody could have a more agreeable manner than this hero of Wagnerian wars. He increased his program generously, waited without annoyance for everybody to find a place after intermission, and shared the applause liberally with his accompanist, Ignace Strasfogel. Mr. Strasfogel played several solos.

Mr. Melchior's program comprised German, Scandinavian and English songs, and arias from operas. Like most singers whose chief business is opera, he was at his best when he could put on the pressure and declaim in epic breadth of tone. The more intimate utterances fettered him somewhat. Not that they were not sung with precise regard for style, but only once or twice did they attain much emotional depth.

Mr. Melchior sings without visible effort. His voice has a splendid firmness and power, a ringing dramatic quality that cannot be mistaken. He began his career as a baritone, and his tones still are enhanced by some of the weight and color more characteristic of the deeper voice.

"The Swan," by Grieg, and "Zueignung," by Richard Strauss, were delivered with particular beauty of tone and shading, and with a moving sincerity. The artist pleased his audience likewise with the familiar serenade of Schubert, and with "Love Went a-Riding," by Bridge. However, it was his final program item that brought perhaps the most stirring response. It was Siegmund's love song from "Die Walkure." Mr. Melchior gave it poignancy and intensity, and made it sound as fresh and vibrant as though he had not already sung it nobody knows how many times.

Mr. Strasfogel played best the Phantasy Impromptu, by Chopin. His tone was poetic, and his command of the keyboard ample. He was heartily applauded.

The program:

Majsang	Lembcke
En Svane	Grieg
Svartar Rosor	Sibelius
Tonerna	Sjoeberg
Mr. Melchior
Des Abends (At Evening)	Schumann
Aufschwung (Soaring)	Schumann
Mr. Strasfogel
Der Doppelganger	Schubert
Der Atlas	Schubert
Standchen	Schubert
Mr. Melchior
Into the Light	La Forge
Love Went a-Riding	Frank Bridge
Do Not Go My Love	Hageman
Mr. Melchior
Phantasy Impromptu	Chopin
Mr. Strasfogel
Heimliche Aufforderung	Strauss
Zueignung	Strauss
Caecilie	Strauss
Aria: Arioso de Loris (Fedora)	Giordano
Aria: Siegmund's Liebeslied (Die Walkure)	Wagner
Mr. Melchior

PROVIDENCE SYMPHONY

The Providence Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Wassili Leps, will give its last program of the season in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Hans Wiener and 38 of his dancers will assist.

The overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," by Glinka, has first place on the program. Lively and melodious, is the composition by which Glinka is most widely known. A poem by Poushkin inspired the opera. The poet was to have written the libretto but he was killed in a duel before he had worked much on it. However, a libretto was prepared and the music was composed. The opera did not succeed, but the brilliant overture finds favor everywhere. Glinka, who lived from 1803 to 1857, was much interested in the folk music of his native Russia.

The next week will be "The Bee," by Pavel Bytovetski, who is one of the violinists of the orchestra.

The overture to "Romeo and Juliet" and excerpts from the "Nutcracker Suite," by Tchaikovsky, will be performed. The overture was written in 1839, and was performed first at a concert of the Musical Society in Moscow, when Nicholas Rubinstein conducted. Subsequently it was revised. The music tells the story of the play—the influence of Friar Laurence, the feud between Montagus and Capulets, the love-scene, the final tragedy.

The "Nutcracker Suite" ballet is based on a fairy tale about a poor girl who dreams on Christmas night that a nutcracker comes to life as a romantic prince, with whom she flies away to the land of the Sugar-Plum Fairy. The orchestra will play the March, the Dance of the Sugar-Plum Fairy, the Trepak (a Russian dance), the Dance of the Flutes, and the Waltz of the Flower.

"Pictures at an Exhibition" will be performed by the orchestra and the dancers. The music was written by Moussorgsky for the piano, and was orchestrated by Ravel at the request of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work is descriptive of some pictures painted by Victor Hartman, a friend of Moussorgsky. Mr. Wiener has created a choreographic suite in "five promenades and 10 pictures." The pictures are Gnomes, The Old Castle, Tuileries, Bydlo, Ballet of the Chickens in Their Shells, Samuel Goldenburg, and Schmuyle; Limoges: the Market Place; Catacombs, A Hut on Fowl's Legs, and The Great Gate at Kiev.

Mr. Wiener is head of the dance department at Mary C. Wheeler School. He has studied dancing in Austria, Germany and the Orient. He came to this country in 1928, establishing a school there and later going to Boston. The suite to be danced tomorrow night was originated for the Boston "Pops" concerts three years ago, and was repeated by request last spring.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

Symphony Orchestra program by Mr. John B. Archer, auspices of Monday Morning Musical Club, Providence Public Library, 4; tea will follow in the studios of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

April 4 — Lecture-film, "Jungle's Calling," Mrs. Martin Johnson, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15.

April 5—Concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15.

BILL BOARD
CINCINATTI, OHIO
MAR 19 1938

Classikers Woo Cats

NEW YORK, March 12.—Long-haired Jose Iturbi and Nadia Boulanger both admitted last week they were slightly more than alligatorish on the subject of swing. Iturbi said: "The swing of today is nothing more nor less than the jazz of 1920—dressed up a little bit."

Mlle. Boulanger, well-known French conductor, preparing for a guest wave with the Boston Symphony Ork, said: "I could listen to your Cab Calloway without so much as a shudder and even with a certain positive enjoyment." However, la Boulanger's choice of a "hot" musician will undoubtedly draw on her head the epithet of "icky" from the hep cats.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR [illegible]

707

Left, Miss Frances Brockman, 23, of Eugene, Oregon, concert mistress. Right, Olivia Carter Hall of Cambridge, 14-year-old harpist, who appeared yesterday afternoon in the concert in the Auditorium given by the New England Conservatory Orchestra.

MUSIC STUDENTS ENTERTAIN

REST

TYMPANI

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

Young Musicians Play With Enthusiasm

N. E. Conservatory Concert Well Received; Sanroma Assisting Artist Here

By TYRA LUNDBERG FULLER

A spirit of fresh young enthusiasm distinguished the concert given in Worcester Memorial Auditorium yesterday afternoon by the New England Conservatory Orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and a member of the conservatory faculty, as assisting artist.

The audience might have been more numerous, but scarcely more enthusiastic, and the eighty-odd students that composed the Orchestra must have felt inspired to do their best. Whatever their inspiration, they played with a quality of tone and performance that would do credit to a professional orchestra. Wallace Goodrich, director of the Conservatory, who directed the concert, had every right to feel pleased and happy.

Sanroma Honored

Mr. Sanroma, vital young artist of the pianoforte, was signally honored after his performance of the MacDowell "Concerto No. 2 in D Minor," with the Orchestra. Again and again he appeared to make his bow to an appreciative and insistent audience. Again and again he shook hands with the director and with the concertmeister, and brought the entire Orchestra to its feet. But—artistically speaking—we are glad that Mr. Sanroma adhered to the tradition of no encores on a symphony program. As a matter of personal preference, nothing could have been more delightful or welcome than an encore—an opportunity to follow again those powerful, agile and flexible fingers as they moved over the keyboard with an artistry that was sure and brilliant. But Mr. Sanroma is no stranger to Worcester music lovers for he has played here more than once in the Art Museum chamber concert programs, and he was soloist with the Worcester Music Festival in 1932.

First on the program was the third Overture to Beethoven's "Leonore," and from the delicate, tuneful beginning to the triumphant finale that follows the dramatic off-stage trumpet call, it was plain to the audience that here was an orchestra in no sense amateurish. Those who had come with the sense of "helping a good cause," or merely "to hear Sanroma" remained to enjoy the concert.

The Last Spring

Grieg's lovely "The Last Spring," woven so beautifully about his "Springtide" song, came next and was followed by the first movement of G. W. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta in D major," a most appropriate number to be included on a Conservatory program since the Sinfonietta—as the composer himself stated—was written for the orchestra of the New England Conservatory.

Closing the first half of the program was a group of Johann Strauss' "Waltzes: Wine, Woman and Song," and listening once more to those appealingly lovely strains, again came the thought that modern composers surely owe much of their inspiration to the unsurpassable music of the "Waltz King."

The MacDowell Concerto opened the second half of the program, salvos of applause following the close of each movement, the "Larghetto calmato," "Presto giocoso," in fast and merry mood, and the final movement, "Largo; molto allegro; presto."

Richard Wagner's splendid "Prelude" to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," was the grand close to a perfectly grand concert.

First Concert Given Here

The concert, the first ever given in Worcester by the Conservatory Orchestra, was sponsored by the Conservatory Alumni Club of Worcester county for the benefit of the scholarship fund.

Worcester county members of the 95-piece orchestra are Miss Florence Smith of Milford and Albert Seely of Athol, second violinists; Oscar Tourtellotte of Sutton, oboist, and Chester Kuniholm of Gardner, clarinetist.

Ages of the players are in the main between 18 and 25. Some of the instructors of various instruments, however, also play in the orchestra, including Clement Lenom, oboe instructor, who is 73. Youngest player is Olivia Carter Hall, 14, of Cambridge, harpist. Because of her age, Clarence H. Corning of Boston, trustee in charge of the orchestra, was forced to obtain a special permit from City Hall to allow her to play.

Miss Hall is a pupil of Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her predecessor with the conservatory orchestra, Louise Kane, is now a harpist with the Boston Symphony, and its only woman player.

Among the patrons and patronesses of the concert was Mrs. Aldus C. Higgins, who is also trustee of the conservatory. She was chairman of the general committee. Philip R. Alden of Walpole, president of the board of trustees, attended.

In the audience were members of the West Boylston Street Military Band and the newly organized Greendale Community Band.

Following the concert, the conservatory alumni club entertained at a tea in Hotel Bancroft.

Miss M. Marguerite Morrison, president of the Worcester County Club, and Mrs. Harold G. Rader, vice-president, poured. Servers were Mrs. Clarence E. Longval and Misses Gladys J. Coyle, Marion Donohue, Margaret M. Hogan, Rosalynd C. Oriani and Marie Madigan of Hopkinton. Yellow and pink Spring flowers decorated the tea table.

Hostesses were Miss Edna C. Gauch, supervisor of music in the public schools; Miss Mary M. Donohue and Mrs. Paul G. Ryder of Uxbridge, members of the club.

Special guests were Mr. and Mrs. Philip R. Allen, the former president of the board of trustees of the conservatory; Clarence H. Corming, financial secretary of the conservatory.

The sponsor committee was Mrs. Aldus C. Higgins, chairman, Arvid C. Anderson, Harry C. Coley, Dr. Wilger L. Jones, W. Karl Lations, Hamilton B. Wood and Miss Morrison.

CALL

MAR 11 1938

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, eminent French woman conductor who will make a guest appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, thinks that jazz is an excellent thing in itself. She says: "I could listen to your Cab Calloway without so much as a shudder, and even with a certain positive enjoyment"... Wallace Jones, trumpet player extraordinary, will join the Duke Ellington orchestra before it opens its engagement at the Cotton Club in March.

Although he has composed dozens of hit songs, ranging from "Mood Indigo" and "Sophisticated Lady" to "Caravan" and "Azure," and although he has been featured with his orchestra at the famous Cotton Club annually for the last decade, Duke Ellington has written a complete musical score for a Cotton Club show for the first time.

Prokofiev, Here for Concerts, Hopeful Over Music Trends

Trans. Mar. 23/38

Leading Russian Composer Says He Is Not a Communist but Is Satisfied with the Soviet

Serge Prokofiev, leading composer of Soviet Russia, is not a Communist, by his own word, but he is not dissatisfied with conditions of music and musicians in USSR.

In Boston to give a sort of one-man show at the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—playing the piano and conducting in a program of his own music—he said he was "too busy" to undertake the heavy demands made on a Communist in the Soviet Union.

He had some uncomplimentary things to say about audiences in general and Boston audiences in particular.

His programs for Friday and Saturday consist of four works which, he says, are not among his "most serious things." Two of the latter were played here in recent years without success—"Four Portraits" and the Fourth Symphony. The latter was commissioned for the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Orchestra but was greeted with the sneers accorded an art work written for an occasion. But Prokofiev says he had been working on it more than a year before he had received the commission from Dr. Koussevitzky.

Prokofiev's Third Symphony and "Chant Symphonique," which he regards among his best efforts, have not been given a chance in Boston. The Boston public will have little difficulty, he intimates, with the program of this week, consisting of two earlier works—the First Piano Concerto and Suite from the ballet, "Chout"—and two more recent but light compositions. One is the Second Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," which makes no attempt to be strictly symphonic. The other is "Peter and the Wolf," a symphonic fairy tale written for children. The purpose was to acquaint children painlessly with the orchestral instruments. A narrator identifies the several instruments of the orchestra, each of which represents a given character throughout the composition. Richard Hale will be the narrator in Boston, employing an English translation of the original Russian.

Prokofiev speaks informatively and hopefully about contemporary trends in music, particularly in the Soviet Union. The problem there arises, he says, from the great new audiences filling concert halls and opera houses. Instead of giving these audiences simply a diet of the classics or current music written in the style of the classics, Russian composers are writing simple music but "in the idiom of our time." On that foundation the audiences can prepare for the more complicated music of the present day.

The films, Prokofiev said, are not merely an instrument of education; they are to be regarded as a contemporary form of art. The same goes for animated cartoons, which he thinks have a "very great future." The music for films, for the most part, still is unsatisfactory, he thinks, because, while Hollywood producers have got to the point of employing serious composers, they insist on music written in old-fashioned style.

"Snow White" he regards as a "marvellous picture, and the music is not very offending!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

MAR 23 1938

TOO DEEP FOR BOSTON

Prokofieff Won't Play His Fourth Symphony There.

BOSTON, March 23 (A. P.).—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer said, "why should I break my baton?

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious numbers that have been performed in Boston were not understood.

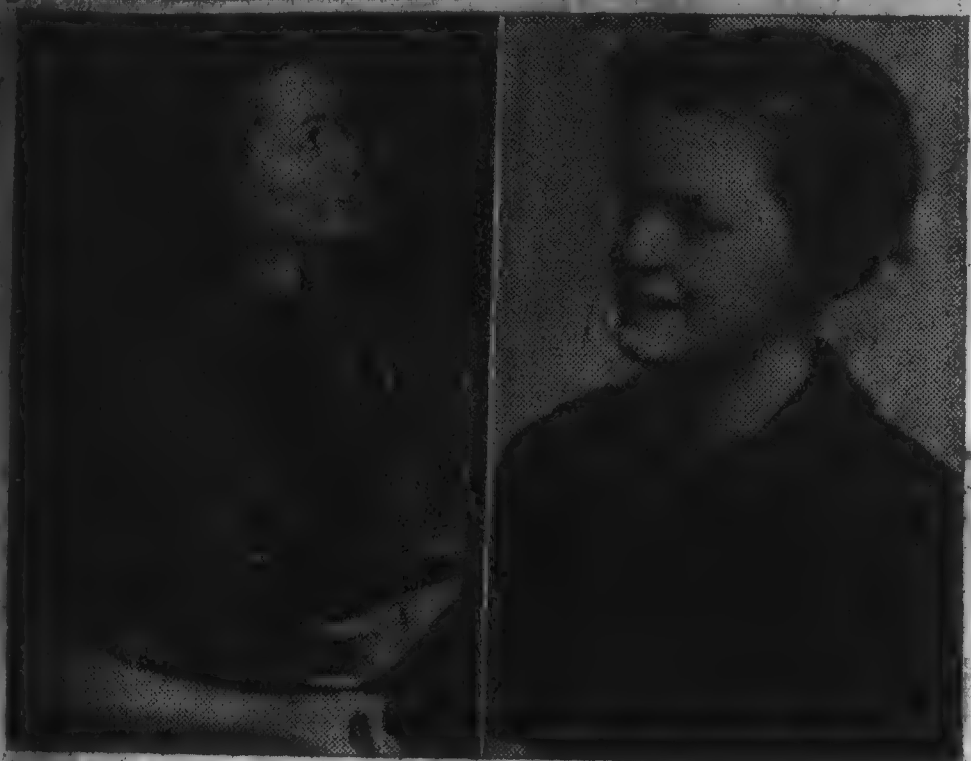
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 20 1938

707

CALL
Kansas City - Mo
MAR 11 1938

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, eminent French woman conductor who will make a guest appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra, thinks that jazz is an excellent thing in itself. She says: "I could listen to your Cab Calloway without so much as a shudder, and even with a certain positive enjoyment"... Wallace Jones, trumpet player extraordinary, will join the Duke Ellington orchestra before it opens its engagement at the Cotton Club in March.

Although he has composed dozens of hit songs, ranging from "Mood Indigo" and "Sophisticated Lady" to "Caravan" and "Azure," and although he has been featured with his orchestra at the famous Cotton Club annually for the last decade, Duke Ellington has written a complete musical score for a Cotton Club show for the first time.



Left, Miss Frances Brockman, 23, of Eugene, Oregon, concert mistress. Right, Olivia Carter Hall of Cambridge, 14-year-old harpist, who appeared yesterday afternoon in the concert in the Auditorium given by the New England Conservatory Orchestra.

MUSIC STUDENTS ENTERTAIN

REST

TYMPANI

Young Musicians Play With Enthusiasm

N. E. Conservatory Concert Well Received; Sanroma Assisting Artist Here

By TYRA LUNDBERG FULLER

A spirit of fresh young enthusiasm distinguished the concert given in Worcester Memorial Auditorium yesterday afternoon by the New England Conservatory Orchestra with Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist, and a member of the conservatory faculty, as assisting artist.

The audience might have been more numerous, but scarcely more enthusiastic, and the eighty-odd students that composed the Orchestra must have felt inspired to do their best. Whatever their inspiration, they played with a quality of tone and performance that would do credit to a professional orchestra. Wallace Goodrich, director of the Conservatory, who directed the concert, had every right to feel pleased and happy.

Sanroma Honored

Mr. Sanroma, vital young artist of the pianoforte, was signally honored after his performance of the MacDowell "Concerto No. 2 in D Minor," with the Orchestra. Again and again he appeared to make his bow to an appreciative and insistent audience. Again and again he shook hands with the director and with the concertmeister, and brought the entire Orchestra to its feet. But—artistically speaking—we are glad that Mr. Sanroma adhered to the tradition of no encores on a symphony program. As a matter of personal preference, nothing could have been more delightful or welcome than an encore—an opportunity to follow again those powerful, agile and flexible fingers as they moved over the keyboard with an artistry that was sure and brilliant. But Mr. Sanroma is no stranger to Worcester music lovers for he has played here more than once in the Art Museum chamber concert programs, and he was soloist with the Worcester Music Festival in 1932.

First on the program was the third Overture to Beethoven's "Leonore," and from the delicate, tuneful beginning to the triumphant finale that follows the dramatic off-stage trumpet call, it was plain to the audience that here was an orchestra in no sense amateurish. Those who had come with the sense of "helping a good cause," or merely "to hear Sanroma" remained to enjoy the concert.

The Last Spring

Grieg's lovely "The Last Spring," woven so beautifully about his "Springtide" song, came next and was followed by the first movement of G. W. Chadwick's "Sinfonietta in D major," a most appropriate number to be included on a Conservatory program since the Sinfonietta—as the composer himself stated—was written for the orchestra of the New England Conservatory.

Closing the first half of the program was a group of Johann Strauss' "Waltzes: Wine, Woman and Song," and listening once more to those appealingly lovely strains, again came the thought that modern composers surely owe much of their inspiration to the unsurpassable music of the "Waltz King."

The MacDowell Concerto opened the second half of the program, salvos of applause following the close of each movement, the "Larghetto calmato," "Presto giocoso," in fast and merry mood, and the final movement, "Largo; molto allegro; presto."

Richard Wagner's splendid "Prelude" to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," was the grand close to a perfectly grand concert.

First Concert Given Here

The concert, the first ever given in Worcester by the Conservatory Orchestra, was sponsored by the Conservatory Alumni Club of Worcester county for the benefit of the scholarship fund.

Worcester county members of the 95-piece orchestra are Miss Florence Smith of Milford and Albert Seely of Athol, second violinists; Oscar Tourtellotte of Sutton, oboist, and Chester Kunihoim of Gardner, clarinetist.

Ages of the players are in the main between 18 and 25. Some of the instructors of various instruments, however, also play in the orchestra, including Clement Lenom, oboe instructor, who is 73. Youngest player is Olivia Carter Hall, 14, of Cambridge, harpist. Because of her age, Clarence H. Corning of Boston, trustee in charge of the orchestra, was forced to obtain a special permit from City Hall to allow her to play.

Miss Hall is a pupil of Bernard Zighera, first harpist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her predecessor with the conservatory orchestra, Louise Kane, is now a harpist with the Boston Symphony, and its only woman player.

Among the patrons and patronesses of the concert was Mrs. Aldus C. Higgins, who is also trustee of the conservatory. She was chairman of the general committee. Philip R. Alden of Walpole, president of the board of trustees, attended.

In the audience were members of the West Boylston Street Military Band and the newly organized Greendale Community Band.

Following the concert, the conservatory alumni club entertained at a tea in Hotel Bancroft.

Miss M. Marguerite Morrison, president of the Worcester County Club, and Mrs. Harold G. Rader, vice-president, poured. Servers were Mrs. Clarence E. Longval and Misses Gladys J. Coyle, Marion Donohue, Margaret M. Hogan, Rosslynd C. Oriani and Marie Madigan of Hopkinton. Yellow and pink Spring flowers decorated the tea table.

Hostesses ere Miss Edna C. Gauch, supervisor of music in the public schools; Miss Mary M. Donohue and Mrs. Paul G. Ryder of Uxbridge, members of the club.

Special guests were Mr. and Mrs. Philip R. Allen, the former president of the board of trustees of the conservatory; Clarence H. Corming, financial secretary of the conservatory.

The sponsor committee was Mrs. Aldus C. Higgins, chairman, Arvid C. Anderson, Harry C. Coley, Dr. Wilger L. Jones, W. Karl Lations, Hamilton B. Wood and Miss Morrison.

Prokofiev, Here for Concerts, Hopeful Over Music Trends

Trans. Mar 23/38

Leading Russian Composer Says He Is Not a Communist but Is Satisfied with the Soviet

Serge Prokofiev, leading composer of Soviet Russia, is not a Communist, by his own word, but he is not dissatisfied with conditions of music and musicians in USSR.

In Boston to give a sort of one-man show at the Boston Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—playing the piano and conducting in a program of his own music—he said he was "too busy" to undertake the heavy demands made on a Communist in the Soviet Union.

He had some uncomplimentary things to say about audiences in general and Boston audiences in particular.

His programs for Friday and Saturday consist of four works which, he says, are not among his "most serious things." Two of the latter were played here in recent years without success—"Four Portraits" and the Fourth Symphony. The latter was commissioned for the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Orchestra but was greeted with the sneers accorded an art work written for an occasion. But Prokofiev says he had been working on it more than a year before he had received the commission from Dr. Koussevitzky.

Prokofiev's Third Symphony and "Chant Symphonique," which he regards among his best efforts, have not been given a chance in Boston. The Boston public will have little difficulty, he intimates, with the program of this week, consisting of two earlier works—the First Piano Concerto and Suite from the ballet, "Chout"—and two more recent but light compositions. One is the Second Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," which makes no attempt to be strictly symphonic. The other is "Peter and the Wolf," a symphonic fairy tale written for children. The purpose was to acquaint children painlessly with the orchestral instruments. A narrator identifies the several instruments of the orchestra, each of which represents a given character throughout the composition. Richard Hale will be the narrator in Boston, employing an English translation of the original Russian.

Prokofiev speaks informatively and hopefully about contemporary trends in music, particularly in the Soviet Union. The problem there arises, he says, from the great new audiences filling concert halls and opera houses. Instead of giving these audiences simply a diet of the classics or current music written in the style of the classics, Russian composers are writing simple music but "in the idiom of our time." On that foundation the audiences can prepare for the more complicated music of the present day.

The films, Prokofiev said, are not merely an instrument of education; they are to be regarded as a contemporary form of art. The same goes for animated cartoons, which he thinks have a "very great future." The music for films, for the most part, still is unsatisfactory, he thinks, because, while Hollywood producers have got to the point of employing serious composers, they insist on music written in old-fashioned style.

"Snow White" he regards as a "marvellous picture, and the music is not very offending!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 23 1938

TOO DEEP FOR BOSTON

Prokofieff Won't Play His Fourth Symphony There.

BOSTON, March 23 (A. P.).—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer said, "why should I break my baton?

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious numbers that have been performed in Boston were not understood.

INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
SUNDAY HERALD

MAR 20 1938

Girls Ga Ga Over Keith

There was a day when a musician was a musician and that was sufficient. Today it is different. A musician in order to be a success in the cultural arts world must have two or three other accomplishments. He must have glamour, individuality, or at least be unusual enough to warrant some exciting advance press agents.

Such a gentleman is Keith Falkner, baritone scheduled to appear on March 24 as the guest of the Wednesday Afternoon Musical club at Central High School.

Keith is English. He is handsome. He is six feet tall and a blond. Further than that Mr. Falkner is an athlete of quite some renown, having won the "Boosey Cup" in a golf tournament of the Concert Artists club.

He is especially fond of cricket, but of course, doesn't get much chance for his hobby, what with touring such countries as America, Holland, Hungary and Czechoslovakia, where cricket is just a name.

Keith is cinema minded too, has already made one movie in Hollywood—such good looks can't go to waste, and when his concert tour is over he will set out for the coast and a sequel to "Mayfair Melody," his first venture.

To continue with the artist's accomplishments— this baritone you will hear on Thursday evening also served as a pilot during the World War in the Royal Naval Air service.

At that time also he was awarded the Royal Humane Society's bronze medal for life saving at sea.

With a send-off like that you might wonder what there is left to be said about Mr. Falkner's music and his mission in Bridgeport.

First, he is termed Britain's finest baritone. He has appeared in most of the important cities in the United States and Canada, France and South Africa.

He was soloist in Bach's St. Matthew's Passion appearing with the Boston Symphony orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky conducting with the St. Louis Symphony in Verdi's Requiem under the direction of Vladimir Golschmann, the Cleveland orchestra under Arthur Rodzinski in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

He was soloist for two successive seasons at the Cincinnati May festival singing the role of Christ in Elgar's oratorio "The Apostles" also the Bethlehem Bach Festival and the Ann Arbor Festival.

When you are gazing starry-eyed at this handsome Englishman on Thursday next, perhaps you'll remember this little tale.

BARRE, VT.
TIMES

MAR 23 1938

CHILDREN'S MUSIC.

So Boston Audience Can Understand It, Says Serge Prokofieff.

Boston, March 23 (A.P.)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's fourth symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony on Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

MAR 15 19

Big Five Returning to Bushnell

See Story Page 1

Top: Artur Rodzinski of the Cleveland Orchestra, left; Dr. Hans Kindler of the National Symphony, right. Center: Mishel Piastro, concertmaster. John Barbirolli (center) and Joseph Schuster, first cellist, of the New York Philharmonic. Bottom: Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia, left; Dr. Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony, right.

NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 2 3 19

BOSTON REQUIRES SIMPLE MUSIC SAYS RUSSIAN ARTIST

Boston, March 23.—(AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofief's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago the Russian composer will play only "Children's Music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale, written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pieces that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the Fourth Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics . . . not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. . . . The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

NORWICH, CONN.
RECORD

MAR 2 3 19

COMPOSER WILL PLAY ONLY SIMPLE MUSIC

BOSTON, March 23— (AP).—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's fourth symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

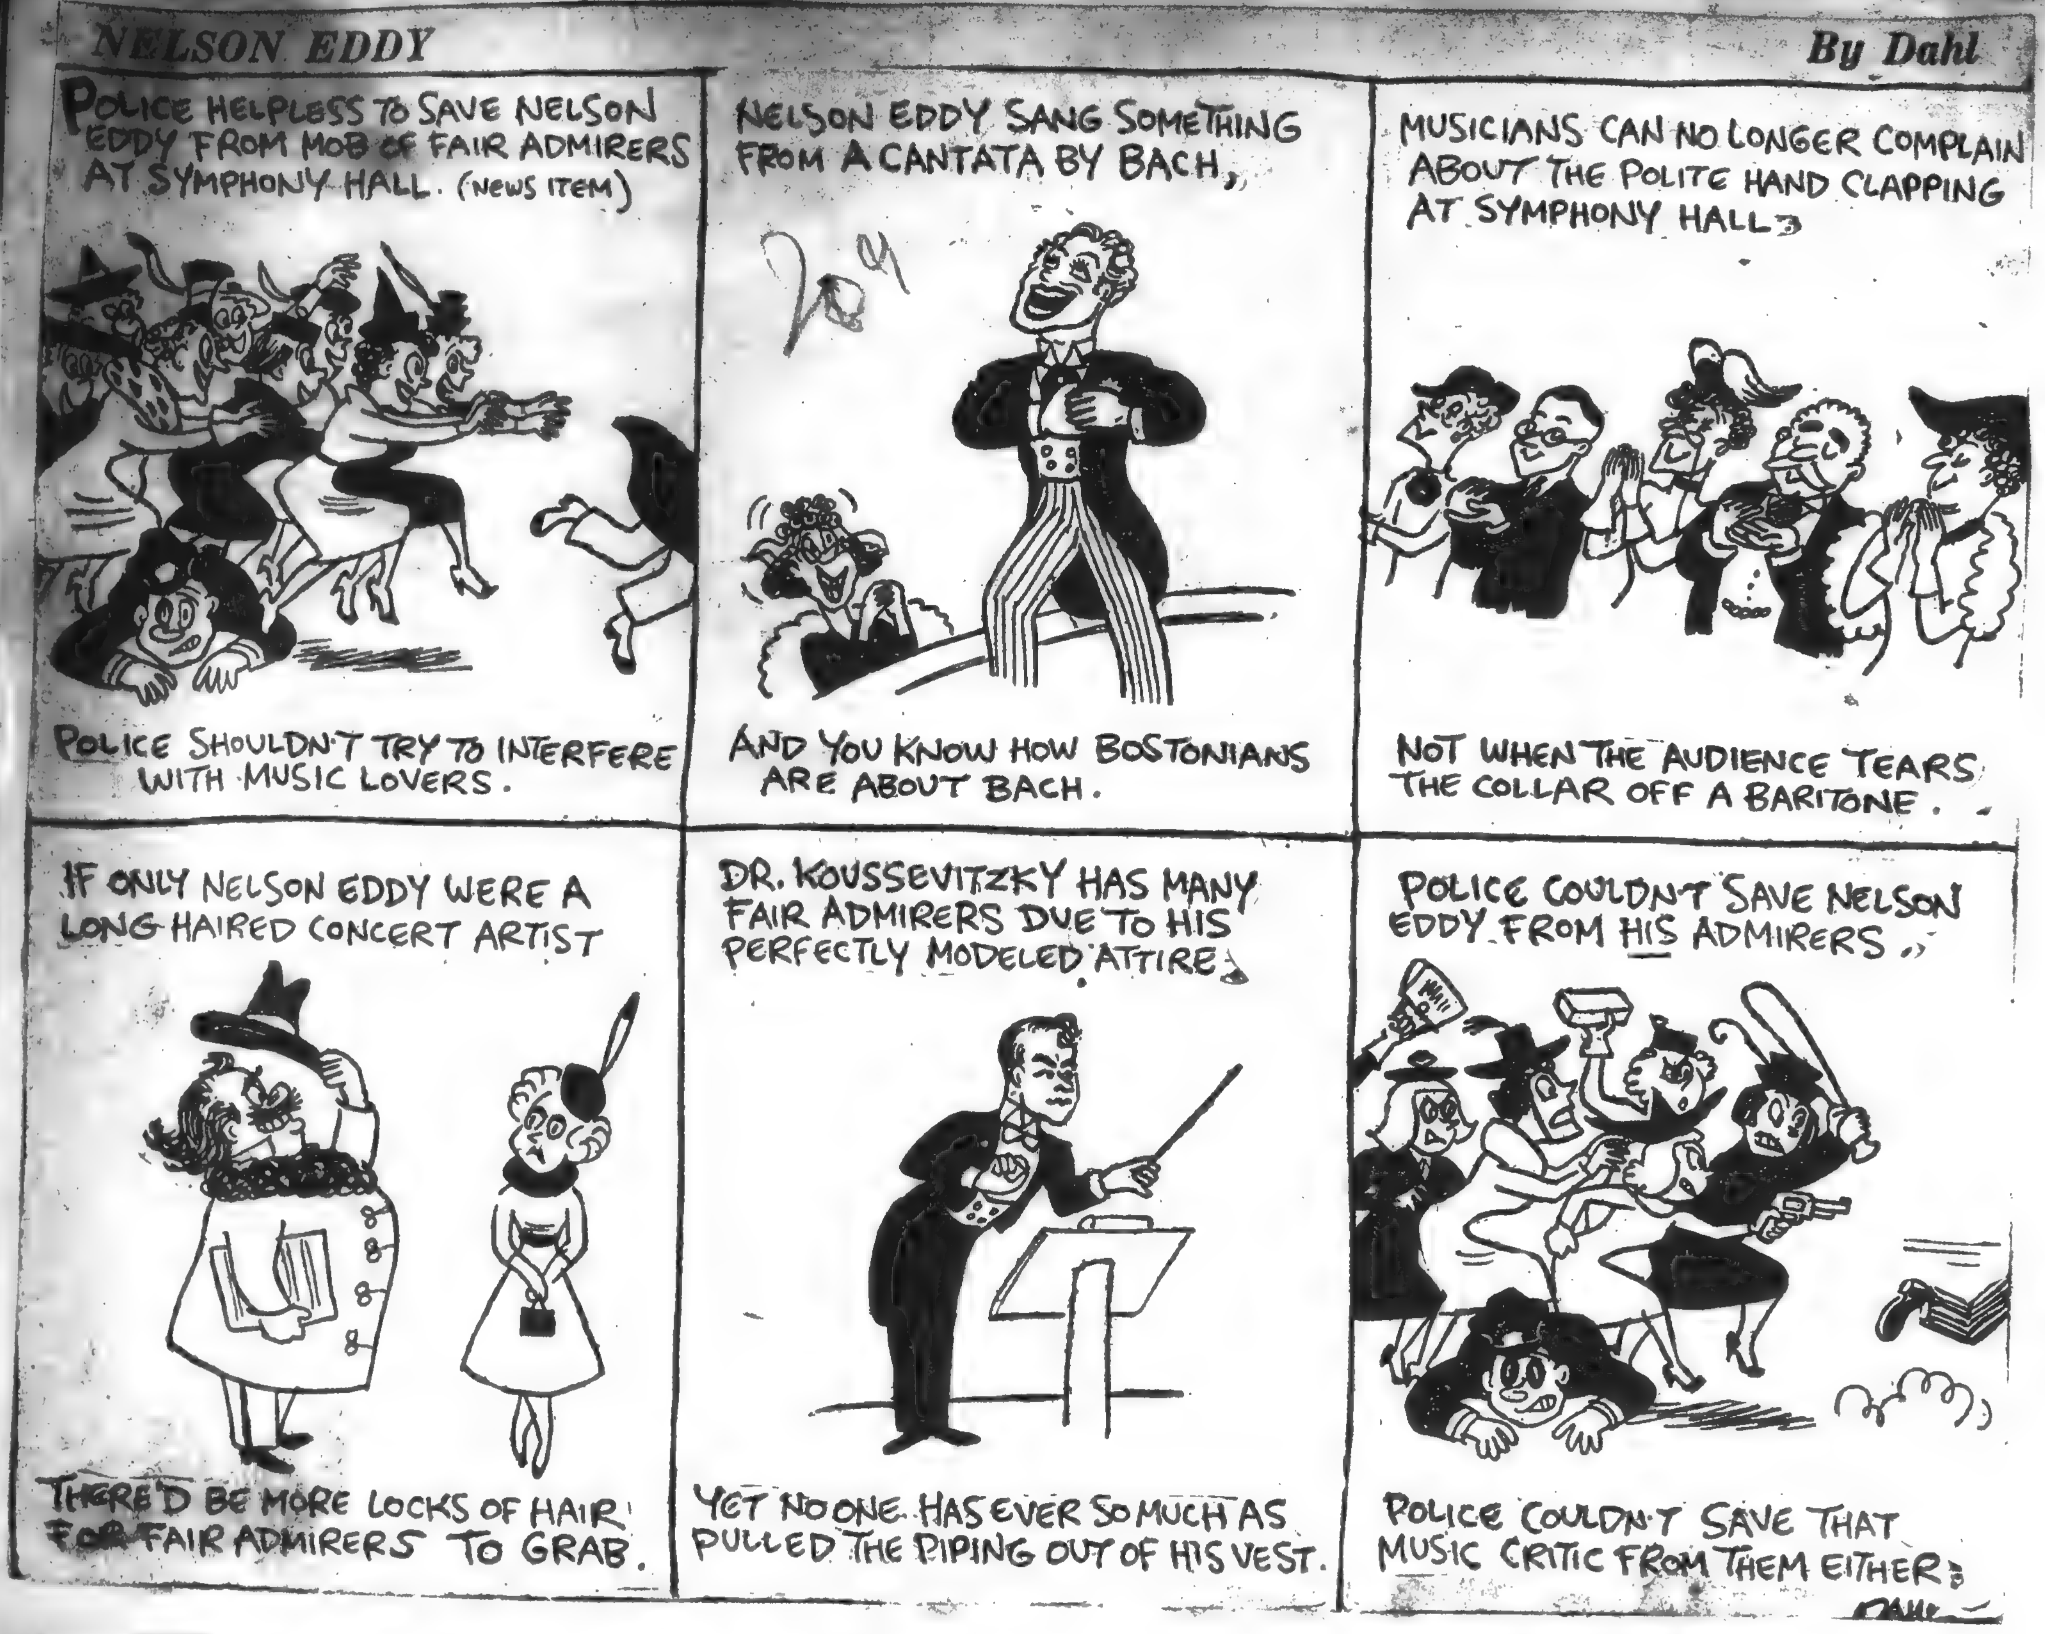
He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pieces that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the Fourth Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics x x x not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. x x x The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAR 22 1938

Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" will be performed in Boston Tuesday evening, April 26, in a Pension Fund concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, with the Harvard Glee club and the Radcliffe Choral society. There will be four soloists, whose names have not yet been announced. This work has been given in Boston only twice in recent years, at the symphony's Beethoven-Centenary festival in 1927, and at the dedication of Symphony hall at the beginning of the century.



NELSON EDDY
By Dahl
POLICE HELPLESS TO SAVE NELSON EDDY FROM MOB OF FAIR ADMIRERS AT SYMPHONY HALL. (NEWS ITEM)
POLICE SHOULDN'T TRY TO INTERFERE WITH MUSIC LOVERS.
NELSON EDDY SANG SOMETHING FROM A CANTATA BY BACH, 204
AND YOU KNOW HOW BOSTONIANS ARE ABOUT BACH.
MUSICIANS CAN NO LONGER COMPLAIN ABOUT THE POLITE HAND CLAPPING AT SYMPHONY HALL
NOT WHEN THE AUDIENCE TEARS THE COLLAR OFF A BARITONE.
IF ONLY NELSON EDDY WERE A LONG HAIRED CONCERT ARTIST
THERE'D BE MORE LOCKS OF HAIR FOR FAIR ADMIRERS TO GRAB.
DR. KOUSSEVITZKY HAS MANY FAIR ADMIRERS DUE TO HIS PERFECTLY MODELED ATTIRE
YET NO ONE HAS EVER SO MUCH AS PULLED THE PIPING OUT OF HIS VEST.
POLICE COULDN'T SAVE NELSON EDDY FROM HIS ADMIRERS
POLICE COULDN'T SAVE THAT MUSIC CRITIC FROM THEM EITHER DAHL

MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS

MAR 23 1938

SARCASTIC COMPOSER

BOSTON, March 23, (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's fourth symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "Why should I break by baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

THE MORNIN

N. Bedford Mercury March 23/38

Burgin Conducts At Symphony

Liszt and D'Indy Make Spring Music for Soloist Casadesus

The fifth in the series of Tuesday commuters' matinee concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra came upon a day of Springlike and welcome atmosphere that was interpretation in itself for the program chosen. Richard Burgin, conducting during a brief absence of Dr. Koussevitzky, raised his baton with an anxious air for the opening number—Moussorgsky's "A Night on Bald Mountain," but this Orchestral Fantasy went very well with its repeated theme of orgaic revelry among unholy spirits. The final passage of dawn and the bell of the village church might be received as modulation into the ripple and shimmer of the Liszt Concerto in E flat major, No. 1, for pianoforte and orchestra with the fleet fingered Robert Casadesus at the keys. Here was Nature in often smiling mood and when the blue grew intense and the sun beat warm the power as well as the delicacy of the guest artist held its own to final Lisztian excitement. M. Casadesus was received with extreme cordiality by the largest audience of the Tuesday series—grateful that so distinguished a musician might come to answer the tinkle of the triangle in the controversial Scherzo with his deliciously airy echo in similar accent on the keyboard.

Other mountains of less ghostly frequenters than the Russian's—the Cevennes in the country D'Indy knew and loved—sent out their calls of shepherds and herders in his Symphony on a French Mountain Song. For this fresh, free, musical evocation, M. Casadesus was also at the piano (essential, prominent, yet not strictly a solo instrument) contributing to the strongly marked rhythm of the nobly invigorating climax. Mr. Burgin was cautiously watchful during the concerto, but it appeared he was in his element here and effected some skillful coloring.

The Introduction and March from Rimsky-Korsakoff's Coq d'Or ended an inspiriting afternoon.

A. C. R.

MOMENTS MUSICAL

Lowell Courier March 23/38

By SIDNEY R. FLEET

To Whom Announcements and Communications on Musical Matters May Be Addressed at This Office.

At the regular Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week Serge Prokofieff, eminent Russian composer, will be guest conductor as well as solo artist. He will play his own First Piano Concerto and will conduct several of his own compositions, including the Suite from the ballet "Chout;" a symphonic fairy tale, "Peter and the Wolf;" the Second Suite from the ballet "Romeo and Juliet."

Reports are that Arthur Fiedler was well received in Philadelphia a week ago Sunday when he conducted the Philadelphia Civic orchestra in an all-Russian program.

The death in Boston hospital last week of Jacques Hoffmann, violinist, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and conductor on occasion of the Pops will be regretted in musical circles. He joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Nikisch in 1890, coming from the Vienna Philharmonic and remained active in it till 1920 after which he devoted his time mostly to teaching. His son Ernst is now carrying on the musical torch as conductor of the Texas Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Hoffmann, some years ago as soloist and as a member of various groups of artists, was a frequent visitor to Lowell.

B. Globe Mar. 23/38

Art as Revenge

Mysteries have a way of clearing themselves up if you only wait patiently. For a dozen years—yes, longer—there has been a regular Egyptian Plague of queer art: screwy painting, bulbous sculpture, gibberish literature, gaspipe furniture and ear-boxing music. "Still have we borne it with a patient shrug." No doubt we were in the wrong . . .

But what? M. Serge Prokofieff, than whom no symphonist could be more modern, is credibly reported as having reported to our reporter that because "Boston does not understand" his serious music, he will retaliate by giving us his immature pieces which he terms "children's music."

There's no chance for a quarrel here. Everybody will be grateful to any modern composer who will write music that children can understand. It is not easy. Art for children is a searching test. But the Great Disclosure is this new concept of "Art as Revenge."

Speak roughly to your little boy
And beat him when he sneezes;
He only does it to annoy
Because he knows it teases.

Thus does modernism stand revealed: "The Art of Annoying." As the late Martin Lomasney, quondam political boss of Ward 8, said suspiciously to a reporter: "They go queer ways to get you!"

B. U. Music Head Backs Boston Audiences

Dean Marshall Says Prokofieff Blast Is Mistake

B. Rec. Mar. 23/38

"If the audience did not like his Fourth Symphony, I should be inclined to blame the symphony—not the audience."

This was the reply today of Dean John P. Marshall, head of the Boston University college of music, to Serge Prokofieff, famous modern Russian composer, who accused Boston music lovers of understanding only "childish" music.

Nettled at the reception given his Fourth Symphony here a few years ago, Prokofieff revealed upon his arrival in Boston that he had arranged a program of "simple music" to the "childish tastes of Boston's symphony-goers." He is scheduled to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday night.

"SIMPLE EXPLANATIONS"

A storm of protest followed the Russian composer's remarks. And the latter added fuel to the fire by saying that Richard Hale, narrator, would explain his compositions at the concerts in words of two syllables.

Dean Marshall declared:

"The Boston Symphony audience, which seems to have provoked Serge Prokofieff to the extent that he feels compelled to seek revenge, is without doubt one of the most intelligent musical audiences in the world."

James A. Ecker, supervisor of music in the Boston schools, took up the cudgels for Boston, saying:

"Such an attitude on the part of the composer, however great, is impertinent and unfounded.

FREEDOM VITAL

"Freedom of taste is as important as freedom of speech, and no one person has a right to try to impose his individual taste upon a discriminating public."

Tribute to Prokofieff's genius was paid by Mrs. A. Lewis Armistead, who has always taken an active interest in musical activities in Boston, and who is herself a talented musician.

"This is very regreattable," she said. "I am a great admirer of Prokofieff, as are many other members of the Boston Symphony audiences.

"It is distressing that he should have been given such a false impression of the musical taste of the Boston Symphony audiences, which are more literate musically than those of any city in America."

NEW BRITAIN, CONN.
HERALD
MAR 23 1938

IANAPOLIS IND.

"Children's Music" All Hub Will Hear

Boston, March 23 AP—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH

MAR 23 1938

RUSSIAN COMPOSER HITS BOSTON CRITICS

BOSTON (AP) — Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music."

BRATTLEBORO, VT.
REFORMER

MAR 23 1938

GIVES BOSTON SIMPLE MUSIC.

Russian Composer Says Serious Works Are Too Deep for City.

BOSTON, March 23 (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's fourth symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

HOLYOKE, MASS.
TRANSCRIPT TELEGRAM

MAR 23 1938

* * *

BECAUSE Boston "does not understand" his serious music, Serge Prokofieff, Soviet composer, will present only his "children's music" during his appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday and Saturday. It was several years ago that the orchestra presented his fourth symphony. "But what happened?" he demanded. "The Boston public and the critics were very insulting. They not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste."

210

Lowell Evening Leader

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23, 1938.

Inspiring Playing Of Casadesus With Boston Symphony

Noted French Pianist Gives Remarkable Interpretation of Little Known Liszt Concerto

From all the area around Boston, and from all over New England came the lovers of music who filled Symphony Hall at the matinee in the supplementary series of programs by the Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday.

They heard as solo artist an outstanding pianist in Robert Casadesus, young French musician of a famous family which has devoted its interest to the collection and playing of ancient instruments. And they heard him before the patrons of the regular symphony concerts have had an opportuntiy to do so, although his success indicates that he will be drafted for the regular series on the basis of his fine showing.

For his first appearance on the program he had chosen the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major, which the musicologists tell us was neglected for some years after its composition, but which now takes its place in the repertory of many distinguished pianists. Naturally, it has the characteristics that marked the Abbe Liszt. It is frankly a show piece. But in the hands of Mr. Casadesus it goes deeper than that, revealing many passages of tender beauty, heightened by contrast with the more brilliant passage-work which the pianist tossed off with remarkable ease and surety. There was both beauty and thrilling, but always musical, vigor in his playing. And the orchestra under the direction of Concert Master Richard Burgin supplied a colorful harmonic background.

After the intermission Mr. Casadesus returned to play the piano part in the Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte written by d'Indy on a French mountain air. It is doubtful if it has ever had a more scintillating performance in Boston. The piano, to be sure, is treated as a member of the orchestral family. But in this instance it is an important one. Mr. Casadesus knew when to give it full play and when to hold it in check.

The purely orchestral numbers on the program by the Russians Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff were brought to impressive and brilliant performance under Mr. Burgin's really inspiring guidance.

The collection of ancient instruments which is now the property of the Symphony Orchestra is housed on the first balcony floor. It was acquired from the Casadesus family. After the concert Robert Casadesus took the opportunity to see it again. Noticing a pair of ancient little kettledrums, he said that in his childhood those identical instruments were among his cherished playthings. They brought back pleasant memories of his boyhood.—S. R. F.

Globe

Art as Revenge

Mar. 24

Mysteries have a way of clearing themselves up if you only wait patiently. For a dozen years—yes, longer—there has been a regular Egyptian Plague of queer art: screwy painting, bulbous sculpture, gibberish literature, gaspipe furniture and ear-boxing music. "Still have we borne it with a patient shrug." No doubt we were in the wrong . . .

But what? M. Serge Prokofieff, than whom no symphonist could be more modern, is credibly reported as having reported to our reporter that because "Boston does not understand" his serious music, he will retaliate by giving us his immature pieces which he terms "children's music."

There's no chance for a quarrel here. Everybody will be grateful to any modern composer who will write music that children can understand. It is not easy. Art for children is a searching test. But the Great Disclosure is this new concept of "Art as Revenge."

Speak roughly to your little boy
And beat him when he sneezes;
He only does it to annoy
Because he knows it teases.

Thus does modernism stand revealed: "The Art of Annoying." As the late Martin Lomasney, quondam political boss of Ward 8, said suspiciously to a reporter: "They go queer ways to get you!"

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD- TRIBUNE
MAR 24 1938

Prokofieff to Give Boston Music It 'Understands'

He'll Play Children's Pieces to Pay for Past Criticism

BOSTON, March 23 (AP).—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer said, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" would have its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing it was "without complications."

B. Post

DAY, MARCH 26, 1

PROKOFIEFF DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Entire Concert From Works by His Hand

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Liszt, in one of his flights of fancy, characterized the Allègretto in Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" as a "flower between two abysses." Coming between Thursday's "Otello" and last night's "Triston," Serge Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf," at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, might, to pursue the metaphor, be likened to a teddy bear in the same awful predicament—even though at Symphony Hall this "orchestral fairy tale for children" was flanked by two ballet-suites and a piano concerto (the first), also from Mr. Prokofieff's hand.

GIVES NEW WORKS

The other day Mr. Prokofieff was widely quoted as saying, probably with his tongue in his cheek, that he was conducting "Peter" at this week's pair of concerts as a sort of rebuke to Boston for having failed to appreciate certain of his more complicated works, in particular the Fourth Symphony, which was composed for the orchestra's 50th anniversary season. Perhaps this Symphony was underestimated; perhaps it was not. Taken by and large, however, Mr. Prokofieff and his music have fared uncommonly well in this city.

Counting the four numbers on yesterday's list his name has appeared on the Symphony programme 31 times in 16 years, a very good record indeed.

"Peter and the Wolf"

In this all-Prokofieff programme the gifted Russian, who still seems essentially boyish despite his 47 years, conducted the familiar Suite from the ballet "Chout" ("Buffoon") and the Second Suite from a recent ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," hitherto unheard in this country. He also played the piano part in the Concerto, new to Boston, which he composed at the age of 19. Here Richard Burgin was the conductor.

Also new to the United States was "Peter and the Wolf," written two years ago and first performed at a children's concert in Moscow. Yesterday Richard Hale, no stranger to Symphony Hall, was the Narrator; and as he related with mock-seriousness the adventures of Peter, the bird, the duck, the cat, the grandfather, the hunters and the wolf, each of whom was represented by a corresponding orchestral instrument, the orchestra played the purposely infantile music, which the audience as a whole appeared greatly to relish. For some, the joke was overlong, and much the best part of it came at the beginning when one by one the "first desks" of the orchestra rose and impersonated bird, beast or human. For the sake of accuracy it should be said that the wolf required the services of three horn players; the hunter's shots, those of a pair of drummers.

Her Concerto Exuberant

It would be a pleasure to hear "Chout" in conjunction with the farcical ballet for which it was designed. Even without such aid it has abundant humor, and possibly the "Romeo and Juliet" Suite would gain by association with its apparently rather artificial libretto. Hearing the music as music, it was not easy to forget Tchaikovsky and Gounod, although the composer successfully forgot them both, and somehow the characterization of the rival houses, of Juliet and of Friar Laurence, of the parting of the lovers and of Romeo's sorrow before he discovers, in this perversion of Shakespeare, that Juliet had not really died was only partly convincing. The 19th century romantic idiom which the composer was almost forced to assume did not seem quite genuine. More grateful to hear was the Concerto, an exuberant work, engagingly mannered and by no means marred by the occasional suggestions of the elder Russians. Mr. Prokofieff played it with the requisite dash and elan, and was enthusiastically applauded here as he was throughout the concert.

Tr. Mar. 26/38

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The 20th regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday in Symphony hall. Serge Prokofieff was the guest conductor and the soloist. In the concerto Richard Burgin conducted. The program was as follows:

Prokofieff. . "Chout." Ballet Suite Op. 21
Prokofieff
Piano Concerto No. 1 in D flat major Op. 10
Prokofieff
"Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale for children Op. 67
Prokofieff
"Romeo and Juliet," Ballet Suite No. 2, Op. 64

The chief fault that one could find in this concert was stated beforehand by Mr. Prokofieff in that curiously indiscreet and possibly distorted interview he gave the press. It was a mistake not to have included one of his more serious formal works on the program, rather than two ballet suites. This was surely Mr. Prokofieff's chance to have repeated the symphony which he believes was misunderstood, though actually it got a reasonably good reception and aroused interest in some quarters to hear it again. Or he might have chosen one of his symphonies that has not been heard here.

It is as if Brahms, when he was misunderstood in Boston, had come here and offered the Liebeslieder Waltzes and such things and had refused to play a symphony. How are we going to appreciate Mr. Prokofieff's serious side if he willfully refuses to expose it? His comic side, however, is delightful, for he is a composer of immense talent and profuse invention. One or two of the "Romeo and Juliet" movements were also serious. The program ran an unconventional course. The "Chout" Suite we have previously heard; but the First Piano Concerto was played for the first time in Boston and the other two works for the first time in America.

There was much curiosity about "Peter and the Wolf," which relates a rather whimsical fairy tale, cleverly demonstrates the various instruments of the orchestra and exploits them artfully to illustrate the story. The piece is amusing and should fill a definitely useful function. The only sour note was Mr. Richard Hale's affected narration of the story. He neglected no single opportunity to mouth a phrase with unctuous emphasis. His pronunciation of such simple words as "tail" and "Peter" beggars description. Direct simplicity was what was wanted. Still, the music is quite charming and makes its points neatly.

The First Piano Concerto is not perhaps as fine as the later ones, as might be expected from an early work; but it is none the less a brilliant and effective work. It is brief, really in one movement with a slow middle section. Even at the age of 20 Prokofieff had mastered the technique of building a climax out of the simplest thematic material. The concerto was cordially received. If Mr. Prokofieff's interview had been published in a Latin country the audience would probably have come armed with vegetables. Whatever he may think, his success in Boston as pianist and composer is assured.

It is also deserved. The well of his inspiration has by no means run dry, as the Second Violin Concerto, heard here earlier in the season, proved. Now we have the Second "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, which contains some fine music. The "Romeo by Juliet's Grave" section is remarkably imaginative and moving.

The suite is a trifle long, especially at the end of a long concert. Harmonically it is more diatonic than the suite from "Chout." It is also, on the basis of its subject, less freakish and ironic.

"Chout" is an example of how effectively a composer can make use of discords for a perfectly legitimate purpose. No other style would fit the wildly farcical story of the ballet. In spite of the fact that the program offered none of the composer's important works, the concert was both interesting and enjoyable. Mr. Prokofieff is evidently a man whose second best is still pretty good.

The performance seemed excellent in every detail. Mr. Prokofieff's astonishing imperturbability at the piano was just as astonishing as ever. Mr. Burgin led the orchestra in sympathetic accompaniment. Elsewhere Mr. Prokofieff appeared to get just the interpretation he wanted.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town.

B. Globe – Mar. 26/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Prokofieff conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first time yesterday afternoon, in a program of his own music. This conspicuous figure among composers of the day is no stranger, for his music has been performed many times by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, and the public has cordially received him on divers occasions when he has joined the orchestra in some of his pieces with piano part. Not until yesterday, however, had he waved a stick over the Boston Symphony.

He favored us with two "first performances in the United States"—the second suite from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," and the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf." He began with the familiar "Chout" suite, and thereafter relinquished the baton to Richard Burgin, while he played the solo part of his youthful First Piano Concerto.

The children's music turned out to be fun, and everyone seemed to have a good time. "Peter and the Wolf" concerns the adventures of little Peter, who saved the bird and the cat from the big, bad wolf by letting down a lasso from a tree and catching the wolf by the tail. Then some hunters joined little Peter, the bird, the cat and Peter's grandfather, and they all marched to the zoo with the big, bad wolf. Unfortunately, little Peter couldn't save the duck, which the wolf swallowed alive.

"Peter and the Wolf" requires a narrator, a position filled expressively by Richard Hale, who begins his story with a direct address to "My Dear Children—." Then, as the narrator speaks, the flutist plays the theme characterizing the bird, the clarinet suggests the cat, the oboe the duck, three horns growl like an evil, gray wolf, and so on. The music is sleek and ingenious, pointing up the story with unerring humor.

While the "Chout" Suite is full of typical Prokofieff rhythms and dissonance, it is not so sheerly exciting as the "Scythian" Suite, one of the notable scores of the present century. The early First Piano Concerto is a slight work, morely lively than substantial.

If any thought that Mr. Prokofieff's conducting would reflect preeminently the brusque nature of much of his music, they must have been surprised to note his care for subtle nuances, especially in the suite from "Romeo and Juliet." This ballet music was, on the whole, disappointing. The feud of the Montagues and the Capulets is depicted vividly enough at the beginning; there are further interludes which delineate the subject matter of the program. But the work is very long and, in the belief of this reviewer, diffuse.

Mr. Prokofieff was again received warmly by the Friday audience.

The program will be repeated tonight. Next week Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct three first symphonies, that in C major by Beethoven; the First Symphony of Walter Piston (first performance), and the E minor Symphony by Sibelius. C. W. D.

Prokofieff Wins In Triple Role At Symphony

B. Am.
Mar. 26/38

By RUTH MARSTERS

Masquerading as Prokofieff, Puck slipped into Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon and took entire charge of the Boston Symphony concert as conductor, composer, and soloist.

The mask, however, was transparent and nobody was deceived. We should, of course, have been forewarned. It was not the first time that the mischievous imp had assumed the same guise.

First on the program was the Ballet Suite, "Chout." It is the story of a buffoon who managed to outwit seven other buffoons and the wit employed in the telling is probably matchless in kind. But it is only one instance of Prokofieff's use of make-believe in mocking credulity.

The Ballet was written for Diaghileff when the composer was twenty-four, and though a mature artist, was still engrossed in playing with bizarre harmonies, and orginal patterns.

The Second Ballet Suite of "Romeo and Juliette" offered a striking contrast. Written in more recent years, it is still vividly graphic music, still tinged with irony, still strikingly original. It is different, however, in the fact that the composer was here absorbed with melody.

Much of "Romeo and Juliette" is indeed possessed of poignant loveliness—a quality which was found extremely elusive in Prokofieff's earlier works.

The first piano concerto in D flat major given its first Boston performance at yesterday afternoon's concert with Prokofieff as soloist and Richard Burgin conducting the orchestra proved both brittle and scintillating.

A remarkable achievement for a young man of 19 years, it was the work that first won Prokofieff the attention of a world which has showed an unflagging interest ever since.

* * *

Gifted with the same effortless virtuosity as a pianist that he enjoys as a composer. Prokofieff's performance of the concerto was remarkable for its brilliance. The orchestra, which was in fine vein through most of the afternoon, could have done with a bit more rehearsing for the sake of the ensemble.

The audience was enthusiastic throughout but it remained for "Peter and the Wolf" An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children to bring its obvious enjoyment of the proceedings to its climax.

There has probably seldom been anything so amusing in music and we cannot but feel that much of it would be wasted on the audience to which the subtitle directs it.

We found it funnier than "Ferdinand" and more vividly pictured. More than this we cannot say.

Cont.

Serge Prokofieff Conducts

C. S. Monitor - Mar. 26/38

The Arts in Boston

Serge Prokofieff has taken over the leadership of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this week's pair of concerts. Conducting for the first time in Boston, he presented yesterday afternoon a program of his own compositions: the Suite from the ballet, "Chout"; the Piano Concerto in D flat, No. 1; the orchestral fairy tale for children, "Peter and the Wolf," and the Second Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The last two numbers, recently written, were played for the first time in the United States.

Soviet children are fortunate to have such a clever composer writing for them. This fantasy of Peter and the Wolf was easily the most successful item of the program, by the vote of popular response. Whether the story is a folk tale or the invention of the composer, the program book did not tell us, but it is charming. It is the story of how a boy and a bird captured a wolf and led him off in triumph to a zoo.

In order that the children may understand everything, a narrator (at these performances the actor Richard Hale) reads from the score a note explaining that Peter is represented by the string quartet, the bird by the flute, a duck by the oboe, a cat by the clarinet, Peter's grandfather by a bassoon, the wolf by three horns and the firing of the hunters by drums. The narrator then describes, while the orchestra pictures, Peter's adventure.

The score is ingenious in its composition, salient in characterization and as full of wit and humor as the tale itself. This Peter is an engaging lad, bold and resourceful. The birds and animals are very amusing, especially the duck, who no doubt is a relative of Donald's. The most mirth-provoking moment in the piece is that in which the bird, on the shore, and the duck, in the lake, dispute the merits of their respective means of locomotion. And the final triumphal march is delightful. The whole work confirms a belief that Prokofieff is the foremost musical wit of the day.

The ballet suite comes under the head of Prokofieff's "serious" music making. So far as one can tell from the rather sketchy program notes, the ballet has a happy ending. This distressed a Moscow critic who is quoted in the program notes as complaining that it "had an unfortunate effect, not only upon the general structure but even upon the otherwise excellent musical score." He feels an "awkward incongruity between the realistic idiom of the musical language . . . which successfully characterizes the individualism of the Shakespearean images, and the blind submission to the worst traditions of the old form, as revealed in the libretto."

The suite describes the strutting of the Montagues and Capulets, the characters of Juliet and Friar Laurence, the parting of the lovers and the reunion at what Romeo believes to be Juliet's grave. Two dance movements are interspersed. The score is written with the composer's invariable expertness, but, in these seven movements, with a singular monotony and a remarkable lack of emotion. Perhaps the Marxist ideology has laid a cold hand on an imagination that never was notable for warmth. Or perhaps the suite is poorly selected and arranged. At a single hearing, it does not seem to mark a new stage of his development.

As conductor Prokofieff is workmanlike, devoid of graces, but alive and authoritative, at least in his own scores. At times he almost dances to his rhythms. He played the piano in the concerto while Richard Burgin conducted. It is an early work, forecasting the later composer but itself of slight substance.

L. A. S.

Direct Quotation

Mar. 28/38

Far from holding any grudge against the Bostonian public, Serge Prokofiev believes his music has been well served here, and he was delighted with his stay, terminating in the second symphony concert over which he presided on Saturday evening.

"Before leaving Boston," he told George Judd, manager of the Symphony Orchestra, "I hope to be understood correctly when I say that perhaps nowhere in the United States has my music received such many-sided representation. For this, for the unexcelled virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for the gratifying interest on the part of the Boston audience may I extend my most cordial thanks."

The statement may well be construed as a close to the "incident," caused by reports in Boston morning newspapers last Wednesday to the effect that Prokofiev was piqued because some of his larger and more serious works had been badly received here or neglected.

THE ORCHESTRAS

N. Y. Her. Tribune - Mar. 27/38

THREE works will be heard for the first time here in this week's concerts of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. On Wednesday evening and Thursday afternoon John Barbirolli will conduct the overture to Sheridan's "The School for Scandal" by the young Philadelphian composer, Samuel Barber.

Next Saturday night Quincy Porter will conduct the first public performance of his first symphony, which won honorable mention in the Philharmonic-Symphony competition for works of symphonic length last season, and Mr. Barbirolli will conduct the first American performance of the prelude to Delius's "Irmelin." A partial novelty in the concerts of Wednesday and Friday will be the suite from William Walton's "Facade," which will include several numbers not included in previous performances here.

Gregor Piatigorsky will reappear as soloist this afternoon in Schumann's cello concerto; the suite arranged by Deems Taylor from the music for two scenes of his opera "Peter Ibbetson," will also be repeated. The midweek program, which has no soloist, will include Sibelius's third symphony in C, last played by the Philharmonic under Hans Lange in April, 1934. With only four performances in the last fourteen years, this has been the least played here of Sibelius's seven symphonies, except for the sixth, which has been played in New York within this period only once, by the Boston Symphony, in 1930.

... hopes "that it expresses some of the feelings which are a part of our spiritual make-up here in this country."

Bostonians Play Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the second half of both programs to Brahms's symphonies, the first on Thursday and the second on Saturday. On Thursday night, after Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, the second suite, Op. 64 ter, from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet," in seven sections, will be played for the first time here. Its American premiere was last Friday in Boston in an all-Prokofieff program.

Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers for Saturday afternoon will be a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." "La Mer" will also be heard in this orchestra's concert Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with C. P. E. Bach's concerto for strings, in D, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
EXAMINER

MAR 21 19

THE VOICE OF NEW YORK

By Louis Sobol

. . . We invade a new restaurant, Fradkin's, over which presides Frederic Fradkin, once concert master of the Boston Symphony, who has deserted his musical career because of his greater love of the culinary art. . . . I can understand that—once I wanted to be a house-painter—until I saw a decorator fall from a ladder.

Symphony Concert

Serge Prokofiev Conducts a Program of His Music and Plays the Piano in Addition

B. Trans. - Mar. 26/38

The presence of Serge Prokofiev as conductor, pianist and sole composer for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of yesterday afternoon and this evening, coming immediately after the appearances of Georges Enesco last week, is further reminder of the variety, richness and distinction of the current symphonic season in Boston. Prokofiev's music is hardly a stranger to the audiences of the symphony concerts, where, as the program-book points out, it was introduced by Monteux as early as 1922, and where, since Serge Koussevitzky's coming two years later it has been represented at least once in every season. Nor has he been absent in the flesh. But even with half a program of his music early in the present season and the Second Violin Concerto a little later, yesterday's all-Prokofiev list did not suggest a surfeit, especially since it gave us another and fuller opportunity to observe in person one of the leading musicians of the present day.

Prokofiev, by his own word, does not pretend to be anything more than a competent symphonic conductor. He indicated yesterday that he is at least that, and something more as well. There seemed to be no mishaps; the musicians seemed to be playing with customary ease and ability; and the music emerged no doubt in the most authoritative character. The program contained many opportunities of expressive, as distinguished from merely correct, playing; and in each instance the orchestra seemed to make good use of the opportunity.

There were four numbers: the Suite from the Ballet, "Chout"; the First Piano Concerto; "Peter and the Wolf" and the Second Suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." Only "Chout" was familiar here from previous performances at these concerts, while the last two works were new to America. Yesterday's hearing of "Chout," the third at the Boston Orchestra's concerts, indicated that the work, written as far back as 1915, is going to wear well. Even without surrounding decor and accompanying action, for which it was written, the music has pungency, wit and true (to our ears) Russian character.

The Piano Concerto, composed while Prokofiev was a student of hardly twenty, is in another class. It is fairly remarkable in several ways: the formal construction especially, the harmonic freedom (considering what must have been the student Prokofiev's "influences") and the fully prophesied, characteristic piano style of the composer's later Concertos. It was further interesting here, as in the "Romeo and Juliet" Suite later, to observe an idiosyncrasy of the composer made familiar by the "Classical" Symphony: his fondness for rapid alternation between two adjacent keys: In the case of the First Concerto the keys in question are D-flat, the predominant tonality, and C.

But the interest of the Concerto remained, for the present writer, in matters outside its intrinsic worth, which seemed ephemeral. It served yesterday once more to exhibit the peculiar and exceptional pianism of the composer, with Richard Burgin leading the accompanying orchestra in able and sympathetic fashion.

"Peter and the Wolf" is frankly an educational venture, as indicated by the sub-title, "An Orchestral Fairy Tale for Children." As such it is a remarkable work, which puts to shame similar attempts by most other composers. Furthermore, it does more than it nominally sets out to do, since it entertained yesterday's audience of adults throughout. Occasionally, it is true, the audience found in the narrative, admirably recited by Richard Hale, elements of humor which children would take with the utmost seriousness. But against this was the orchestral writing and felicity of melodic invention, together with an almost disarming simplicity, that were everywhere observable. "Peter and the Wolf" deserves, that is to say, further performance at adult concerts. But above all, and without loss of time, it ought to be in the repertory of every competent orchestra giving children's concerts, a category in which, unfortunately, the Boston Symphony Orchestra does not at present find itself.

The "Romeo and Juliet" Suite, containing seven movements of unequal length and varying content, did not make a deep impression at first acquaintance. Perhaps the composer accomplished too well his task of providing a setting for a scenario, so that the music can be suitably enjoyed only in actual performance of the ballet. (On the other hand, the composer has intimated in conversation with the present writer that his concert suites are intended to stand on their own feet.) It is also paradoxically possible that the music will sound fresher on second hearing.

The matinee audience greeted Prokofiev warmly on each occasion and gave evidence of enjoying both music and performance.

M. S.

WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE

MAR 23 1938

WILL GIVE BOSTON CHILDREN'S MUSIC

BOSTON, March 23 (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's "Fourth Symphony" was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pieces that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the "Fourth Symphony," written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics . . not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but also they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. . . .The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

23 1938

Russian Composer Scores Boston Public

BOSTON, March 23. (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was

---

EDWARDSVILLE, ILL.
INTELLIGENCER

FEB 28 1938

IN THE FEMININE WORLD—(1) Mrs. Elizabeth Smith Friedman, America's only woman cryptanalyst, who recently helped break up one of the biggest smuggling rings on the Pacific Coast, by translating twenty-seven Chinese code cablegrams. (2) Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, who will be the first woman ever to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. (3) Miss Patty Berg, 19-year-old Minneapolis golfer, who has won the Grace Doherty trophy for the third consecutive year.

DISPATCH

2/25/38

All like above

MEXICO, MO.
INTELLIGENCER

FEB 28 1938

ORANGE, TEX.
LEADER

FEB 27 1938

PASSAIC, N. J.
SUNDAY EAGLE

FEB 27 1938

TWO RIVERS, WIS.
REPORTER

FEB 28 1938

GREENVILLE, MICH.
NEWS

FEB 28 1938

JERSEYVILLE, ILL.
DEMOCRAT

FEB 28 1938

like above

More clippings like same sent over continent.

Nelson Eddy Mobbed by Won
After Symphony Hall C

B. Post - Mar. 28/38

BIG OVERFLOW AWAITS NELSO

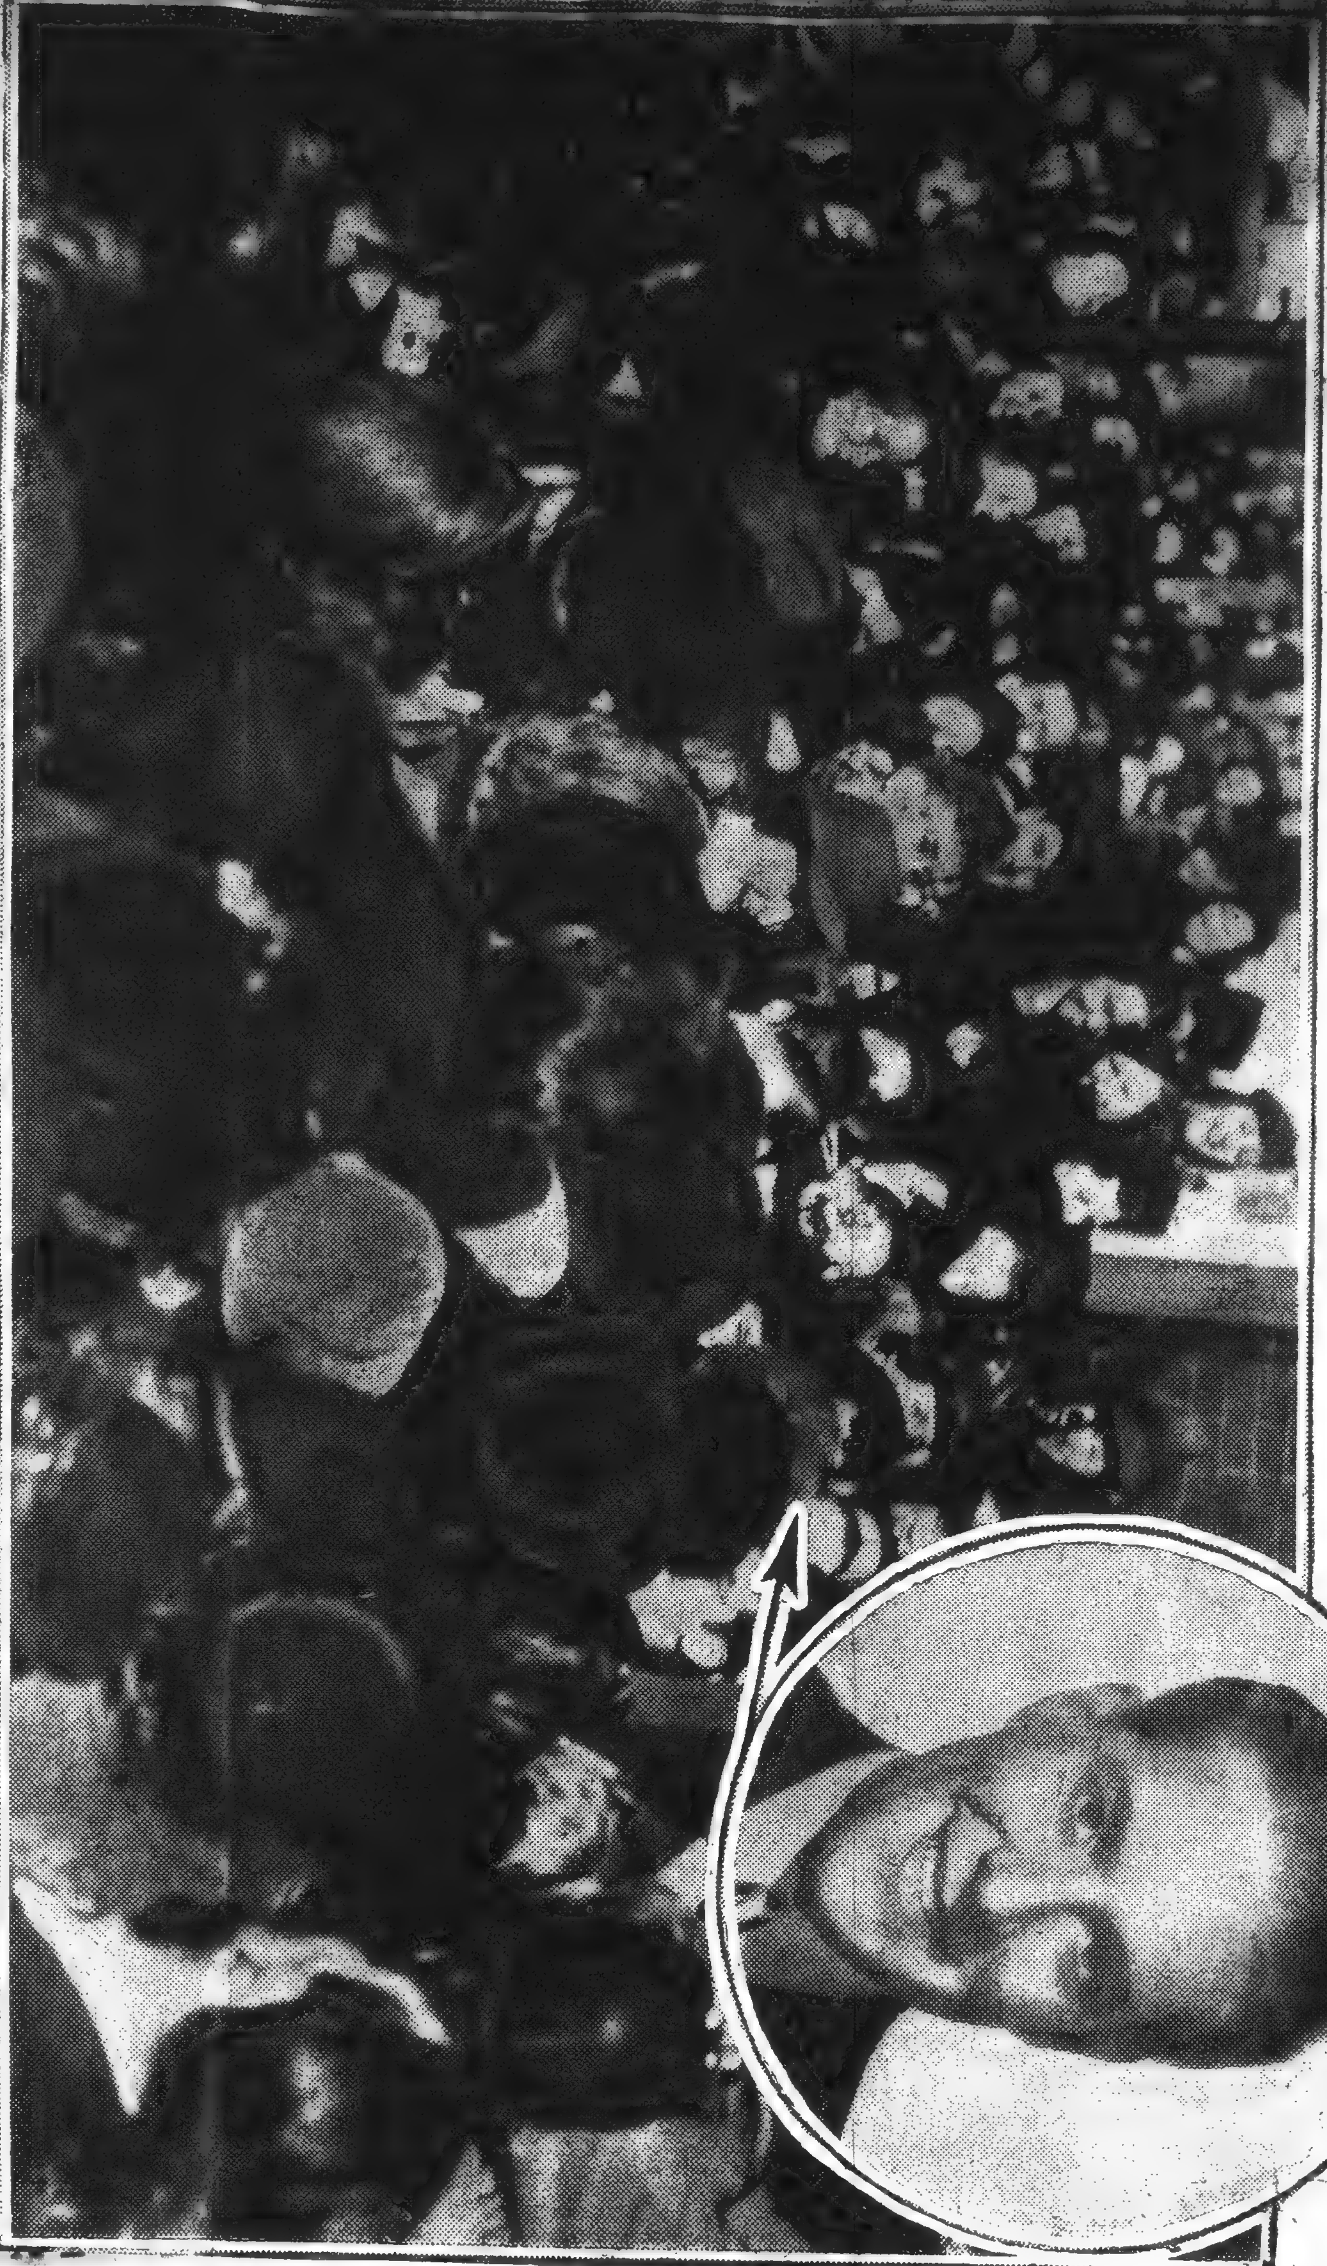
Several hundred women outside Symphony Hall yesterday after conc

Admirers Sweep Aside Police Escort

Nelson Eddy, film and opera star, circle, was trapped for 20 minutes in this throng of 500 women admirers, who pushed his police escort aside and clamored for autographs when the handsome star left Symphony Hall after giving a concert yesterday. Arrow indicates the besieged Eddy. He finally reached his taxi, which was parked 10 feet from stage door. Story on Page 3

(Daily Record Photo)

Star Mobbed by 500 Women



NELSON EDDY

Singing movie star, who appeared at Symphony Hall to packed house yesterday.

WOMEN MOB MOVIE STAR AT CONCERT

Nelson Eddy Unable to Leave Hall Due to Admirers

Nelson Eddy, handsome hero of the cinema, came to Boston yesterday to give a Symphony Hall concert, and when it was over proved to be such a success with the women that 3000 of them forced him to "hide" from them.

When the famous baritone finished his concert, which was one of the best attended concerts in years at the famous music hall, he was mobbed by 3000 people, mostly women, at the stage door.

The movie hero darted back inside and decided that it would be better for all concerned if he left the hall quietly and not in front of the crowds.

The women he feared would be trampled upon. Handsome Nelson opened a window from backstage and looked out at the crowd.

"How, ya?" he inquired as the hundreds of women cheered their movie hero.

Nelson's return to Boston was a most enjoyable one for him, for he turned the tables on some harsh critics.

"When I was here the last time, I was told I should go back to Hollywood and stay there," the good-looking baritone revealed as he came backstage after several encores by the largest crowd in Symphony Hall for a concert in years.

He had little to say for Boston interviewers, he said, as the things written and said about him the last time he was here on a concert sort of frightened him.

When he started to leave the theatre, he was literally mobbed. Extra police were in the vicinity from the Back Bay station, to hold the crowd of women back.

He in no way considers himself a huge success, despite the fact that he is. He said that he is still studying and still working hard.

He has finished a picture in which he co-starred with Jeanette MacDonald, and this picture will be shown in Boston theatres in the immediate future. "It's a great picture," Nelson said.

His future, he said, is wrapped up in three things. "I have three jobs, movies, radio and concert touring. I try to do them all well. I like them all and I am having a great time, really," he said.

April 3—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program by John B. Archer, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m.

April 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

NELSON EDDY RECITAL

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The old injunction, "young man go West" is still good advice if the young man is a singer and by West, is meant Hollywood. It were idle to pretend that Nelson Eddy's recital at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon would have sold out, as it did, two months ago, if that agreeable baritone had not already won the heart of the Boston public through his appearances on the screen. Besides packing the hall and the stage Mr. Eddy's admirers thronged the stage door at the beginning and end of the concert and had to be kept in order by mounted policemen.

Be it said to Mr. Eddy's credit that his programme did not consist entirely of numbers of a popular nature. He even began with Bach, a characteristically repetitious air, "Good Fellows, Be Merry!" from the Peasant Cantata; and his opening group found room for Schubert's Serenade, Wolf's "Er Ist's" and the aria "An jenem Tag" from Marschner's romantic opera, "Hans Heiling." The remainder of the programme announced airs by Legrenzi and Massenet, songs by Tosi, Carpenter, Clarke and Head.

As concert singer, Mr. Eddy has much in his favor, a pleasing stage manner, a prepossessing face and figure, a smooth and, for the most purposes, sufficiently powerful voice. One may hardly expect from him subtleties in the matter of interpretation, but he sings musically and with taste, though some yesterday were distressed by his arbitrary altering of the end of "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," which he sang "by request" after the air of Bach. The most interesting number on the programme was the aforesaid air by Marschner. We read in the history books that Wagner learned from Marschner as well as from Weber, but concrete examples of the former indebtedness is seldom offered us. "An jenem Tag" is full of suggestions of the "Tannhaeuser" which was to come.

Mr. Eddy was ably accompanied yesterday by Theodore Paxson who also appeared as soloist playing the Twelth Rhapsody of Liszt.

CROWDS IN RUSH AT NELSON EDDY

Police Here Save Singer From Eager Admirers

By JOHN BARRY

Nothing short of a troop of mounted police was needed to rescue Nelson Eddy, blond baritone heart throb of screen and radio, from screaming thousands of feminine fans who mobbed him at the stage door of Symphony Hall after his Boston concert yesterday afternoon.

To convoy the young singer whose screen romances with Jeanette MacDonald and radio tiffs with Charlie McCarthy have moved him into the top rank of box office attractions, Division 16 had to gallop six mounted police officers to the scene. With a horse to the right of him and a horse to the left of him, into the jaws of button tearing, autograph seeking fandom gallantly strode Nelson.

If his feet were on the pavement it could not be proved. Not even Eddy could testify to that. There was a swirl of horses and humanity, galloping hoofs beating a path around the taxi, and he made it. Small wonder that he tried to make the previous hours of his visit here a dark secret and remained practically incognito at his Statler rooms all day Saturday and Sunday without giving a word of publicity to his presence in town..

Wild Cheers Greet Him

Police anticipated something of a crush five weeks ago when Symphony Hall was sold out on the announcement that the star of "Rosalie," "Rose Marie," "The Firefly" and other musical successes was to make a concert appearance in Boston. Two mounted officers and the usual traffic men were on hand before the concert yesterday, but they were practically jostled into the Fenway. When Eddy's cab arrived it seemed doubtful that he would be able to cross the walk in time for his concert. With little more than the encouragement of police, who suggested that he "hit the line," Eddy

Eddy
Continued on Page 10

Eddy—

Continued from the First Page

whirled through to safety. Two hours and a half later the reserves were on hand and they got him out again.

Inside Symphony's bulging walls with 500 seated on the stage, leaving only room enough for the singer and his accompanist, Theodore Paxon, to reach the concert grand, those who had been able to get seats whistled, shouted, cheered and stamped the floor when hand-clapping seemed insufficient to bring forth a full quota of encores. They apparently expected the complete scores of all the Eddy musical shows of the picture screen. He gave a generous measure.

Program Aptly Varied

That the audience did not find their idol lacking in any of the artistry which brought him to top rank in pictures and radio, "was more than apparent. They saw and heard what they wanted. His program groupings gave him opportunity to select from the German, Italian, French, English and American composers. In his encores he acceded to requests for selections from the better musical comedies in which he has starred and with a bow to his Hollywood producers included the singing of "Who Are We To Say?" by Sigmund Romberg from his latest picture with Jeanette MacDonald, "The Girl of the Golden West" which comes to Loew's State and Orpheum Theatres Easter Week.

The Eddy concert was not in the familiar pattern of Symphony Hall but more in accordance with radio's formula of humanizing the figures of the operatic and concert stage. It did not go so far as presenting a rendition of "The Dipsy Doodle," although that number was done "operatica"v" on a Nelson Eddy radio program not long ago. But it combined the mimicry of the screen, the humor of radio and voice of song.

In his stuttering lament from "The Bartered Bride"; in "The Song of the Flea" and in a little French song, with explanations, of the poilu whose sweetheart married another, leaving nothing for him to do but go back to war, Eddy was at his comic best.

For more serious fare, Eddy offered Schubert's "Staendchen," the air, "An Jenem Tag" from "Hans Heiling," by Marschner; Tosti's "Ricordati Di Me," the air "Promesse de Mon Avenir," by Massenet, and three in English. "The Blind Ploughman," by R. Coningsby Clarke; "Her Voice," by John Alden Carpenter, and "My Sword For the King," by Michael Head. Works of MacDowell and Victor Herbert were included in encores.

Three years ago the Nelson Eddy of the concert stage was a more serious person. Today, after having met the demands of the camera and the microphone for romance and laughs, he appears to feel that Fate has decreed that he shall be a funny fellow, who invites audience laughter at the business of scratching imaginary fleas, the while his song is lost in the confusion. And so it was as a handsome, smiling, ingratiating singing comedian that he came in person to a Boston audience and sent his faithful followers home laughing with him.

The powerful baritone who could pour a world of tender feeling into such simple renditions as "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," was there yesterday but only for a fleeting moment. Boston looked upon and listened to a Hollywood personality in the Hollywood tradition.

Nelson Eddy Mobbed by Women After Symphony Hall Concert

B. Post - Mar. 28/38

212

BIG OVERFLOW AWAITS NELSON EDDY
Several hundred women outside Symphony Hall yesterday after concert by Nelson Eddy, movie singing star.

NELSON EDDY
Singing movie star, who appeared at Symphony Hall to packed house yesterday.

WOMEN MOB MOVIE STAR AT CONCERT

Nelson Eddy Unable to Leave Hall Due to Admirers

Nelson Eddy, handsome hero of the cinema, came to Boston yesterday to give a Symphony Hall concert, and when it was over proved to be such a success with the women that 3000 of them forced him to "hide" from them.

When the famous baritone finished his concert, which was one of the best attended concerts in years at the famous music hall, he was mobbed by 3000 people, mostly women, at the stage door.

The movie hero darted back inside and decided that it would be better for all concerned if he left the hall quietly and not in front of the crowds.

The women he feared would be trampled upon. Handsome Nelson opened a window from backstage and looked out at the crowd.

"How, ya?" he inquired as the hundreds of women cheered their movie hero.

Nelson's return to Boston was a most enjoyable one for him, for he turned the tables on some harsh critics.

"When I was here the last time, I was told I should go back to Hollywood and stay there," the good-looking baritone revealed as he came backstage after several encores by the largest crowd in Symphony Hall for a concert in years.

He had little to say for Boston interviewers, he said, as the things written and said about him the last time he was here on a concert sort of frightened him.

When he started to leave the theatre, he was literally mobbed. Extra police were in the vicinity from the Back Bay station, to hold the crowd of women back.

He in no way considers himself a huge success, despite the fact that he is. He said that he is still studying and still working hard.

He has finished a picture in which he co-starred with Jeanette MacDonald, and this picture will be shown in Boston theatres in the immediate future. "It's a great picture," Nelson said.

His future, he said, is wrapped up in three things. "I have three jobs, movies, radio and concert touring. I try to do them all well. I like them all and I am having a great time, really," he said.

ORCHESTRA SEASON ENDS

Boston Group Is Heard by Large Brooklyn Audience

June 9/21

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, closed its fifty-second season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. A capacity audience attended.

Announcement was made that the orchestra would return next year for a series of five concerts. The dates of the 1938-39 series are Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 9, March 10 and March 31.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

April 3—Free lecture on Boston Symphony Orchestra program by John B. Archer, auspices Monday Morning Musical Club; Providence Public Library, 4 p. m.

April 5—Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor; Metropolitan Theatre, 8:15 p. m.

NELSON EDDY RECITAL

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The old injunction, "young man go West" is still good advice if the young man is a singer and by West, is meant Hollywood. It were idle to pretend tha' Nelson Eddy's recital at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon would have sold out, as it did, two months ago, if that agreeable baritone had not already won the heart of the Boston public through his appearances on the screen. Besides packing the hall and the stage Mr. Eddy's admirers thronged the stage door at the beginning and end of the concert and had to be kept in order by mounted policemen.

Be it said to Mr. Eddy's credit that his programme did not consist entirely of numbers of a popular nature. He even began with Bach, a characteristically repetitious air, "Good Fellows, Be Merry!" from the Peasant Cantata; and his opening group found room for Schubert's Serenade, Wolf's "Er Ist's" and the aria "An jenem Tag", from Marschner's romantic opera, "Hans Heiling." The remainder of the programme announced airs by Legrenzi and Massenet, songs by Tosi, Carpenter, Clarke and Head.

As concert singer, Mr. Eddy has much in his favor, a pleasing stage manner, a prepossessing face and figure, a smooth and, for the most purposes, sufficiently powerful voice. One may hardly expect from him subtleties in the matter of interpretation, but he sings musically and with taste, though some yesterday were distressed by his arbitrary altering of the end of "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," which he sang "by request" after the air of Bach. The most interesting number on the programme was the aforesaid air by Marschner. We read in the history books that Wagner learned from Marschner as well as from Weber, but concrete examples of the former indebtedness is seldom offered us. "An jenem Tag" is full of suggestions of the "Tannhaeuser" which was to come.

Mr. Eddy was ably accompanied yesterday by Theodore Paxson who also appeared as soloist playing the Twelth Rhapsody of Liszt.

Star Mobbed by 500 Women

cation now will be indefinite—st some city in central Europe.

* * *

t the Hawaiian Paradise's circus ty, Barbara Stankyck and bert Taylor were photographed many times they hardly had time eat. The pair came in western fits, both wearing white hats, ck shirts and chaps. Taylor gingly posed holding up a dwarf.
he refused to get up on the r and do a big apple.
"If I did," he said, "somebody uld see the picture and say I s drunk."
ob is sensitive about publicity
, and you can't blame him.
wever, Dick Arlen, Bob Young
Edgar Kennedy big-appled to glare of flash bulbs. Joan Crawcame as a bareback rider, and did Wendy Barrie and Anita tour with Lou Holtz when a heart attack wrote an untimely finish to her career . . . Honey Chile Wilder and John King are a new twosome. If you know Honey Chile, get her to tell you about her test for Scarlett O'Hara.

* * *

The late Jack Gilbert could have told Stokowski how hard it was to lead Garbo to the altar. Jack once got her as far as Yuma. . . . Mitzi Mackar, the dancer, is taking up a lot of Maxie Rosenbloom's time at his club these evenings. . . . And did you hear about the two agents watching a certain actor go up to the desk at the Lido? Said one to the other; "Look at that ham! Taking 90 per cent of our dough!"

—LIFT OPPRESSIVE TAXES—

amateurs take the stage after the Friday night show.

—ENCOURAGE AMERICAN INDUSTRY—

Nora Ford in Howard Show

One of burlesque's special darlings, Nora Ford, will preside with all her smiles and charms over the "Scan-tees" frolic billed for the week at the Old Howard. La Ford ranks among the prime Howard favorites. She has "it" and the pep that marks the burlesque queen.

Comic Benny Moore, Diana Logan (of exotic dance fame) and Manny King, who rivals Moore for comic Country and the Woman," with George Brent and Beverly Roberts in the stellar role

AMUSEMENTS
NOW!
COLUMBIA
WASH. ST.
Again.. WE DARE TO LEAD
OUTSTANDING BURLESQUE SHOW

CROWDS IN RUSH AT NELSON EDDY

Police Here Save Singer From Eager Admirers

By JOHN BARRY

Nothing short of a troop of mounted police was needed to rescue Nelson Eddy, blond baritone heart throb of screen and radio, from screaming thousands of feminine fans who mobbed him at the stage door of Symphony Hall after his Boston concert yesterday afternoon.

To convoy the young singer whose screen romances with Jeanette MacDonald and radio tiffs with Charlie McCarthy have moved him into the top rank of box office attractions, Division 16 had to gallop six mounted police officers to the scene. With a horse to the right of him and a horse to the left of him, into the jaws of button tearing, autograph seeking fandom gallantly strode Nelson.

If his feet were on the pavement it could not be proved. Not even Eddy could testify to that. There was a swirl of horses and humanity, galloping hoofs beating a path around the taxi, and he made it. Small wonder that he tried to make the previous hours of his visit here a dark secret and remained practically incognito at his Statler. rooms all day Saturday and Sunday without giving a word of publicity to his presence in town..

Wild Cheers Greet Him

Police anticipated something of a crush five weeks ago when Symphony Hall was sold out on the announcement that the star of "Rosalie," "Rose Marie," "The Firefly" and other musical successes was to make a concert appearance in Boston. Two mounted officers and the usual traffic men were on hand before the concert yesterday, but they were practically jostled into the Fenway. When Eddy's cab arrived it seemed doubtful that he would be able to cross the walk in time for his concert. With little more than the encouragement of police, who suggested that he "hit the line," Eddy

Eddy
Continued on Page 10

Eddy—

Continued from the First Page

whirled through to safety. Two hours and a half later the reserves were on hand and they got him out again.

Inside Symphony's bulging walls with 500 seated on the stage, leaving only room enough for the singer and his accompanist, Theodore Paxon, to reach the concert grand, those who had been able to get seats whistled, shouted, cheered and stamped the floor when handclapping seemed insufficient to bring forth a full quota of encores. They apparently expected the complete scores of all the Eddy musical shows of the picture screen. He gave a generous measure.

Program Aptly Varied

That the audience did not find their idol lacking in any of the artistry which brought him to top rank in pictures and radio, "was more than apparent. They saw and heard what they wanted. His program groupings gave him opportunity to select from the German, Italian, French, English and American composers. In his encores he acceded to requests for selections from the better musical comedies in which he has starred and with a bow to his Hollywood producers included the singing of "Who Are We To Say?" by Sigmund Romberg from his latest picture with Jeanette MacDonald, "The Girl of the Golden West" which comes to Loew's State and Orpheum Theatres Easter Week.

The Eddy concert was not in the familiar pattern of Symphony Hall but more in accordance with radio's formula of humanizing the figures of the operatic and concert stage. It did not go so far as presenting a rendition of "The Dipsy Doodle," although that number was done "operatica''v" on a Nelson Eddy radio program not long ago. But it combined the mimicry of the screen, the humor of radio and voice of song.

In his stuttering lament from "The Bartered Bride"; in "The Song of the Flea" and in a little French song, with explanations, of the poilu whose sweetheart married another, leaving nothing for him to do but go back to war, Eddy was at his comic best.

For m re serious fare, Eddy offered Schubert's "Staendchen," the air, "An Jenem Tag" from "Hans Heiling," by Marschner; Tosti's "Ricordati Di Me," the air "Promesse de Mon Avenir," by Massenet, and three in English, "The Blind Ploughman," by R. Coningsby Clarke; "Her Voice," by John Alden Carpenter, and "My Sword For the King," by Michael Head. Works of MacDowell and Victor Herbert were included in encores.

Three years ago the Nelson Eddy of the concert stage was a more serious person. Today, after having met the demands of the camera and the microphone for romance and laughs, he appears to feel that Fate has decreed that he shall be a funny fellow, who invites audience laughter at the business of scratching imaginary fleas, the while his song is lost in the confusion. And so it was as a handsome, smiling, ingratiating singing comedian that he came in person to a Boston audience and sent his faithful followers home laughing with him.

The powerful baritone who could pour a world of tender feeling into such simple renditions as "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," was there yesterday but only for a fleeting moment. Boston looked upon and listened to a Hollywood personality in the Hollywood tradition.

213

Prokofieff Novelty Played

Koussevitzky Presents Ballet Suite at Boston Symphony Concert

Ap. 1 N Y Sun

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

At the fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky set before his New York admirers last night a novelty from Soviet Russia, arrived by way of Prague, Paris and London. This was the second of two orchestral suites compiled by Serge Prokofieff from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," composed in 1935 for the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow.

The first suite reached America a year ago, when the composer conducted it in Chicago. The second had its introduction to this country only last Friday when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it for the first time in Boston. That the ballet itself will be imported seems most unlikely, Apparently it is best remembered because of its substitution of a happy ending for the final tragedy. Juliet didn't die, though Romeo went through the travail of thinking her dead. Mr. Prokofieff was not called upon to set Shakespeare. Gounod's opera and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia are not less Shakespearean in feeling. Nor are they, today, more full of musical cliches than is this relatively new music by the man of Sontsovka.

Of the seven sections or numbers in the suite heard last night that which is styled "Romeo at Juliet's Grave," an adagio funebre, has both a Tschaikowskyan and a Gounodian feeling, but this Romeo's supposed sorrow is quite as empty as the grave of his unperishing Juliet. Something of characterization is essayed in other parts of the suite. The Montagues and Capulets swagger with little of distinction through the opening allegro; Juliet is portrayed in music as naive as herself in the succeeding vivace; Friar Laurence is represented by two themes of an andante, neither of which grants him much of flesh and blood. There are two dances, one of which has to do with West Indian slave girls, and there is a fairly extended movement devoted to the parting of the lovers, lyrical but commonplace. The music is at times mildly dissonant, but is prevailingly traditional in character rather than advanced or adventurous. The writing is clear and the scoring has Prokofieff's usual neatness and precision. But this is scarcely the music to be expected in his full maturity from the young man who once had the world by the ears with his "Scythian" suite.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players met every obligation the novelty imposed upon them and more. For, the performance had a fervor the music itself did not convey. There was much superb playing also in Haydn's G major symphony, No. 88—one of the twelve written for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and in the Brahms C minor, where the brasses particularly distinguished themselves in spite of one conspicuous blemish. The Haydn performance was on the robust side, but not to the sacrifice of finesse. Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms has mellowed until now there may be reason to regard his conception of the first symphony as a little too easy going and variable of pace rather than too tense and brittle.

With tomorrow afternoon's concert the Bostonians will conclude their New York visits for this season. The first of the farewells last night resulted in a succession of demonstrations for the conductor and the orchestra.

World-Telegram

RAM, FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1938.

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Gives First of Its Last Two Concerts for This Season, Playing Second Suite of Prokolieff's "Romeo and Juliet"

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Sym-gave the first of its last two conn, introducing to New York kofieff's ballet, "Romeo and re Haydn's symphony in G

WORDS WITHOUT MUSIC

By LOUIS REID

Music Features & Photo Syndicate

in America in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in January, 1937.

The second suite, which enjoyed an initial performance in Russia last year, had its American premiere in Boston last Friday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it as part of an all-Prokofieff program.

The suite, divided into seven sections, is descriptive of various stages in the tragedy, with one or two interpolated divertissements, the titles being "The Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Friar Laurence," "Dance," "Parting of Romeo and Juliet," "Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls" and "Romeo at Juliet's Grave."

Tomorrow afternoon in the same hall the orchestra will play a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee"; Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

Hall, save on those occasions when Leopold Stokowski is waving his eloquent fingers over the Philadelphia band . . . Among the former theatre orchestra conductors now writing scores for the movies are Hugo Riesenfeld and Frank Tours.

Another songwriter becomes an entertainer in a hotel restaurant. Vee Lawnhurst is now doing a singing - piano playing chore at Gotham's Essex House . . . Rudolf Friml, Jr., bandmaster, does not intend his father shall be the only composer in the family. He has written a suite and five piano solo compositions for early publication . . . Andre Kostelanetz' expert orchestra is not given enough to do in its radio programs. Talk and baritone solos are dominating the period . . . The Boston Symphony continues as the best drawing card of all visiting symphonic organizations at Carnegie

---

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

N. Y. Times

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Last-Night Performance of New York Season

April 1/38

HAYDN SYMPHONY PLAYED

New Music by Prokofieff and a Brahms Composition Also Win Much Applause

By OLIN DOWNES

In a considerable perspective of orchestral concerts this chronicler remembers few if any occasions when a Haydn symphony was applauded as last night after the opening performance of the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

It could be said that the sheer tone quality and the brilliancy of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization would have aroused extravagant plaudits under any circumstances. It could be added that the symphony itself, thrice familiar, is an experience always new and engrossing, granted the adequate interpretation. A further consideration could be attached to the above, as concerning slight differences of individual opinion in details of interpretation, as the slow pace of the theme and the variations, which seemed excessive. The sum of it all was a most brilliant and fascinating reading. Many an imposing finale of a concert receives cooler recognition than that extended the first item of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final evening program in New York this season.

Prokofieff Music Included

New music by Prokofieff followed, music composed for a ballet designed, apparently with typical Communist license, after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The program book might have vouchsafed us some information concerning Mr. Prokofieff's scenario to which mysterious reference is made in a review of the Russian première, which is quoted. From the information provided the conclusion is reached that Prokofieff composed music to a plot as different from Shakespeare's as the Hamlet to which Shostakovich, years ago, wrote music. It was different from the original conception of the Bard of Avon.

In that plot there was no ghost. The ghost was merely an invention of Hamlet to prey on the superstitions of a populace that he wished to rouse against the murder of his father. We find by the directions for the Prokofieff ballet that "Juliet's grave is a deception, though Romeo is unaware of the fact." The music, somewhat like unto Shostakovitch's, is predominantly satirical in tone. There is the partial suggestion of that which is poignant and tragic, but there is little of the sensuous or emotional, and in the main the music could bear almost any title and still serve for ballet evolutions, and have nothing to do with Romeo and Juliet.

Some of it is banal. Possibly, associated with the movements on the stage, its true meaning would be completed. Probably Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, compared with it, would be subject to the sneers of the sophisticates. There, however, we find something of Shakespeare, while in last night's offering we do not.

Brahms Symphony a Highlight

The Brahms First symphony, which ended the concert, was of the highest testimony to Dr. Koussevitzky's mastery, not only as conductor but as one who penetrates to the pith of the great masterpiece. His control of the orchestra was complete and imperious; his results were accomplished with an impressive simplicity and economy of effort. By the same token the interpretation was conspicuous for its intensity, merged in a noble form, and its sustained and accumulating power. The symphony was permitted to appear in its own gigantic lines and to speak for itself as a mountain peak against the sky speaks for itself. For the grand lines of the music were carved as by a master sculptor.

It was a classic conception, but not a pedantic one. Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to fling out the great chorale, when it appears, fully scored, toward the wild ending of the symphony, with a breadth that momentarily held in abeyance the momentum of the music. (And by the way, how superbly the same chorale was played, piano, by the trombones in the introduction!) There was the end of frantic rejoicing, the great cry for liberty that Brahms understood and that Beethoven voiced before him, the cry which at last is always heard, to the defeat of evil and the confusion of tyrants. Perhaps at no time would the great C minor symphony have meant more to an audience. And it is probable that on no previous occasion had Dr. Koussevitzky and his men given a more complete revelation of the composition. On its conclusion there was long applause and vociferous cheering.

Prokofieff in Retrospect; Farewell to the Opera

B. Herald Apr. 3/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

If Mr. Prokofieff chose to let us hear only his second-line works when he conducted the Boston Symphony last week, he still managed to stir up a good deal of interest. Probably it was a mistake to run two ballet suites on the same program. The people in the audience who are interested in the dance are bound to be irritated that they receive no visual satisfaction, though what they would have got out of the curious "Romeo and Juliet" libretto is hard to imagine. The more austerely musical part of the audience could be counted on to turn up their noses at ballet music as too slight for a concert, especially when combined with a children's piece and a brilliant, short piano concerto. In brief, Mr. Prokofieff was foreordained not to please all his public all the time.

We may forget his indiscreet interview, apparently sneering at the Boston public, for unquestionably his statement was distorted. He was obviously very much interested in the performance of "Peter and the Wolf" and wanted to try it out. The interview may also be forgotten because the public sensibly made no fuss about it and acted as though it had never appeared. In this Mr. Prokofieff was fortunate. It is tempting to fancy the reaction if it had been published in an Italian city or even in Paris.

THE PROGRAM INDIVIDUALLY

If we reflect on the program piece by piece and not as a single design, it can be admitted to contain works of considerable interest. The First Piano Concerto is not perhaps as fine as the later ones. Its form and development are less assured, though not obscure or clumsy. On the other hand it does not date, as one might expect of a work written in 1911 by a composer of 20 years. It is brilliant and effective. It needs no apology and can stand on its own merits. This, as a matter of fact, it did, for it was very cordially received by the audience.

The London critics of the "Romeo and Juliet" Suite were much upset because they failed to detect the breath of Shakespeare in Prokofieff's score. Did their predecessors express similar misgivings when first confronted with Tchaikovsky's Overture and Gounod's opera? This is carrying asthetic insight too far. The last scene of Romeo at the grave contains deeply impressive music. What does it matter if Friar Laurence suggests a Byzantine rather than a Roman priest? There is good music in the Suite, though its merits are unequal. The West Indian slave dance need not detain us, but "Juliet, the Maiden" is admirable.

"Peter and the Wolf" is just about perfect for what it sets out to achieve. Let us hope that the Cambridge committee for children's concerts will appropriate it for their series next season. It ought to sound well with fewer than the Boston Symphony's full string section. The themes are delightful and are so well contrasted that children ought to have no trouble in following them. There is no reason why the music as it stands would not make an excellent background for a Walt Disney picture. Indeed the music is immeasurably better than that which Mr. Disney usually has written for him. Prokofieff's score is charming without being saccharine.

MUSIC

Young Russia

Serge Prokofieff, famed Russian modernist composer, has a scunner against Boston. Seven years ago, when his Fourth Symphony was premièred there, supercilious Bostonians pooh-poohed it, critics even dared to suggest that it was written in too much of a hurry. Last week blond, lumbering Prokofieff, guest-conducting the Boston Symphony, evened the score. "If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," said irate Composer Prokofieff, "I'm going to give them simple things." One of the simple things was his Peter and the Wolf, a musical fairy tale written to teach the various sounds of the orchestral instruments.

Bostonians who found Peter and the Wolf lots of fun were not alone in not knowing when to applaud music by contemporary Russians. Two years ago, Soviet Russia officially banned "Leftist" tendencies in music and art, held up James Joyce's polyperverse novel Ulysses, "written in English that can hardly be understood by Englishmen," as a celebrated example. Two years before that, Nazi Germany had banned exactly the same types of modernistic art as kulturbolschewistisch.

Most prominent victim of the Soviet ban was Dmitri Shostakovich, Soviet composer-laureate, whose tricky, sensational opera Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, introduced to the U. S. in 1935 (TIME, Feb. 11, 1935), had become the rage of Manhattan's intellectuals. Lady Macbeth of Mzensk was withdrawn from Soviet theatres.* Composer Shostakovich's subsequent ballet, The Limpid Stream, was also withdrawn after a panning by Moscow critics, and his Fourth Symphony was suppressed without a performance. For two years Shostakovich was in the doghouse.

Meanwhile, Soviet musical authorities, who had suddenly developed a tremendous respect for such romantic 19th-Century composers as Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov (both previously considered horrible examples of bourgeois sentimentality), got themselves a new approved list of less modernistic composers. First to shine among the new group was young Ivan Dzerzhinsky, whose melodious, folksong-inspired opera And Quiet Flows the Don was contrasted favorably with that "muddle of sound, raucous cacophony and lascivious naturalism." Lady Macbeth. Most talented of the new group was shy, sandy-haired, 24-year-old Tykon Krennikov, whose deep, contemplative First Symphony was hailed by critic its

Sovfoto

SERGE PROKOFIEFF

For Boston, something sim

Manhattan première last year as the finest contemporary works of its Also basking in official favor were nosed Dmitri Kabalevsky, Cau Lev Knipper, and aging, conserv olas Miaskovsky, who was symphonies long before the Old Bol were dry behind the ears.

Last November, wiry, bespec Shostakovich, who had been laborin perately but unsuccessfully to get in with the new romantic-minded finally turned the trick in his Fifth phony and was promptly restored to grace. This symphony, described by mollified Moscow critics as "a work of great depth and emotional wealth," will be given its U. S. première over the air next week by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Artur Rodzinski.

Meanwhile 46-year-old Composer Prokofieff, who left Russia after the revolution of 1917 settled eventually with Composer Stravinsky, Impresario Diaghilev and other artistic émigrés in Paris, has also seen the light. Once a brilliant musical bad boy who followed the primitivist (Scythian Suite) and satiric, neo-classical (Classical Symphony) vogues of the sophisticated ballet music, he has today forsworn his "smart" past, moved back to the Soviet Union, and embarked on an expedition into what he describes as the "deeper realms of music." Compositions of his "deeper" period already include a Russian Overture and a ballet, Romeo and Juliet, excerpts of which were performed last week in Boston.

---

*The Soviet Government supports talented Soviet composers, but controls all rights to the performance and publication of their compositions, issues an approved few of these compositions to the outside world.

213

Prokofieff Novelty Played

Koussevitzky Presents Ballet Suite at Boston Symphony Concert

April 1 N Y Sun

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

At the fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky set before his New York admirers last night a novelty from Soviet Russia, arrived by way of Prague, Paris and London. This was the second of two orchestral suites compiled by Serge Prokofieff from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," composed in 1935 for the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow.

The first suite reached America a year ago, when the composer conducted it in Chicago. The second had its introduction to this country only last Friday when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it for the first time in Boston. That the ballet itself will be imported seems most unlikely. Apparently it is best remembered because of its substitution of a happy ending for the final tragedy. Juliet didn't die, though Romeo went through the travail of thinking her dead. Mr. Prokofieff was not called upon to set Shakespeare. Gounod's opera and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia are not less Shakespearean in feeling. Nor are they, today, more full of musical cliches than is this relatively new music by the man of Sontsovka.

Of the seven sections or numbers in the suite heard last night that which is styled "Romeo at Juliet's Grave," an adagio funebre, has both a Tschaikowskyan and a Gounodian feeling, but this Romeo's supposed sorrow is quite as empty as the grave of his unperishing Juliet. Something of characterization is essayed in other parts of the suite. The Montagues and Capulets swagger with little of distinction through the opening allegro; Juliet is portrayed in music as naive as herself in the succeeding vivace; Friar Laurence is represented by two themes of an andante, neither of which grants him much of flesh and blood. There are two dances, one of which has to do with West Indian slave girls, and there is a fairly extended movement devoted to the parting of the lovers, lyrical but commonplace. The music is at times mildly dissonant, but is prevailingly traditional in character rather than advanced or adventurous. The writing is clear and the scoring has Prokofieff's usual neatness and precision. But this is scarcely the music to be expected in his full maturity from the young man who once had the world by the ears with his "Scythian" suite.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players met every obligation the novelty imposed upon them and more. For the performance had a fervor the music itself did not convey. There was much superb playing also in Haydn's G major symphony, No. 88—one of the twelve written for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and in the Brahms C minor, where the brasses particularly distinguished themselves in spite of one conspicuous blemish. The Haydn performance was on the robust side, but not to the sacrifice of finesse. Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms has mellowed until now there may be reason to regard his conception of the first symphony as a little too easy going and variable of pace rather than too tense and brittle.

With tomorrow afternoon's concert the Bostonians will conclude their New York visits for this season. The first of the farewells last night resulted in a succession of demonstrations for the conductor and the orchestra.

World-Telegram

RAM, FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1938.

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Gives First of Its Last Two Concerts for This Season, Playing Second Suite of Prokolieff's "Romeo and Juliet"

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the first of its last two concerts in Carnegie Hall this sea the second suite from Serge Pı Juliet" (opus 64).

The remaining numbers w (No. 88) and Brahms' First Symphony.

The Prokofieff ballet, which, incidentally, is not the first based on Shakespeare's tragedy, was produced at the Bolshoi Theater, Moscow, in 1935.

Prokofieff made two orchestral suites from the work, the first of which was played for the first time in America in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in January, 1937.

The second suite, which enjoyed an initial performance in Russia last year, had its American premiere in Boston last Friday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it as part of an all-Prokofieff program.

The suite, divided into seven sections, is descriptive of various stages in the tragedy, with one or two interpolated divertissements, the titles being "The Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Friar Laurence," "Dance," "Parting of Romeo and Juliet," "Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls" and "Romeo at Juliet's Grave."

Tomorrow afternoon in the same hall the orchestra will play a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee"; Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

UNION CITY, IND.
GAZETTE
MAR 23 19

Hall, save on those occasions when Leopold Stokowski is waving his eloquent fingers over the Philadelphia band . . . Among the former theatre orchestra conductors now writing scores for the movies are Hugo Riesenfeld and Frank Tours.

Another songwriter becomes an entertainer in a hotel restaurant. Vee Lawnhurst is now doing a singing - piano playing chore at Gotham's Essex House . . . Rudolf Friml, Jr., bandmaster, does not intend his father shall be the only composer in the family. He has written a suite and five piano solo compositions for early publication . . . Andre Kostelanetz' expert orchestra is not given enough to do in its radio programs. Talk and baritone solos are dominating the period . . . The Boston Symphony continues as the best drawing card of all visiting symphonic organizations at Carnegie

---

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's TIMES.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

N. Y. Times

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Last-Night Performance of New York Season

April 1/38

HAYDN SYMPHONY PLAYED

New Music by Prokofieff and a Brahms Composition Also Win Much Applause

By OLIN DOWNES

In a considerable perspective of orchestral concerts this chronicler remembers few if any occasions when a Haydn symphony was applauded as last night after the opening performance of the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

It could be said that the sheer tone quality and the brilliancy of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization would have aroused extravagant plaudits under any circumstances. It could be added that the symphony itself, thrice familiar, is an experience always new and engrossing, granted the adequate interpretation. A further consideration could be attached to the above, as concerning slight differences of individual opinion in details of interpretation, as the slow pace of the theme and the variations, which seemed excessive. The sum of it all was a most brilliant and fascinating reading. Many an imposing finale of a concert receives cooler recognition than that extended the first item of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final evening program in New York this season.

Prokofieff Music Included

New music by Prokofieff followed, music composed for a ballet designed, apparently with typical Communist license, after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The program book might have vouchsafed us some information concerning Mr. Prokofieff's scenario to which mysterious reference is made in a review of the Russian première, which is quoted. From the information provided the conclusion is reached that Prokofieff composed music to a plot as different from Shakespeare's as the Hamlet to which Shostakovich, years ago, wrote music. It was different from the original conception of the Bard of Avon.

In that plot there was no ghost. The ghost was merely an invention of Hamlet to prey on the superstitions of a populace that he wished to rouse against the murder of his father. We find by the directions for the Prokofieff ballet that "Juliet's grave is a deception, though Romeo is unaware of the fact." The music, somewhat like unto Shostakovitch's, is predominantly satirical in tone. There is the partial suggestion of that which is poignant and tragic, but there is little of the sensuous or emotional, and in the main the music could bear almost any title and still serve for ballet evolutions, and have nothing to do with Romeo and Juliet.

Some of it is banal. Possibly, associated with the movements on the stage, its true meaning would be completed. Probably Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, compared with it, would be subject to the sneers of the sophisticates. There, however, we find something of Shakespeare, while in last night's offering we do not.

Brahms Symphony a Highlight

The Brahms First symphony, which ended the concert, was of the highest testimony to Dr. Koussevitzky's mastery, not only as conductor but as one who penetrates to the pith of the great masterpiece. His control of the orchestra was complete and imperious; his results were accomplished with an impressive simplicity and economy of effort. By the same token the interpretation was conspicuous for its intensity, merged in a noble form, and its sustained and accumulating power. The symphony was permitted to appear in its own gigantic lines and to speak for itself as a mountain peak against the sky speaks for itself. For the grand lines of the music were carved as by a master sculptor.

It was a classic conception, but not a pedantic one. Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to fling out the great chorale, when it appears, fully scored, toward the wild ending of the symphony, with a breadth that momentarily held in abeyance the momentum of the music. (And by the way, how superbly the same chorale was played, piano, by the trombones in the introduction!) There was the end of frantic rejoicing, the great cry for liberty that Brahms understood and that Beethoven voiced before him, the cry which at last is always heard, to the defeat of evil and the confusion of tyrants. Perhaps at no time would the great C minor symphony have meant more to an audience. And it is probable that on no previous occasion had Dr. Koussevitzky and his men given a more complete revelation of the composition. On its conclusion there was long applause and vociferous cheering.

Prokofieff in Retrospect; Farewell to the Opera

B. Herald Apr. 3/38

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

If Mr. Prokofieff chose to let us hear only his second-line works when he conducted the Boston Symphony last week, he still managed to stir up a good deal of interest. Probably it was a mistake to run two ballet suites on the same program. The people in the audience who are interested in the dance are bound to be irritated that they receive no visual satisfaction, though what they would have got out of the curious "Romeo and Juliet" libretto is hard to imagine. The more austerely musical part of the audience could be counted on to turn up their noses at ballet music as too slight for a concert, especially when combined with a children's piece and a brilliant, short piano concerto. In brief, Mr. Prokofieff was foreordained not to please all his public all the time.

We may forget his indiscreet interview, apparently sneering at the Boston public, for unquestionably his statement was distorted. He was obviously very much interested in the performance of "Peter and the Wolf" and wanted to try it out. The interview may also be forgotten because the public sensibly made no fuss about it and acted as though it had never appeared. In this Mr. Prokofieff was fortunate. It is tempting to fancy the reaction if it had been published in an Italian city or even in Paris.

THE PROGRAM INDIVIDUALLY

If we reflect on the program piece by piece and not as asingle design, it can be admitted to contain works of considerable interest. The First Piano Concerto is not perhaps as fine as the later ones. Its form and development are less assured, though not obscure or clumsy. On the other hand it does not date, as one might expect of a work written in 1911 by a composer of 20 years. It is brilliant and effective. It needs no apology and can stand on its own merits. This, as a matter of fact, it did, for it was very cordially received by the audience.

The London critics of the "Romeo and Juliet" Suite were much upset because they failed to detect the breath of Shakespeare in Prokofieff's score. Did their predecessors express similar misgivings when first confronted with Tchaikovsky's Overture and Gounod's opera? This is carrying asthetic insight too far. The last scene of Romeo at the grave contains deeply impressive music. What does it matter if Friar Laurence suggests a Byzantine rather than a Roman priest? There is good music in the Suite, though its merits are unequal. The West Indian slave dance need not detain us, but "Juliet, the Maiden" is admirable.

"Peter and the Wolf" is just about perfect for what it sets out to achieve. Let us hope that the Cambridge committee for children's concerts will appropriate it for their series next season. It ought to sound well with fewer than the Boston Symphony's full string section. The themes are delightful and are so well contrasted that children ought to have no trouble in following them. There is no reason why the music as it stands would not make an excellent background for a Walt Disney picture. Indeed the music is immeasurably better than that which Mr. Disney usually has written for him. Prokofieff's score is charming without being saccharine.

MUSIC

Young Russia

Serge Prokofieff, famed Russian modernist composer, has a scunner against Boston. Seven years ago, when his Fourth Symphony was premièred there, supercilious Bostonians pooh-poohed it, critics even dared to suggest that it was written in too much of a hurry. Last week blond, lumbering Prokofieff, guest-conducting the Boston Symphony, evened the score. "If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," said irate Composer Prokofieff, "I'm going to give them simple things." One of the simple things was his Peter and the Wolf, a musical fairy tale written to teach the various sounds of the orchestral instruments.

Bostonians who found Peter and the Wolf lots of fun were not alone in not knowing when to applaud music by contemporary Russians. Two years ago, Soviet Russia officially banned "Leftist" tendencies in music and art, held up James Joyce's polyperverse novel Ulysses, "written in English that can hardly be understood by Englishmen," as a celebrated example. Two years before that, Nazi Germany had banned exactly the same types of modernistic art as kulturbolschewistisch.

Most prominent victim of the Soviet ban was Dmitri Shostakovich, Soviet composer-laureate, whose tricky, sensational opera Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, introduced to the U. S. in 1935 (TIME, Feb. 11, 1935), had become the rage of Manhattan's intellectuals. Lady Macbeth of Mzensk was withdrawn from Soviet theatres.* Composer Shostakovich's subsequent ballet, The Limpid Stream, was also withdrawn after a panning by Moscow critics, and his Fourth Symphony was suppressed without a performance. For two years Shostakovich was in the doghouse.

Meanwhile, Soviet musical authorities, who had suddenly developed a tremendous respect for such romantic 19th-Century composers as Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov (both previously considered horrible examples of bourgeois sentimentality), got themselves a new approved list of less modernistic composers. First to shine among the new group was young Ivan Dzerzhinsky, whose melodious, folksong-inspired opera And Quiet Flows the Don was contrasted favorably with that "muddle of sound, raucous cacophony and lascivious naturalism." Lady Macbeth. Most talented of the new group was shy, sandy-haired, 24-year-old Tykon Krennikov, whose deep, contemplative First Symphony was hailed by critic [illegible] its

Sovfoto

SERGE PROKOFIEFF

For Boston, something sim

Manhattan première last year as the finest contemporary works of i[illegible] Also basking in official favor were [illegible]nosed Dmitri Kabalevsky, Cau[illegible] Lev Knipper, and aging, conserv[illegible] olas Miaskovsky, who was [illegible] symphonies long before the Old Bol[illegible] were dry behind the ears.

Last November, wiry, bespe[illegible] Shostakovich, who had been laboring [illegible]perately but unsuccessfully to get in [illegible] with the new romantic-minded [illegible] finally turned the trick in his Fifth Symphony and was promptly restored to gra[illegible] This symphony, described by mollified Moscow critics as "a work of great depth and emotional wealth," will be given its U. S. première over the air next week by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Artur Rodzinski.

Meanwhile 46-year-old Composer Prokofieff, who left Russia after the revolution of 1917 settled eventually with Composer Stravinsky, Impresario Diaghilev and other artistic émigrés in Paris, has also seen the light. Once a brilliant musical bad boy who followed the primitivist (Scythian Suite) and satiric, neo-classical (Classical Symphony) vogues of the sophisticated ballet music, he has today forsworn his "smart" past, moved back to the Soviet Union, and embarked on an expedition into what he describes as the "deeper realms of music." Compositions of his "deeper" period already include a Russian Overture and a ballet, Romeo and Juli[illegible] excerpts of which were performed la[illegible] week in Boston.

---

*The Soviet Government supports talented Soviet composers, but controls all rights to the performance and publication of their compositions, issues an approved few of these compositions to the outside world.

Prokofieff Novelty Played

23

Koussevitzky Presents Ballet Suite at Boston Symphony Concert

April 1 N Y Sun

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

At the fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky set before his New York admirers last night a novelty from Soviet Russia, arrived by way of Prague, Paris and London. This was the second of two orchestral suites compiled by Serge Prokofieff from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," composed in 1935 for the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow.

The first suite reached America a year ago, when the composer conducted it in Chicago. The second had its introduction to this country only last Friday when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it for the first time in Boston. That the ballet itself will be imported seems most unlikely. Apparently it is best remembered because of its substitution of a happy ending for the final tragedy. Juliet didn't die, though Romeo went through the travail of thinking her dead. Mr. Prokofieff was not called upon to set Shakespeare. Gounod's opera and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia are not less Shakespearean in feeling. Nor are they, today, more full of musical cliches than is this relatively new music by the man of Sontsovka.

Of the seven sections or numbers in the suite heard last night that which is styled "Romeo at Juliet's Grave," an adagio funebre, has both a Tschaikowskyan and a Gounodian feeling, but this Romeo's supposed sorrow is quite as empty as the grave of his unperishing Juliet. Something of characterization is essayed in other parts of the suite. The Montagues and Capulets swagger with little of distinction through the opening allegro; Juliet is portrayed in music as naive as herself in the succeeding vivace; Friar Laurence is represented by two themes of an andante, neither of which grants him much of flesh and blood. There are two dances, one of which has to do with West Indian slave girls, and there is a fairly extended movement devoted to the parting of the lovers, lyrical but commonplace. The music is at times mildly dissonant, but is prevailingly traditional in character rather than advanced or adventurous. The writing is clear and the scoring has Prokofieff's usual neatness and precision. But this is scarcely the music to be expected in his full maturity from the young man who once had the world by the ears with his "Scythian" suite.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players met every obligation the novelty imposed upon them and more. For the performance had a fervor the music itself did not convey. There was much superb playing also in Haydn's G major symphony, No. 88—one of the twelve written for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and in the Brahms C minor, where the brasses particularly distinguished themselves in spite of one conspicuous blemish. The Haydn performance was on the robust side, but not to the sacrifice of finesse. Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms has mellowed until now there may be reason to regard his conception of the first symphony as a little too easy going and variable of pace rather than too tense and brittle.

With tomorrow afternoon's concert the Bostonians will conclude their New York visits for this season. The first of the farewells last night resulted in a succession of demonstrations for the conductor and the orchestra.

World-Telegram

RAM, FRIDAY, APRIL 1, 1938.

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Gives First of Its Last Two Concerts for This Season, Playing Second Suite of Prokofieff's "Romeo and Juliet"

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the first of its last two concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, introducing to New York the second suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" (opus 64).

The remaining numbers were Haydn's symphony in G (No. 88) and Brahms' First Symphony.

The Prokofieff ballet, which, incidentally, is not the first based on Shakespeare's tragedy, was produced at the Bolshoi Theater, Moscow, in 1935.

Prokofieff made two orchestral suites from the work, the first of which was played for the first time in America in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in January, 1937.

The second suite, which enjoyed an initial performance in Russia last year, had its American premiere in Boston last Friday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it as part of an all-Prokofieff program.

The suite, divided into seven sections, is descriptive of various stages in the tragedy, with one or two interpolated divertissements, the titles being "The Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Friar Laurence," "Dance," "Parting of Romeo and Juliet," "Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls" and "Romeo at Juliet's Grave."

Tomorrow afternoon in the same hall the orchestra will play a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee"; Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

Hall, save on [illegible] Leopold Stokowski is [illegible] eloquent fingers over the Philadelphia band . . . Among the former theatre orchestra conductors now writing scores for the movies are Hugo Riesenfeld and Frank Tours.

Another songwriter becomes an entertainer in a hotel restaurant. Vee Lawnhurst is now doing a singing - piano playing chore at Gotham's Essex House . . . Rudolf Friml, Jr., bandmaster, does not intend his father shall be the only composer in the family. He has written a suite and five piano solo compositions for early publication . . . Andre Kostelanetz' expert orchestra is not given enough to do in its radio programs. Talk and baritone solos are dominating the period . . . The Boston Symphony continues as the best drawing card of all visiting symphonic organizations at Carnegie

---

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

N. Y. Times

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Last-Night Performance of New York Season

April 1/38

HAYDN SYMPHONY PLAYED

New Music by Prokofieff and a Brahms Composition Also Win Much Applause

By OLIN DOWNES

In a considerable perspective of orchestral concerts this chronicler remembers few if any occasions when a Haydn symphony was applauded as last night after the opening performance of the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

It could be said that the sheer tone quality and the brilliancy of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization would have aroused extravagant plaudits under any circumstances. It could be added that the symphony itself, thrice familiar, is an experience always new and engrossing, granted the adequate interpretation. A further consideration could be attached to the above, as concerning slight differences of individual opinion in details of interpretation, as the slow pace of the theme and the variations, which seemed excessive. The sum of it all was a most brilliant and fascinating reading. Many an imposing finale of a concert receives cooler recognition than that extended the first item of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final evening program in New York this season.

Prokofieff Music Included

New music by Prokofieff followed, music composed for a ballet designed, apparently with typical Communist license, after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The program book might have vouchsafed us some information concerning Mr. Prokofieff's scenario to which mysterious reference is made in a review of the Russian première, which is quoted. From the information provided the conclusion is reached that Prokofieff composed music to a plot as different from Shakespeare's as the Hamlet to which Shostakovich, years ago, wrote music. It was different from the original conception of the Bard of Avon.

In that plot there was no ghost. The ghost was merely an invention of Hamlet to prey on the superstitions of a populace that he wished to rouse against the murder of his father. We find by the directions for the Prokofieff ballet that "Juliet's grave is a deception, though Romeo is unaware of the fact." The music, somewhat like unto Shostakovitch's, is predominantly satirical in tone. There is the partial suggestion of that which is poignant and tragic, but there is little of the sensuous or emotional, and in the main the music could bear almost any title and still serve for ballet evolutions, and have nothing to do with Romeo and Juliet.

Some of it is banal. Possibly, associated with the movements on the stage, its true meaning would be completed. Probably Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, compared with it, would be subject to the sneers of the sophisticates. There, however, we find something of Shakespeare, while in last night's offering we do not.

Brahms Symphony a Highlight

The Brahms First symphony, which ended the concert, was of the highest testimony to Dr. Koussevitzky's mastery, not only as conductor but as one who penetrates to the pith of the great masterpiece. His control of the orchestra was complete and imperious; his results were accomplished with an impressive simplicity and economy of effort. By the same token the interpretation was conspicuous for its intensity, merged in a noble form, and its sustained and accumulating power. The symphony was permitted to appear in its own gigantic lines and to speak for itself as a mountain peak against the sky speaks for itself. For the grand lines of the music were carved as by a master sculptor.

It was a classic conception, but not a pedantic one. Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to fling out the great chorale, when it appears, fully scored, toward the wild ending of the symphony, with a breadth that momentarily held in abeyance the momentum of the music. (And by the way, how superbly the same chorale was played, piano, by the trombones in the introduction!) There was the end of frantic rejoicing, the great cry for liberty that Brahms understood and that Beethoven voiced before him, the cry which at last is always heard, to the defeat of evil and the confusion of tyrants. Perhaps at no time would the great C minor symphony have meant more to an audience. And it is probable that on no previous occasion had Dr. Koussevitzky and his men given a more complete revelation of the composition. On its conclusion there was long applause and vociferous cheer-

---

Prokofieff in Retrospect; Farewell to the Opera

3

Herald

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Apr. 3/38

If Mr. Prokofieff chose to let us hear only his second-line works when he conducted the Boston Symphony last week, he still managed to stir up a good deal of interest. Probably it was a mistake to run two ballet suites on the same program. The people in the audience who are interested in the dance are bound to be irritated that they receive no visual satisfaction, though what they would have got out of the curious "Romeo and Juliet" libretto is hard to imagine. The more austerely musical part of the audience could be counted on to turn up their noses at ballet music as too slight for a concert, especially when combined with a children's piece and a brilliant, short piano concerto. In brief, Mr. Prokofieff was foreordained not to please all his public all the time.

We may forget his indiscreet interview, apparently sneering at the Boston public, for unquestionably his statement was distorted. He was obviously very much interested in the performance of "Peter and the Wolf" and wanted to try it out. The interview may also be forgotten because the public sensibly made no fuss about it and acted as though it had never appeared. In this Mr. Prokofieff was fortunate. It is tempting to fancy the reaction if it had been published in an Italian city or even in Paris.

THE PROGRAM INDIVIDUALLY

If we reflect on the program piece by piece and not as a single design, it can be admitted to contain works of considerable interest. The First Piano Concerto is not perhaps as fine as the later ones. Its form and development are less assured, though not obscure or clumsy. On the other hand it does not date, as one might expect of a work written in 1911 by a composer of 20 years. It is brilliant and effective. It needs no apology and can stand on its own merits. This, as a matter of fact, it did, for it was very cordially received by the audience.

The London critics of the "Romeo and Juliet" Suite were much upset because they failed to detect the breath of Shakespeare in Prokofieff's score. Did their predecessors express similar misgivings when first confronted with Tchaikovsky's Overture and Gounod's opera? This is carrying asthetic insight too far. The last scene of Romeo at the grave contains deeply impressive music. What does it matter if Friar Laurence suggests a Byzantine rather than a Roman priest? There is good music in the Suite, though its merits are unequal. The West Indian slave dance need not detain us, but "Juliet, the Maiden" is admirable.

"Peter and the Wolf" is just about perfect for what it sets out to achieve. Let us hope that the Cambridge committee for children's concerts will appropriate it for their series next season. It ought to sound well with fewer than the Boston Symphony's full string section. The themes are delightful and are so well contrasted that children ought to have no trouble in following them. There is no reason why the music as it stands would not make an excellent background for a Walt Disney picture. Indeed the music is immeasurably better than that which Mr. Disney usually has written for him. Prokofieff's score is charming without being saccharine.

MUSIC

Time Magazine

Young Russia

Apr. 9/38

Serge Prokofieff, famed Russian modernist composer, has a scunner against Boston. Seven years ago, when his Fourth Symphony was premièred there, supercilious Bostonians pooh-poohed it, critics even dared to suggest that it was written in too much of a hurry. Last week blond, lumbering Prokofieff, guest-conducting the Boston Symphony, evened the score. "If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," said irate Composer Prokofieff, "I'm going to give them simple things." One of the simple things was his Peter and the Wolf, a musical fairy tale written to teach the various sounds of the orchestral instruments.

Bostonians who found Peter and the Wolf lots of fun were not alone in not knowing when to applaud music by contemporary Russians. Two years ago, Soviet Russia officially banned "Leftist" tendencies in music and art, held up James Joyce's polyperverse novel Ulysses, "written in English that can hardly be understood by Englishmen," as a celebrated example. Two years before that, Nazi Germany had banned exactly the same types of modernistic art as kulturbolschewistisch.

Most prominent victim of the Soviet ban was Dmitri Shostakovich, Soviet composer-laureate, whose tricky, sensational opera Lady Macbeth of Mzensk, introduced to the U. S. in 1935 (TIME, Feb. 11, 1935), had become the rage of Manhattan's intellectuals. Lady Macbeth of Mzensk was withdrawn from Soviet theatres.* Composer Shostakovich's subsequent ballet, The Limpid Stream, was also withdrawn after a panning by Moscow critics, and his Fourth Symphony was suppressed without a performance. For two years Shostakovich was in the doghouse.

Meanwhile, Soviet musical authorities, who had suddenly developed a tremendous respect for such romantic 19th-Century composers as Tchaikovsky and Rimsky-Korsakov (both previously considered horrible examples of bourgeois sentimentality), got themselves a new approved list of less modernistic composers. First to shine among the new group was young Ivan Dzerzhinsky, whose melodious, folksong-inspired opera And Quiet Flows the Don was contrasted favorably with that "muddle of sound, raucous cacophony and lascivious naturalism," Lady Macbeth. Most talented of the new group was shy, sandy-haired, 24-year-old Tykon Krennikov, whose deep, contemplative First Symphony was hailed by critics at its Manhattan première last year as one of the finest contemporary works of its kind. Also basking in official favor were long-nosed Dmitri Kabalevsky, Caucasus-born Lev Knipper, and aging, conservative Nicolas Miaskovsky, who was composing symphonies long before the Old Bolsheviks were dry behind the ears.

Sovfoto

SERGE PROKOFIEFF

For Boston, something simple.

Last November, wiry, bespectacled Shostakovich, who had been laboring desperately but unsuccessfully to get in line with the new romantic-minded order, finally turned the trick in his Fifth Symphony and was promptly restored to grace. This symphony, described by mollified Moscow critics as "a work of great depth and emotional wealth," will be given its U. S. première over the air next week by the NBC Symphony Orchestra under Conductor Artur Rodzinski.

Meanwhile 46-year-old Composer Prokofieff, who left Russia after the revolution of 1917 settled eventually with Composer Stravinsky, Impresario Diaghilev and other artistic émigrés in Paris, has also seen the light. Once a brilliant musical bad boy who followed the primitivist (Scythian Suite) and satiric, neo-classical (Classical Symphony) vogues of the sophisticated ballet music, he has today forsworn his "smart" past, moved back to the Soviet Union, and embarked on an expedition into what he describes as the "deeper realms of music." Compositions of his "deeper" period already include a Russian Overture and a ballet, Romeo and Juliet, excerpts of which were performed last week in Boston.

---

*The Soviet Government supports talented Soviet composers, but controls all rights to the performance and publication of their compositions, issues an approved few of these compositions to the outside world.

Wave of Popular Interest in Symphony Music Now Sweeping From Hub Across Country---Even Young People Clamor for It

Howard Barlow, young American conductor of the Columbia Broadcasting System's symphony orchestra.

(At Right) An informal snapshot of Dr. Koussevitzky conducting a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BY GUS LEONARD

SYMPHONITIS!

That's the latest fad to hit conservative Boston!

It's got the whole town by the ears, from the society matrons of Beacon street, mind you, to the collegiate students at Harvard!

It's making swing-weary John Q. Public a music lover at last. And even Daughter Jane is beginning to admit that Beethoven, Brahms and Wagner could really give Cole Porter, Jerome Kern and Irving Berlin a run for their money.

Symphony music has come of age; the classics are goin' to town!

All because a 70-year-old Italian decided to bring music—good music—to the masses.

The dean of conductors who transformed a dipsy-doodling hot-cha public to lovers of minuets and overtures; who has made more friends than any one person in the musical world is the irrepresible Arturo Toscanini.

But Toscanini has done more than make symphony music popular. He has focused the spotlight upon symphony orchestras in general and upon symphony conductors in particular.

Now these conductors have their own legion of fans. Soon they will out-rival Hollywood's glamorous stars in popularity.

Indeed, three conductors are already winning movie fans.

Mighty Monarch of Music

There's tall, ash-blonde Leopold Stokowski, former conductor of the brilliant Philadelphia Orchestra, whose name has been linked with that of glamorous Greta Garbo. There's the versatile Andre Kostelanetz, former conductor of the Imperial Russian Orchestra and leader of one of radio's most popular programmes, who is the husband-to-be of petite Lily Pons.

Then we have the musical genius, Werner Janssen, who married the devastatingly beautiful movie star, Ann Harding.

Yes, sirree! It's a far cry from yesteryear when symphony conductors wore long hair and unpressed clothes, and lived alone in an atmosphere of the musty past. Today they have become wealthy, popular, lionized by blue-bloods.

The latter part of 1937 and the dawn of 1938 will go down in history as the era when humble people awakened to the profound beauties of the works of the masters.

But let's look into this "symphonitis" matter. Let's get the low-down on these mighty monarchs of music. . . .

These men are geniuses who must intrepret the towering works of the immortals in their true realism.

Take Toscanini, for example. With those deep-penetrating almost hypnotic eyes. He's the only man living who could make the great Caruso tremble by a mere gesture. The many years that Toscanini directed the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra, Toscanini was the complete master of all he surveyed. Every note, every pulsating beat had to be executed with the Toscanini touch.

Popularity of Radio Concerts

The recent 11 radio symphony concerts directed by Toscanini and organized and sponsored by the National Broadcasting Company have added millions of people to the lovers of finer music.

Thousands of congratulatory letters have been received by the National Broadcasting Company for making possible these symphonic concerts. An actual flood of letters . . . something that never happened before, because they explain that the heretofore radio symphony audience was considered one of radio's most intelligent, and the intelligentsia are not fan-letter writers!

Nearly 14,000 people were fortunate to attend these concerts. Every seat was filled, and 50,000 requests for studio tickets could not be filled.

Never before in the history of this nation have people been so eager to hear symphony!

The ovations of the studio audience were so tremendous that Toscanini was deeply touched and sincerely thankful.

He had given all of his life to symphony and at last it was gratifying that an unseen audience of millions was paying tribute by listening to his music.

It was the deciding factor which helped Toscanini agree to return to America for three more years (or perhaps the fact that he received $40,000 for this year may have helped just a little!).

When Toscanini mounts the podia—from the very moment, in fact, that he enters the stage . . . you sense a breathless excitement—a deep silence . . . spellbinding . . . a strange feeling so concentrated you cannot experience again.

It is this same unexplainable power that he casts over his entire orchestra . . . the men become tense . . . almost fearful . . .

Fritz Reiner, one of the most versatile conductors in the musical world, formerly leader of the Cincinnati Symphony.

Then—like a miracle—this uncompromising and genial little old man smiles all around and disarms his men and his audience by transferring to them something of the emotion that surges through him, as he brings to life again those musical masterpieces.

His eyes sparkle, and his mouth compresses the lips. What he cannot say in words or convey in looks, he expresses with his hands, the most animated and articulate hands imaginable.

"Come!" he declares, "——that E flat is a sustained forte. Forte! Not noise . . . there's a difference. You can have all the noise in the world but no power."

In teaching the shadings of sound, he says:

"In pianissimo passages, every musician should reach the point where he no longer can hear his instrument; in the fortissimo passages, he should hear his instrument above all the rest."

Toscanini has perhaps the most phenomenal memory in the world; he never opens a score when directing. He knows note by note every opera and symphony he has ever conducted and his repertoire is the widest of any conductors.

Toscanini is really mild-tempered when not directing, but once he takes his baton in hand, he becomes a human dynamo, a supernatural being and sometimes irresponsible. He is agile as he was years ago; his face betrays the same fire and intensity that has long been associated with his name.

Demands Best Efforts of Players.

Much of his fame rests upon his absolute refusal to accept anything but the best efforts of his men. And if the same is not forthcoming he explodes like a Fourth of July fire-cracker.

"Shoemaker," he shouts to one of his fiddlers, "play that passage clean, don't fumble it."

"Rivetters, you should go to work in a boiler factory," he yells at the trumpeters.

He's been known to throw his baton at his men, or break a player's trombone to pieces over his knee.

When it comes to choice epithets, Maestro Toscanini is very thorough. He can throw them in every direction and in practically every language!

Incidentally, one of the players in the NBC symphony is Miss Laura Newell, harpist, a scholarship student and graduate at the New England Conservatory of Music. Another is young Edgar Lastgarten, cellist, only 21 years old.

Leopold Stokowski and Deanna Durbin in the moving picture, "100 Men and a Girl," which featured a symphony orchestra.

Or let's look into the career of Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, noted French teacher, conductor and composer, who made the rafters ring at her recent concert at Symphony Hall.

The majority of those in attendance were just young folks not yet out of their teens, mind you, and as the saying goes, "They went simply wild over the Mademoiselle!"

Assisted by the Boston Symphony and the Bach Cantata Club, her rendition of Faure's "Requiem" was truly delightful. Mlle. Boulanger must take her place with musicians of the very first rank. She has been the first woman to serve as guest conductor to this organization, and congratulations to Dr. Koussevitzky, who so graciously made it possible.

Young People Enthusiastic

Young people everywhere are attending these symphonic concerts!

They are stamping their feet and clamoring for more.

Dr. Koussevitzky tells us that these young folks are so enthusiastic in their applause that it's very common for him to have to take as many as eight bows before he can appease them.

He visions that in the near future symphony halls will be two and three times larger than they are now. Cities with two or more symphony orchestras where only one formerly existed are also a possibility, he believes, with patronage of tens of thousands, instead of a selected few, and lower box-office prices and longer seasons of music.

Leopold Stokowski, who has already appeared in two movies with his orchestra, visualizes the screen and radio as the greatest mediums of presenting immortal music.

His first picture via Paramount's "The Big Broadcast of 1937" presented Bach's "Fugue in G-minor" and the "Impregnable Fortress."

It proved spellbinding! It established a record for holding all types of audiences. This scene was only a five-minute sequence but it paved the way.

In February of 1937, Universal Pictures had huge plans for Stokowski. It was Deanna Durbin's second vehicle, "One Hundred Men and a Girl." In this Stokowski not only supervised all the music in the picture but conducted a 100-piece orchestra, played the piano and became an actor!

Needless to say, this picture broke many box-office records! In its triumph, it further endeared delicious Deanna and masterful Stokowski into the hearts of the American public.

Werner Janssen, American born conductor, also famed as a composer-pianist.

Opera on the Screen

Symphony had conquered another medium—the screen.

Stokowski's creed, "to bring the greatest music to the greatest number of people," has come true.

Wilfred Pelletier, conductor of the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra is taking the lead in bringing opera before the masses.

"When the medium of presenting opera on the screen is discovered," says Mr. Pelletier, "you will have standing lines in every theatre where it is shown."

And why not? Even prima donnas have become streamlined. Where can you find anyone as sweet-and-lovely as Gladys Swarthout, as vivacious as Lily Pons, as charming as Grace Moore or as pretty as Helen Jepson?

Then for the romantic males, Nino Martini, Nelson Eddy, Lawrence Tibbett, Richard Crooke. Yes, we agree, it's going to be . . . swell!

Among those that are contributing to a major degree towards this matter of symphonitis is 39-year-old John Barbirolli, first permanent conductor of the New York Philharmonic Symphony since its 1920-1921 season.

Howard Barlow, Columbia Broadcasting System's symphony conductor for 10 years, and Werner Janssen, American born conductor, who is famed as a composer-pianist, are two others who are doing their part.

Eugene Ormandy, who has filled Stokowski's shoes very capably as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, and Ernest Schelling and Rudolf Gantz of the "Young People's Concerts of the Philharmonic Society," are two more.

Then there are Fritz Reiner, former conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony and of the Sunday Symphony Hour, Alexander Von Kreisler of the Cincinnati Conservatory Orchestra and Eugene Goosens of the Young People's concerts in the same city.

Conductor's Job Strenuous

The hundreds of thousands who have seen and heard Arthur Fiedler conduct the "Pops" concerts in the Boston Symphony Hall or the open air Esplanade, have enjoyed many, many pleasant hours. I know Bostonians have been very generous in showering their gratitude upon him.

To the layman, a conductor's job may seem an easy one, yet it is as exhausting as playing a strenuous game of tennis.

Every motion is important. They are made with a precision that requires tense muscular effort. Every gesture carries vigor to inspire the musicians to do their best performance.

The players learn through many years of experience to be very responsive to the interpretive ideas of their conductor.

Yes, this business of conducting is an unbelievably complex one. No other art requires a knowledge of anything as intricate as an orchestral score.

214

Trends in Symphonic Music: Boston and Seven Other Cities

Analysis of the Kind of Programs Heard Here and Elsewhere Through the Years

By John H. Mueller, Ph.D., and Kate Hevner, Ph.D., of Indiana University

B. Trans. April 2/38

(Copyright by the Boston Evening Transcript)

"First time in America" or "First time anywhere" are regular announcements of all symphony orchestras. "Last time in America" or "Last time in Boston" occurs just as regularly, but without the proud announcement. For with each premiere, some older composition must be laid quietly away on the shelves to be forgotten. Whose composition is it?

We have answered that question at Indiana University with a nation-wide survey of orchestra programs from 1875 to 1936, tracing the fortunes of fifty great composers and all the national schools of music for sixty years of the American concert stage. We have calculated the percentage that each composer's work represents of the total repertory for the year. In five-year periods we have charted these data for Boston, for the two orchestras in New York, and for Chicago, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Minneapolis and St. Louis. We can therefore draw the musical portrait of each city upon the background of the national trends and characteristics.

First af all, Boston has always been the best and steadiest proponent of American music. Whether because many prominent American composers (Foote, Chadwick, Mason, MacDowell, Paine and others) spent at least part of their musical career in or about the city, or because the spirit of Americanism runs higher than in New York or other cities, Boston has been the acknowledged leader in this field. Chicago, St. Louis and Cincinnati have on occasion surpassed her, but these enthusiasms have been short-lived. Boston in the last decades has been filling about ten per cent of her programs with American music, two and three times as much as many of the others, and well above the national average of six per cent.

Germans Prevail

Bach, Beethoven, Brahms Gluck, Handel, Liszt, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Strauss, Wagner, Weber—it is the Germans of course, whose music dominates American programs. Up to the time of the war, they were heard more often than all other nations taken together. Today they claim forty-three per cent of all program time. The Russians are next highest with fifteen per cent, the Austrians next with fourteen, and the French with eleven. British, Scandinavian and Italian have two or three per cent each.

Boston has never favored the French except from 1918 to 1923 under Rabaud and Monteux, when she temporarily assumed the leadership. Lately her enthusiasm for Sibelius has kept her proportion of Scandinavian music high, but she is low in the recent revival of Italian music. It is only in the last fourteen years that she has moved from the lowest place to the highest place in the presentation of Russian music.

Although the Boston orchestra was built by Viennese and German conductors, it has never played more than a moderate amount of German music, and for the last two decades it has been conspicuously low. This is due largely to the fact that Boston has never given itself over to the Wagner cult, even though it had many conductors of Teutonic origin and one at least, Dr. Muck, who had achieved wide recognition for his Wagnerian interpretation. In these sixty years, under nine different conductors, Boston has played in general less than half as much Wagner as the national average. Yet it is a curious fact that the members of this orchestra, when given an opportunity to pass judgment on the quality of the music they played, gave Wagner a higher rating than was accorded to him by any other orchestra. Perhaps it is a small but well chosen Wagner repertory which is needed to heighten the world's appreciation of this master.

Decline of Wagner

For the records show that Wagner has been declining. From 1910 to 1935 he has dropped from twelve per cent to six per cent of the national repertory. Tchaikowsky has had an even more precipitous drop, from eight per cent to three per cent since 1910. This does not mean that the world hears less of these composers today, for concert music may have many reincarnations and today in the popular series, in the radio and stadium and summer outdoor concerts, these two composers are more popular than ever. In fact as their popularity wanes in the subscription concerts, it rises in the popular.

Beethoven likewise has been very slowly declining in all the orchestras, although he has been and still is the dominant figure on all programs. His very early proportion, as much as a fourth of the entire repertories, has now been reduced to ten per cent, but even this is more than all the American music, more than all the British, Italians and Scandinavians combined.

On the other hand, Mozart is maintaining an even level on these programs, at six per cent of the repertory, and Bach and Brahms are rising. In Boston, Brahms's music was recognized and appreciated much earlier than elsewhere. In 1895 Boston was giving him eight per cent, a proportion which the nation in general has given him only since 1935. Bach has had little popularity in Boston, nor has Weber, whose music elsewhere shows very little decline. Haydn and Handel flourish in Boston, and on the whole the classic composers are well served.

Many another composer has had his earlier record reduced by half—Schumann, Schubert, Liszt, Mendelssohn and Berlioz. Of these, Schubert and Schumann have declined more rapidly in Boston than in any other orchestra. Berlioz and Liszt have also been underprivileged in Boston, although they have been dropping out everywhere so rapidly that the next few decades may see their complete disappearance. Already some of the older composers have disappeared—Rubinstein is such a one, and Raff is another. Spohr, who once filled ten per cent of the programs (in 1845), has not been heard these many years, and Lindpaintner, who was as popular in 1850 as Wagner in 1935, has been silent since 1870.

Recent Composers

Of the new voices, the modern voices whose fame is at present rising, we may differentiate two groups. First, the early moderns, dating from 1895, with Strauss, Sibelius, Debussy, Rimsky-Korsakov and Franck, in that order, and Elgar, Mahler and D'Indy definitely below them. Strauss suffered more from the war boycott than any other composer, but in spite of this adversity Strauss has dominated modern music much as the German music has dominated the general picture. Sibelius is making his way into the programs more rapidly than any other.

Of the second group, the late moderns, dating from 1905, Ravel, Stravinsky, Rachmaninov, Prokofiev and Respighi are the leaders, with only Respighi showing any signs of decline. These five contribute seven and one half per cent of the 1936 programs, and Scriabine, DeFalla, Schoenberg, Miaskowsky and Carpenter not quite two per cent.

For all these modern composers, Boston is the outstanding leader, and the composite curve stands well above any of the other orchestras for both the early and late modern groups. Of the first group Boston plays especially Sibelius and Rimsky-Korsakov, and devotes less time to Debussy, to Franck and to Strauss. Of the later group, Boston favors all the Russians, Stravinsky, Prokofiev and Scriabine, as well as Ravel and Respighi. Insofar as these composers typify the interest in modernity, Boston must be given the palm for unflagging and generous devotion to musical progress.

With the frequent changes in conductors, and the many extraneous factors which influence our repertories, it is unusual for one orchestra to maintain a consistent character or a leadership in any field. That Boston should take the initiative for the native and for modern music and maintain this leadership continuously throughout the whole of her long history is a distinction which marks her as unique in the history of the American concert stage.

N SUNDAY POST COLOR-FEATURE SECTION, = April 3, 193

Interest in Symphony Music I s Country---Even Young Peop

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Dr. Koussevitzky Changes All Chairs but First Violins

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky is one of the noted conductors who come to the Bushnell Memorial who has varied the seating arrangement of his orchestra. The Boston Symphony follows the plan in the accompanying drawing.

Dr. Koussevitzky doubles his violins to the left, instead of giving the second violins the front right position. The violas, second right in the standard arrangement, take the front flank in the Boston Symphony with the 'cellos behind them, instead of second left.

Dr. Koussevitzky also gives his double basses the extreme left of the stage, forming the boundary for the violins, instead of a third of the way back behind the cellos, with the English horns, oboes and clarinets behind them, instead of the standard positions of oboes and English horns right and parallel with the flutes. The Boston bassoons, therefore, are fourth row center instead of third right, and his French horns, trumpets and trombones are grouped with the tuba center back instead of fanning out to the right. That position he reserves for the percussion and harps, instead of having the percussion back row center and the harps extreme right front.

In other words, Dr. Koussevitzky's is a particularly individual arrangement, for only the first violins are in the exact standard position.

The Times plans to publish other charts and descriptions dealing with the seating arrangements of the Philadelphia, Cleveland and National symphony orchestras which, with the previously described New York Philharmonic and the Boston Symphony make up the Bushnell Concert Series.

It is suggested that music-lovers save these charts for study and reference so that a knowledge of the inner workings of symphonic organizations may aid to appreciation of the orchestras' tonal accomplishments.

215

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

MAR 2

"Insulted" Composer Plans Childish Music for Hub

Boston, March 23.—(AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pices that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the Fourth Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

MANCHESTER, CONN.
HERALD

MAR 23 1938

Russian Composer Raps Boston's Musical Taste

Boston, March 23.—(AP) —Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf" an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pieces that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the Fourth Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
TIMES - STAR

MAR 23 1938

Composer Plans Only "Children's" Music For Unappreciative Boston

BOSTON, March 23—(UP)—Because Boston "does not understand" his serious music, Serge Prokofieff, Soviet composer, will present only his "children's music" during his appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday and Saturday.

It was several years ago that the orchestra presented his fourth symphony.

"But what happened?" he demanded. "The Boston public and the critics were very insulting. They not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste."

This time, Prokofieff declared, he will present "simple things," including "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale used to teach Soviet children the various sounds of orchestral instruments, and "Chout," which means "the Buffoon."

"If the public of Boston cannot understand my music," he asked "Why should I break my baton?"

HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

Prokofieff to Play 'Children's Music'

Boston —(AP)— Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russion composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "Why should I break my baton?"

That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet Children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

MAR 23 1938

Decides Boston Music Tastes Are Juvenile

BOSTON, March 23.—(UP) — Because Boston "does not understand" his serious music, Serge Prokofieff, Soviet composer, will present only his "children's music" during his appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra Friday and Saturday.

It was several years ago that the orchestra presented his fourth symphony.

"But what happened?" he demanded. "The Boston public and the critics were very insulting. They not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste."

"If the public of Boston cannot understand my music," he asked, "why should I break my baton?"

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

Boston Audience to Hear Only "Children's Music"

Russian Composer Says Hub Public "Cannot Understand My Serious Music"

BOSTON, March 23 (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony Friday.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer explained on his arrival here, "why should I break my baton?"

Simple Things

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing that it was "without complications."

Prokofieff asserted his two serious pieces that have been performed in Boston were not understood. Of the Fourth Symphony, written for the 50th anniversary celebration of the Boston Symphony, he said: "The Boston public and critics . . . not only didn't like it and didn't show any signs of understanding it, but they charged that I had composed it with too much haste. . . The fact of the matter is, I had plenty of time to compose the symphony and composed it very slowly."

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

Classical and modern selections featured during annual appearances with the Boston Symphony orchestra will be included on a program to be presented by the Harvard Glee club at 8:30 o'clock Monday evening, April 4, in the Hotel Statler ballroom. Proceeds will benefit the Harvard scholarship fund.

PORTLAND, MAINE
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

MAR 27

Mrs. George T. Dealy of the Eastern Promenade and Mrs. Charles B [illegible] of Fairmount Street were in Boston Tuesday to attend the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Robert Casadesus, distinguished French pianist, as soloist. They also attended the Spring Flower Show.

LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAR 23 1938

Inspiring Playing Of Casadesus With Boston Symphony

Noted French Pianist Gives Remarkable Interpretation of Little Known Liszt Concerto

From all the area around Boston, and from all over New England came the lovers of music who filled Symphony Hall at the matinee in the supplementary series of programs by the Boston Symphony orchestra, yesterday.

They heard as solo artist an outstanding pianist in Robert Casadesus, young French musician of a famous family which has devoted its interest to the collection and playing of ancient instruments. And they heard him before the patrons of the regular symphony concerts have had an opportuntiy to do so, although his success indicates that he will be drafted for the regular series on the basis of his fine showing.

For his first appearance on the program he had chosen the Liszt Concerto in E-flat major, which the musicologists tell us was neglected for some years after its composition, but which now takes its place in the repertory of many distinguished pianists. Naturally, it has the characteristics that marked the Abbe Liszt. It is frankly a show piece. But in the hands of Mr. Casadesus it goes deeper than that, revealing many passages of tender beauty, heightened by contrast with the more brilliant passage-work which the pianist tossed off with remarkable ease and surety. There was both beauty and thrilling, but always musical, vigor in his playing. And the orchestra under the direction of Concert Master Richard Burgin supplied a colorful harmonic background.

After the intermission Mr. Casadesus returned to play the piano part in the Symphony for Orchestra and Pianoforte written by d'Indy on a French mountain air. It is doubtful if it has ever had a more scintillating performance in Boston. The piano, to be sure, is treated as a member of the orchestral family. But in this instance it is an important one. Mr. Casadesus knew when to give it full play and when to hold it in check.

The purely orchestral numbers on the program by the Russians Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff were brought to impressive and brilliant performance under Mr. Burgin's really inspiring guidance.

The collection of ancient instruments which is now the property of the Symphony Orchestra is housed on the first balcony floor. It was acquired from the Casadesus family. After the concert Robert Casadesus took the opportunity to see it again. Noticing a pair of ancient little kettledrums, he said that in his childhood those identical instruments were among his cherished playthings. They brought back pleasant memories of his boyhood.—S. R. F.

NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS

Prokofieff Insulted By Boston's Reaction

BOSTON (AP)—Because the Boston public and critics "were very insulting" when Serge Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony was played here a few years ago, the Russian composer will play only "children's music" when he conducts the Boston Symphony tonight.

"If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music," the composer said, "why should I break my baton?"

"That's why I'm going to give them children's music. I'm not going to puzzle them, but give them simple things."

He announced the program would include "Peter and the Wolf," an orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children the various sounds of musical instruments. A "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" will be given its first performance in America, the composer said, stressing it was "without complications."

WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

MAR 24 1938

WHEELING SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES FINEST CONCERT OF SEASON WEDNESDAY

By ROBERT PERMAR

The Wheeling Symphony orchestra, and it is that in the precise meaning of the word, gave its most ambitious and best rendered program at the Virginia theatre last evening. Those who were apprehensive when the Tschaikowsky Sixth was advertised found their fears quite groundless. The bristling technical difficulties and emotional requirements of this work found Mr. Modarelli's people more than ready. They played with a certainty which never faltered, and with expression which was often indescribably beautiful.

The development of the Symphony Society orchestra, in the last two years, is little short of a wonder. To be sure, magic may be expected from a man like Antonio Modarelli. His superbly finished musicianship, his inspiring patience, his natural and totally unaffected capacity for leadership bespeak that. But there is something more. Even the best architect must have good building materials, and Mr. Modarelli has that, in abundance, in his loyal, hardworking and very able ensemble—without exception, from the brilliant and ever sure Romine Hamilton, in the concertmaster's chair, to the lad and lass in the last row of the second fiddles.

This concert provided opportunity for a personal triumph by Richard Clayton, first 'cellist. He played the Goltermann A-minor concerto with lovely intonation and skill which laughed at the severe technical requirements of the final movement. The ovation accorded him was well deserved, and renewed after the encore by Popper. He is another splendid addition to our musical community.

All Excellent

Mozart's sparkling overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Sibelius' "Valse Triste" (given a subtle and haunting reading), and the sure-fire Bacchanale from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Dalila," were the other works, and all done excellently. Even the colossal mental and physical demands of the B-minor symphony, played without cuts, did not exhaust the orchestra. They approached and consummated each number fresh as so many daisies. There could be no better testimonial to their fundamental, collective worth.

We wish that we had the time and space to point out all of the extraordinary individual achievements of last evening. Outstanding were Professor Blumenberg's fine leadership of the viola section in the attack and projection of the second theme of the symphony's first movement; the playing of all the brasses, and particularly the four French horns, in the extremely tricky rhythms and unusual accents all through the major work; and the really great tympani of William Conrath. In the second movement and in the Bacchanale he reached heights of kettle-drumming good enough for any orchestra, anywhere and at any time. Then there is always that solid musicianship of Earl Summers, Sr., in the second chair—dependable as the U. S. Mail. If there were sixty-four notes to a bar, to be taken presto and requiring five key changes and seven position changes, we will wager a month's pay that he would negotiate properly at least sixty-three.

The audience, somewhat reduced by the stormy night, was its usual attentive, intelligent and well-bred self—in happy contrast to those of Pittsburgh, and which cause men like Serge Koussevitzky to suspend a concert and to walk off the stage in Syria Mosque, vowing never to play again for such rowdy yokels. But the "pull" of the Sixth, the verve and validity of its execution, was too much. Spontaneous applause broke forth at the end of the thrilling, third march movement, though they knew that they should have observed symphony punctilio and waited until the end. But they just couldn't help it. It was just that good. And Mr. Modarelli and his band, we are sure, understood.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

2/6

COLUMBUS, O.
DISPATCH

Dr. and Mrs. Hughes To Entertain Noted Artist

Mademoiselle Nadia Boulanger to Be Guest At Reception April 7.

DR. AND MRS. ROYAL D. HUGHES, 129 East Lane avenue, are to be hosts on Thursday evening, April 7, honoring Mlle. Nadia Boulanger, distinguished French composer, organist and teacher.

The affair is to follow Mlle. Boulanger's appearance that evening in the Ohio State university hall chapel, when she will lecture and conduct a small mixed chorus in a program including compositions by her famous and talented sister, Mlle. Lili Boulanger.

After the concert, Dr. and Mrs. Hughes have invited a few friends of music to join with them and members of the university department of music in a reception at the Faculty club to meet the artist.

Mlle. Boulanger has been in the United States since the first of the year lecturing, and Radcliffe and Wellesley are giving a series of Saturday morning broadcasts locally over WCOL. Recently she appeared as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mlle. Boulanger will be the guest of the university music department, of which Dr. Hughes is chairman, on both April 7 and 6.

* * *

GLEANERS' CLASS

Gleaners' class of the Westgate Evangelical church will meet Friday, March 25, at the home of Mrs. Clyde Wendell, 53 South Powell avenue. The meeting will begin at 8:00 p. m. and will be in charge of Mrs. Lyman Moler. Miss Jennie Tate, superintendent of the Friends' Rescue home will be guest speaker, and will talk on the work of the home.

Assistant hostesses are Mrs. L. Wood and Mrs. Don Myers.

ELKART, IND.
TRUTH

MAR 24 1938

At Hollywood

By Paul Harrison

HOLLYWOOD: The plush carpets of Paramount were rolled out the other day to receive Serge Prokofieff and his wife, who are visiting hereabout. The name is not exactly an American household word, but he's a big figure in highbrow musical circles and his very modern "Loves of Three Oranges" recently was presented in Denver.

The Prokofieffs wanted to hear how Hollywood made movie music, so they were escorted through the studio's Tin Pan Alley by Boris Morros, Paramount musical director and an old pal of Russian Imperial Conservatory days. The composer got it in the raw, from Indian tom-toms to jitter-bug swing.

On one stage they heard an audition of an orchestra of Alaskan Indians who were trying out for a job in "Spawn of the North." One of the drummers and the flutist kept their hats on, and the only woman in the group wore a trim little frock made of three or four blankets. The visitors seemed fascinated by this native American art-form, but the beaming Morros led them away in the middle of an Indian Big Apple to visit the creative cubbyhole of Ralph Ranger and Leo Robin.

* * *

Bashful

The team were as bashful as little boys about playing and singing some of their own stuff. "Aw-w-w," they blushed, "he doesn't want to hear us!" But Morros launched into a flood of Russian with his guests and then told Robin and Ranger that they were to do "Thanks for the Memory." "That's got some pretty trick words," said Lyricist Robin. "Maybe we better try something else if they don't speak English."

Mme. Prokofieff smiled and said, "Well, our slang may not be very up-to-date, but we certainly do speak English." So the pair finally got going, and the visitors tapped their feet and liked it. Next, with some apology, came the ungrammatical ditty written for Martha Raye, "It Don't Make Sense," and then a dogie song from "The Texans," which Mme. Prokofieff interpreted as a "cow lullaby."

The Russian composer liked the first song best, asked to have some passages repeated, and praised an unusual change in pitch. But the team's delight changed to embarrassment when he said of Miss Raye's swing tune, "It is not original!"

"No," said Robin. "It isn't. We take a little of this and a little of that, and—"

"But that is not honest!" exclaimed the shocked composer.

"Mister," said Robin, "if our stuff was original we'd starve to death. We tried that once. People didn't like it."

Prokofieff laughed and went away to see the sound laboratory. One of the things he wants to do while in Hollywood is get Walt Disney to hear another of his modern compositions, "Peter the Wolf," which the Boston Symphony will play in a few weeks.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

A Highbrow Composer Investigates Hollywood Music

BY PAUL HARRISON

HOLLYWOOD, March 24. — The plush carpets of Paramount were rolled out the other day to receive Serge Prokofieff and his wife, who

Cont.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES-STAR

EUGENE GOOSSENS AGAIN IS TO DIRECT ORCHESTRA; SIGNS NEW CONTRACT

Eugene Goossens, musical director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, is shown at the right signing his 1939 contract as conductor with the orchestra at the meeting Friday in the offices of the Cincinnati Institute of Fine Arts. Lucien Wulsin, president of the Symphony Board is shown seated to the left of Goossens, while Theo Gannon, manager of the orchestra, looks over his shoulder.—Times-Star Photo.

Three Other Noted Conductors Also to Wield Batons.

LONDON INVITATION

Accepted by Leader Will Keep Him Away for Time.

Eugene Goossens Friday signed a contract to continue as musical director and conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra next season. During a discussion with Lucien Wulsin, chairman of the Symphony board, and Theodore F. Gannon, manager of the orchestra, Goossens affixed his signature to the document

However, the orchestra will play next season under the batons of three other noted conductors as well. Because of European engagements Goossens has accepted, he will not return to the podium at Music Hall next season until the seventh week of the series.

Jose Iturbi will serve as conductor of the orchestra during the first three weeks, and Hans Lange will direct the orchestra the three following weeks, conducting three pairs of regular symphony concerts and one Young People's program. A third guest conductor, to be announced later, will be engaged to lead the orchestra later in the season, when Goossens will have a leave of absence to appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In this connection Goossens said, "I am gratified to be invited to open the Royal Philharmonic concerts in London and renew an ass which has been interrupt 1925. And though by birth I ly have many bonds in Englai will be glad of the opportunity newing many former ties, my heart is here with my own orchestra an my first concern is the mu progress and welfare of Cinc I appreciate the efforts of the dent and directors of the nati Symphony Orchestra to me the opportunity of fu these engagements abroad."

In a formal statement conce the arrangement, the symp management stated: "At th sistent demand of British and tinental impresarios and au our musical director, Euger sens, will remain abroad early part of the season. He open the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra concerts in London and conduct a number of other orchestras throughout the British Isles and on the continent. Mr. Goossens will resume the directorship of his own orchestra at the beginning of the seventh week, and, save for one week's engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will complete the direction of the balance of the year's concerts.

"The first three weeks of our season will be in charge of Jose Iturbi. His conducting talent, as yet unknown to Cincinnati, has been widely acclaimed by major orchestras all over the United States and in Mexico City, where he began his baton career. The interest created by Iturbi as a pianist is fast being doubled and redoubled by the public's acceptance of him as an orchestra leader; so undoubtedly our patrons will experience an exceptional thrill as his three weeks' engagement will also include a performance at the piano.

LANGE TO DIRECT

"The baton of our orchestra for the second three weeks will be taken by Mr. Hans Lange, associate conductor with Dr. Frederick Stock of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Lange, long associated with Willem Mengelberg in The Netherlands, more recently for eight years assistant to Arturo Toscanini with the Philharmonic Symphony Society of New York, has had a brilliant and enthusiastic reception during his past two seasons with the celebrated Chicago Symphony.

"The brief period while Goossens is in Boston will be in charge of another distinguished conductor, whose name we shall announce at an early date."

In addition to his association with the New York Philharmonic and Chicago orchestras, Lange has distinguished himself as conductor of New York Stadium concerts and summer programs of the Philadelphia and Portland (Ore.) orchestras.

Next season will be Goossens's eighth as head of the Cincinnati orchestra.

Commenting on his European engagements next fall, Gannon said: "The selection of Goossens to open the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra season in London is an exceptional mark of distinction. We are elated that we have the opportunity to grant Goossens a leave of absence under such notable circumstances, for it continues to enhance the prestige of both our maestro and the orchestra."

JOSE ITURBI MAKES BRIEF STOP IN CITY

Fresh after a wash and shave at Lunken Airport, early Friday, Jose Iturbi, explosive pianist and conductor, took time to say, "Hello Cincinnati till the 1938-39 Symphony season."

His brief two-hour visit was the result of Louisville-to-New York airline schedules, which include a stop-off in Cincinnati. In addition to extending the greetings, Iturbi also found time to make an inspection trip through the Baldwin piano factory, guided by Philip Wyman, vice president.

The internationally known pianist and conductor is to return to Cincinnati early next fall, when he will open the annual concert season. In the meantime he will make appearances in the United States and in South America.

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

TOO MUCH TEMPERAMENT

Serge Prokofieff, a Russian composer, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra today, has a grouch against the Boston public and musical critics and he has declared the intention of expressing his resentment during the concert. Because he believes the public and critics were insulting in their reception of his Fourth Symphony when it was played in Boston a few years ago, Prokofieff states that he will play only "children's music" today.

Artists and musicians are proverbially temperamental, but Prokofieff's projected reprisal is as childish in its nature as any music he can include in his program. He says that if the public in Boston cannot understand his serious music, "why should I break my baton?" It might be asked with equal pertinence, why should he lead the orchestra? When he undertakes the job he assumes the responsibility of providing entertainment for the audience and it is not within his rights to find any opportunity for the satisfaction of a grudge against the people who have paid for tickets.

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 25 1938

Comment

SALZBURG AFTER ANSCHLUSS

(Moses Smith writing in the Boston Transcript)

News from Central Europe has come over the cables so rapidly during the past few days that what apparently was true one day might be obviously unreliable the next. With regard to the summer Festival in Salzburg, for example, the last word to this department, received from the Austrian State Tourist Department, was to the effect that Toscanini was definitely "out"; that the authorities had given up hope of persuading him to change his decision not to conduct there, and that they had obtained in his place Wilhelm Furtwaengler. Willem Mengelberg would also be one of the conductors. And negotiations were proceeding with Stokowski and other conductors of international reputation.

While not disguising disappointment at Toscanini's adamance the release went on to say that "it is perhaps significant that the announcement that Arturo Toscanini decided not to fulfill his Salzburg agreements did not materially affect the sale of festival tickets in the United States. The sale here has always been and remains particularly heavy." It is indeed significant, in the light of the fact that after Toscanini abandoned the Bayreuth Festival that institution promptly lost international prestige.

It remains to be seen what effect the most recent events of the past few days, which evidently followed the preparation of the release in question, will have on the Festival. Certainly a non-Aryan conductor like Bruno Walter will be no longer welcome at Salzburg. Nor will the many non-Aryan singers who found there, so to say, a haven denied them in Germany. Many an Aryan performer, for that matter, will undoubtedly follow Toscanini's lead as a result of the now definite Anschluss. The other day Lottie Lehmann said she would go on with her contract because "art had nothing to do with politics," or words to that effect, even though paradoxically that was the reason Toscanini had quit. Perhaps she would now be willing to admit that in some European countries politics have a good deal to do with art.

A by-product of the persistent European disturbances looms now more largely than ever. Inevitably as things get hotter in central and eastern Europe, creative and performing musicians of the first rank turn more and more to the democracies of the West and particularly to the wealthiest, the United States. For years we have all realized that in order to hear the finest performances it is unnecessary to travel to Europe. The festivals have continued to attract, however, particularly Salzburg in recent years. Meanwhile some of us have been agitating for just such a festival on the American scene, and particularly in the Berkshire Hills, where the Berkshire Festival Committee and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have established jointly what seems to be the best effort in this direction to date. With understandable caution the sponsors have made haste slowly, and the results commend them. But is not now the time—a particularly spectacular time—to act boldly? Opera may be out of the question as yet. But a much longer and varied festival than programs in two week-ends may not be impossible. With quick decision and action there is a chance, it seems to me, to capture much of the enormous good will that Salzburg has lost within a week.

There ought to be a meeting.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS

Recorded Music

Sibelius; Bach

ONE of the most significant of the releases in Victor's copious special list for this season is an album containing the two C major symphonies of Sibelius, the third and the seventh. The earlier one is played by the London Symphony under Robert Kajanus; the later one, by the BBC Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. The two make a congenial pair of works illustrative of the development of one of the most individual writers of our time.

The great epidemic of Sibeliusness which is sweeping over America from Philadelphia (Stokowski) and Boston (Koussevitzky) has gathered in a very large Chicago group and it is safe to say that not even Strawinski has drawn such a phonographic cult as the dreamy, picturesque, sonorous and colorful Finnish master.

The third symphony is in three movements, the second being an andante with a scherzo complication, and it is in this movement that Sibelius displays a peculiarly Schubertian tinge in the folk-like rhythm of his melodies and in his masterful counterpoise of sentiments in major and in minor. The seventh symphony, in a single movement, is one of the most colossal exercises to be found in present day music; Sibelius' novel method of arriving at a climax by assembling only at the end of a movement the whole theme of whose fragments he has already made extended use, is in the seventh symphony even more masterfully expanded. The whole of the work (which occupies six surfaces) is in a state of flux until it coalesces in a peculiarly majestic finale. There is, indeed, as much shrewdness as beauty in Sibelius' music and its intricacy and firmness of fiber make recordings of it invaluable for reference and for study. Invaluable, too, for a peculiarly flavorsome and lasting pleasure in masterpieces curiously graphic in nature and saturated with a unique and lasting wizardry.

This is a domestic pressing from the matrices of the second album published in England by the Sibelius Society, and is the fourth of that society's albums to be released by Victor. The fifth, containing the fourth symphony (a masterpiece to which alone the seventh is ranked second by the Sibelius experts), excerpts from music for "The Tempest" and "Lemminkainen's Homefaring, was issued abroad in December and will be released by Victor shortly. The release of the present volume, however, makes all the Sibelius symphonies available under domestic labels, as American catalogues already contain the first (Ormandy), the second (Koussevitzky) and the fourth (Stokowski). Beecham conducts the performance recorded by the Sibelius Society.

* * *

THE Victor recording of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," to be completed in a third album, offers this month in a second album (sides 21 through 35) the story of Jesus before Caiaphas and before Pilate. The album commences with the finale to Part I, the gentle but sublime chorale, "Mankind Bewail Thy Grievous Sin." It closes with the terse but effective scene of the mob, "Let Him Be Crucified," a passage frequently commented upon for its exceptional nature in the whole of Bach's music; it is one of the extremely rare instances of a genuinely dramatic instinct in Bach's great genius.

The album also includes one of the most spellbinding and piognant passages in the entire score, the beautiful alto solo, "O Pardon Me My God," sung by Kathryn Meisle, the marvelous violin obbligato being played by Richard Burgin.

Bach's telling scheme of interspersing the action with the occasional voicing of personal grief by a solo voice or more often with the devotional revery of the congregation, as sung in the chorales, is followed throughout the work in a spirit of the most sensitive and affecting religious ardor. The work when completed will be absolutely unique in all recorded music.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS

MAR 26 1938

Serge Koussevitzky, Jerome Kern, Paul Whiteman, Oscar Hammerstein and Olin Downes are among those who will contribute to a book on George Gershwin to be published in the Fall by Longman, Green & Co. More than 16 of Gershwin's paintings will be reproduced in the book.

KEY WEST, FLA.
CITIZEN

MAR 26 1938

A FIRST OPERA HIT

Produced in the week of the composer's 71st birthday, the first opera by Gustav Strube of Baltimore was acclaimed as a success. It is called "The Captive," and deals with the buccaneers of the seventeenth century.

It is classed as an American opera, although the composer was born in Germany. He came to the United States in 1890, was naturalized in 1896, and has taken a prominent part in the musical life of his adopted country for nearly half a century, beginning as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Strube is a musical conductor of note, and has composed three symphonies, besides a long list of other works, but is said to have worked intermittently for 20 years on his opera. He was the organizer and for 15 years conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

"The Captive" was produced in Baltimore by a company of experienced but not professional singers, the principal role being sung by Mrs. Margaret Gilmer, described as "a comely housewife." The performance was conducted by the composer, who received an ovation.

JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS

in Hollywood

How Hollywood Receives One High in Music World

Title of a Song Serge Prokofieff and His Wife Hear—"It Don't Make Sense"—Expresses Their Reaction Pretty Well

By PAUL HARRISON
NEA Service Staff Correspondent

Hollywood, March 24.—The plush carpets of Paramount

(ETC. like one on preceding

MAYSVILLE, KY.
PUBLIC LEDGER

MAR 25 1938

Goosens Signs To Direct Symphony Next Season

Cincinnati, O., March 25—Eugene Goossens Friday signed a contract to continue as musical director and conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra next season.

However, the orchestra will play next season under the batons of three other noted conductors. Because of European engagements Goossens has accepted, he will not return to the podium at Music Hall next season until the seventh week of the series.

Jose Iturbi will serve as conductor of the orchestra during the first three weeks, and Hans Lange will direct the orchestra the three following weeks, conducting three pairs of regular symphony concerts and one Young People's program. A third guest conductor, to be announced later, will be engaged to lead the orchestra later in the season, when Goossens will have a leave of absence to appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR

Of Books and Authors

Dutch publishers of Hervey Allen's "Action at Aquila" are calling the book "De Slag by Aquila," and the German title will be "Oberst Franklin" . . . A book on George Gershwin by his friends will be published in the fall. Heading the list of contributors is Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony conductor. Over 16 of Gershwin's paintings will be reproduced . . . "Holy Old Mackinaw" by Stewart H. Holbrook, published this month, is a history of the lumberjack at work and at play, from Maine to Oregon and from colonial times to the present day . . . An impartial biography of John D. Rockefeller, derived from friendly, neutral and hostile sources, will be published next year. Its author will be Allan Nevins, Pulitzer prize biographer

---

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE

MAR 25 1938

Plymouth

WOMAN'S CLUB PLANS CONCERT

PLYMOUTH, March 25.—On the evening of March 30 at 8 o'clock the Plymouth Woman's Club will sponsor a concert at the High school auditorium with four outstanding artists: Olive Appleton, soprano; Harry Newcombe, baritone; James Pappaoutasakis, flutist, and Reginald Boardman, pianist.

Miss Appleton has appeared with the leading choral and orchestral societies in New England and through the middle west. Her appearance with the Handel and Haydn Society in the performance of "The Messiah" was a marked success.

Mr. Newcombe has made several appearances with the Boston Symphony and the Handel and Haydn Society, also has appeared with the leading choral societies in Boston and the North Shore.

Mr. Pappaoutasakis received his musical education in Boston and studied with the solo flutist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has appeared with the outstanding orchestras in Boston and toured with many musical groups. His work has been pre-eminent among the flutists of Boston and this season he was taken into the Boston Symphony orchestra as a member of the wood-wind section.

Mr. Boardman is a distinguished New England pianist who holds a unique position among his Boston colleagues.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST

MAR 26 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 31, and Saturday afternoon, April 2. Serge Koussevitzky will present on each program a suite drawn from a ballet of an eminent living Russian composer.

At the evening concert Koussevitzky will present for the first time in New York the second suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The ballet was composed for performance in Russia in 1935. This suite had its first American performance at the Symphony concerts in Boston during the week past under the composer's direction. The movements are as follows: Montagues and Capulets, Juliet the Maiden, Friar Laurence, Dance, The Parting of Romeo and Juliet, Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls, Romeo by Juliet's Grave. Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 83, will open the program and Brahms' First Symphony in C minor will be the concluding number.

Stravinsky's Divertimento, "The Fairy's Kiss," will be performed at the matinee. "Le Baiser de la Fee" is drawn from a tale of Hans Andersen. Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "The Sea," will also be performed and Brahms' Second Symphony in D major.

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
SATURDAY NIGHT

Those good old times, when vodvil still was Vaudeville (with a capital V), were revived for an afternoon by Manager S. Hurok who Raphael of the magic accordion, Chenkin, the one-man theater and Emma Runitch, singer of passionate Russian gipsy songs, billed as the Continental Ensemble, held forth at the Philharmonic Auditorium. The torch-singer may be American product, but Russia of the so-called good old days had these verbal flame-throwers on the entertainment stage, whence they made sentimental people still more sentimental.

But Slavic sentimentality is something different from the Western variety. The Russia of Pushkin, Dostoyeffsky and Turgenieff of Tolstoi, Moussorgsky and Tschaikowsky is now a historic phase so far as the course of civilization, manner and fashions are concerned.

Koussevitzky and Albert Coates still conduct Tschaikowsky in the style in which Chaliapin used to sing Russian songs. Gabrilowitsch the unforgettable one, whole-hearted American that he was keenly felt and brought that atmosphere of "toska," of nostalgia and yearning, which was as typical Russia of bygone days as the shirt worn hanging down below the hip belt.

Mme. Runitch sang with that realization of "toska." It is hard to describe this longing which is wellnigh a physical sensation, an articulate bitter-sweet mortification, a super-sensual voluptuousness of a heart lonely even in the merriest of company. Chenkin is a clever ballad-raconteur, fired with the energy of a whole troupe of actors. He is so vivid because he is his own audience and can enjoy himself.

As for Raphael, he is fascinatingly skillful on a miniature accordion which often sounds like an oboe, or like a clarinet. And when he played Kreisler violin favorites, and in due course ended with an amazing feat of skill, Sarasate's "Gipsy Airs," he played presto passages as only a brilliant fiddler can toss them off.

Often there were tones which might well have passed for violin harmonics. This may sound a bit absurd, but Raphael is one of those musical virtuosi, one of the men of genius whose instrument for better or for worse is an accordion small enough to fit into a bowler hat.

216

PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 25 1938

Comment

SALZBURG AFTER ANSCHLUSS

(Moses Smith writing in the Boston Transcript)

News from Central Europe has come over the cables so rapidly during the past few days that what apparently was true one day might be obviously unreliable the next. With regard to the summer Festival in Salzburg, for example, the last word to this department, received from the Austrian State Tourist Department, was to the effect that Toscanini was definitely "out"; that the authorities had given up hope of persuading him to change his decision not to conduct there, and that they had obtained in his place Wilhelm Furtwaengler. Willem Mengelberg would also be one of the conductors. And negotiations were proceeding with Stokowski and other conductors of international reputation.

While not disguising disappointment at Toscanini's adamance the release went on to say that "it is perhaps significant that the announcement that Arturo Toscanini decided not to fulfill his Salzburg agreements did not materially affect the sale of festival tickets in the United States. The sale here has always been and remains particularly heavy." It is indeed significant, in the light of the fact that after Toscanini abandoned the Bayreuth Festival that institution promptly lost international prestige.

It remains to be seen what effect the most recent events of the past few days, which evidently followed the preparation of the release in question, will have on the Festival. Certainly a non-Aryan conductor like Bruno Walter will be no longer welcome at Salzburg. Nor will the many non-Aryan singers who found there, so to say, a haven denied them in Germany. Many an Aryan performer, for that matter, will undoubtedly follow Toscanini's lead as a result of the now definite Anschluss. The other day Lottie Lehmann said she would go on with her contract because "art had nothing to do with politics," or words to that effect, even though paradoxically that was the reason Toscanini had quit. Perhaps she would now be willing to admit that in some European countries politics have a good deal to do with art.

A by-product of the persistent European disturbances looms now more largely than ever. Inevitably as things get hotter in central and eastern Europe, creative and performing musicians of the first rank turn more and more to the democracies of the West and particularly to the wealthiest, the United States. For years we have all realized that in order to hear the finest performances it is unnecessary to travel to Europe. The festivals have continued to attract, however, particularly Salzburg in recent years. Meanwhile some of us have been agitating for just such a festival on the American scene, and particularly in the Berkshire Hills, where the Berkshire Festival Committee and the Boston Symphony Orchestra have established jointly what seems to be the best effort in this direction to date. With understandable caution the sponsors have made haste slowly, and the results commend them. But is not now the time—a particularly spectacular time—to act boldly? Opera may be out of the question as yet. But a much longer and varied festival than programs in two week-ends may not be impossible. With quick decision and action there is a chance, it seems to me, to capture much of the enormous good will that Salzburg has lost within a week.

There ought to be a meeting.

BUFFALO, N. Y.
NEWS
MAR 26 1938

Serge Koussevitzky, Jerome Kern, Paul Whiteman, Oscar Hammerstein and Olin Downes are among those who will contribute to a book on George Gershwin to be published in the Fall by Longman, Green & Co. More than 16 of Gershwin's paintings will be reproduced in the book.

CHICAGO, ILL.
NEWS
MAR 25 1938

Recorded Music

Sibelius; Bach

ONE of the most significant of the releases in Victor's copious special list for this season is an album containing the two C major symphonies of Sibelius, the third and the seventh. The earlier one is played by the London Symphony under Robert Kajanus; the later one, by the BBC Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky. The two make a congenial pair of works illustrative of the development of one of the most individual writers of our time.

The great epidemic of Sibeliusness which is sweeping over America from Philadelphia (Stokowski) and Boston (Koussevitzky) has gathered in a very large Chicago group and it is safe to say that not even Strawinski has drawn such a phonographic cult as the dreamy, picturesque, sonorous and colorful Finnish master.

The third symphony is in three movements, the second being an andante with a scherzo complication, and it is in this movement that Sibelius displays a peculiarly Schubertian tinge in the folk-like rhythm of his melodies and in his masterful counterpoise of sentiments in major and in minor. The seventh symphony, in a single movement, is one of the most colossal exercises to be found in present day music; Sibelius' novel method of arriving at a climax by assembling only at the end of a movement the whole theme of whose fragments he has already made extended use, is in the seventh symphony even more masterfully expanded. The whole of the work (which occupies six surfaces) is in a state of flux until it coalesces in a peculiarly majestic finale. There is, indeed, as much shrewdness as beauty in Sibelius' music and its intricacy and firmness of fiber make recordings of it invaluable for reference and for study. Invaluable, too, for a peculiarly flavorsome and lasting pleasure in masterpieces curiously graphic in nature and saturated with a unique and lasting wizardry.

This is a domestic pressing from the matrices of the second album published in England by the Sibelius Society, and is the fourth of that society's albums to be released by Victor. The fifth, containing the fourth symphony (a masterpiece to which alone the seventh is ranked second by the Sibelius experts), excerpts from music for "The Tempest" and "Lemminkainen's Homefaring, was issued abroad in December and will be released by Victor shortly. The release of the present volume, however, makes all the Sibelius symphonies available under domestic labels, as American catalogues already contain the first (Ormandy), the second (Koussevitzky) and the fourth (Stokowski). Beecham conducts the performance recorded by the Sibelius Society.

* * *

THE Victor recording of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," to be completed in a third album, offers this month in a second album (sides 21 through 35) the story of Jesus before Caiaphas and before Pilate. The album commences with the finale to Part I, the gentle but sublime chorale, "Mankind Bewail Thy Grievous Sin." It closes with the terse but effective scene of the mob, "Let Him Be Crucified," a passage frequently commented upon for its exceptional nature in the whole of Bach's music; it is one of the extremely rare instances of a genuinely dramatic instinct in Bach's great genius.

The album also includes one of the most spellbinding and piognant passages in the entire score, the beautiful alto solo, "O Pardon Me My God," sung by Kathryn Meisle, the marvelous violin obbligato being played by Richard Burgin.

Bach's telling scheme of interspersing the action with the occasional voicing of personal grief by a solo voice or more often with the devotional revery of the congregation, as sung in the chorales, is followed throughout the work in a spirit of the most sensitive and affecting religious ardor. The work when completed will be absolutely unique in all recorded music.

KEY WEST, FLA.
CITIZEN
MAR 26 1938

A FIRST OPERA HIT

Produced in the week of the composer's 71st birthday, the first opera by Gustav Strube of Baltimore was acclaimed as a success. It is called "The Captive," and deals with the buccaneers of the seventeenth century.

It is classed as an American opera, although the composer was born in Germany. He came to the United States in 1890, was naturalized in 1896, and has taken a prominent part in the musical life of his adopted country for nearly half a century, beginning as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Strube is a musical conductor of note, and has composed three symphonies, besides a long list of other works, but is said to have worked intermittently for 20 years on his opera. He was the organizer and for 15 years conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

"The Captive" was produced in Baltimore by a company of experienced but not professional singers, the principal role being sung by Mrs. Margaret Gilmer, described as "a comely housewife." The performance was conducted by the composer who received an ovation.

JOLIET, ILL.
HERALD-NEWS
MAR 24 1938

In Hollywood

How Hollywood Receives One High in Music World

Title of a Song Serge Prokofieff and His Wife Hear — "It Don't Make Sense" — Expresses Their Reaction Pretty Well

By PAUL HARRISON
NEA Service Staff Correspondent

Hollywood, March 24.—The plush carpets of Paramount

(ETC. like one on [illegible]

MAYSVILLE, KY.
PUBLIC LEDGER
MAR 25 1938

Goosens Signs To Direct Symphony Next Season

Cincinnati, O., March 25—Eugene Goossens Friday signed a contract to continue as musical director and conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra next season.

However, the orchestra will play next season under the batons of three other noted conductors. Because of European engagements Goossens has accepted, he will not return to the podium at Music Hall next season until the seventh week of the series.

Jose Iturbi will serve as conductor of the orchestra during the first three weeks, and Hans Lange will direct the orchestra the three following weeks, conducting three pairs of regular symphony concerts and one Young People's program. A third guest conductor, to be announced later, will be engaged to lead the orchestra later in the season, when Goossens will have a leave of absence to appear as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
MAR 25 1938

Plymouth

WOMAN'S CLUB PLANS CONCERT

PLYMOUTH, March 25.—On the evening of March 30 at 8 o'clock the Plymouth Woman's Club will sponsor a concert at the High school auditorium with four outstanding artists: Olive Appleton, soprano; Harry Newcombe, baritone; James Pappaoutasakis, flutist, and Reginald Boardman, pianist.

Miss Appleton has appeared with the leading choral and orchestral societies in New England and through the middle west. Her appearance with the Handel and Haydn Society in the performance of "The Messiah" was a marked success.

Mr. Newcombe has made several appearances with the Boston Symphony and the Handel and Haydn Society, also has appeared with the leading choral societies in Boston and the North Shore.

Mr. Pappaoutasakis received his musical education in Boston and studied with the solo flutist of the Boston Symphony orchestra. He has appeared with the outstanding orchestras in Boston and toured with many musical groups. His work has been pre-eminent among the flutists of Boston and this season he was taken into the Boston Symphony orchestra as a member of the wood-wind section.

Mr. Boardman is a distinguished New England pianist who holds a unique position among his Boston colleagues.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 26 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its last visit of the season to New York for a pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, March 31, and Saturday afternoon, April 2. Serge Koussevitzky will present on each program a suite drawn from a ballet of an eminent living Russian composer.

At the evening concert Koussevitzky will present for the first time in New York the second suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet." The ballet was composed for performance in Russia in 1935. This suite had its first American performance at the Symphony concerts in Boston during the week past under the composer's direction. The movements are as follows: Montagues and Capulets, Juliet the Maiden, Friar Laurence, Dance, The Parting of Romeo and Juliet, Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls, Romeo by Juliet's Grave. Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, will open the program and Brahms' First Symphony in C minor will be the concluding number.

Stravinsky's Divertimento, "The Fairy's Kiss," will be performed at the matinee. "Le Baiser de la Fee" is drawn from a tale of Hans Andersen. Debussy's three symphonic sketches, "The Sea," will also be performed and Brahms' Second Symphony in D major.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
STAR
MAR 26 1938

Of Books and Authors

Dutch publishers of Hervey Allen's "Action at Aquila" are calling the book "De Slag by Aquila," and the German title will be "Oberst Franklin" . . . A book on George Gershwin by his friends will be published in the fall. Heading the list of contributors is Serge Koussevitzky, Boston symphony conductor. Over 16 of Gershwin's paintings will be reproduced . . . "Holy Old Mackinaw" by Stewart H. Holbrook, published this month, is a history of the lumberjack at work and at play, from Maine to Oregon and from colonial times to the present day . . . An impartial biography of John D. Rockefeller, derived from friendly, neutral and hostile sources will be published next year. Its author will be Allan Nevins, Pulitzer prize biog-

---

LOS ANGELES, CAL.
SATURDAY NIGHT
MAR 26 1938

Those good old times, when vodvil still was Vaudeville (with a capital V), were revived for an afternoon by Manager S. Hurok when Raphael of the magic accordion, Chenkin, the one-man theater and Emma Runitch, singer of passionate Russian gipsy songs, billed as the Continental Ensemble, held forth at the Philharmonic Auditorium. The torch-singer may be an American product, but Russia of the so-called good old days had these verbal flame-throwers on the entertainment stage, whence they made sentimental people still more sentimental.

But Slavic sentimentality is something different from the Western variety. The Russia of Pushkin, Dostoyeffsky and Turgenieff, of Tolstoi, Moussorgsky and Tschaikowsky is now a historic phase so far as the course of civilization, manner and fashions are concerned.

Koussevitzky and Albert Coates still conduct Tschaikowsky in the style in which Chaliapin used to sing Russian songs. Gabrilowitsch, the unforgettable one, wholehearted American that he was, keenly felt and brought that atmosphere of "toska," of nostalgia and yearning, which was as typical of Russia of bygone days as the shirt worn hanging down below the hip belt.

Mme. Runitch sang with that realization of "toska." It is hard to describe this longing which is wellnigh a physical sensation, an articulate bitter-sweet mortification, a super-sensual voluptuousness of a heart lonely even in the merriest of company. Chenkin is a clever ballad-raconteur, fired with the energy of a whole troupe of actors. He is so vivid because he is his own audience and can enjoy himself.

As for Raphael, he is fascinatingly skillful on a miniature accordion which often sounds like an oboe, or like a clarinet. And when he played Kreisler violin favorites, and in due course ended with an amazing feat of skill, Sarasate's "Gipsy Airs," he played presto passages as only a brilliant fiddler can toss them off.

Often there were tones which might well have passed for violin harmonics. This may sound a bit absurd, but Raphael is one of those musical virtuosi, one of the men of genius whose instrument for better or for worse is an accordion small enough to fit into a bowler hat.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 26 1938

Debussy, Twenty Years After

Anniversary of His Death in 1918 Prompts Discussion of Unfinished Tasks.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Twenty years ago Claude Debussy died in war-time Paris. Yesterday, March 25, was the anniversary. In Grove and other English lexicons the date is given erroneously as March 26. Inevitably some confusion has resulted in this country concerning the day to be commemorated.

But there is nothing like an error in the types to prove the whole world kin. At hand is a copy of "L'Intransigeant" of Paris, dated March 4, which carries on its first page a two-column article about the Debussy anniversary. The date of the death appears as May 25, 1918, by which time Debussy had been nearly two months in his grave.

First buried at Pere Lachaise, the body later was transferred to Passy. There, Debussy's fourteen-year-old daughter—the beloved Chou-Chou to whom he dedicated his "Children's Corner"—joined him a year later and her mother in 1934. Visitors at the grave who pause to note the inscription on the black marble vault will find there, along with the composer's name, the sentence: "His wife and daughter are with him."

The reference, of course, is to the second wife, Emma Moyse Debussy, who at the time she eloped with Debussy was the wife of Sigismond Bardac, a banker. The first wife, Rosalie Texier, the "Lily-Lilo" of the dedication on the manuscript of the "Nocturnes," sleeps elsewhere, having died only a year or so before the second Mme. Debussy.

Debussy's Sister Living.

What became of Gabriele Dupont, "Gaby of the green eyes," who managed the Debussy household, such as it was, in the days of his labors on "Pelleas et Melisande," is something which this writer's first hand researches in Paris did not disclose. Is she perhaps alive? She would be a woman in the seventies, like Debussy's own sister, Adele, who busies herself with her birds and her flowers in a spinster abode high up under the roof of an old building near the Etoile.

A year ago, two of Debussy's brothers were living; one since has died. Of the composer's friends, a handful, all men in the sixties or seventies, remain. Debussy himself would be in his seventy-sixth year if the fates had spared him until today. He would be but two years older than Richard Strauss, and three years older than Jean Sibelius. At fifty-five, exhausted by cancer and successive operations, Debussy's work was done. What the story would have been if he had escaped his malignant enemy and preserved his health through at least another decade is beyond conjecture. Still, the question persists as to whether there was, in reality, anything left for Debussy to do that he had not done as well as he was ever likely to do again.

The unwritten operas, particularly the two Poe subjects, "The Devil in the Belfry" and "The Fall of the House of Usher," invite all manner of speculation. But the multiplicity of the stage works which Debussy considered after "Pelleas" and the restlessness with which he shifted from one to another, blowing hot and cold as he took up or dropped successive projects, tends to corroborate a fair assumption that the reason he wrote but one opera was that he found but one subject which really served his needs.

Klingsor at His Elbow.

Debussy discarded the early "Rodrigue et Chimene" after he had committed two acts of it to paper, presumably because he found old Klingsor at his elbow—his way of describing the imperious influence of Richard Wagner. But with Klingsor effectually barred, he still could complete no opera but "Pelleas."

"Le Roman de Tristan" was to have been as un-Wagnerian as "Orphee-roi" was to have been anti-Gluck. What Debussy had in mind for his "Comme il vous plaira" ("As You Like It") is not to be guessed from his references to it in his letters, nor can any idea as to how he would have set Shakespeare's comedy be derived from the several fragments which survive of the incidental music planned for "King Lear." There was a hint of a projected "Don Juan" and the press of the day mentioned a work to be called "Crimen Amoris," both quite as nebulous as the "Daphnis et Chloe" which Debussy considered for the purposes of ballet some years before Ravel utilized the subject. "Cendrelune" and "La Saulaire" are similarly only names.

Enthusiasm for Poe Subjects.

Debussy's letters bespeak enthusiasm for the Shakespeare and Poe subjects and he was willing to contract with Giulio Gatti-Casazzza for the rights of latter as well as for the projected "Legend of Tristan." But was he, perhaps, whistling to keep his courage up? Did he actually put on paper those ideas for the "Belfry" and "Usher" scores concerning which he wrote to the publisher, Durand? If so, did he destroy his sketches or are there all manner of Debussy oddments still to be unearthed somewhere? Something phantasmal surrounds the composer's references to the work he described as in progress. One wonders whether he was quite as frank in his letters to Durand as he was in his conversation with Giulio Gatti-Casazza when he said that he was a lazy man and that the music for which he had contracted might never be heard by any one. Was it laziness? Was it musical as well as physical exhaustion? Or was he in a blind alley because of what he was trying to do?

The completed libretto for "La Chute de la maison Usher" (there are two versions) has not convinced those who have consulted it as ideal for Debussy's music in the manner and degree that the text of "Pelleas" was ideal. Indeed, it would seem to have required a very different idiom. Debussy's career and musical personality considered, had he another idiom up his sleeve—one as different from the music of "Pelleas" as Poe's original story was different from Maeterlinck's drama? The basic feasibility of both the "Devil in the Belfry" and "The Fall of the House of Usher" as stage works remains more than a little doubtful. Did Debussy, perhaps only intuitively, come to be a little dubious about his own first enthusiasm?

A Great Work Little Known.

However these questions are answered, they can supply no new refreshment of the spirit in the places where audiences foregather. Compared with major masterpieces by Debussy that are available and are proving of steadily increasing popularity, any fragments that may yet come to light can be of slight consequence, except to historians and other specialists. But there is one Debussy work for the stage that the world of music—Paris not excluded—has yet to assimilate and make completely its own. This is "The Martyrdom of Saint Sebastian," concerning which the views of many otherwise exceptionally well-informed musicians remain surprisingly vague. The performance of a fragment such as was given by Arturo Toscanini (the "Cours des Lys" scene) in his all-Debussy program with the Philharmonic-Symphony two years ago may attest the aristocracy of the music, while leaving the listener with little comprehension of its effectiveness as an entity. Boston was given a better idea of the scope of the score in the performance which Koussevitzky gave there at Christmas time in 1936, not confined, as was the Toscanini performance, to music from the first act, but embracing the four other "mansions" as well. A good many years ago, Boston had a stage performance with a dancer in the role created for Ida Rubinstein. But neither that performance, nor one given in concert form in New York by Kurt Schindler, can be said to have left any such impress as can serve to place "Saint Sebastian" for the American public today.

The work has been described in Paris as the French "Parsifal," but a "Parsifal" without a Bayreuth. How to make it effective without D'Annunzio's play remains a problem for conductors to solve. Meanwhile, it is of interest to know that John Barbirolli is at work on a "synthesis" (to borrow a Stokowski term) of the entr'actes of "Pelleas et Melisande," with the thought that here, too, is beautiful music for the concert room—music which too often is only half heard in opera performances because of what commonly happens the moment the curtains close, whether the opera be "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Meistersinger," "Don Giovanni" or "Pelleas."

TAMPA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
MAR 27 1938

WPA SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO PLAY IN TAMPA

Florida Unit To Give Concert April 6

The 70-piece Florida symphony orchestra, first major symphonic ensemble to be established in the south under federal auspices, will appear under direction of Dr. Clarence Carter Nice, well-known symphony and opera conductor, in municipal auditorium April 6, in a program featuring Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

The orchestra made its first appearance in Tampa two years ago as a unit of temporary character formed through the merger of the federal concert units then maintained in Miami, Jacksonville, Tampa and St. Petersburg.

It has since been reorganized as a permanent unit with headquarters in Jacksonville and is working on a schedule which calls for a six-point tour each month, thus bringing the services of a full-fledged symphony orchestra within reach of musically-minded communities throughout the state.

Dr. Sokoloff First Conductor

The orchestra made its first tour of the current season under the guest conductorship of Dr. Nikolai Sokoloff, national director of the WPA musical division, who authorized the establishment of the unit on a permanent basis after his visit to Florida last November.

The Florida orchestra is composed of musicians of long experience, many of whom have served in leading symphonic organizations. Among these are Walter Grossman, Miami 'cellist, who played with the Berlin Philharmonic; Joel Belov, formerly of the Philadelphia orchestra, and later a member of the New York Philharmonic; Max Gaebel, who came from Germany to join the Boston symphony orchestra as a stringed bass player; Maurice Goldman, former violinist with the Detroit symphony orchestra, and Atillio Canonico, youthful honor graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Naples.

On West Coast Tour

The concert master is Alice Biscrow Sager, Jacksonville violinist who received her symphonic training under Walter Damrosch.

The west coast tour will begin with a concert in the Congregational church in St. Petersburg, followed by two appearances in Fort Myers. A school concert will be given on the afternoon of the Tampa concert at Bradenton high school.

Dr. Nice, under whose supervision the state orchestra was formed, conducted more than 200 opera performances for the San Carlo Opera company in New York and on tour, and served four years as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera company.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 26 1938

Boston Symphony to Be Heard In Season's Final Concert Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its final Brooklyn concert of the season on Friday evening, in the Brooklyn Academy of Music with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. The concert will open with C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. Debussy's Three Orchestral Sketches, "La Mer," will follow. The second half of the program wil be devoted to Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor.

The concert series is presented here under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Edward C. Blum, president; the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman. This is the orchestra's fifty-second borough season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 27 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO END ITS SEASON

Concert to Be Given Friday at Brooklyn Academy—Marian Anderson to Be Heard

CHURCH PLANS PROGRAM

Performance Tonight Set by Plymouth Orchestra—Arion Society to Nominate

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its final concert of the Brooklyn season on Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music.

The Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport, acting chairman, reported yesterday that the 1937-38 season has been one of the most successful and best attended in recent years.

The program of the final concert will consist of C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D major for stringed instruments, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth symphony.

Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols will be the hostess in the committee box. Box-holders will be Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Theodore Fitch, Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

The concerts are under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which H. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American
MAR 27 1938

Boston Symphony To End Season

Concert Next Friday Will Culminate 52nd Series in Boro

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold its final Brooklyn Etc.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 28 1938

Symphony Concert Friday Will Conclude 52nd Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will hold its final Brooklyn concert Etc.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1938

Mrs. Carroll Nichols to Be Hostess at Final Concert Of Boston Symphony Friday

The final concert in the 52d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will be given Friday night at the Academy of Music. Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols will be hostess in the committee box. Other boxholders for the final concert will include Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, Theodore Henry Huss, composers; Dr. and Mrs. Edgar Stillman Kelley, composers; Charles Haubiel composer; L. Camilieri, conductor of People's Chorus; Amelia Gray Clarke, conductor of the Chaminade; Carolyn Beebe, concert pianist; Walter Mills, concert baritone; Dr. Sigmund Spaeth, Tune Detective; and Mme. Yvonne de Treville, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
MAR 26 1938

MUSIC EVENTS IN BROOKLYN

The following music events will be presented this coming week at the Brooklyn Academy of Music under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences: Monday evening, March 28, Marian Anderson, contralto, in songs of Purcell, Bach, Schubert, Gluck, Sibelius, Veracini and Negro Spirituals; Friday evening, April 1, Boston Symphony, Koussevitzky conducting, in C. P. E. Bach's Concerto for Strings, Debussy's "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony; Sunday afternoon, April 3, the Fiedel Trio in instrumental music of the fourteenth to sixteenth centuries.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
MAR 27 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO CLOSE SERIES

Final Community Concert to Take Place Wednesday Night at Auditorium

The Boston Symphony orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will close the current series of four concerts given under the auspices of the Springfield Community Concert association and the Junior league. During the course of the program, announcement will be made of the attractions to be offered during the 1938-'39 season as well as of the plans for the coming membership drive. Artists for next season have already been selected, although the dates have not yet been set.

The program for Wednesday night will be as follows:—

Concerto in D-major .... C. P. E. Bach
  Allegro moderato
  Andante lento molto
  Allegro
"The Sea," three orchestral sketches
  Debussy
  From dawn to noon on the sea
  The play of waves
  Dialog of the wind and the sea
Symphony No 5 in E-minor, Op 64
  Tschaikowsky
  Andante; allegro con anima
  Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
  Valse (allegro moderato)
  Finale (andante maestoso); allegro vivace

In this program the works of two extremely well-known composers will be played, and one by C. P. E. Bach, who to modern concertgoers is more remembered for having been one of the sons of the great John Sebastian Bach than for his own individual contribution to music. In his day, however, the younger Bach was far better understood and more fully appreciated than his father; many of the latter's works being put aside at the time of his death with some admiration but little interest.

C. P. E. Bach, as a figure in the history of music, is a forerunner of Haydn and Mozart, and was one of the early exponents of the sonata form as it is known today. The concerto in D-major was originally written for string orchestra and arranged about 12 years ago by Maximilian Steinberg for full orchestra at the request of Dr Koussevitzky. The conductor became acquainted with the work as performed by the Society of Ancient Instruments at Paris, a set of viols then being used.

Debussy's "La Mer: Trois Esquisses Symphoniques" is regarded as one of the great modern scores for symphony orchestra. It was composed in 1903-'05 and on its first performance enjoyed immediate success. It is written in his characteristic "impressionist" style so closely akin to the painter Monet. While each of the three pieces has a fanciful name, however, it cannot be regarded as "program" music in the usual sense. The playing of waves, and the dialogs of wind and sea are perhaps suggested, but it is in the rich orchestral coloring and the original method of instrumentation that make "La Mer", more than 30 years after its composition, a brilliant addition to concert programs.

Tschaikowsky, whose Fourth, Fifth and Sixth symphonies are the delight of most listeners, is the most popular figure of the three composers represented on the above program. During the past season his Fifth has been heard over the radio a number of times, and owing to previous performances both at Springfield and vicinity, it will be doubly and triply familiar to everyone.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
MIRROR
MAR 27 1938

Music

—By JON BYRON—

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, are giving three concerts this week: Thursday afternoon and Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall, Friday afternoon at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. On Thursday, Mr. Koussevitzky will feature the second suite from Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet."

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1938

219

First Orchestra of U. S.

Boston Symphony Rounds Out 49th Season in Brooklyn—Dr. Koussevitzky Carries On Traditions of Famous Music Organization

By Miles Kastendieck

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the concert will be more than just the closing event in this year's series of five, important though that it. The occasion will mark to the very day the 49th anniversary of the orchestra's first coming to Brooklyn.

On the eve of a half-century of bringing to us the greatest symphonic music played by what may this season be ranked as the first orchestra of America, the Boston Symphony has given 257 concerts in in this borough. The record is impressive in itself, but it is the more significant because the Brooklyn visits of the Boston Symphony have become an honored and treasured tradition and its concerts a source of distinction. It has been the thing to go to them for nearly 50 years.

* * *

Almost a decade before Brooklyn became a part of Greater New York, the Boston Symphony was hailed as the outstanding event in the musical, cultural and social life of the community. The orchestra, which had been founded in 1881 as a result of the imaginative foresight of Henry L. Higginson "a gentleman destined for immortality in the annals of American music," ventured forth first to Philadelphia. After considerable success there, it was invited to New York by Theodore Steinway in 1886-87, and the first regular season was inaugurated with Wilhelm Gericke conducting. Now in its 52d season it makes five visits annually giving a Thursday evening and a Saturday afternoon performance in Carnegie Hall.

Not so long after starting in New York, the orchestra was persuaded to make the trip to Brooklyn, a daring and arduous trip if we are to believe the wise-cracks of old. On April 1, 1889, it played its first program at the Old Academy of Music on Montague St. Gericke conducted just before laying down his baton that Spring and returning to Vienna. The concert listed as soloists Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. Mr. Henschel had been the orchestra's first conductor but had yielded his position for a career of song in England at the end of his third season. The program included Goldmark's Penthesilia Overture," Fuch's Serenade for Strings, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, "The Loreley," by Liszt, and "Crugantinos Sons" from "Claudine von Villa Bella," by Beethoven. That the Bostonians survived the trip and that the concert must have been a success is borne out by the fact that on April 1, 1938, we shall be attending another concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Friday's concert will be no different in quality of program nor performance from the high standard hitherto observed, the Boston Symphony has always furnished us with the best. Two concerts back, it showed good faith in giving Brooklyn the first of the Ravel commemorative programs. Though a shift in schedule actually brought this to pass, still the program could have been saved for the glamor of a first Manhattan performance.

This final program lists Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D Major for Stringed Instruments (arranged for Orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg), Debussy's "La Mer," the three orchestral sketches the performance of which is a notable achievement by this orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, which usually finds the conductor in the vein.

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has been conducting for fourteen seasons, holds the record for length of continuous service. He is descended from a long line of distinguished musicians that have led the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn: William Gericke, in 1389; Artur Nikisch, from 1889 to 1893; Emil Paur, 1893 to 1898; then Gericke again from 1898 to 1906; Karl Muck, 1906-08; Max Fiedler, 1908-12; Kark Muck once more in 1912 to 1918; Henri Rabaud for a year; Pierre Monteux from 1919 to 1924; Koussevitzky from 1924 to the present day.

Today the orchestra carries on at the zenith of its history with Dr. Koussevitzky supreme. Graduated from Moscow Conservatory, the conductor first won recognition for his remarkable accomplishments as a player of the double bass. Later he attracted attention as guest conductor of the London Symphony and with his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris. He tooks the Bostonians, both in and out of the orchestra, literally by storm and has so engaged their admiration since that he has almost become a cult. As reported before he came to Boston and proved over and over again since that time, Koussevitzky has always championed new music and had a way of his own with the classic repertoire.

* * *

Though his Brooklyn programs have always been conservative by request, he has managed to slip in names other than Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Strauss on his programs. Brooklyn needs to hear more contemporary music as its reception of the Ravel program recently demonstrated. A Sibelius symphony is now undoubtedly accepted, while perhaps Prokofieff will be more tolerated after the two performances—"Lieutenant Kije" and the "Classical Symphony" this year. The genius of Koussevitzky lies in interpreting and performing works written for the modern orchestra and the new composers in which he finds interest.

At the close of this series of concerts, we find the Boston Symphony one of the greatest lights of musical art in America. "Magnificently imagined, well-born, ingeniously directed and expertly managed, it has brooked growing pains, internal and external crises and metamorphoses which would have extinguished less propitious enterprises." Today it stands without a peer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will make its final appearance of this season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 1

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD- TRIBUNE
MAR 27 1938

THE ORCHESTRAS

Bostonians Play Brahms

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the second half of both programs to Brahms's symphonies, the first on Thursday and the second on Saturday. On Thursday night, after Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, the second suite, Op. 64 ter, from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet," in seven sections, will be played for the first time here. Its American premiere was last Friday in Boston in an all-Prokofieff program.

Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers for Saturday afternoon will be a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." "La Mer" will also be heard in this orchestra's concert Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with C. P. E. Bach's concerto for strings, in D, and Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Five Glee Clubs

COLLEGE GLEE clubs are very elaborately trained these days, a program containing all kinds of classics for men's voices being not only attempted by them, but performed with artistic ease and beauty. The two aggregations of young men here some time ago to give fine glee club programs duplicated two of the program numbers. Each group sang them beautifully, each had its own individuality. "Brothers, Sing On," and the Sibelius, "Broken Melody" were the duplicated songs. The Amherst men, with conductor Ralph Oatley sang in the fifth and last Art Museum concert one Sunday afternoon. I inquired for a former teacher, Prof. Charles Wiggins Cobb, retired five years now, with them. way, who a lot of immature minds and made them like it! The Bowdoin glee club gave the most brilliant performance of modern music for men's voices heard here in a long time, with Philip James' musical setting of Vachel Lindsays stirring "Gen. William Booth Enters Into Heaven," lines that give many of us a thrill as often as heard, recited, chanted or sung. Frederic Tillotson, their director, has been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I hear that the late Chester T. Porter was a Worcester man on that historic European trip of the Amherst glee club, mentioned that Sunday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1938

GENIUS

Feelings Hurt

"Insulting" was the word Serge Prokofieff used to describe the critical notices cultured Boston gave his Fourth Symphony, played under his baton a few years ago upon occasion of 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony.

Last Friday he conducted again. Played "only children's music." Quoth he: "If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music, why should I break my baton?"

Program included "Peter and the Wolf," orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children sounds of the various musical instruments. Also on program for a premiere in America was "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" which, said famed Prokofieff, "was without any complications." (Back Bay raised its eyebrows, glared through its lorgnettes, sniffed at hot comeback by Red Russian; but play "children's" music Moscow conductor most certainly did.)

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 27 1938

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Serge Koussevitzky will resume his conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra when, following the season's last visit to New York which will occupy the coming week, he conducts the 21st regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9. Walter Piston's Symphony, the first that he has composed, will have its initial hearing at this pair of concerts. The programme, which consists of three "first" symphonies, will open with Beethoven's Symphony in C major, No. 1, and close with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 28 1938

FOURTH AND FINAL CONCERT IS GIVEN

MISS BERTHA SEIFERT

Arthur Fiedler Conducts Alumni Symphony Orchestra Again

The fourth and final concert in the Alumni Symphony Orchestra's 1937-38 course was given last evening in the Oliver school hall and there was a very large sized audience present. Robert E. Sault, the regular conductor and organizer of the orchestra, again gratuitously stepped aside and turned over the baton to Arthur Fiedler, the well and favorably known conductor of the Boston Symphony Parks and Esplanade concerts. Once more Miss Bertha Seifert, the local pianist, was the guest soloist. Miss Seifert is an instructor in the music department of the Walnut Hill school in Natick. The program last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella,"
  Op. 69 Schubert
Symphony in B minor—
  The "Unfinished" Schubert
  a. Allegro moderato
  b. Andante con moto

Intermission

Concerto No. 9 in E Flat
  (Kochel 271)—
  for Piano and Orchestra Mozart
  a. Allegro
  b. Andantino
  c. Rondo—(Presto, Menuetto, Presto)
Pavane for a Dead Child Ravel
Ballet Music from the opera,
  "Aida" Verdi

The several rehearsals that Mr Fiedler held with the orchestra during the past month or more was duly reflected in the general excellence of the performance last evening. With his years of handling large and small orchestral bodies Mr. Fiedler's understanding background amply fits him for the task of infusing new or greater vitality into the so-called small town organization. But this could not be accomplished without serviceable material upon which to work. The Alumni orchestra, now in its fourth year, has been growing gradually in musicianship and technical qualifications. Mr. Sault has labored valiantly to give the city an orchestra of which to be proud and on several occasions he has been big enough to step aside and engage the services of more experienced conductors in his efforts to promote the organization's welfare. Last evening Mr. Fiedler brought out many telling effects and his energy and enthusiasm was reflected in the general smoothness of the playing, in which was observed a greater elasticity and precision than heretofore disclosed.

Miss Seifert against proved herself an accomplished pianist in the delicately molded Mozart Concerto. In the three movements, with their sharply divergent styles, she gave unalloyed pleasure to the large audience, which gave her a real ovation at the close of the work.

A note on the program thanked the public for its past support of the orchestra and hoped for continued appreciation of its work in the future. An ther note referred to the performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's operetta, "Ruddigore," by the Lawrence High school music clubs in the Holy Rosary auditorium on next Thursday and Friday evenings.

A. L. M.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1938

219

First Orchestra of U. S.

Boston Symphony Rounds Out 49th Season in Brooklyn—Dr. Koussevitzky Carries On Traditions of Famous Music Organization

By Miles Kastendieck

WHEN the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, the concert will be more than just the closing event in this year's series of five, important though that it. The occasion will mark to the very day the 49th anniversary of the orchestra's first coming to Brooklyn.

On the eve of a half-century of bringing to us the greatest symphonic music played by what may this season be ranked as the first orchestra of America, the Boston Symphony has given 257 concerts in in this borough. The record is impressive in itself, but it is the more significant because the Brooklyn visits of the Boston Symphony have become an honored and treasured tradition and its concerts a source of distinction. It has been the thing to go to them for nearly 50 years.

* * *

Almost a decade before Brooklyn became a part of Greater New York, the Boston Symphony was hailed as the outstanding event in the musical, cultural and social life of the community. The orchestra, which had been founded in 1881 as a result of the imaginative foresight of Henry L. Higginson "a gentleman destined for immortality in the annals of American music," ventured forth first to Philadelphia. After considerable success there, it was invited to New York by Theodore Steinway in 1886-87, and the first regular season was inaugurated with Wilhelm Gericke conducting. Now in its 52d season it makes five visits annually giving a Thursday evening and a Saturday afternoon performance in Carnegie Hall.

Not so long after starting in New York, the orchestra was persuaded to make the trip to Brooklyn, a daring and arduous trip if we are to believe the wise-cracks of old. On April 1, 1889, it played its first program at the Old Academy of Music on Montague St. Gericke conducted just before laying down his baton that Spring and returning to Vienna. The concert listed as soloists Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. Mr. Henschel had been the orchestra's first conductor but had yielded his position for a career of song in England at the end of his third season. The program included Goldmark's Penthesilia Overture," Fuch's Serenade for Strings, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, "The Loreley," by Liszt, and "Crugantinos Sons" from "Claudine von Villa Bella," by Beethoven. That the Bostonians survived the trip and that the concert must have been a success is borne out by the fact that on April 1, 1938, we shall be attending another concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Friday's concert will be no different in quality of program nor performance from the high standard hitherto observed, the Boston Symphony has always furnished us with the best. Two concerts back, it showed good faith in giving Brooklyn the first of the Ravel commemorative programs. Though a shift in schedule actually brought this to pass, still the program could have been saved for the glamor of a first Manhattan performance.

This final program lists Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D Major for Stringed Instruments (arranged for Orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg), Debussy's "La Mer," the three orchestral sketches the performance of which is a notable achievement by this orchestra, and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E Minor, which usually finds the conductor in the vein.

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who has been conducting for fourteen seasons, holds the record for length of continuous service. He is descended from a long line of distinguished musicians that have led the Boston Symphony in Brooklyn: William Gericke, in 1889; Artur Nikisch, from 1889 to 1893; Emil Paur, 1893 to 1898; then Gericke again from 1898 to 1906; Karl Muck, 1906-08; Max Fiedler, 1908-12; Kark Muck once more in 1912 to 1918; Henri Rabaud for a year; Pierre Monteux from 1919 to 1924; Koussevitzky from 1924 to the present day.

Today the orchestra carries on at the zenith of its history with Dr. Koussevitzky supreme. Graduated from Moscow Conservatory, the conductor first won recognition for his remarkable accomplishments as a player of the double bass. Later he attracted attention as guest conductor of the London Symphony and with his Concerts Koussevitzky in Paris. He tooks the Bostonians, both in and out of the orchestra, literally by storm and has so engaged their admiration since that he has almost become a cult. As reported before he came to Boston and proved over and over again since that time, Koussevitzky has always championed new music and had a way of his own with the classic repertoire.

* * *

Though his Brooklyn programs have always been conservative by request, he has managed to slip in names other than Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Strauss on his programs. Brooklyn needs to hear more contemporary music as its reception of the Ravel program recently demonstrated. A Sibelius symphony is now undoubtedly accepted, while perhaps Prokofieff will be more tolerated after the two performances—"Lieutenant Kije" and the "Classical Symphony" this year. The genius of Koussevitzky lies in interpreting and performing works written for the modern orchestra and the new composers in which he finds interest.

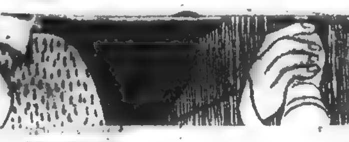
At the close of this series of concerts, we find the Boston Symphony one of the greatest lights of musical art in America. "Ma[illegible]ently imagined, well-born, ingen[illegible] directed and expertly managed, it has brooked growing pains, internal and external crises and metamorphoses which would have extinguished less propitious enterprises." Today it stands without a peer.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will make its final appearance of this season in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music on Friday evening, April 1

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
MAR 27 1938

T



Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last concerts of the season in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky will devote the second half of both programs to Brahms's symphonies, the first on Thursday and the second on Saturday. On Thursday night, after Haydn's symphony in G, No. 88, the second suite, Op. 64 ter, from Serge Prokofieff's ballet "Romeo and Juliet," in seven sections, will be played for the first time here. Its American premiere was last Friday in Boston in an all-Prokofieff program.

Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers for Saturday afternoon will be a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" and Debussy's "La Mer." "La Mer" will also be heard in this orchestra's concert Friday night in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, with C. P. E. Bach's concerto for strings, in D, and Tschaikovsky's fifth symphony.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

Five Glee Clubs

COLLEGE GLEE clubs are very elaborately trained these days, a program containing all kinds of classics for men's voices being not only attempted by them, but performed with artistic ease and beauty. The two aggregations of young men here some time ago to give fine glee club programs duplicated two of the program numbers. Each group sang them beautifully, each had its own individuality. "Brothers, Sing On," and the Sibelius, "Broken Melody" were the duplicated songs. The Amherst men, with conductor Ralph Oatley sang in the fifth and last Art Museum concert one Sunday afternoon. I inquired for a former teacher, Prof. Charles Wiggins Cobb, retired five years now, but he was not traveling with them. It was Prof. Cobb, by the way, who drilled good music into a lot of immature minds and made them like it! The Bowdoin glee club gave the most brilliant performance of modern music for men's voices heard here in a long time, with Philip James' musical setting of Vachel Lindsays stirring "Gen. William Booth Enters Into Heaven," lines that give many of us a thrill as often as heard, recited, chanted or sung. Frederic Tillotson, their director, has been a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

I hear that the late Chester T. Porter was a Worcester man on that historic European trip of the Amherst glee club, mentioned that Sunday.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
MAR 27 1938

GENIUS

Feelings Hurt

"Insulting" was the word Serge Prokofieff used to describe the critical notices cultured Boston gave his Fourth Symphony, played under his baton a few years ago upon occasion of 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony.

Last Friday he conducted again. Played "only children's music." Quoth he: "If the public in Boston cannot understand my serious music, why should I break my baton?"

Program included "Peter and the Wolf," orchestral fairy tale written to teach Soviet children sounds of the various musical instruments. Also on program for a premiere in America was "Romeo and Juliet Ballet" which, said famed Prokofieff, "was without any complications." (Back Bay raised its eyebrows, glared through its lorgnettes, sniffed at hot comeback by Red Russian; but play "children's" music Moscow conductor most certainly did.)

LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
MAR 27 1938

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME

Serge Koussevitzky will resume his conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra when, following the season's last visit to New York which will occupy the coming week, he conducts the 21st regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, April 8 and 9. Walter Piston's Symphony, the first that he has composed, will have its initial hearing at this pair of concerts. The programme, which consists of three "first" symphonies, will open with Beethoven's Symphony in C major, No. 1, and close with the First Symphony of Sibelius in E minor.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 28 1938

FOURTH AND FINAL CONCERT IS GIVEN

MISS BERTHA SEIFERT

Arthur Fiedler Conducts Alumni Symphony Orchestra Again

The fourth and final concert in the Alumni Symphony Orchestra's 1937-38 course was given last evening in the Oliver school hall and there was a very large sized audience present. Robert E. Sault, the regular conductor and organizer of the orchestra, again gratuitously stepped aside and turned over the baton to Arthur Fiedler, the well and favorably known conductor of the Boston Symphony Parks and Esplanade concerts. Once more Miss Bertha Seifert, the local pianist, was the guest soloist. Miss Seifert is an instructor in the music department of the Walnut Hill school in Natick. The program last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella." Op. 69	Schubert
Symphony in B minor—The "Unfinished" a. Allegro moderato b. Andante con moto	Schubert

Intermission

Concerto No. 9 in E Flat (Kochel 271)—for Piano and Orchestra a. Allegro b. Andantino c. Rondo—(Presto, Menuetto, Presto)	Mozart
Pavane for a Dead Child	Rave
Ballet Music from the opera, "Aida"	Verd

The several rehearsals that Mr Fiedler held with the orchestra during the past month or more was duly reflected in the general excellence of the performance last evening. With his years of handling large and small orchestral bodies Mr. Fiedler's understanding background amply fits him for the task of infusing new or greater vitality into the so-called small town organization. But this could not be accomplished without serviceable material upon which to work. The Alumni orchestra, now in its fourth year, has been growing gradually in musicianship and technical qualifications. Mr. Sault has labored valiantly to give the city an orchestra of which to be proud and on several occasions he has been big enough to step aside and engage the services of more experienced conductors in his efforts to promote the organization's welfare. Last evening Mr. Fiedler brought out many telling effects and his energy and enthusiasm was reflected in the general smoothness of the playing, in which was observed a greater elasticity and precision than heretofore disclosed.

Miss Seifert against proved herself an accomplished pianist in the delicately molded Mozart Concerto. In the three movements, with their sharply divergent styles, she gave unalloyed pleasure to the large audience, which gave her a real ovation at the close of the work.

A note on the program thanked the public for its past support of the orchestra and hoped for continued appreciation of its work in the future. Another note referred to the performance of Gilbert and Sullivan's operetta, "Ruddigore," by the Lawrence High school music clubs in the Holy Rosary auditorium on next Thursday and Friday evenings.

A. L. M.

220

2

YORK, PA.
GAZETTE DAILY

MAR 29 1938

NOTED PIANIST HERE TONIGHT

Harold Bauer Will Present Final Concert Of Season

AT SENIOR HIGH SCHOOL

Harold Bauer, master pianist, will play tonight in William Penn Senior High school, the final concert of the 1937-38 season of the York Community Concert association.

A large audience is expected to hear this English born American citizen, who was forced to become a pianist when the death of a Russian czar prohibited him from remaining a violinist.

Bauer was born into a musical family somewhere around 1880. At five he entered his musical career by dividing his enthusiasms between piano and violin. The violin won over the piano at first, however.

At ten he made his debut with an orchestra. His personal success put to rest all doubts as to a future career even though the last movement of the concerto was played slightly in advance of the orchestra.

Touring Russia as assisting violinist with a singer, Bauer was forced into filling out the program with piano solos when the group found it had to tour the smaller towns because the death of a czar had cancelled all concerts in the large cities.

From then on he remained a pianist. Since then he has played with all the important orchestras of the world. In 1900 he came to America at the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston symphony, and appeared as soloist with that orchestra. Eventually he made his home here and in 1921 became an American citizen.

Attending the concert tonight will be many subscribers of the 1938-39 season, who will be guests of the association. The campaign for members for the next season closed Saturday evening. Twenty-seven canvassers have been announced as having obtained eight or more new members. As a reward they will be given free tickets for the 1938-39 season. They follow: Beatrice Bott, Mrs. Hilda L. Black, Mrs. T. H. Donahue, Mrs. Ralph Fisher, Lou Finkbinder, Mr. A. E. Horton, Mrs. Stanley Hills, Mrs. Joe Kindig, Jr., Mrs. S. H. Katz, Miss Ruth Klinedinst, Mrs. J. Edmund Lippy, Frederick Marco,, Mrs. J. W. C. Morgan, Miss Bertha Neiman, Miss Helen M. Ness, Mrs. Sally Olewiler, Red Lion; Mrs. Walter Rohrbach, Miss Grace Reever, Miss Georgia Stum, Miss Fern Elizabeth Strine, Mrs. Mary H. Sieker, Miss Evelyn Sch le, Miss Sara Stahle, Miss Mary Shultz, Wrightsville; Miss Florence Spangler, Red Lion; Mrs. C. S. Treib Miss Helen W. Ziegler.

WELLSBURG, W. VA.
HERALD

MAR 29 1938

A FIRST OPERA HIT

Produced in the week of the composer's 71st birthday, the first opera by Gustav Strube of Baltimore was acclaimed as a success. It is called "The Captive," and deals with the buccaneers of the seventeenth century.

It is classed as an American opera, although the composer was born in Germany. He came to the United States in 1890, was naturalized in 1896, and has taken a prominent part in the musical life of his adopted country for nearly half a century, beginning as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Strube is a musical conductor of note, and has composed three symphonies, besides a long list of other works, but is said to have worked intermittently for 20 years on his opera. He was the organizer and for 15 years conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

"The Captive" was produced in Baltimore by a company of experienced but not professional singers, the principal role being sung by Mrs. Margaret Gilmer, described as "a comely housewife." The performance was conducted by the composer, who received an ovation.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

MAR 29 1938

In New York

* * *

By GEORGE ROSS

In Memoriam

As a tribute to the late George Gershwin, many of his friends have got together to compose a memorial volume to him. It is to include the beloved composer's songs, with his brother Ira's lyrics, and it will contain 16 of the late Gershwin's paintings which he executed as a greatly admired amateur. Serge Koussevitsky, DuBose Heyward, Jerome Kern, Olin Downes, Oscar Hammerstein II, Rouben Mamoulian, Walter Damrosch and Paul Whiteman are among the notables who will contribute to it.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS

MAR 29 1938

String Quintette Gives Fine Program To Small Audience

(Contributed)

The Tapley String Quintet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here last night at the Community Theatre under the sponsorship of the Bristol Teachers' Association, presenting a most exquisite program before a small and appreciative audience and a large number of empty seats.

Although the sight of the latter could not have been particularly inspiring to the artists, they nevertheless gave those who had come to hear them a memorable evening with not only the pelasure of hearing immortal musical compositions superbly played, but also to watch the best in technique, trained as they are to perfection under Koussevitsky's exacting baton.

LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD

MAR 30 1938

Seidel To Be Symphony Soloist

CINCINNATI, Ohio, March 29—Toscha Seidel, world-famous violinist, will be the soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra at its concerts in Music Hall, Friday afternoon at 2:45 o'clock, and Saturday evening, at 8:30 o'clock. He will be heard in Max Bruch's Concerto No. 2 in D minor. Other works on the program will include Symphony No. 2, E minor, by Felix Borowski, American composer; Overture, Fantasia, from "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky; and Slavonic Dance No. 1, Dvorak.

Two soloists, Marjorie Lawrence, soprano, and Friedrich Schorr, baritone, stars of the Metropolitan opera, will take part in an all-Wagner program to be presented by the orchestra, with Eugene Goossens conducting, at the following pair of concerts, April 8 and 9.

Plans announced by Theo F. Gannon, manager of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, for the 1938-1939 season, beginning next October, indicate the most brilliant array of talent in the history of the orchestra. Conductor Eugene Goossens is being given a leave of absence the early part of the season so that he may open the Royal Philharmonic season in London and keep engagements with other leading European orchestras. Accordingly, the first three pairs of concerts next season will be conducted by Jose Iturbi, famous Spanish pianist and conductor, who also will appear on one of the programs as piano soloist. Hans Lange, associate conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, will conduct the second three pairs. Goossens will return for the seventh pair and, except for one week when he will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, will head the Cincinnati orchestra the rest of the season.

Soloists announced by Mr. Gannon for next season include Jascha Heifetz, and Yehudi Menuhin, violinists; Myra Hess, Walter Kiesekind, Arthur Loesser, Josef Hofmann and Iturbi, pianists; Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson, two-piano team; Helen Jepson and Rose Pauly, sopranos; and Lawrence Tibbett and Ifor Gorin, baritones.

Another important announcement made by Mr. Gannon is that next season there will be twenty pairs of concerts instead of sixteen, but that season ticket prices will be only slightly higher for the larger series than they were for this season.

PITTSFIELD
EAG

Richard Hale Performs With Boston Orchestra

Richard Hale, frequent member of the Berkshire Playhouse Company in Stockbridge, was the narrator yesterday when Serge Prokofieff conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston in a program of his own music. Mr. Hale officiated in the presentation of "Peter and the Wolf," labeled "children's music."

"Peter and the Wolf" concerns the adventures of little Peter, who saved the bird and the cat from the big, bad wolf by letting down a lasso from a tree and catching the wolf by the tail. Then some hunters joined little Peter, the bird, the cat and Peter's grandfather, and they all marched to the zoo with the big, bad wolf. Unfortunately, little Peter couldn't save the duck, which the wolf swallowed alive.

The program will be repeated tonight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES

MAR 31 1938

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard tonight in Carnegie Hall.

The New School Chorus, under the direction of Arthur Lief, will present Haydn's "Seasons" and music by Byrd, Palestrina, Vittoria, Morley, Ford, Lassus and others tonight at the New School for Social Research.

The Budapest String Quartet will give an all-Beethoven program tonight at the Y. M. H. A., Lexington Avenue and Ninety-second Street.

The Gramercy Chamber Trio will play this afternoon at the Abraham Lincoln High School, Brighton Beach, Brooklyn.

The recitation of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," with music by Richard Strauss, will be given this evening at Steinway Hall by Eugene Bissell, reader, and Alfred Freckelton, pianist, under the direction of the Freckelton Associates.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

CITY NEWS

KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS CONCERT COURSE HERE

Next Year's Program Is Announced and Membership Drive Starts

By Willard M. Clark

The Community Concert Course, sponsored by the Springfield Junior League, came to a brilliant close last night with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. Practically every seat in the Auditorium was taken.

Atty. Raymond T. King, president of the Community Concerts Association, introduced Mrs. Lloyd D. Fernald, president of the Junior League, who announced that four concerts would be given next season and also that all seats would be reserved. The concerts will be given by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting; Marion Anderson, contralto; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, and the two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson. The applause following the announcement indicated that association members were well pleased by the selection of the artist committee.

Members' Wishes Considered

It is no easy task to select artists to appear on this course. Members have had the opportunity to make their various choices of artists and the hundreds of ballots turned in were carefully examined by the committee before a choice was made. It was not always possible to get the artists asked for but as far as possible the wishes of the members have been considered.

The Philadelphia orchestra replaces the Boston orchestra which has appeared here several times. Menuhin first came here as a boy prodigy, he returns a mature artist. Marion Anderson, great Negro contralto, comes here for the first time, although she has been heard in Boston and at Smith College. The two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson is considered the best to be heard, according to foremost critics. The last piano duo to be heard here was made up of Bauer and Gabrilowitsch.

Considerable applause followed the announcement that all seats would be reserved next season. The popularity of the course has made it impossible to provide seats for all who wished to attend and holders of regular tickets had to be at the Auditorium very early to get good places.

Drive Opens Today

The 1938-1939 Community Concert drive will be held in Steinert's store. It opened today and will continue through April 14. Old memberships will receive preference until April 9. New memberships will be accepted from April 11 to April 14. Memberships will be assigned according to the length of time the applicant has been an association member. The prices will be the same as this year, that is, sustaining members, $7.50; associate members, $5, and contributing members, $3. All members anticipating renewing their memberships are asked to do so without waiting for solicitation.

The program last night was one in which Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly happy as an interpreter. He has a magnificent orchestra at his disposal and the program was planned to show it to the best advantage.

It opened with a "Concerto in D Major" by C. P. E. Bach. Written originally for strings it was orchestrated for full orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, at the request of Dr. Koussevitzky. Using an orchestra of reduced size, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a clean-cut, beautifully-phrased performance. One is accustomed to think, perhaps, of a concerto as a display piece for solo instruments or instrument accompanied by orchestra. The concerto of Bach's day was something quite different, the chief element being the contrast between two groups of instruments, in this case the flute, oboe, English horn, bassoon and horn against the main body of strings. The concerto was charming in its freshness and simplicity.

Debussy Work Given

Debussy's "La Mer" was a particularly fine choice. This work is divided into three parts: "The Sea From Dawn Until Noon," "Sport of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." The three symphonic sketches are united thematically in the final movement where two themes of the first movement occur. Here is music so zestful, so colorful and so magical in its suggestion of the sea that one could no more separate it into its parts than one could analyze each separate wave in the sea. It is a superb impression of nature's mightiest force. The transparency of tone achieved by the players in the opening sketch was as remarkable as the brilliant climax of the final dialog between wind and sea. In this final sketch Dr. Koussevitzky unloosed a bewildering and intoxicating flood of sound.

It is not necessary to write at length of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Each is a superb achievement and last night the performance of the Fifth Symphony was no exception. Whether or not Tschaikowsky was morbid or a neurotic, the fact remains he was a musical genius and so Dr. Koussevitzky regards him. The virtuosity of the Boston players was never better exemplified than in the final movement, surely one of the greatest pieces of bravura writing to come from this prolific pen.

There appeared to be a nervous tension in the air last night. More than once Dr. Koussevitzky glanced toward Concertmaster Richard Burgin while playing the Debussy number. He seemed to be urging Mr. Burgin ahead. It was noticed that Mr. Burgin was not in his place during the symphony. It is understood that Mr. Burgin was suffering from a bad cold and did not feel able to play.

Diapason

SOWERBY WORK PREMIERE IN BOSTON; BIGGS AT ORGAN

A new concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, with E. Power Biggs at the organ, is announced as a feature of the season in Boston. The work is dedicated to Mr. Biggs. The premiere of the concerto is to take place at the concerts April 22 and 23 and music-lovers of New England are looking forward to the event. To organists the country over this performance is of interest.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS

MAR 31 1938

Boston Symphony In Final Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fifth and final program of its 52d season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night.

The program includes a Bach concerto, three orchestral sketches by Debussy, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Mrs. Helen Schanck Appleby will be in charge of the tea which is to be served at the Monday Morning Musical Club Studios on Washington street Sunday, following the talk to be given by Mr. John B. Archer at the Providence Public Library on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

Miss Ruth Tripp will preside at the tea table.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

Brahms Piece Theme For Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, March 30.—Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68 will be featured in an appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Koussevitzky will conduct.

ORANGE, N. J.
COURIER

MAR 31 1939

Pianist Will Feature Newark WPA Concert

Sigismond Stojowski, pianist and composer, will be the guest artist at the second concert, April 14, of the Federal Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Modeste Alloo at Fuld Hall, Newark.

Mr. Stojowski, who was born in Poland, was a pupil of Paderewski and in turn is credited with two famous students, Guiomar Novaes and Mischa Levitzka. As a pianist, he is considered one of the leading artists in Europe and America and was soloist of the Berlin Philharmonic, London Symphony, Sir Charles Halle's Orchestra in Manchester, Munich Academy, New York Philharmonic, Metropolitan Opera, Boston Symphony with Monteux, and Cincinnati with Stokowski. His program will be selected from his own and other well-known compositions.

Dr. Modeste Alloo, at the Stojowski concert, will conduct his seventy-five musician in works by Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Saint-Saens.

YORK, PA.
GAZETTE DAILY
MAR 29 1938

NOTED PIANIST HERE TONIGHT

Harold Bauer Will Present Final Concert Of Season

AT SENIOR HIGH SCHOOL

Harold Bauer, master pianist, will play tonight in William Penn Senior High school, the final concert of the 1937-38 season of the York Community Concert association.

A large audience is expected to hear this English born American citizen, who was forced to become a pianist when the death of a Russian czar prohibited him from remaining a violinist.

Bauer was born into a musical family somewhere around 1880. At five he entered his musical career by dividing his enthusiasms between piano and violin. The violin won over the piano at first, however.

At ten he made his debut with an orchestra. His personal success put to rest all doubts as to a future career even though the last movement of the concerto was played slightly in advance of the orchestra.

Touring Russia as assisting violinist with a singer, Bauer was forced into filling out the program with piano solos when the group found it had to tour the smaller towns because the death of a czar had cancelled all concerts in the large cities.

From then on he remained a pianist. Since then he has played with all the important orchestras of the world. In 1900 he came to America at the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston symphony, and appeared as soloist with that orchestra. Eventually he made his home here and in 1921 became an American citizen.

Attending the concert tonight will be many subscribers of the 1938-39 season, who will be guests of the association. The campaign for members for the next season closed Saturday evening. Twenty-seven canvassers have been announced as having obtained eight or more new members. As a reward they will be given free tickets for the 1938-39 season. They follow: Beatrice Bott, Mrs. Hilda L. Black, Mrs. T. H. Donahue, Mrs. Ralph Fisher, Lou Finkbinder, Mr. A. E. Horton, Mrs. Stanley Hills, Mrs. Joe Kindig, Jr., Mrs. S. H. Katz, Miss Ruth Klinedinst, Mrs. J. Edmund Lippy, Frederick Marco, Mrs. J. W. C. Morgan, Miss Bertha Neiman, Miss Helen M. Ness, Mrs. Sally Olewiler, Red Lion; Mrs. Walter Rohrbach, Miss Grace Reever, Miss Georgia Stum, Miss Fern Elizabeth Strine, Mrs. Mary H. Sieker, Miss Evelyn Sch le, Miss Sara Stahle, Miss Mary Shultz, Wrightsville; Miss Florence Spangler, Red Lion; Mrs. C. S. Treib Miss Helen W. Ziegler.

WELLSBURG, W. VA.
HERALD
MAR 29 1938

A FIRST OPERA HIT

Produced in the week of the composer's 71st birthday, the first opera by Gustav Strube of Baltimore was acclaimed as a success. It is called "The Captive," and deals with the buccaneers of the seventeenth century.

It is classed as an American opera, although the composer was born in Germany. He came to the United States in 1890, was naturalized in 1896, and has taken a prominent part in the musical life of his adopted country for nearly half a century, beginning as a violinist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Strube is a musical conductor of note, and has composed three symphonies, besides a long list of other works, but is said to have worked intermittently for 20 years on his opera. He was the organizer and for 15 years conductor of the Baltimore Symphony Orchestra.

"The Captive" was produced in Baltimore by a company of experienced but not professional singers, the principal role being sung by Mrs. Margaret Gilmer, described as "a comely housewife." The performance was conducted by the composer, who received an ovation.

BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
MAR 29 1938

In New York

By GEORGE ROSS

In Memoriam

As a tribute to the late George Gershwin, many of his friends have got together to compose a memorial volume to him. It is to include the beloved composer's songs, with his brother Ira's lyrics, and it will contain 16 of the late Gershwin's paintings which he executed as a greatly admired amateur. Serge Koussevitzky, DuBose Heyward, Jerome Kern, Olin Downes, Oscar Hammerstein II, Rouben Mamoulian, Walter Damrosch and Paul Whiteman are among the notables who will contribute to it.

BRISTOL, CONN.
PRESS
MAR 29 1938

String Quintette Gives Fine Program To Small Audience

(Contributed)

The Tapley String Quintet of the Boston Symphony Orchestra played here last night at the Community Theatre under the sponsorship of the Bristol Teachers' Association, presenting a most exquisite program before a small and appreciative audience and a large number of empty seats.

Although the sight of the latter could not have been particularly inspiring to the artists, they nevertheless gave those who had come to hear them a memorable evening with not only the pelasure of hearing immortal musical compositions superbly played, but also to watch the best in technique, trained as they are to perfection under Koussevitsky's exacting baton.

PITTSFIELD,
EAGLE
MAR 26 1938

Richard Hale Performs With Boston Orchestra

Richard Hale, frequent member of the Berkshire Playhouse Company in Stockbridge, was the narrator yesterday when Serge Prokofieff conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston in a program of his own music. Mr. Hale officiated in the presentation of "Peter and the Wolf," labeled "children's music."

"Peter and the Wolf" concerns the adventures of little Peter, who saved the bird and the cat from the big, bad wolf by letting down a lasso from a tree and catching the wolf by the tail. Then some hunters joined little Peter, the bird, the cat and Peter's grandfather, and they all marched to the zoo with the big, bad wolf. Unfortunately, little Peter couldn't save the duck, which the wolf swallowed alive.

The program will be repeated tonight.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
MAR 31 1938

MUSIC NOTES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conductor, will be heard tonight in Carnegie Hall.

The New School Chorus, under the direction of Arthur Lief, will present Haydn's "Seasons" and music by Byrd, Palestrina, Vittoria, Morley, Ford, Lassus and others tonight at the New School for Social Research.

The Budapest String Quartet will give an all-Beethoven program tonight at the Y. M. H. A., Lexington Avenue and Ninety-second Street.

The Gramercy Chamber Trio will play this afternoon at the Abraham Lincoln High School, Brighton Beach, Brooklyn.

The recitation of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," with music by Richard Strauss, will be given this evening at Steinway Hall by Eugene Bissell, reader, and Alfred Freckelton, pianist, under the direction of the Freckelton Associates.

LEXINGTON, KY.
HERALD
MAR 30 1938

Seidel To Be Symphony Soloist

CINCINNATI, Ohio, March 29—Toscha Seidel, world-famous violinist, will be the soloist with the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra at its concerts in Music Hall, Friday afternoon at 2:45 o'clock, and Saturday evening, at 8:30 o'clock. He will be heard in Max Bruch's Concerto No. 2 in D minor. Other works on the program will include Symphony No. 2, E minor, by Felix Borowski, American composer; Overture, Fantasia, from "Romeo and Juliet," by Tschaikowsky; and Slavonic Dance No. 1, Dvorak.

Two soloists, Marjorie Lawrence, soprano, and Friedrich Schorr, baritone, stars of the Metropolitan opera, will take part in an all-Wagner program to be presented by the orchestra, with Eugene Goossens conducting, at the following pair of concerts, April 8 and 9.

Plans announced by Theo F. Gannon, manager of the Cincinnati Symphony orchestra, for the 1938-1939 season, beginning next October, indicate the most brilliant array of talent in the history of the orchestra. Conductor Eugene Goossens is being given a leave of absence the early part of the season so that he may open the Royal Philharmonic season in London and keep engagements with other leading European orchestras. Accordingly, the first three pairs of concerts next season will be conducted by Jose Iturbi, famous Spanish pianist and conductor, who also will appear on one of the programs as piano soloist. Hans Lange, associate conductor of the Chicago Symphony orchestra, will conduct the second three pairs. Goossens will return for the seventh pair and, except for one week when he will conduct the Boston Symphony orchestra, will head the Cincinnati orchestra the rest of the season.

Soloists announced by Mr. Gannon for next season include Jascha Heifetz, and Yehudi Menuhin, violinists; Myra Hess, Walter Kiesekind, Arthur Loesser, Josef Hof-

---

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAR 31 1938

CITY NEWS

KOUSSEVITZKY ENDS CONCERT COURSE HERE

Next Year's Program Is Announced and Membership Drive Starts

By Willard M. Clark

The Community Concert Course, sponsored by the Springfield Junior League, came to a brilliant close last night with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. Practically every seat in the Auditorium was taken.

Atty. Raymond T. King, president of the Community Concerts Association, introduced Mrs. Lloyd D. Fernald, president of the Junior League, who announced that four concerts would be given next season and also that all seats would be reserved. The concerts will be given by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting; Marion Anderson, contralto; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, and the two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson. The applause following the announcement indicated that association members were well pleased by the selection of the artist committee.

Members' Wishes Considered

It is no easy task to select artists to appear on this course. Members have had the opportunity to make their various choices of artists and the hundreds of ballots turned in were carefully examined by the committee before a choice was made. It was not always possible to get the artists asked for but as far as possible the wishes of the members have been considered.

The Philadelphia orchestra replaces the Boston orchestra which has appeared here several times. Menuhin first came here as a boy prodigy, he returns a mature artist. Marion Anderson, great Negro contralto, comes here for the first time, although she has been heard in Boston and at Smith College. The two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson is considered the best to be heard, according to foremost critics. The last piano duo to be heard here was made up of Bauer and Gabrilowitsch.

Considerable applause followed the announcement that all seats would be reserved next season. The popularity of the course has made it impossible to provide seats for all who wished to attend and holders of regular tickets had to be at the Auditorium very early to get good places.

Drive Opens Today

The 1938-1939 Community Concert drive will be held in Steinert's store. It opened today and will continue through April 14. Old memberships will receive preference until April 9. New memberships will be accepted from April 11 to April 14. Memberships will be assigned according to the length of time the applicant has been an association member. The prices will be the same as this year, that is, sustaining members, $7.50; associate members, $5, and contributing members, $3. All members anticipating renewing their memberships are asked to do so without waiting for solicitation.

The program last night was one in which Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly happy as an interpreter. He has a magnificent orchestra at his disposal and the program was planned to show it to the best advantage.

It opened with a "Concerto in D Major" by C. P. E. Bach. Written originally for strings it was orchestrated for full orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, at the request of Dr. Koussevitzky. Using an orchestra of reduced size, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a clean-cut, beautifully-phrased performance. One is accustomed to think, perhaps, of a concerto as a display piece for solo instruments or instrument accompanied by orchestra. The concerto of Bach's day was something quite different, the chief element being the contrast between two groups of instruments, in this case the flute, oboe, English horn, bassoon and horn against the main body of strings. The concerto was charming in its freshness and simplicity.

Debussy Work Given

Debussy's "La Mer" was a particularly fine choice. This work is divided into three parts: "The Sea From Dawn Until Noon," "Sport of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." The three symphonic sketches are united thematically in the final movement where two themes of the first movement occur. Here is music so zestful, so colorful and so magical in its suggestion of the sea that one could no more separate it into its parts than one could analyze each separate wave in the sea. It is a superb impression of nature's mightiest force. The transparency of tone achieved by the players in the opening sketch was as remarkable as the brilliant climax of the final dialog between wind and sea. In this final sketch Dr. Koussevitzky unloosed a bewildering and intoxicating flood of sound.

It is not necessary to write at length of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Each is a superb achievement and last night the performance of the Fifth Symphony was no exception. Whether or not Tschaikowsky was morbid or a neurotic, the fact remains he was a musical genius and so Dr. Koussevitzky regards him. The virtuosity of the Boston players was never better exemplified than in the final movement, surely one of the greatest pieces of bravura writing to come from this prolific pen.

There appeared to be a nervous tension in the air last night. More than once Dr. Koussevitzky glanced toward Concertmaster Richard Burgin while playing the Debussy number. He seemed to be urging Mr. Burgin ahead. It was noticed that Mr. Burgin was not in his place during the symphony. It is understood that Mr. Burgin was suffering from a bad cold and did not feel able to play.

Diapason

Chicago, Ill. Apr. 1/38

SOWERBY WORK PREMIERE IN BOSTON; BIGGS AT ORGAN

A new concerto for organ and orchestra by Leo Sowerby, to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitsky, with E. Power Biggs at the organ, is announced as a feature of the season in Boston. The work is dedicated to Mr. Biggs. The premiere of the concerto is to take place at the concerts April 22 and 23 and music-lovers of New England are looking forward to the event. To organists the country over this performance is of interest.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
DAILY NEWS
MAR 31 1938

Boston Symphony In Final Concert

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the fifth and final program of its 52d season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Friday night.

The program includes a Bach concerto, three orchestral sketches by Debussy, and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony.

JOURNAL
Providence, R. I.

Mrs. Helen Schanck Appleby will be in charge of the tea which is to be served at the Monday Morning Musical Club Studios on Washington street Sunday, following the talk to be given by Mr. John B. Archer at the Providence Public Library on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert.

Miss Ruth Tripp will preside at the tea table.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
[illegible]

Brahms' Piece Theme For Boston Symphony

NEW YORK, March 30.—Brahms' Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68 will be featured in an appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Thursday night in Carnegie Hall. Koussevitzky will conduct.

ORANGE, N. J.
COURIER
MAR 31 1938

Pianist Will Feature Newark WPA Concert

Sigismond Stojowski, pianist and composer, will be the guest artist at the second concert, April 14, of the Federal Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Modeste Alloo at Fuld Hall, Newark.

Mr. Stojowski, who was born in Poland, was a pupil of Paderewski and in turn is credited with two famous students, Guiomar Novaes and Mischa Levitzka. As a pianist, he is considered one of the leading artists in Europe and America and was soloist of the Berlin Philharmonic, London Symphony, Sir Charles Halle's Orchestra in Manchester, Munich Academy, New York Philharmonic, Metropolitan Opera, Boston Symphony with Monteux, and Cincinnati with Stokowski. His program will be selected from his own and other well-known compositions.

Dr. Modeste Alloo, at the Stojowski concert, will conduct his seventy-five musician in works by Beethoven, Richard Strauss and Saint-Saens.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.
NEWS
MAR 28 1938

221

BIG MUSIC NAMES OF 1915 FAIR RECALLED AND FUTURE SCANNED

Great Ones Journeyed Here Once

Loudspeaker Plan Gives Correspondent Chills

BY MARJORY M. FISHER
The News Music Editor

Last week we wrote re some visions that have turned into nightmares. Today, from out the mail bag we conjure forth another's vision that may yet be realized.

The following letter speaks for itself (also for this department):

Dear Miss Fisher:

This is rather a late word of commendation to you for the splendid article which you had in The News the other day, giving the deplorable facts concerning music for the forthcoming world's fair. It was high time that someone sounded an alarm in this respect.

I do not have data on the music of our great 1915 fair with me, but there are memories of that event that will never fade. There was old Saint-Saens at fourscore traveling out here to conduct his grand symphony for organ and orchestra at Festival Hall and, incidentally, composing a special composition for the exposition to boot. There was the great Boston Symphony Orchestra with Karl Muck. And remember those glorious band concerts? There was Sousa, who wrote his "Pathfinder of Panama" for our fair. There was Gabriel Pares and the Republican Guard Band of Paris, Creatore came in for his share and Conway and Pryor, not to forget a very fine Philippine band. Paderewski and the other great ones dominated at Festival Hall, and there were outdoor musical attractions of endless variety, including an abundance of Hawaiian music and the popular Guatemala Marimba Band. These are but a few of the musical attractions that come readily to mind.

Horrible Rumor

But to look forward to 1939. What are we to have in the way of music? Someone has said that loudspeakers are going to be placed about Treasure Island for the music. Heaven forbid! Chicago tried this in 1933 and it satisfied no one. One who does not care for good music does not like to have it crammed down his throat as he is strolling about the fair grounds. Certainly no music lover enjoys music amplified and distorted through a loudspeaker to be competed against by the fellow selling soda-pop.

San Francisco may not be New York, but for me there's just one San Francisco, and regardless of the Eastern fair we should make a creditable showing with our music next year. Why can't some of the European governments be induced to send over musicians (as France previously did with Saint-Saens, Cortot and the Paris Conservatory Orchestra) to our fair? Let them call it propaganda if you will. It's a harmless type and creates only joy. For example why couldn't England be induced to send over Beecham with the London Philharmonic or the British Broadcasting Orchestra? Or France Bonnet, Dupre or the Republican Guard Band again? Does Hitler's plan allow him to send us an artist such as Richard Strauss or Finland to lend us Sibelius? And now that poor Bruno Walter is being put out of Vienna why couldn't we use him to good advantage next year? Above all, too, let's not underestimate our own Pierre Monteux—with the time he can make them all look up to him. Then Toscanini, who has never been here and who is continually cutting his European tours—why shouldn't he be here to climax the musical season? Paderewski, too, is still supreme (have you heard his movie of last year, "Moonlight Sonata," recorded in England?

If all of this is too fantastic or ambitious can't we at least take advantage of New York's musical activities and collaborate with them? But San Francisco really should lead the way in matters musical. Can we do it? Yours truly, R. A. Jones.

In spite of the uncertainties of the situation and continued reports that neither money nor place has yet been apportioned for music festivals, the exposition display center in Union Square still points out the Temple of Music, the Theater of the Sky and a Radio Center as possible headquarters for music.

When confronted by the report that the Temple of Music had long since been done away with, the lady in charge of the exhibit gave us the welcome assurance that only the design had been changed, and added the comforting comment, "We hear many strange things about us, but we just go right on with our plans."

The plans which Harris Connick had up his sleeve when he was head of the music co-ordinating committee were such as to justify the expectation that the 1939 fair would become as famous for its music as was that of 1915.

As maestro and generalissimo of the entire exposition, Mr. Connick should be able to conjure forth Toscanini as easily as the Kansas City Toy Symphony. And it is only because of our complete confidence in Mr. Connick's ability that the music editor can journey eastward to inspect the New York 1939 music plan with the optimistic belief that upon her return to San Francisco a few weeks hence she will learn that the Golden Gate International Exposition will not take second place, musically, to the exposition on Long Island.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
MAR 31 1938

Diversity in Music Program

'School for Scandal,' by Samuel Barber, Opening Number

By PITTS SANBORN.

Considerable diversity marked the program offered by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, John Barbirolli conducting, in Carnegie Hall last evening. The opening number was an overture, "School for Scandal," by Samuel Barber, previously unheard in New York.

This American composer, turned 28 this month, composed the overture, inspired, of course, by Sheridan's comedy, in 1932. It was his first work for orchestra. Though inferior to his "Music for a Scene from Shelley," which made a favorable impression here just three years ago, it is a lively and creditable composition and was so well received by the fair-sized audience that the composer had several times to go out on the stage to bow.

The next number was the "little" Third Symphony of Sibelius, which one listener is unable to regard as quite so charged with Rhapsody," "Country Dance," "Noche Espagnola" [sic], "Popular Song," and "Fox Trot," for the most part inferior to the suite's original numbers. The audience reveled in it all.

* * *

Harpist to Appear at Steinway Hall

Betty Paret, harpist, appearing at Steinway Hall this evening, will be heard in pieces by Rousseau, Purcell, Byrd, Farnaby, Bach, Tournier, Handel, Debussy, Granados, Grandjany, and herself.

* * *

Serge Koussevitsky, conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has chosen for tomorrow evening's program at the Brooklyn Academy of Music a concerto in D major by C. P. E. Bach as arranged by Maximilian Steinberg; Debussy's "La Mer," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings Community Series to A Brilliant End in Auditorium

E. P. E. BACH CONCERTO HOLDS FIRST PLACE ON EXCELLENT PROGRAM

The Auditorium was crowded to capacity last night to hear the Boston symphony in a superb concert which brought this season's community series to an end. Koussevitsky chose a concerto for stringed instruments by the great Bach's most gifted son, Carl Philipp Emanuel, to hold first place on an excitingly varied program. Although C. P. E. Bach was not put through the intensive musical training to which Bach subjected most members of his large family, this son, known now as the "Hamburg Bach," did inherit a fair slice of his father's genius, of which the concerto, beautifully interpreted by Koussevitsky, is an excellent example. Moreover, unlike many works of the period composed for small ensembles, the concerto is admirably suited to the power and coloring of the modern orchestra. The simple manly theme of the first movement is treated in a quasi fugal manner, and seldom has the exquisite balance of the Boston symphony shown to better advantage. The slow movement had a melancholy and elusive quality and the sustained themes made it rather difficult to grasp on first hearing. The concerto ended with that gay exuberance which was typical of last movements until the vogue of cyclonic finales came in.

Debussy's three orchestral sketches, musical dreams of the sea, received an interpretation last night which made most people select this composition as the most satisfactory on the evening's program. Debussy wrote "La Mer" far from the sea, because, he said, the splendor of nature's pageant would stifle the creative imagination. The music is therefore intentionally a poem of musical memories and it would be difficult to find a composition displaying a greater wealth of imagination or a greater grasp of the subtleties of an orchestra. This is no picture of the sea that tars love and hate but the suggestion of a sea dreamed in solitude by an impressionistic poet. The winds are romantic winds, the waves, which in the last movement answer their whining, are waves of the emotions. The dialog reaches a furious climax, breaks off suddenly, and leaves an audience chained to their seats.

Tchaikovsky's fifth symphony in E minor ended the concert. It is said that Tchaikovsky was his own sternest critic and that the majority of his judgments on his own works have been upheld by the critics of posterity. The composer is reported to have been dissatisfied with his fifth symphony and to have contrasted it unfavorably with the fourth and sixth. Even today when the work has gained a large degree of popularity and even after hearing Koussevitsky's reading of it which could not be surpassed, one is inclined to agree partly with the composer's first appraisal. It is patchy as he said it was. There is in it much that is superfluous, insincere. It suffers from Tchaikovsky's long-windedness and from his propensity for substituting a wealth of glorious melody for development. Nevertheless the symphony is inspired with considerable zest, and for all its repetitious length never subsides into bathos. Last night, moreover, it was impossible not to be carried away by Koussevitsky's enthusiastic interpretation.

Tobias Matthay at London they fell in love and married. As rising young pianists, they found separate achievements incompatible with mutual happiness, so they solved their problem by appearing jointly as a piano duo.

Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times has written of them: "Their musical and highly intelligent performances have won for them a deserved following. They interpret music without affectation, or ostentation or pretense with communicative sincerity and feeling. The players are true musicians. They perform with imagination and feeling. They utilize the resources of pedal and tonal color that the piano furnishes with excellent results."

ROSINDALE, MASS.
Weekly Parkway
Transcript
R 31 1938

Local Orchestra In City Program

The Roslindale Community Orchestra will give a concert of popular classics on Monday, April 4, at 8.15 p. m. in the Lecture Hall of the Boston Public Library, Copley square, at the invitation of the Back Bay recreation committee. The orchestra is one of many similar groups of amateur musicians maintained by recreation committees throughout the city in co-operation with the Adult Recreation Project, Works Progress Administration.

An appealing program has been arranged for the concert, opening with Rudolph Friml's Marche Carnivalesque, which will be followed by Mendelssohn's Italian symphony, second movement; Rubinstein's Kamenoi Ostrow; Evans' Lady of Spain; Schubert's Rosamunde; Chaminade's Concertino for flute and orchestra, in which Malcolm Hall, now studying at the New England Conservatory of Music with Laurent of the Boston Symphony, will be the soloist; Beethoven's Symphony in F Major, Second Movement; Komzak's Love and Life in Vienna Waltz; the Pizzicato Polka and March and Procession of Bacchus from Delibes' Ballet Sylvia; and Smetana's Dance of the Comedians.

EAU CLAIRE, WIS.
LEADER
MAR 31 1938

Attractions for Summer Tourists Held State Need

Events Drawing Visitors to Other States Reviewed

In an editorial entitled, "Are We Looking Ahead?" the Sheboygan Press suggests need of more and greater attractions in Wisconsin to draw summer tourists and cites many attractions used to draw visitors to other sections. The editorial follows:

"Wisconsin, looking toward continual development and expansion of its $300,000,000 vacation industry, ought to start thinking about providing more and better entertainment for its millions of summer guests from other states. Worthwhile events that will draw visitors from other regions and make them want to return another year. Events that will make national news.

"The national Swiss turnfest at Monroe, the Marinette smelt festival, the row-boat derby in Winnebagoland, the Menominee Indian pageant are a start in the right direction. But see what Michigan has been effering her summer guests. Here are a few Michigan events for tourists: a pageant based upon the explorations of Pere Marquette; a Hiawatha pageant by the Ottawa Indians; a Coast Guard water fete; an antique show; a peach festival; sailing, power-boat, tennis, golf, skeet casting, log-rolling, birling meets and tournaments; an arts fete and artists' ball; several musical events of real importance, including grand opera and the American Music festival at Interlochen.

"People travel from all over the country to the "dead" mining town of Central City, Colorado, for the annual summer play festivals there. Last summer, from July 17 to August 7, a top-flight cast gave daily performances in the old opera house of Ibsen's "A Doll's House" with such stars as Ruth Gordon, Walter Slezak, Sam Jaffe, Dennis King. A typical day's program at Central City included a network radio broadcast, pioneer barn dancing in Williams' Livery stable, a concert in the Teller House court, a performance at the opera house, more barn dancing and night-club entertainment with ace New York entertainers; a dawn ham-and-egg breakfast in the Teller House kitchen. On Sundays, church services, rock drill contests, and fire runs were added to the program.

"In the East, New Englanders and New Yorkers last summer flocked up into the Berkshire hills of Massachusetts—at the rate of 5,000 a night—to attend the Berkshire music festival, symphonic performances by the Boston symphony orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky. Massachusetts, New Jersey, Connecticut, in fact, practically every summer playground town and village in all New England has a summer theatre, many of them with well-known professionals from stage and screen in their casts

"Wisconsin last year had one short-season summer theatre, in Door county. Wisconsin has no top-notch professional summer music. The best Milwaukee can do is three park operettas, some park band concerts, some lake-front fireworks, good enough for the home-folks, to be sure, but not the sort of thing to make anyone travel more than 10 miles to attend

"Milwaukee has for years claimed and enjoyed a share in the Chicago Symphony orchestra. If we are unable to have an orchestra of our own, why not use the Chicagoans in the summer, too?—if not in Milwaukee, then in some other part of the state.

"Wisconsin is the birthplace, according to material unearthed by the Folklore section of the Federal Writers' project, of a dozen and more circuses, including Ringling Brothers. A giant circus roundup and fete is an idea for someone to develop. Waterbound on three sides, Wisconsin has yet to achieve an important water event. Yet it was on the Mississippi that showboats reached their zenith (and we mean showboats and not floating dance-halls) —and steamboat races, too.

"Wisconsin has many an old inn and wayhouse that could be restored to the considerable profit of anyone with a little imagination who saw fit to serve really good food (as compared with the common small-town meal that so disheartens and dismays travelers), and serve it well and with dispatch. Think of the old lumberjack meals, the Swiss meals, the Norwegian meals, and so on. We might even have a real beer garden.

"Wisconsin ought to decide whether to adopt Paul Bunyan, or forget him. If the former, he ought to be worth a festival and fete worthy of his proportions.

"Wisconsinites ought to realize what fortune is theirs to have real Indians. Did you ever see the eyes of a boy from some place like Indiana when you mention live Indians? The plan of Ralph Fredenberg, superintendent of the Menominee reservation, is a splendid one—for a national encampment or congress of Indians from all over the United States. He should receive support from all Wisconsin, for this and for the annual pageant of Menominee legends.

"Wisconsin's colleges could take a leaf from the experiences of Union college at Schenectady, New York, which annually conducts the Mohawk festival of drama, and draws thousands to performances of Shakespeare and Moliere.

"There are unlimited opportunities in Wisconsin for folk festivals and pageants, for more sports events, for music and the theatre. Those who are interested in keeping the great tourist income flowing into the state—and that should include practically everybody—can well start thinking about these opportunities now."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

Symphony Concert Brilliant Close to Community Course

Next Year's Program Announced; Drive for Members Will Open Today

By Willard M. Clark

The Community Concert Course, sponsored by the Springfield Junior League, came to a brilliant close last night with a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. Practically every seat in the Auditorium was taken.

Atty. Raymond T. King, president of the Community Concerts Association, introduced Mrs. Lloyd D. Fernald, president of the Junior League, who announced that four concerts would be given next season and also that all seats would be reserved. The concerts will be given by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy conducting; Marion Anderson, contralto; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, and the two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson. The applause following the announcement indicated that association members were well pleased by the selection of the artist committee.

Members' Wishes Considered

It is no easy task to select artists to appear on this course. Members have had the opportunity to make their various choices of artists and the hundreds of ballots turned in were carefully examined by the committee before a choice was made. It was not always possible to get the artists asked for but as far as possible the wishes of the members have been considered.

The Philadelphia orchestra replaces the Boston orchestra which has appeared here several times. Menuhin first came here as a boy prodigy, he returns a mature artist. Marion Anderson, great Negro contralto, comes here for the first time, although she has been heard in Boston and at Smith College. The two-piano team of Bartlett and Robertson is considered the best to be heard, according to foremost critics. The last piano duo to be heard here was made up of Bauer and Gabrilowitsch.

Considerable applause followed the announcement that all seats would be reserved next season. The popularity of the course has made it impossible to provide seats for all who wished to attend and holders of regular tickets had to be at the Auditorium very early to get good places.

Drive Opens Today

The 1938-1939 Community Concert drive will be held in Steinert's store. It will open today at 9 a.m. and continue through April 14. Old memberships will receive preference until April 9. New memberships will be accepted from April 11 to April 14. Memberships will be assigned according to the length of time the applicant has been an association member. The prices will be the same as this year, that is, sustaining members, $7.50; associate members, $5, and contributing members, $3. All members anticipating renewing their memberships are asked to do so without waiting for solicitation.

(Continued on Twenty-second P

Continued From First Page

The program last night was one in which Dr. Koussevitzky was particularly happy as an interpreter. He has a magnificent orchestra at his disposal and the program was planned to show it to the best advantage.

It opened with a "Concerto in D Major" by C. P. E. Bach. Written originally for strings it was orchestrated for full orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, at the request of Dr. Koussevitzky. Using an orchestra of reduced size, Dr. Koussevitzky provided a clean-cut, beautifully-phrased performance. One is accustomed to think, perhaps, of a concerto as a display piece for solo instruments or instrument accompanied by orchestra. The concerto of Bach's day was something quite different, the chief element being the contrast between two groups of instruments, in this case the flute, oboe, English horn, bassoon and horn against the main body of strings. The concerto was charming in its freshness and simplicity.

Debussy Work Given

Debussy's "La Mer" was a particularly fine choice. This work is divided into three parts: "The Sea From Dawn Until Noon," "Sport of the Waves," and "Dialogue of the Wind and the Sea." The three symphonic sketches are united thematically in the final movement where two themes of the first movement occur. Here is music so zestful, so colorful and so magical in its suggestion of the sea that one could no more separate it into its parts than one could analyze each separate wave in the sea. It is a superb impression of nature's mightiest force. The transparency of tone achieved by the players in the opening sketch was as remarkable as the brilliant climax of the final dialog between wind and sea. In this final sketch Dr. Koussevitzky unloosed a bewildering and intoxicating flood of sound.

It is not necessary to write at length of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Each is a superb achievement and last night the performance of the Fifth Symphony was no exception. Whether or not Tschaikowsky was morbid or a neurotic, the fact remains he was a musical genius and so Dr. Koussevitzky regards him. The virtuosity of the Boston players was never better exemplified than in the final movement, surely one of the greatest pieces of bravura writing to come from this prolific pen.

There appeared to be a nervous tension in the air last night. More than once Dr. Koussevitzky glanced toward Concertmaster Richard Burgin while playing the Debussy number. He seemed to be urging Mr. Burgin ahead. It was noticed that Mr. Burgin was not in his place during the symphony. It is understood that Mr. Burgin was suffering from a bad cold and did not feel able to play.

SPRINGFIELD, O.
SUN

1938

LIBRARY STORES MODERN MUSIC

Orchestral Works Of Contemporary Composers Are Preserved

PHILADELPHIA, March 31.—(U.P.)—Orchestral works of contemporary American composers are being preserved for posterity by the Federal Music Copying Project here, only one of its kind in the nation according to WPA officials.

Orchestral scores are copied on pure rag paper, double checked with the original, and then filed in specially constructed dust-proof boxes at the Free Library of Philadelphia as part of the Edwin A. Fleisher music collection, said to be the largest orchestral collection in the world.

A complete set of orchestral parts, enough for the largest symphony orchestra, are copied from the composer's original score. Many of the works prepared by the project have had premieres by the Philadelphia, the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic and other symphony orchestras, according to Arthur Cohn, director.

The staff of 52, all trained musicians and expert copyists, are occupied almost entirely with the works of contemporary Americans, many of whom do not have sufficient funds to pay for the copying that is necessary before their compositions may reach the public.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 1 - 1938

Boston Symphony Plays At Academy Tonight

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its current Brooklyn season to a close this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky has planned three important orchestral numbers for his program: Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D major for stringed instruments, Debussy's three orchestral sketches "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. The Bach Concerto has been arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, which sponsors the Boston Symphony concerts in the borough, has just released the dates of the orchestra's five concerts for the coming season: Friday, evening, Nov. 18; Friday evening, Jan. 6; Thursday evening, Feb. 9; Friday evening, March 10; Friday evening, March 31.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Symphony Brings Season's Series To Brilliant End

Concert by Orchestra Led by Dr Serge Koussevitzky Stirs Large Audience at the Auditorium

By FRANCIS REGAL

The series of four concerts given by the Community Concert association came to a climax and a close last evening with a superb concert at the Auditorium by the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr Serge Koussevitzky. This famous organization [illegible] visited Springfield every year since these concerts were transferred to the Auditorium and expanded under the auspices of the Junior League of Springfield. If another orchestra is to take its place in the next series it is not for lack of appreciation of the Boston musicians but to give the public a basis for comparison. Certainly it would be idle to expect finer playing than Mr Koussevitzky and his men gave last night, and the great audience was deeply stirred.

Some listeners may have found the program less interesting than various programs which Mr Koussevitzky has offered in the past, but this is partly a matter of taste and partly a matter of personal experience—what one finds well worn is a thrilling novelty to others. That the three works presented last evening met the general mood could be seen from the rapt interest with which each was followed, and together they made a fine crescendo of orchestral and emotional power. First came a charming concerto for stringed instruments by C. P. E. Bach, arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg, and full of grace and beauty of the 18th century classical type.

(Continued from First Page)

Admirable Introduction

This is effective for a modern orchestra, but in a simple way which made it an admirable introduction. It finely attuned the ear to the orchestral subtleties of Debussy's suite "La Mer," one of the most beautiful works of a highly original composer who did for music much what the impressionists did for painting. These tone sketches of the sea are not realistic descriptive music, and one would look in vain even for such a hint as the theme in Mendelssohn's overture to the Hebrides which keeps up the rote of the sea.

Whether most listeners would associate Debussy's work with the sea without the aid of the title is a nice question, but with that clew its inner meaning is fairly clear to anyone who knows something of this composer's work. It expresses a poetic mood and uses for that purpose exquisite and sometimes ethereal fragments of the sounds of wind and sea which subconsciously impress themselves upon a sensitive ear. It is not a description of the sea but a poem of the sea and it is incidentally a marvelous pattern of rhythm and delicate orchestral coloring.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth

With this background, the audience got the full effect of a thrilling performance of what many consider the finest of Tschaikowsky's symphonies, the fifth, in E minor. There is nothing subtle or ethereal about this great Russian's music; his tone colors are laid on with a broad brush, and his emotional colors are even more garish. If the fifth, as some think, is even finer than the "Pathetic" symphony it is because emotion is more nearly kept within bounds, but even so it is a tremendous work and for an adequate performance conductor and orchestra must give it all they have.

In the interpretation of many composers, Mr Koussevitzky is admirable, and in these intense and powerful symphonies by Tschaikowsky he has hardly an equal. Those refinements of rhythm in the famous "andante cantabile" which the composer indicates by marking it "with a certain license" were perfect and delicious, and conductor and performers combined to give the moving melody its full beauty. But the essential quality of each movement was extracted in full measure, and while the volume of tone in the climaxes of the several movements was at times almost stunning, it was never coarse or harsh.

At previous concerts some works have been heard which displayed better the luscious beauty of the general standard of tone which the Boston orchestra has attained in recent years, but the Tschaikowsky symphony brought out in a memorable way the richness and power of this great tonal mass. The three works taken together made a program varied in interest and cumulative in effect.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN

Varied Program Scheduled For 1938-39 Season

Will Include Philadelphia Symphony, Menuhin, Marian Anderson and Bartlett and Robertson

The Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, directed by Eugene Ormandy; Marian Anderson, Negro contralto; Yehudi Menuhin, violinist, and Bartlett and Robertson, two-piano team, will comprise the attractions to be offered by the Springfield Community Concert association and the Junior League during the 1938-39 season. This announcement was made last night at the Boston Symphony orchestra concert, which closed the series of four programs presented this season, by Mrs Lloyd Fernald, president of the Junior League.

Further announcements were made relative to the membership drive and other details of interest to subscribers to the series. Mrs Fernald told the audience that present members of the association may renew their subscriptions starting today and continuing through April 7. New members will be accepted from April 11 to the 14th. Memberships will be obtainable at Steinert's, 1217 Main street from 9 in the morning to 5, weekdays.

No Box Office Sale

As is customary in the Community Concert series, there will be no box office sale for the individual concerts, and following the close of the drive no additional applications will be accepted. Applications to seats will be assigned in accordance to the length of membership, that is, the number of consecutive years applicants have been subscribers.

(Continued from First Page)

Because of the innumerable requests that have been made for reserved seats in all price classes, Mrs Fernald announced that all seats would be reserved. She also advised all members anticipating the renewal of their membership for the coming year to subscribe at once without waiting to be solicited.

Two of next season's attractions are already well known to Springfield audiences. Yehudi Menuhin, appeared here a few years ago in one of the Community concert series. From an early age Menuhin has been before the public, and now, at the age of 21, is regarded as one of the world's greatest violinists. Formerly a pupil of Louis Persinger, New York teacher of violin prodigies, the young artist has toured extensively, receiving the acclaim of both critics and public. This season he returned to the concert stage after two years' retirement spent in study and relaxation.

The Philadelphia Symphony orchestra played in Springfield two years ago and has appeared a number of times in the series given each year in the Smith college series at Northampton. It achieved fame during the long conductorship of Leopold Stokowski, and Eugene Ormandy, who recently became leader of the orchestra, is said to have maintained the high standard already established. The orchestra is notable for the quality of its string section and for the flexibility and freedom of its performance.

Marian Anderson Coming

Marian Anderson, the great Negro contralto, will be making her first Springfield appearance, and her concert here next season is expected to be one of the high lights of the series. A year ago she was heard at Northampton, and this season has given recitals at both Pittsfield and Boston. A native of Philadelphia, Miss Anderson was formerly a church singer. During the past few seasons she has made concert tours in both Europe and South America and has impressed audiences everywhere with the simplicity of her stage manner and with the authentic and beautiful interpretations of all types of songs and arias.

Also new to Springfield will be the two-piano team of Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson. After having had distinguished careers as solo pianists, they are heard exclusively together. Miss Bartlett, a native of London, is considered "one of England's most beautiful women." Rae Robertson is a Scotsman and an M. A. of Edinburg university. As students under Tobias Matthay at London they fell in love and married. As rising young pianists, they found separate achievements incompatible with mutual happiness, so they solved their problem by appearing jointly as a piano duo.

Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times has written of them: "Their musical and highly intelligent performances have won for them a deserved following. They interpret music without affectation, or ostentation or pretense with communicative sincerity and feeling. The players are true musicians. They perform with imagination and feeling. They utilize the resources of pedal and tonal color that the piano furnishes with excellent results."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD-TRIBUNE
APR 1 - 1938

222

Koussevitzky Offers Part of 'Romeo' Ballet

Boston Orchestra Plays Prokofief Episodes Here for First Time; Also Haydn and Brahms Symphonies

By Jerome D. Bohm

At his fifth and final evening concert of the season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Koussevitzky unfolded for the first time here four episodes from Prokofieff's second suite from the ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," Op. 64, along with two time-tried symphonies, that of Haydn in G major, No. 88, and Brahms's first in C minor.

Little is known of the text upon which Prokofieff has based his ballet version of "Romeo and Juliet." M. D. Calvocoressi, whose elucidative comments are quoted in the program notes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gives but one clew to the action in his description of the final episode of the suite, "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," in which we are informed that "Juliet is not really dead, and that Romeo, unaware of the fact, is prostrate with grief."

Unshakespearian as is this treatment of the conclusion of the tragedy, it does not prepare the listener for the utter banality of Prokofieff's score. The first fragment, "Montagues and Capulets," begins promisingly with an all too brief solemn introduction which soon gives way to an incredibly commonplace tune. The second excerpt, "Juliet, the Maiden," might serve well as illustrative music for a coy Hollywood motion-picture heroine; the following "Dance" is a harmless trifle and, in the longest and most pretentious movement, the aforementioned "Romeo by Juliet's Grave," we are led to suspect that Romeo was a "blues" singer, for he mourns in unmistakably jazz accents.

There is nothing in these four of the seven sections which comprise this suite to remind us of the Prokofieff who conceived such original and telling music as the "Scythian" suite or the captivating opera, "Love for the Three Oranges." The score is, to be sure, skillfully and effectively orchestrated; but it is devoid of substance. Mr. Koussevitzky and his magnificent orchestra gave of their best in interpretation; but this music is stillborn.

Far more rewarding were the disclosures of the Haydn and Brahms symphonies. Especially felicitous was the performance of the former, in which the pacing and adjustment of dynamic values were well considered and just. Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the C minor symphony of Brahms has gained in poise and dignity since it was last heard here. There were moments in the second and last movements in which the conductor's sudden shifts of tempo were disturbing; but for the most part he gave a well integrated delivery of all four movements, stressing always the lyrical aspects of the music. The sentimentality which has sometimes crept into Mr. Koussevitzky's traversal of the andante sostenuto was avoided and while the incomparable introduction to the last movement has been known to have greater emotional impact, the triumphant allegro was set forth with stirring effect. Regarded merely from the tonal aspect, nothing more gorgeous could be desired. The large audience reserved its greatest demonstrations of approval for the Haydn and Brahms works.

DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS

APR 1 - 1938

Koussevitsky to Play Tchaikovsky's Fifth

Special to The News.

NEW YORK, March 31.—Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 1, in E minor, Op. 64 will high light a program to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Other selections will be Concerto in D, for stringed instruments, by C. P. E. Bach-Steinberg, and Debussy's "La Mer." Serge Kous-

223

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
APR 1 - 1938

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

Gives First of Its Last Two Concerts for This Season, Playing Second Suite of Prokolieff's "Romeo and Juliet"

With Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night gave the first of its last two concerts in Carnegie Hall this season, introducing to New York the second suite from Serge Prokofieff's ballet, "Romeo and Juliet" (opus 64).

The remaining numbers were Haydn's symphony in G (No. 88) and Brahms' First Symphony.

The Prokofieff ballet, which, incidentally, is not the first based on Shakespeare's tragedy, was produced at the Bolshoi Theater, Moscow, in 1935.

Prokofieff made two orchestral suites from the work, the first of which was played for the first time in America in Chicago by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in January, 1937.

The second suite, which enjoyed an initial performance in Russia last year, had its American premiere in Boston last Friday when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it as part of an all-Prokofieff program.

The suite, divided into seven sections, is descriptive of various stages in the tragedy, with one or two interpolated divertissements, the titles being "The Montagues and Capulets," "Juliet the Maiden," "Friar Laurence," "Dance," "Parting of Romeo and Juliet," "Dance of the West Indian Slave Girls" and "Romeo at Juliet's Grave."

Tomorrow afternoon in the same hall the orchestra will play a divertimento from Stravinsky's allegorical ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fee"; Debussy's "La Mer" and Brahms' Second Symphony.

* * *

Betty Paret Is Heard In a Harp Recital.

With many local colleagues in the audience—Marcel Grandjany among them—Betty Paret, a young harpist, gave her first New York recital at Steinway Hall last night. She had the assistance in two numbers of the American Woman's String Quartet.

Miss Paret's fingers evidently know their way about on harp strings. Her plucking, gliding, swishing and tinkling all showed resourceful skill, and in impressionistic modern pieces she knew how to swell and diminish a series of phrases with suggestive dynamic nuance.

The string ensemble showed its technical mettle first in Marcel Samuel Rousseau's variations on an old French "Noel" and later accompanied Miss Paret in Handel's B flat concerto, revised by Mr. Grandjany.

Handel wrote [illegible] concerto for the young harpist, Powell, who played it during an intermission in "Alexander's Feast." The composer's melodic power and sustained eloquence are in its pages, and Mr. Grandjany seems to have done a good job of revision.

Miss Paret and her assisting artists gave the work its full measure of balance and smoothness. Mr. Grandjany, incidentally, wrote the cadenza linking the larghetto to the finale.

Among the harpist's solo selections was the early French "Chanson de Gullot Martin." This is one of the finest of all melodies to come down to us and by its peculiar quality seems predestined for the harp. Miss Paret caught all its noble lyricism and bell-like purity, and the audience gave her an ovation.

A fine exhibition of skill was Marcel Tournier's "Au Matin," with its billowing glissandos and gentle thumpings, evoking a Debussyan picture of a rolling sea.

L. B.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 1 - 1938

Final Concert of Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring its current Brooklyn season to a close this evening at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has planned three important orchestral numbers for his program: Carl Philip Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments; Debussy's Three Orchestra Sketches, "La Mer," and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 5 in E minor. The Bach Concerto has been arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg.

CINCINNATI, O.
TIMES - STAR

GOSSIP OF MUSICAL CIRCLES

Music patrons of Southwestern Ohio and Eastern Indiana are receiving with pleasure the announcement of the coming of Nadia Boulanger of Paris, France. Her only appearance in this section will be in Presser Hall, Western College, Oxford, at 8 p. m. on April 9.

Mlle. Boulanger has the distinction of having been the first woman ever to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London last year and she has added to her laurels by conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the Philadelphia orchestra.

Hundreds of musicians and music critics in this section have attended her classes in Paris and have been under her guidance in molding their own careers. Her influence is credited with directing to a large extent musical compositions in America. Among her more noted American students have been Virgil Thomson, composer of "Four Saints in Three Acts"; Aaron Copeland, Prof. Walter Piston of Harvard, Ross Lee Finney, Prof. Douglas Moore of Columbus and Roy Harris of the faculty of Westminster Choir School. More close to home is Prof. Henry Lynne Woodward, instructor in theoretical music at Western College, Oxford. Scores of her students are now instructors in many other American colleges and universities.

Mlle. Boulanger chose for the Boston Symphony when she conducted it, "Requieum," by Gabriel Faure, with whom she studied composition in the Paris Conservatory, where both her father and grandfather were professors. She later abandoned composition for teaching, and has given courses in the American Conservatory at Fontainebleau and at the Ecole Normal in composition, harmony, counterpoint, piano accompaniment and music history.

More recently her interest turned to conducting and she leads a group of singers in Paris. She has been decorated by the French government with the Legion d'honneur and sent to the United States to study educational methods here.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 1 - 1938

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Last-Night Performance of New York Season

HAYDN SYMPHONY PLAYED

New Music by Prokofieff and a Brahms Composition Also Win Much Applause

By OLIN DOWNES

In a considerable perspective of orchestral concerts this chronicler remembers few if any occasions when a Haydn symphony was applauded as last night after the opening performance of the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

It could be said that the sheer tone quality and the brilliancy of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization would have aroused extravagant plaudits under any circumstances. It could be added that the symphony itself, thrice familiar, is an experience always new and engrossing, granted the adequate interpretation. A further consideration could be attached to the above, as concerning slight differences of individual opinion in details of interpretation, as the slow pace of the theme and the variations, which seemed excessive. The sum of it all was a most brilliant and fascinating reading. Many an imposing finale of a concert receives cooler recognition than that extended the first item of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final evening program in New York this season.

Prokofieff Music Included

New music by Prokofieff followed, music composed for a ballet designed, apparently with typical Communist license, after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The program book might have vouchsafed us some information concerning Mr. Prokofieff's scenario to which mysterious reference is made in a review of the Russian première, which is quoted. From the information provided the conclusion is reached that Prokofieff composed music to a plot as different from Shakespeare's as the Hamlet to which Shostakovich, years ago, wrote music. It was different from the original conception of the Bard of Avon.

In that plot there was no ghost. The ghost was merely an invention of Hamlet to prey on the superstitions of a populace that he wished to rouse against the murder of his father. We find by the directions for the Prokofieff ballet that "Juliet's grave is a deception, though Romeo is unaware of the fact." The music, somewhat like unto Shostakovitch's, is predominantly satirical in tone. There is the partial suggestion of that which is poignant and tragic, but there is little of the sensuous or emotional, and in the main the music could bear almost any title and still serve for ballet evolutions, and have nothing to do with Romeo and Juliet.

Some of it is banal. Possibly, associated with the movements on the stage, its true meaning would be completed. Probably Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, compared with it, would be subject to the sneers of the sophisticates. There, however, we find something of Shakespeare, while in last night's offering we do not.

Brahms Symphony a Highlight

The Brahms First symphony, which ended the concert, was of the highest testimony to Dr. Koussevitzky's mastery, not only as conductor but as one who penetrates to the pith of the great masterpiece. His control of the orchestra was complete and imperious; his results were accomplished with an impressive simplicity and economy of effort. By the same token the interpretation was conspicuous for its intensity, merged in a noble form, and its sustained and accumulating power. The symphony was permitted to appear in its own gigantic lines and to speak for itself as a mountain peak against the sky speaks for itself. For the grand lines of the music were carved as by a master sculptor.

It was a classic conception, but not a pedantic one. Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to fling out the great chorale, when it appears, fully scored, toward the wild ending of the symphony, with a breadth that momentarily held in abeyance the momentum of the music. (And by the way, how superbly the same chorale was played, piano, by the trombones in the introduction!) There was the end of frantic rejoicing, the great cry for liberty that Brahms understood, and that Beethoven voiced before him, the cry which at last is always heard, to the defeat of evil and the confusion of tyrants. Perhaps at no time would the great C minor symphony have meant more to an audience. And it is probable that on no previous occasion had Dr. Koussevitzky and his men given a more complete revelation of the composition. On its conclusion there was long applause and vociferous cheering.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 1 - 1938

Prokofieff Novelty Played

Koussevitzky Presents Ballet Suite at Boston Symphony Concert.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

At the fifth and final concert of the Boston Symphony's evening series in Carnegie Hall, Serge Koussevitzky set before his New York admirers last night a novelty from Soviet Russia, arrived by way of Prague, Paris and London. This was the second of two orchestral suites compiled by Serge Prokofieff from his ballet, "Romeo and Juliet," composed in 1935 for the Bolshoi Theater in Moscow.

The first suite reached America a year ago, when the composer conducted it in Chicago. The second had its introduction to this country only last Friday when Mr. Koussevitzky performed it for the first time in Boston. That the ballet itself will be imported seems most unlikely. Apparently it is best remembered because of its substitution of a happy ending for the final tragedy. Juliet didn't die, though Romeo went through the travail of thinking her dead. Mr. Prokofieff was not called upon to set Shakespeare. Gounod's opera and Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia are not less Shakespearean in feeling. Nor are they, today, more full of musical cliches than is this relatively new music by the man of Sontsovka.

Of the seven sections or numbers in the suite heard last night that which is styled "Romeo at Juliet's Grave," an adagio funebre, has both a Tschaikowskyan and a Gounodian feeling, but this Romeo's supposed sorrow is quite as empty as the grave of his unperishing Juliet. Something of characterization is essayed in other parts of the suite. The Montagues and Capulets swagger with little of distinction through the opening allegro; Juliet is portrayed in music as naive as herself in the succeeding vivace; Friar Laurence is represented by two themes of an andante, neither of which grants him much of flesh and blood. There are two dances, one of which has to do with West Indian slave girls, and there is a fairly extended movement devoted to the parting of the lovers, lyrical but commonplace. The music is at times mildly dissonant, but is prevailingly traditional in character rather than advanced or adventurous. The writing is clear and the scoring has Prokofieff's usual neatness and precision. But this is scarcely the music to be expected in his full maturity from the young man who once had the world by the ears with his "Scythian" suite.

Mr. Koussevitzky and his players met every obligation the novelty imposed upon them and more. For the performance had a fervor the music itself did not convey. There was much superb playing also in Haydn's G major symphony, No. 88—one of the twelve written for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and in the Brahms C minor, where the brasses particularly distinguished themselves in spite of one conspicuous blemish. The Haydn performance was on the robust side, but not to the sacrifice of finesse. Mr. Koussevitzky's Brahms has mellowed until now there may be reason to regard his conception of the first symphony as a little too easy going and variable of pace rather than too tense and brittle.

With tomorrow afternoon's concert the Bostonians will conclude their New York visits for this season. The first of the farewells last night resulted in a succession of demonstrations for the conductor and the orchestra.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 1 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Koussevitzky Conducts New Prokofieff Score in Final Evening Concert of Boston Symphony Carnegie Hall Series

Serge Koussevitzky brought a new Prokofieff score for a first New York performance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night, but it was the playing of the orchestra that swept all before it. There was lengthy applause at the close of the concert for the eminent conductor making his final bows of the season to this audience after a performance of the Brahms First Symphony. Yet the most finished playing was heard at the beginning of the concert in the Haydn Symphony in G Major.

The new Prokofieff composition is his Second Suite from the Ballet "Romeo and Juliet" arranged in this form in 1936-7 from the ballet composed the previous year. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first performance in America on March 25 in Boston. The movements of the suite from the programmatic point of view give a fair idea of the music: Montagues and Capulets; Juliet, the maiden; Friar Lawrence; Dance; the parting of Romeo and Juliet; Dance of the West Indian slave girls; Romeo at Juliet's grave.

Cont.

What was actually heard was a strange mixture of striking music, the juxtaposition of very modern and quite traditional harmonic writing, and a generally uneven structure. The opening measures in their discordance have a realistic ring closely associated with the nature of the subject, but on repetition the jarring conflict of tones loses some of the startling and almost objectionable qualities. The thematic portrayals are well conceived; much of the music has character and quality. But had it not been for the brilliant performance by conductor and orchestra, how much of this music would have sounded as persuasive as it did?

The ever-refreshing Haydn symphony was enjoyed at a recent Brooklyn concert, while the Brahms was conducted in the Koussevitzky tradition somewhat more mannered than usual in tempo and dynamic contrasts. But for finesse and polish this orchestra again made an indelible impression in the superiority of its performance and the sumptuousness of its tonal balance.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 2 - 1938

Society Notes

By LUCILE MINTZ

Boston Symphony Closes Season Here Before Large Audience; Many Are Hosts in Boxes

The fifty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this borough came to a close last evening with a gala performance in the Brooklyn Academy of Music and an enthusiastic demonstration on the part of the large audience in honor of Dr .Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor. Dates for next season's series were announced in a folder enclosed in the program.

Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, hostess in the box of the Brooklyn Committee, formed by a group of prominent citizens to foster interest in the annual concert series, entertained a group of nurses from St. John's Hospital.

Other box parties were those of Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Mrs. Edward C. Blum, the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president; Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

In the box with Mrs. Prince were Mr. and Mrs. William Copeland Finley, of Montreal; Miss Lorraine Finley, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Theodore Fitch.

The guests of Mr. and Mrs. Pratt were Mrs. William Temple Emmett and William Temple Emmett 3d.

Occupying the box of Admiral and Mrs. Woodward were Captain and Mrs. A. C. Stoo, Captain and Mrs. Jonas H. Ingram, Captain and Mrs. S. F. Heim and Captain and Mrs. R. E. Hoyt.

Mr. and Mrs. Blum entertained at dinner at their home, No. 45 Plaza street, before the concert. Their box guests were Miss Francese Walton, Mis Florence Bigelow, Miss Jane Foote, Jack Langstaff, Gordon Thayer, Derry Hull and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro.

The concerts are presented here under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, R. Huntington Woodman, chairman, and the Brooklyn Committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is acting chairman. Mrs. Trafton O. Badger headed a Junior League Committee of the series.

Plans for the 1938-1939 series will be made this month at the meeting of the Brooklyn Committee. The concerts will be heard here on the venings of Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 9, March 10, and March 31.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 2 - 1938

ORCHESTRA SEASON ENDS

Boston Group Is Heard by Large Brooklyn Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, closed its fifty-second season last night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. A capacity audience attended.

Announcement was made that the orchestra would return next year for a series of five concerts. The dates of the 1938-39 series are Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 9, March 10 and March 31.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 2 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY FINALE

The last New York concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes place this afternoon at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program includes "The Fairy's Kiss" by Stravinsky, Debussy's "La Mer" and the Brahms Second Symphony.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 1 - 1938

WORDS AND MUSIC

Boston Symphony Heard In Season's Thursday Finale

Koussevitzky Presents Works of Prokofieff, Haydn and Brahms at Carnegie Hall

By SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF

At Carnegie Hall a crowded house greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the last Thursday concert of the season. The fame of the visitors has by now reached pre-war heights as has its achievements. It is well to remember that the credit for the restoration of the orchestra belongs to Dr. Koussevitzky, who repaired its war-damaged beauty and perfection and made it again the Stradivarius of ensembles. Those who look upon the conductor of the Boston Symphony as a peerless interpreter of music (and their name is legion) have the added comfort of knowing that he has a worthy instrument at his command. While that small number of dissidents, myself unhappily among them, which does not always find in his art the spiritual nourishment it seeks, can at least take unqualified pleasure in the miraculous sound and balance of his orchestra.

True to his reputation as a program maker who senses the need of subscribers for contrast and variety Dr. Koussevitzky selected for last night's entertainment a trio of works that satisfied the audience on both counts. Prokofieff's Second Suite from his ballet "Romeo and Juliet" was the novelty sandwiched between Haydn's G major Symphony No. 88 and Brahms' "First." No two masterpieces could be so contrasting as the symphonies of Haydn and Brahms, and the "Romeo and Juliett" ballet, just about a year old, had not before been heard in New York.

It is strange to read that the libretto of the ballet contrives a happy ending for Shakespeare's tragedy and that it was thus given at its trial presentation in Moscow. Ordinarily an un-Russian procedure, the happy ending would prove that the Kremlin has gone in for liquidating the well-known Russian zest for melancholy. Fortunately, Dr. Koussevitzky finished the suite last night with the section called "Romeo at Juliet's Grave" ("Adagio funebre"). Perhaps the music actually goes no further and stops dead at the moment when the lovers joyfully fall into each other's arms. At any rate the numbers of the suite reveal Prokofieff in uninspired mood, intent on the pictorial values of his theme. Harsh and imposing sonorities alternate with banal melodic progressions. While here and there one catches a glimpse of the old Prokofieff, one hardly ever gets a peep at the old Shakespeare.

The playing of the Bostonians in this and in the two symphonies could hardly be surpassed for beauty and clarity. Yet I hesitate to say that Dr. Koussevitzky was convincing in the music of Haydn and Brahms. Once again Haydn was transformed into the Papa Haydn of popular legend, this time refined to Mozartean preciousness or rather to the preciousness that is foisted on Mozart. The "Largo" of the G major Symphony was wanting in that large, prophetic utterance which foreshadowed Beethoven, and the "Finale" was presented as a characterless "round," undetermined by light and shade and an inner rhythmic compulsion.

The Symphony of Brahms is conductor proof, and issuing from a superb instrument it excited the audience to rapture. But here Dr. Koussevitzky labored for effect. Tempi were too fast, as those of the third movement, marked "Un poco allegretto e grazioso" and the final "Allegro non troppo." The Chorale passage was an obvious bit of histrionics. It was, in short, a theatrical interpretation, touching neither the heights nor the depths of the impassioned work. It must be recorded, however, that the Thursday subscribers thought otherwise, for they gave the doctor and his men a rousing ovation at the symphony's conclusion.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
Sunday Journal & American
APR 3 - 1938

Symphony's Season Ends At Concert

By GRENA BENNETT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its farewell concert for the current season in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon.

Serge Koussevitzky conducted a delactable program, which began with Stravinsky's Divertimento, from the allegorical ballet, "Le Baisser de la Fee," ("The Fairy's Kiss").

The score was derived from various pages by Tschaikovsky and is dedicated to that famous composer. It is capricious music, beginning with themes essentially Slavic in character and content and, chameleonlike, assumes at times the serene suavity of Mozart and at others the spontaneity and syncopation of Gershwin.

Second on the list was Debussy's "La Mer,"

The Second Symphony by Brahms brought the concert and the visitors' seasonable activities to a close.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRAISED IN N. Y.

An exceptionally striking comment on the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor on the occasion of their fifth and concluding New York concert, Saturday afternoon, was made in the review by Olin Downes, music editor of the New York Times.

"There are certain scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are unequaled," Downes wrote. "One of these is Debussy's 'La Mer.' Nothing could have been more perfect and finished in detail. Of this astonishing performance one cannot speak dispassionately. It is a supreme achievement, not short of a miracle of conception and execution. Among the greatest artistic experiences of which the present generation can boast in years to come will be the right to say 'I heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play "La Mer."'"

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
APR 2 - 1938

Music Notes

FINAL CONCERT GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Capacity Audience Hears Program at Academy; Koussevitzky Conducts

By PAUL J. BROWN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky concluded brilliantly and then in a burst of applause its 57th annual Brooklyn series at the Academy of Music last night. There was a capacity audience that was ready to shows its appreciation for the series of five concerts which the Boston Symphony had provided: the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky offered an excellent final concert which was bound to evoke that enthusiasm.

The program opened with Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's Concerto in D major for Stringed Instruments as arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. The work, written originally by Bach for four viols, is in the Steinberg form sustained in large part by the woodwinds, the interplay of whose tones is most distinguished. The concerto is chamber music at its best and a most pleasant opening for a concert.

The second part of the program was Debussy's "La Mer" which is an auditory picture of the sea, bath in calm and in storm and a portrayal of the sea's moods. It is a beautiful work, much more complicated in orchestration than many of Debussy's compositions, and emphatic evidence of his versatility. Dr. Koussevitzky was quite the master of the situation, as Jove-like he carried the sea from calm to gale and back again.

Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor ended the program most aptly. Forceful, sweeping and gay, with brasses predominating as woodwinds had earlier in the evening, it went forward to musical triumph. We hope in the exuberance of the Fifth as it was played last night, Dr. Koussevitzky and the directors of the Academy determined to bring the Boston Symphony Orchestra back to us for the next season.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
APR 2 - 1938

Boston Symphony Closes in Brooklyn

Superlative orchestral playing was the gift to Brooklyn at the Academy of Music last night of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. For the last concert by the Bostonians in their Brooklyn series of 1937-38 Serge Koussevitsky selected an agreeably varied program comprising Maximilian Steinberg's orchestral arrangement of a concerto for strings in G by C. P. E. Bach, Debussy's three orchestral sketches collectively entitled "Le Mer," and Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony.

Particularly delightful was the performance accorded the beautiful Andante of the concerto. Debussy's intricate score was handled with an analytical clearness. The Tschaikowsky symphony might be set down as a specialty of the conductor and the orchestra. They never fail to present it at its full value. The large audience was exceedingly responsive.

P. S.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 2 - 1938

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

Koussevitzky Leads Group in Last-Night Performance of New York Season

HAYDN SYMPHONY PLAYED

New Music by Prokofieff and a Brahms Composition Also Win Much Applause

By OLIN DOWNES

In a considerable perspective of orchestral concerts this chronicler remembers few if any occasions when a Haydn symphony was applauded as last night after the opening performance of the concert given by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

It could be said that the sheer tone quality and the brilliancy of Dr. Koussevitzky's organization would have aroused extravagant plaudits under any circumstances. It could be added that the symphony itself, thrice familiar, is an experience always new and engrossing, granted the adequate interpretation. A further consideration could be attached to the above, as concerning slight differences of individual opinion in details of interpretation, as the slow pace of the theme and the variations, which seemed excessive. The sum of it all was a most brilliant and fascinating reading. Many an imposing finale of a concert receives cooler recognition than that extended the first item of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's final evening program in New York this season.

Prokofieff Music Included

New music by Prokofieff followed, music composed for a ballet designed, apparently with typical Communist license, after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The program book might have vouchsafed us some information concerning Mr. Prokofieff's scenario to which mysterious reference is made in a review of the Russian première, which is quoted. From the information provided the conclusion is reached that Prokofieff composed music to a plot as different from Shakespeare's as the Hamlet to which Shostakovich, years ago, wrote music. It was different from the original conception of the Bard of Avon.

In that plot there was no ghost. The ghost was merely an invention of Hamlet to prey on the superstitions of a populace that he wished to rouse against the murder of his father. We find by the directions for the Prokofieff ballet that "Juliet's grave is a deception, though Romeo is unaware of the fact." The music, somewhat like unto Shostakovitch's, is predominantly satirical in tone. There is the partial suggestion of that which is poignant and tragic, but there is little of the sensuous or emotional, and in the main the music could bear almost any title and still serve for ballet evolutions, and have nothing to do with Romeo and Juliet.

Some of it is banal. Possibly, associated with the movements on the stage, its true meaning would be completed. Probably Tschaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture, compared with it, would be subject to the sneers of the sophisticates. There, however, we find something of Shakespeare, while in last night's offering we do not.

Brahms Symphony a Highlight

The Brahms First symphony, which ended the concert, was of the highest testimony to Dr. Koussevitzky's mastery, not only as conductor but as one who penetrates to the pith of the great masterpiece. His control of the orchestra was complete and imperious; his results were accomplished with an impressive simplicity and economy of effort. By the same token the interpretation was conspicuous for its intensity, merged in a noble form, and its sustained and accumulating power. The symphony was permitted to appear in its own gigantic lines and to speak for itself as a mountain peak against the sky speaks for itself. For the grand lines of the music were carved as by a master sculptor.

It was a classic conception, but not a pedantic one. Mr. Koussevitzky did not hesitate to fling out the great chorale, when it appears, fully scored, toward the wild ending of the symphony, with a breadth that momentarily held in abeyance the momentum of the music. (And by the way, how superbly the same chorale was played, piano, by the trombones in the introduction!) There was the end of frantic rejoicing, the great cry for liberty that Brahms understood and that Beethoven voiced before him, the cry which at last is always heard, to the defeat of evil and the confusion of tyrants. Perhaps at no time would the great C minor symphony have meant more to an audience. And it is probable that on no previous occasion had Dr. Koussevitzky and his men given a more complete revelation of the composition. On its conclusion there was long applause and vociferous cheering.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 1938

225

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Brilliantly In Final Appearance of the Season At the Academy of Music

Forty-nine years ago last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Brooklyn concert in the old Academy of Music. It was a young organization of eight years standing, and it was reported to have played rather well and to have made a distinct impression. Now in the prime of its existence at 57, it made its final appearance for this season at the Academy of Music last night, and the report should read that it played more perfectly than most would have conceded possible so many years back. In fact, it gave a performance that probably could not be excelled today unless that performance were another by the Boston Symphony. And it left a profound impression.

There were only three works on this birthday program and no soloists. The concert opened with the Concerto in D Major for Stringed Instruments by the most illustrious of Bach's sons, Carl Philipp Emanuel, was followed by Debussy's three orchestral sketches entitled "La Mer," and was concluded with Tchaikowsky's styles of musical composition.

At Koussevitzky's request, the Bach concerto was arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. By use of the woodwinds and especially the English horn in the second movement Steinberg has enhanced the essentially musical character of the work in tonal effectiveness, but C. P. E. Bach was a composer in his own right, once ranked above his father in importance, and now remembered for the gallant style which he perfected. His music has a place other than historical. Koussevitzky conducted it in the classic style with a polish that defined all the more the tonal splendor of this body of musicians.

But the performance of the evening was that given "La Mer." Just as there can "be no denying Debussy's passion for the sea," so there can be no denying the mystic fascination and reality that this music conveys to the listener familiar with the sea. Those feelings were conjured up not only by the music but through the superb performance that Koussevitzky fashioned. Here was music that inspired the finest in him, and with a magnificent instrument at his command he conceived the finest of performances.

The Tchaikovsky sounded far more satisfactory than it was. Music to stir the blood with a vivacious finale, it achieved in sonority what it lacked in musical continuity. Koussevitzky loves this music to the point of overrefining it, dwelling here and there where movement is called for, and lengthening his andante beat beyond its natural tempo. It was a restrained performance last night that took away some of the virile, robust character of the music. And yet the music triumphed through the playing of the orchestra, and brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 193

Society Attends Seaso'ns Final Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy

A gala performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening brought the 52d season of the orchestra's presentations in Brooklyn to a brilliant close. For the final concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, selected for the program: C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D Major for stringed instruments, Debussy's Three Orchestral Sketches "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The large audience was enthusiastic in their appreciation of the fine program and Dr. Koussevitzky graciously acknowledged their long applause.

Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, as hostess in the Brooklyn committee box, had a group of St. John's Hospital nurses as her guests.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's box guests were Mr. and Mrs. William Copeland Finley of Montreal, Canada, Miss Lorraine Finley, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Theodore Fitch. Mrs. Prince entertained her guests at dinner before the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum entertained at dinner at their home, 45 Plaza St., at dinner for their box guests who included Miss Frances Walton, Miss Florence Bigelow, Miss Jane Foote, Jack Langstaff, Gordon Thayer, Derry Hull and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro.

Guests of Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt were Mrs. William Temple Emmett and William Temple Emmett 3d.

Occupying the box of Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward were Capt. and Mrs. A. C. Stott, Capt. and Mrs. Jonas J. Ingram, Capt. and Mrs. S. F. Heim and Capt. and Mrs R. E. Hoyt

Other boxholders were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

Announcement was made of the 53d season and dates of the series of five concerts. They will be given on Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 9 and March 10 and 31.

The concert series of the orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman. Mrs. Davenport will hold a meeting of the Brooklyn committee next month to form subcommittees for next season.

Officers for the current 1937-38 season, in addition to Mrs. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenpere, were Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Representing the Junior League of Brooklyn on the Brooklyn committee this year were Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
APR

Who's News Today

By LEMUEL F. PARTON

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

It was probably quite a blow to Boston when Serge Prokofieff saved his "Romeo and Juliet" ballet for New York. In Boston on this trip he gave Boston only "children's music", saying the critics had insulted him in the past and implying that this was about all they rated. The ballet, played by the Boston Symphony in New York, gets only a so-so listing by the Manhattan critics.

A child musical prodigy of Leningrad, Serge Prokofieff was a conductor at 17, was tossed around a lot in the revolution, and spent a 7-year wanderjahr before returning to Moscow in 1927 to an assured place as a composer, conductor, and pianist. He is a satirist and innovator, drifting a bit to the Right in his later years. He is now 47.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2 - 1938

The New Records

Stokowski's 'Parsifal'—Purcell Album—A Passion Completed—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Purcell Album.

Since the first album of the Purcell Society was reviewed here in detail when it appeared two years ago as an importation from England, it is only necessary to repeat that recommendation, now that it is available as a domestic release from Columbia. Among the works in the collection are the nine four-part fantasias and the superb five-part fantasia on one note (all excellently played by the International String Quartet), the fine "Golden" Sonata, with Isolde Menges and William Primrose as the two artists, three songs interrupted by Keith Faulkner, and two catches by the Purcell Singers. Mr. Faulkner has his difficulty with the unfamiliar technical requirements of the songs, but the quality of performance through the album, both musically and interpretatively, is extremely high. The recording of the strings, moreover, is as good as any I have ever heard and the surfaces are unusually quiet. Columbia is especially to be complimented for including the splendid brochure written by Alec Robertson for the original issue.

The Passion Completed.

The concluding records of the Victor-Boston Symphony "St. Matthew Passion" are now in hand, completing this imposing three-volume issue, but the first impression of the set has not been materially altered by the additional evidence. It still is strangely equivalent to a maimed giant, the torso faithfully represented by the orchestra and chorus, the other features rather less so by the soloists. There are some remarkable details in the last two volumes, including Richard Burgin's beautiful performance of the violin solo in "Erbarme dich'," the excellent singing of the same Mr. Faulkner noted above, and the dramatic effectiveness of the chorus. Of course, the orchestra is never less than splendid. However, the singing of the tenor (John Priebe) is even a greater trial in the later records where he has more to do, and neither the soprano, contralto, nor bass are the stuff of a definitive performance. The recording continues erratic, with numerous unfortunate breaks between sides.

Not all the $100,000 building fund for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has yet been subscribed, although at last accounts about four-fifths of the desired total was "in." Progress on the structure itself has been made to the extent to justify the promise that the building will be ready for "occupancy" by Festival time. Less for financial reasons than because of a desire to be prepared for whatever direction the Festival may take in the next year or two, there will be only a temporary stage this summer. Nor will there be a ceiling until Professor Fay of M.I.T. has been able to work out the best acoustical design. (Of course there will be a cover against the elements.) The erection of the steel structure has proceeded according to schedule and the lumber was to be delivered during the present week.

There has been unofficial discussion—as well as in print, as readers of these columns are aware—of the proposal to expand the Festival this summer in the light of recent events overseas. No one in authority has been willing to express himself explicitly to this department. But it is a good guess that an enlarged Festival for next August, instead of waiting for another year, would meet with the hearty approval of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is not in the habit of believing that progress consists in standing still. Progress, of course, will have been made in any event by virtue of the erection of a permanent house for the Festival. But on the artistic side some would like to see an advance similar to that of last year, when the number of concerts was increased from three to six. Another good guess would seem to be that even if the number of concerts this summer remains at six, they will enlist the assistance of more than the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, as previously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2

Who's News Today

Austria's Gnadige Frau Has Ridden the Surfboard of Politics for 60 Years.

By LEMUEL F. PARTON

It was probably quite a blow to Boston when Serge Prokofieff saved his "Romeo and Juliet" ballet for New York. In Boston, on this trip, he gave Boston only "children's music," saying the critics had insulted him in the past, and implying that this was about all they rated. The ballet, played by the Boston Symphony in New York, gets only a so-so listing by the Manhattan critics.

A child musical prodigy of Leningrad, Serge Prokofieff was a conductor at 17, tossed around a lot in the revolution and spent a seven years' "wanderjahr" before returning to Moscow in 1927, to an assured place as a composer, conductor and pianist. He is a satirist and innovator, drifting a bit to the right in his later years. He is now 47.

Copyright 1938. All Rights Reserved.

SARASOTA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1938

SYMPHONY UNIT TO PERFORM AT BRADENTON

The Florida Symphony orchestra of 70 pieces, first major symphonic ensemble to be established in the South under federal auspices, will appear in a concert at the High school auditorium in Bradenton Wednesday at 2 p. m.

Clarence Carter Nice will direct the orchestra which is composed of musicians of long experience, many of whom have served with leading symphony orchestras. Included are Walter Grossman, cellist, of Miami, who played with the Berlin Philharmonic; Joel Belov, formerly a member of the New York Philharmonic; Max Gaebel, who came from Germany to join the Boston Symphony orchestra; Maurice Goldman, former violinist with the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and Attilio Canonico, youthful honor graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Naples.

Prof. Nice conducted more than 200 performances for the San Carlo Opera company in New York and on tour, and served four years as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera company.

The concert is sponsored by the Bradenton High school orchestra, and the high type of music to be presented, together with the importance of many of the artists who comprise the organization, should make an appeal to all real music lovers and should prove an inspiration to the musically ambitious youth.

Popular prices will afford opportunity to all music lovers and to all school children to hear and see this symphony orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 7 - 1938

HERE APRIL 12

Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a concert here April 12 in the Auditorium.

Koussevitzky to Conduct Here

Boston Symphony To Be Heard in Auditorium

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard April 12 in the Municipal Auditorium at 8.15 in the final concert of the season of the Civic Music Association.

The program will include the Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 88"; "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, second suite, by Prokofieff, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 2 - 1938

Violinist

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard in recital with Elizabeth Siedhoff, pianist, on Friday night.

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

MAR 31 1938

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT SUNDAY

Shown above is the State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, which will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences Sunday evening under the direction of Earl V. Clay conductor. Miss Marie Healy, talented coloratura, will serve as guest soloist.

Earl V. Clay Will Serve As Program Director

On Sunday evening, April, 3 the Federal Music Project State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, under the direction of its newly appointed conductor, Earl V. Clay, will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences hall with Marie Healy, coloratura, as guest soloist.

Mr. Clay comes to his new position with the highest recommendations. He is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music where he was a scholarship student. He studied brass with Louis Kloepfel, theory with Frederick Converse and was a pupil of Stuart Mason, Kurt Fischer and Clement Lenom. Mr. Clay has played in the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitsky and Eugene Goossens and during the past several seasons has conducted the Boston Chamber orchestra and the Stoneham Choral society. He has been a member of the Massachusetts State Symphony orchestra under Alexander Thiede.

Marie Healy Is Soloist.

Miss Healy, soloist on the program, has won national recognition through her many concert and radio performances.

Among the numbers which she will sing with orchestral accompaniment is the aria, "Ah, Fors E Lui," from La Traviata. Of her rendition of this number one New York paper says, "With an astonishing dramatic interpretation, Miss Healy sang the Traviata aria giving a finished presentation of the operatic selection."

Tickets for Sunday evening's concert are on sale at the Piper-McIntire Music store or may be purchased at the door the evening of the performance. It is anticipated that a capacity audience will be in attendance to enjoy an exceptionally fine program and to greet Miss Healy, who has a large local following.

Ushers for Sunday evening are William Adams, Eugene Clough, Walter Fradd, William Law, Robert Babcock, Fred Clements, Charles Perkins and Irving Youland.

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1938

DUO-PIANISTS TO APPEAR IN CIVIC MUSIC CONCERT

Lubochutz and Nemenoff, duo-pianists, will appear here in the last of the series of Civic Music association concerts for the season on the evening of April 27, a week later than the first announcement.

It isn't surprising that Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Numenoff take naturally to the duo form of piano recital which they will present here on Wednesday, April 27, at Converse college auditorium. Both of them have been playing ensemble music since they were children.

Pierre Luboshutz was one of a family of three gifted children who played together as a trio first privately at home and later on concert tours in their native Russia. Their grandfather was a well-known opera singer, and their father a talented amateur violinist who operated a piano factory in Odessa.

At the age of four, Pierre began to study violin with his father. But his sisters soon put an end to this. The older of them, Lea Luboshutz, (now well known as a concert artist) played the violin and the younger, Ana, the cello. The daughters decided there were enough stringed instrument players in the family without Pierre. They needed a pianist to accompany them. So they united their efforts to induce the father to switch their younger brother from violin to piano.

Thus was Pierre's career determined. He progressed rapidly on the piano and at 12 was sent to the conservatory in Moscow, from which he was graduated with the highest honors. Indeed so highly was he thought of that when Kreisler visited Moscow for a series of concerts, arriving without an accompanist, 14-year-old Pierre Luboshutz was chosen to meet the need. Later the boy was sent to Paris, where he continued his studies under the distinguished Edouard Risler and Professor Blumenfeld.

In 1912 Luboshutz made an important and auspicious debut in Moscow as guest soloist with the Koussevitzky orchestra—Koussevitzky himself conducting. Then deferring to the wishes of his gifted sisters, he toured with them as a trio throughout Russia until the revolution.

Then he made his way to Paris where he met Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano. The two toured together in joint recital. Luboshutz first visited the United States 11 years ago and in the intervening period has toured annually through the country in collaboration with such artists as Eide Norena, and Piatigorsky. He also has given numerous recitals of his own and has played with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under Arturo Toscanini.

Luboshutz's attractive partner in his joint recitals, Genia Nemenoff, is in private life Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz. She, too, had the advantage of a highly musical background. She was the child of a mother who was an accomplished pianist and a father who was an opera singer. Her brother studied the cello and at 10 she was giving ensemble performances with him.

Her first teacher was her mother, who began giving her piano lessons at the age of four. When she was six the great composer Moszkowski heard her play some of his works and was so impressed that he arranged for her to be enrolled at the Paris conservatory. There she studied with Isidore Philipp. She made her recital debut in Paris and not long afterwards played in joint recital with the brilliant cellist, Pablo Casals. Later she toured through Algeria, Holland, Belgium, Spain and Germany.

Eight years ago Pierre Luboshutz was conducting a master class in Paris, and Genia Nemenoff enrolled as his pupil. A romance ensued and two years later they were married. She kept up her music, however, and the two formed the habit of playing together regularly for their own amusement. It was out of this practice that their joint recital tours grew.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 2 - 1938

The Choir Loft

Many Oratorio Services Will Mark the Observance of Passion Sunday Tomorrow.

By WILLARD IRVING NEVINS.

In commemoration of Passion Sunday many oratorio services have been planned by churches in the metropolitan area for tomorrow.

A partial list of the works to be heard is as follows:

Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 8:30 P. M. next Wednesday.

Recent Recordings.

With the recent release of the third volume of the "Passion According to St. Matthew," by Bach, we have the complete recording of that great choral work, as given under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

Symphony Orchestra, Glee Club, the Rad- Society and a dis- oup of soloists. Con- nagnitude of this un- results are most sat- ecially impressive are the many chorales which are heard throughout the work. This recording is found in Victor albums M-411-12-13.

In Victor album M-421 will be found the prelude and Good Friday spell of Wagner's "Parsifal" as played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski. The recording matches the superlative playing of this justly famous orchestra.

A single Victor record No. 14744 is a re-recording of Enrico Caruso's singing of Faure's "The Palms" and Franck's "La Procession."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

APR 3 - 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony's Last Matinee Concert This Season

Fifth and last afternoon concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Stravinsky........Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fée," Allegorical Ballet
2. Debussy.....................'La Mer"

Intermission

3. Brahms..Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

THE NEAREST approach to a novelty at this season's last Boston Symphony matinée was a series of excerpts from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée." The original score was heard here in the Spring of 1937, when it was performed at the Metropolitan by the American Ballet. The music, composed in 1928 (after the beginning of Stravinsky's creative decline), is, for the most part, the feeblest sort of commonplace, though some of it is mildly pretty. Mr. Stravinsky, who has horrified his adherents by professing a passionate admiration for Tchaikovsky—whom no genuine Stravinskyan would pick up with the tongs—says that he dedicated this work "to the Muse of Tchaikovsky." The genius of Peter Ilych, explains Stravinsky, "has marked the score of 'Le Baiser de la Fée' with a predestined kiss." Perhaps it is just as well that Tchaikovsky himself did not remain alive to observe the result of this mystic osculation.

* * *

The most engaging aspect of the score is its instrumentation, which Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant players turned almost into authentic magic at yesterday's performance. The playing of the orchestra in the remainder of the program, especially in that classic masterpiece, Debussy's "La Mer," was of an equal beauty and mastery.

The audience was demonstrative

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 3 - 1938

Elizabeth S

MISS ELIZABETH SIEDHOFF of Boston, who will appear at the Plantations Auditorium Friday evening in joint piano recital with Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra relates many interesting incidents of her association with one of the world's outstanding teachers of piano, the eccentric and beloved Prof. Tobias Mathay, informally known to London music circles as "Uncle Tobs."

Outstanding among women pianists of this country, Miss Siedhoff has worked with a great many European music masters. She studied for three years' in Berlin with Breithaupt and the world-renowned Arthur Schnabel. Last year she studied with Prof. Mathay during the winter season. She has also coached with him in four of his "summer schools."

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

APR 3 - 1938

Musical offerings at Carnegie hall in New York during April will include the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra, the National Orchestral association, the New York Women's Symphony, Trudi School and her Dancing Comedians, Pianist Josef Hofmann, Contralto Marian Anderson, the Dessoff Choirs, and a memorial concert under the auspices of the Henry Hadley foundation.

PIQUA, O.
CALL

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS ENJOYED FRIDAY

Splendid Organization from Ohio State University Gives Delightful Program.

Realization of how much we miss by not being able to hear symphony orchestras often must have come to every member of the audience who gathered Friday night at Piqua Central high school auditorium to listen to the concert presented by the Ohio State University Symphony orchestra under the direction of Eugene J. Weigel. The occasion was the second of the concerts on the series brought here this spring by the Piqua Madrigal Singers and to whom Piqua music lover's should be unanimously grateful for bringing such a musical treat to this city.

The orchestra is composed of 90 young musicians, each one majoring in music at Ohio State university; each a talented performer in his or her own right and each bespeaking an earnestness that cannot help but infect their audience. No musical sophistication or other depressing influence can deaden the response to fine orchestral music finely played. There is always that marvel of minds and instruments swayed into a singleness of purpose by one mind, all intent on the recreation of wonderful music by another mind and made eternal by the many.

The program was well chosen, including as it did some of the better known classical masterpieces Opening with the Oberon overture by von Weber, it proceeded to Beethoven's glorious Fifth Symphony in which each young musician evidenced a musical awareness, playing for all they were worth and responding to the director in a manner that brought a complete cooperation in the result.

After the intermission Winnifred Roudebush was soloist when the orchestra played Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, another well known and inspiring composition. Miss Roudebush, who is a senior majoring in music in the university Department of Music, left no doubt as to her talent, playing the entire, difficult Concerto from memory, a feat in itself even without the necessity of blending with 90 other musicians.

The fourth number on the program, "America," an epic rhapsody, by Ernest Bloch, was so completely modern that it was amusing to watch the reaction of the audience. Beginning on the strings, it took various themes from well known American airs such as "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Pop Goes the Weasel," but so completely modernized that little vestige of the original tempo remained. This rhapsody was composed in the middle of the last decade and was unanimously selected as the winning composition among 92 manuscripts submitted in Musical America's "Symphony Contest," the prize being awarded to the composer in June 1928, the judges being Walter Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitsky, Stock and Stokowski so it MUST be good, no matter what the Piqua audience thought.

The program closed with the brilliant and exciting "Espana" by Chabrier, which has become familiarized to American audiences during the past winter through being used as the concluding number on a number of symphony broadcasts. Written in the form of a rhapsody, it presents a succession of tunes bound together as an effective whole.

Enthusiastic applause after the concluding number was responded to with an encore, the well known and popular Intermezzo from Wolf-Farrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

Great credit goes to Mr. Weigel for the splendid training and vision which has enabled him to produce such a musical organization and it is hoped that the group will return to Piqua again so that more music lovers may have the opportunity of hearing and enjoying such splendid music.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 1938

225

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Brilliantly In Final Appearance of the Season At the Academy of Music

Forty-nine years ago last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first Brooklyn concert in the old Academy of Music. It was a young organization of eight years standing, and it was reported to have played rather well and to have made a distinct impression. Now in the prime of its existence at 57, it made its final appearance for this season at the Academy of Music last night, and the report should read that it played more perfectly than most would have conceded possible so many years back. In fact, it gave a performance that probably could not be excelled today unless that performance were another by the Boston Symphony. And it left a profound impression.

There were only three works on this birthday program and no soloists. The concert opened with the Concerto in D Major for Stringed Instruments by the most illustrious of Bach's sons, Carl Philipp Emanuel, was followed by Debussy's three orchestral sketches entitled "La Mer," and was concluded with Tchaikowsky's styles of musical composition.

At Koussevitzky's request, the Bach concerto was arranged for orchestra by Maximilian Steinberg. By use of the woodwinds and especially the English horn in the second movement Steinberg has enhanced the essentially musical character of the work in tonal effectiveness, but C. P. E. Bach was a composer in his own right, once ranked above his father in importance, and now remembered for the gallant style which he perfected. His music has a place other than historical. Koussevitzky conducted it in the classic style with a polish that defined all the more the tonal splendor of this body of musicians.

But the performance of the evening was that given "La Mer." Just as there can "be no denying Debussy's passion for the sea," so there can be no denying the mystic fascination and reality that this music conveys to the listener familiar with the sea. Those feelings were conjured up not only by the music but through the superb performance that Koussevitzky fashioned. Here was music that inspired the finest in him, and with a magnificent instrument at his command he conceived the finest of performances.

The Tchaikovsky sounded far more satisfactory than it was. Music to stir the blood with a vivacious finale, it achieved in sonority what it lacked in musical continuity. Koussevitzky loves this music to the point of overrefining it, dwelling here and there where movement is called for, and lengthening his andante beat beyond its natural tempo. It was a restrained performance last night that took away some of the virile, robust character of the music. And yet the music triumphed through the playing of the orchestra, and brought the concert to a brilliant close.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 2 - 1938

Society Attends Seaso'ns Final Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy

A gala performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening brought the 52d season of the orchestra's presentations in Brooklyn to a brilliant close. For the final concert Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, selected for the program: C. P. E. Bach's Concerto in D Major for stringed instruments, Debussy's Three Orchestral Sketches "La Mer" and Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony in E minor. The large audience was enthusiastic in their appreciation of the fine program and Dr. Koussevitzky graciously acknowledged their long applause.

Mrs. Carroll Leja Nichols, as hostess in the Brooklyn committee box, had a group of St. John's Hospital nurses as her guests.

Mrs. Benjamin Prince's box guests were Mr. and Mrs. William Copeland Finley of Montreal, Canada, Miss Lorraine Finley, Mr. and Mrs. Karp Mikhalenkoff, Mrs. William Stearns Cooney and Theodore Fitch. Mrs. Prince entertained her guests at dinner before the concert.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward C. Blum entertained at dinner at their home, 45 Plaza St., at dinner for their box guests who included Miss Frances Walton, Miss Florence Bigelow, Miss Jane Foote, Jack Langstaff, Gordon Thayer, Derry Hull and Mr. and Mrs. Eugene S. Taliaferro.

Guests of Mr. and Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt were Mrs. William Temple Emmett and William Temple Emmett 3d.

Occupying the box of Rear Admiral and Mrs. Clark H. Woodward were Capt. and Mrs. A. C. Stott, Capt. and Mrs. Jonas ? . Ingram, Capt. and Mrs. S. F. Heim and Capt. and Mrs R. E. Hoyt

Other boxholders were Mrs. Thomas E. Murray Jr., the Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association of which Mrs. Roy M. Hart is president, Miss Mary E. Mills and Mrs. James Maclay.

Announcement was made of the 53d season and dates of the series of five concerts. They will be given on Nov. 18, Jan. 6, Feb. 9 and March 10 and 31.

The concert series of the orchestra in Brooklyn is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which Edward C. Blum is president; the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, of which R. Huntington Woodman is chairman, and the Brooklyn committee, of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport acting chairman. Mrs. Davenport will hold a meeting of the Brooklyn committee next month to form subcommittees for next season.

Officers for the current 1937-38 season, in addition to Mrs. Van Sinderen and Mrs. Davenpere, were Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of the membership committee, and Mrs. Trafton O. Badger, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Representing the Junior League of Brooklyn on the Brooklyn committee this year were Miss Helen Adam, Miss Phyllis Barnes, Mrs. Theodore Fitz-Randolph, Mrs. Charles Singleton, Miss Arrietta Smith, Mrs. Hollis Thayer and Mrs. Kent Rhodes.

HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN RECORD
APR

Who's News Today

By LEMUEL F. PARTON

(Special to the Bergen Evening Record)

It was probably quite a blow to Boston when Serge Prokofieff saved his "Romeo and Juliet" ballet for New York. In Boston on this trip he gave Boston only "children's music", saying the critics had insulted him in the past and implying that this was about all they rated. The ballet, played by the Boston Symphony in New York, gets only a so-so listing by the Manhattan critics.

A child musical prodigy of Leningrad, Serge Prokofieff was a conductor at 17, was tossed around a lot in the revolution, and spent a 7-year wanderjahr before returning to Moscow in 1927 to an assured place as a composer, conductor, and pianist. He is a satirist and innovator, drifting a bit to the Right in his later years. He is now 47.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2 - 1938

The New Records

Stokowski's 'Parsifal'—Purcell Album—A Passion Completed—The Lighter Side.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

Purcell Album.

Since the first album of the Purcell Society was reviewed here in detail when it appeared two years ago as an importation from England, it is only necessary to repeat that recommendation, now that it is available as a domestic release from Columbia. Among the works in the collection are the nine four-part fantasias and the superb five-part fantasia on one note (all excellently played by the International String Quartet), the fine "Golden" Sonata, with Isolde Menges and William Primrose as the two artists, three songs interrupted by Keith Faulkner, and two catches by the Purcell Singers. Mr. Faulkner has his difficulty with the unfamiliar technical requirements of the songs, but the quality of performance through the album, both musically and interpretatively, is extremely high. The recording of the strings, moreover, is as good as any I have ever heard and the surfaces are unusually quiet. Columbia is especially to be complimented for including the splendid brochure written by Alec Robertson for the original issue.

The Passion Completed.

The concluding records of the Victor-Boston Symphony "St. Matthew Passion" are now in hand, completing this imposing three-volume issue, but the first impression of the set has not been materially altered by the additional evidence. It still is strangely equivalent to a maimed giant, the torso faithfully represented by the orchestra and chorus, the other features rather less so by the soloists. There are some remarkable details in the last two volumes, including Richard Burgin's beautiful performance of the violin solo in "Erbarme dich'," the excellent singing of the same Mr. Faulkner noted above, and the dramatic effectiveness of the chorus. Of course, the orchestra is never less than splendid. However, the singing of the tenor (John Priebe) is even a greater trial in the later records where he has more to do, and neither the soprano, contralto, nor bass are the stuff of a definitive performance. The recording continues erratic, with numerous unfortunate breaks between sides.

Apr 4/38

Not all the $100,000 building fund for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival has yet been subscribed, although at last accounts about four-fifths of the desired total was "in." Progress on the structure ~~itself has~~ been made to the extent to justify the promise that the building will be ready for "occupancy" by Festival time. Less for financial reasons than because of a desire to be prepared for whatever direction the Festival may take in the next year or two, there will be only a temporary stage this summer. Nor will there be a ceiling until Professor Fay of M.I.T. has been able to work out the best acoustical design. (Of course there will be a cover against the elements.) The erection of the steel structure has proceeded according to schedule and the lumber was to be delivered during the present week.

There has been unofficial discussion—as well as in print, as readers of these columns are aware—of the proposal to expand the Festival this summer in the light of recent events overseas. No one in authority has been willing to express himself explicitly to this department. But it is a good guess that an enlarged Festival for next August, instead of waiting for another year, would meet with the hearty approval of Dr. Koussevitzky, who is not in the habit of believing that progress consists in standing still. Progress, of course, will have been made in any event by virtue of the erection of a permanent house for the Festival. But on the artistic side some would like to see an advance similar to that of last year, when the number of concerts was increased from three to [illegible] other good guess would seem to be that even if the number of concerts this summer remains at six, they will enlist the assistance of more than the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor, as previously.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN
APR 2 - 1938

Who's News Today

Austria's Gnadige Frau Has Ridden the Surfboard of Politics for 60 Years.

By LEMUEL F. PARTON

It was probably quite a blow to Boston when Serge Prokofieff saved his "Romeo and Juliet" ballet for New York. In Boston, on this trip, he gave Boston only "children's music," saying the critics had insulted him in the past, and implying that this was about all they rated. The ballet, played by the Boston Symphony in New York, gets only a so-so listing by the Manhattan critics.

A child musical prodigy of Leningrad, Serge Prokofieff was a conductor at 17, tossed around a lot in the revolution and spent a seven years' "wanderjahr" before returning to Moscow in 1927, to an assured place as a composer, conductor and pianist. He is a satirist and innovator, drifting a bit to the right in his later years. He is now 47.

Copyright 1938. All Rights Reserved.

SARASOTA, FLA.
TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1938

SYMPHONY UNIT TO PERFORM AT BRADENTON

The Florida Symphony orchestra of 70 pieces, first major symphonic ensemble to be established in the South under federal auspices, will appear in a concert at the High school auditorium in Bradenton Wednesday at 2 p. m.

Clarence Carter Nice will direct the orchestra which is composed of musicians of long experience, many of whom have served with leading symphony orchestras. Included are Walter Grossman, cellist, of Miami, who played with the Berlin Philharmonic; Joel Belov, formerly a member of the New York Philharmonic; Max Gaebel, who came from Germany to join the Boston Symphony orchestra; Maurice Goldman, former violinist with the Detroit Symphony orchestra, and Attilio Canonico, youthful honor graduate of the Royal Conservatory of Naples.

Prof. Nice conducted more than 200 performances for the San Carlo Opera company in New York and on tour, and served four years as musical director of the Philadelphia Grand Opera company.

The concert is sponsored by the Bradenton High school orchestra, and the high type of music to be presented, together with the importance of many of the artists who comprise the organization, should make an appeal to all real music lovers and should prove an inspiration to the musically ambitious youth.

Popular prices will afford opportunity to all music lovers and to all school children to hear and see this symphony orchestra.

WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
APR 7 - 1938

HERE APRIL 12

Serge Koussevitsky, who will conduct ~~the Boston~~ Symphony Orchestra in a concert here April 12 in the Auditorium.

Koussevitzky to Conduct Here

Boston Symphony To Be Heard in Auditorium

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussvitsky, will be heard April 12 in the Municipal Auditorium at 8.15 in the final concert of the season of the Civic Music Association.

The program will include the Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 88"; "Romeo and Juliet" ballet, second suite, by Prokofieff, and Brahms' "Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73."

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
12
APR 2 - 1938

Violinist

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be heard in recital with Elizabeth Siedhoff, pianist, on Friday night.

226

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

31 193

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT SUNDAY

Shown above is the State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, which will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences Sunday evening under the direction of Earl V. Clay conductor. Miss Marie Healy, talented coloratura, will serve as guest soloist.

Earl V. Clay Will Serve As Program Director

On Sunday evening, April, 3 the Federal Music Project State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, under the direction of its newly appointed conductor, Earl V. Clay, will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences hall with Marie Healy, coloratura, as guest soloist.

Mr. Clay comes to his new position with the highest recommendations. He is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music where he was a scholarship student. He studied brass with Louis Kloepfel, theory with Frederick Converse and was a pupil of Stuart Mason, Kurt Fischer and Clement Lenom. Mr. Clay has played in the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitsky and Eugene Goossens and during the past several seasons has conducted the Boston Chamber orchestra and the Stoneham Choral society. He has been a member of the Massachusetts State Symphony orchestra under Alexander Thiede.

Marie Healy Is Soloist.

Miss Healy, soloist on the program, has won national recognition through her many concert and radio performances.

Among the numbers which she will sing with orchestral accompaniment is the aria, "Ah, Fors E Lui," from La Traviata. Of her rendition of this number one New York paper says, "With an astonishing dramatic interpretation, Miss Healy sang the Traviata aria giving a finished presentation of the operatic selection."

Tickets for Sunday evening's concert are on sale at the Piper-Mc-Intire Music store or may be purchased at the door the evening of the performance. It is anticipated that a capacity audience will be in attendance to enjoy an exceptionally fine program and to greet Miss Healy, who has a large local following.

Ushers for Sunday evening are William Adams, Eugene Clough, Walter Fradd, William Law, Robert Babcock, Fred Clements, Charles Perkins and Irving Youland.

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

APR 3 193

Musical offerings at Carnegie hall in New York during April will include the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra, the National Orchestral association, the New York Women's Symphony, Trudi School and her Dancing Comedians, Pianist Josef Hofmann, Contralto Marian Anderson, the Dessoff Choirs, and a memorial concert under the auspices of the Henry Hadley foundation.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 2 193

The Choir Loft

Many Oratorio Services Will Mark the Observance of Passion Sunday Tomorrow.

By WILLARD IRVING NEVINS.

In commemoration of Passion Sunday many oratorio services have been planned by churches in the metropolitan area for tomorrow.

A partial list of the works to be heard is as follows:

Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 8:30 P. M. next Wednesday.

Recent Recordings.

With the recent release of the third volume of the "Passion According to St. Matthew," by Bach, we have the complete recording of that great choral work, as given under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky,
Symphony Orchestra,
Glee Club, the Rad-
Society and a dis-
oup of soloists. Connagnitude of this un-
results are most sat-
ecially impressive are the many chorales which are heard throughout the work. This recording is found in Victor albums M-411-12-13.

In Victor album M-421 will be found the prelude and Good Friday spell of Wagner's "Parsifal" as played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski. The recording matches the superlative playing of this justly famous orchestra.

A single Victor record No. 14744 is a re-recording of Enrico Caruso's singing of Faure's "The Palms" and Franck's "La Procession."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

APR 3 - 1938

MUSIC

By LAWRENCE GILMAN

The Boston Symphony's Last Matinee Concert This Season

Fifth and last afternoon concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Stravinsky........Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fée," Allegorical Ballet
2. Debussy....................."La Mer"

Intermission

3. Brahms..Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

THE NEAREST approach to a novelty at this season's last Boston Symphony matinée was a series of excerpts from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée." The original score was heard here in the Spring of 1937, when it was performed at the Metropolitan by the American Ballet. The music, composed in 1928 (after the beginning of Stravinsky's creative decline), is, for the most part, the feeblest sort of commonplace, though some of it is mildly pretty. Mr. Stravinsky, who has horrified his adherents by professing a passionate admiration for Tchaikovsky—whom no genuine Stravinskyan would pick up with the tongs—says that he dedicated this work "to the Muse of Tchaikovsky." The genius of Peter Ilych, explains Stravinsky, "has marked the score of 'Le Baiser de la Fée' with a predestined kiss." Perhaps it is just as well that Tchaikovsky himself did not remain alive to observe the result of this mystic osculation.

* * *

The most engaging aspect of the score is its instrumentation, which Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant players turned almost into authentic magic at yesterday's performance. The playing of the orchestra in the remainder of the program, especially in that classic masterpiece, Debussy's "La Mer," was of an equal beauty and mastery.

The audience was demonstrative

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 3 - 1938

Elizabeth S

MISS ELIZABETH SIEDHOFF of Boston, who will appear at the Plantations Auditorium Friday evening in joint piano recital with Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra relates many interesting incidents of her association with one of the world's outstanding teachers of piano, the eccentric and beloved Prof. Tobias Mathay, informally known to London music circles as "Uncle Tobs."

Outstanding among women pianists of this country, Miss Siedhoff has worked with a great many European music masters. She studied for three years' in Berlin with Breithaupt and the world-renowned Arthur Schnabel. Last year she studied with Prof. Mathay during the winter season. She has also coached with him in four of his "summer schools."

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1938

DUO-PIANISTS TO APPEAR IN CIVIC MUSIC CONCERT

Lubochutz and Nemenoff, duo-pianists, will appear here in the last of the series of Civic Music association concerts for the season on the evening of April 27, a week later than the first announcement.

It isn't surprising that Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Numenoff take naturally to the duo form of piano recital which they will present here on Wednesday, April 27, at Converse college auditorium. Both of them have been playing ensemble music since they were children.

Pierre Luboshutz was one of a family of three gifted children who played together as a trio first privately at home and later on concert tours in their native Russia. Their grandfather was a well-known opera singer, and their father a talented amateur violinist who operated a piano factory in Odessa.

At the age of four, Pierre began to study violin with his father. But his sisters soon put an end to this. The older of them, Lea Luboshutz, (now well known as a concert artist) played the violin and the younger, Ana, the cello. The daughters decided there were enough stringed instrument players in the family without Pierre. They needed a pianist to accompany them. So they united their efforts to induce the father to switch their younger brother from violin to piano.

Thus was Pierre's career determined. He progressed rapidly on the piano and at 12 was sent to the conservatory in Moscow, from which he was graduated with the highest honors. Indeed so highly was he thought of that when Kreisler visited Moscow for a series of concerts, arriving without an accompanist, 14-year-old Pierre Luboshutz was chosen to meet the need. Later the boy was sent to Paris, where he continued his studies under the distinguished Edouard Risler and Professor Blumenfeld.

In 1912 Luboshutz made an important and auspicious debut in Moscow as guest soloist with the Koussevitzky orchestra—Koussevitzky himself conducting. Then deferring to the wishes of his gifted sisters, he toured with them as a trio throughout Russia until the revolution.

Then he made his way to Paris where he met Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano. The two toured together in joint recital. Luboshutz first visited the United States 11 years ago and in the intervening period has toured annually through the country in collaboration with such artists as Eide Norena, and Piatigorsky. He also has given numerous recitals of his own and has played with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under Arturo Toscanini.

Luboshutz's attractive partner in his joint recitals, Genia Nemenoff, is in private life Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz. She, too, had the advantage of a highly musical background. She was the child of a mother who was an accomplished pianist and a father who was an opera singer. Her brother studied the cello and at 10 she was giving ensemble performances with him.

Her first teacher was her mother, who began giving her piano lessons at the age of four. When she was six the great composer Moszkowski heard her play some of his works and was so impressed that he arranged for her to be enrolled at the Paris conservatory. There she studied with Isidore Philipp. She made her recital debut in Paris and not long afterwards played in joint recital with the brilliant cellist, Pablo Casals. Later she toured through Algeria, Holland, Belgium, Spain and Germany.

Eight years ago Pierre Luboshutz was conducting a master class in Paris, and Genia Nemenoff enrolled as his pupil. A romance ensued and two years later they were married. She kept up her music, however, and the two formed the habit of playing together regularly for their own amusement. It was out of this practice that their joint recital tours grew.

PIQUA, O.
CALL

APR

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS ENJOYED FRIDAY

Splendid Organization from Ohio State University Gives Delightful Program.

Realization of how much we miss by not being able to hear symphony orchestras often must have come to every member of the audience who gathered Friday night at Piqua Central high school auditorium to listen to the concert presented by the Ohio State University Symphony orchestra under the direction of Eugene J. Weigel. The occasion was the second of the concerts on the series brought here this spring by the Piqua Madrigal Singers and to whom Piqua music lover's should be unanimously grateful for bringing such a musical treat to this city.

The orchestra is composed of 90 young musicians, each one majoring in music at Ohio State university; each a talented performer in his or her own right and each bespeaking an earnestness that cannot help but infect their audience. No musical sophistication or other depressing influence can deaden the response to fine orchestral music finely played. There is always that marvel of minds and instruments swayed into a singleness of purpose by one mind, all intent on the recreation of wonderful music by another mind and made eternal by the many.

The program was well chosen, including as it did some of the better known classical masterpieces Opening with the Oberon overture by von Weber, it proceeded to Beethoven's glorious Fifth Symphony in which each young musician evidenced a musical awareness, playing for all they were worth and responding to the director in a manner that brought a complete cooperation in the result.

After the intermission Winnifred Roudebush was soloist when the orchestra played Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, another well known and inspiring composition. Miss Roudebush, who is a senior majoring in music in the university Department of Music, left no doubt as to her talent, playing the entire, difficult Concerto from memory, a feat in itself even without the necessity of blending with 90 other musicians.

The fourth number on the program, "America," an epic rhapsody, by Ernest Bloch, was so completely modern that it was amusing to watch the reaction of the audience. Beginning on the strings, it took various themes from well known American airs such as "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Pop" Goes the Weasel," but so completely modernized that little vestige of the original, tempo remained. This rhapsody was composed in the middle of the last decade and was unanimously selected as the winning composition among 92 manuscripts submitted in Musical America's "Symphony Contest," the prize being awarded to the composer in June 1928, the judges being Walter Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitsky, Stock and Stokowski so it MUST be good, no matter what the Piqua audience thought.

The program closed with the brilliant and exciting "Espana" by Chabrier, which has become familiarized to American audiences during the past winter through being used as the concluding number on a number of symphony broadcasts. Written in the form of a rhapsody, it presents a succession of tunes bound together as an effective whole.

Enthusiastic applause after the concluding number was responded to with an encore, the well known and popular Intermezzo from Wolf-Farrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

Great credit goes to Mr. Weigel for the splendid training and vision which has enabled him to produce such a musical organization and it is hoped that the group will return to Piqua again so that more music lovers may have the opportunity of hearing and enjoying such splendid music.

226

MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

[illegible]

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN CONCERT SUNDAY

Shown above is the State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, which will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences Sunday evening under the direction of Earl V. Clay conductor. Miss Marie Healy, talented coloratura, will serve as guest soloist.

Earl V. Clay Will Serve As Program Director

On Sunday evening, April, 3 the Federal Music Project State Symphony orchestra, a unit of the Works Progress administration, under the direction of its newly appointed conductor, Earl V. Clay, will present a program at the Institute of Arts and Sciences hall with Marie Healy, coloratura, as guest soloist.

Mr. Clay comes to his new position with the highest recommendations. He is a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music where he was a scholarship student. He studied brass with Louis Kloepfel, theory with Frederick Converse and was a pupil of Stuart Mason, Kurt Fischer and Clement Lenom. Mr. Clay has played in the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitsky and Eugene Goossens and during the past several seasons has conducted the Boston Chamber orchestra and the Stoneham Choral society. He has been a member of the Massachusetts State Symphony orchestra under Alexander Thiede.

Marie Healy Is Soloist.

Miss Healy, soloist on the program, has won national recognition through her many concert and radio performances.

Among the numbers which she will sing with orchestral accompaniment is the aria, "Ah, Fors E Lui," from La Traviata. Of her rendition of this number one New York paper says, "With an astonishing dramatic interpretation, Miss Healy sang the Traviata aria giving a finished presentation of the operatic selection."

Tickets for Sunday evening's concert are on sale at the Piper-McIntire Music store or may be purchased at the door the evening of the performance. It is anticipated that a capacity audience will be in attendance to enjoy an exceptionally fine program and to greet Miss Healy, who has a large local following.

Ushers for Sunday evening are William Adams, Eugene Clough, Walter Fradd, William Law, Robert Babcock, Fred Clements, Charles Perkins and Irving Youland.

SPARTANSBURG, S. C.
JOURNAL

APR 2 - 1938

DUO-PIANISTS TO APPEAR IN CIVIC MUSIC CONCERT

Lubochutz and Nemenoff, duo-pianists, will appear here in the last of the series of Civic Music association concerts for the season on the evening of April 27, a week later than the first announcement.

It isn't surprising that Pierre Luboshutz and Genia Numenoff take naturally to the duo form of piano recital which they will present here on Wednesday, April 27, at Converse college auditorium. Both of them have been playing ensemble music since they were children.

Pierre Luboshutz was one of a family of three gifted children who played together as a trio first privately at home and later on concert tours in their native Russia. Their grandfather was a well-known opera singer, and their father a talented amateur violinist who operated a piano factory in Odessa.

At the age of four, Pierre began to study violin with his father. But his sisters soon put an end to this. The older of them, Lea Luboshutz, (now well known as a concert artist) played the violin and the younger, Ana, the cello. The daughters decided there were enough stringed instrument players in the family without Pierre. They needed a pianist to accompany them. So they united their efforts to induce the father to switch their younger brother from violin to piano.

Thus was Pierre's career determined. He progressed rapidly on the piano and at 12 was sent to the conservatory in Moscow, from which he was graduated with the highest honors. Indeed so highly was he thought of that when Kreisler visited Moscow for a series of concerts, arriving without an accompanist, 14-year-old Pierre Luboshutz was chosen to meet the need. Later the boy was sent to Paris, where he continued his studies under the distinguished Edouard Risler and Professor Blumenfeld.

In 1912 Luboshutz made an important and auspicious debut in Moscow as guest soloist with the Koussevitzky orchestra—Koussevitzky himself conducting. Then deferring to the wishes of his gifted sisters, he toured with them as a trio throughout Russia until the revolution.

Then he made his way to Paris where he met Nina Koshetz, Russian soprano. The two toured together in joint recital. Luboshutz first visited the United States 11 years ago and in the intervening period has toured annually through the country in collaboration with such artists as Eide Norena, and Piatigorsky. He also has given numerous recitals of his own and has played with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra under Arturo Toscanini.

Luboshutz's attractive partner in his joint recitals, Genia Nemenoff, is in private life Mrs. Pierre Luboshutz. She, too, had the advantage of a highly musical background. She was the child of a mother who was an accomplished pianist and a father who was an opera singer. Her brother studied the cello and at 10 she was giving ensemble performances with him.

Her first teacher was her mother, who began giving her piano lessons at the age of four. When she was six the great composer Moszkowski heard her play some of his works and was so impressed that he arranged for her to be enrolled at the Paris conservatory. There she studied with Isidore Philipp. She made her recital debut in Paris and not long afterwards played in joint recital with the brilliant cellist, Pablo Casals. Later she toured through Algeria, Holland, Belgium, Spain and Germany.

Eight years ago Pierre Luboshutz was conducting a master class in Paris, and Genia Nemenoff enrolled as his pupil. A romance ensued and two years later they were married. She kept up her music, however, and the two formed the habit of playing together regularly for their own amusement. It was out of this practice that their joint recital tours grew.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 2 - 1938

The Choir Loft

Many Oratorio Services Will Mark the Observance of Passion Sunday Tomorrow.

By WILLARD IRVING NEVINS.

In commemoration of Passion Sunday many oratorio services have been planned by churches in the metropolitan area for tomorrow.

A partial list of the works to be heard is as follows:

Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., at 8:30 P. M. next Wednesday.

Recent Recordings.

With the recent release of the third volume of the "Passion According to St. Matthew," by Bach, we have the complete recording of that great choral work, as given under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society and a distinguished group of soloists. Considering the magnitude of this undertak[illegible] results are most satisfac[illegible]ecially impressive are the many chorales which are heard throughout the work. This recording is found in Victor albums M-411-12-13.

In Victor album M-421 will be found the prelude and Good Friday spell of Wagner's "Parsifal" as played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under the direction of Leopold Stokowski. The recording matches the superlative playing of this justly famous orchestra.

A single Victor record No. 14744 is a re-recording of Enrico Caruso's singing of Faure's "The Palms" and Franck's "La Procession."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE

APR 3 - 1938

The Boston Symph[illegible] Last Matinee Concert This Season

Fifth and last afternoon concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, at Carnegie Hall.

PROGRAM

1. Stravinsky........Divertimento from "Le Baiser de la Fée," Allegorical Ballet
2. Debussy....................."La Mer"

Intermission

3. Brahms..Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73

THE NEAREST approach to a novelty at this season's last Boston Symphony matinée was a series of excerpts from Stravinsky's ballet, "Le Baiser de la Fée." The original score was heard here in the Spring of 1937, when it was performed at the Metropolitan by the American Ballet. The music, composed in 1928 (after the beginning of Stravinsky's creative decline), is, for the most part, the feeblest sort of commonplace, though some of it is mildly pretty. Mr. Stravinsky, who has horrified his adherents by professing a passionate admiration for Tchaikovsky—whom no genuine Stravinskyan would pick up with the tongs—says that he dedicated this work "to the Muse of Tchaikovsky." The genius of Peter Ilych, explains Stravinsky, "has marked the score of 'Le Baiser de la Fée' with a predestined kiss." Perhaps it is just as well that Tchaikovsky himself did not remain alive to observe the result of this mystic osculation.

* * *

The most engaging aspect of the score is its instrumentation, which Mr. Koussevitzky's brilliant players turned almost into authentic magic at yesterday's performance. The playing of the orchestra in the remainder of the program, especially in that classic masterpiece, Debussy's "La Mer," was of an equal beauty and mastery.

The audience was demonstrative

TUCSON, ARIZ.
STAR

APR 3 - 1938

Musical offerings at Carnegie hall in New York during April will include the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia orchestra, the National Orchestral association, the New York Women's Symphony, Trudi School and her Dancing Comedians, Pianist Josef Hofmann, Contralto Marian Anderson, the Dessoff Choirs, and a memorial concert under the auspices of the Henry Hadley foundation.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

APR 3 - 1938

Elizabeth S

MISS ELIZABETH SIEDHOFF of Boston, who will appear at the Plantations Auditorium Friday evening in joint piano recital with Richard Burgin, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra relates many interesting incidents of her association with one of the world's outstanding teachers of piano, the eccentric and beloved Prof. Tobias Mathay, informally known to London music circles as "Uncle Tobs."

Outstanding among women pianists of this country, Miss Siedhoff has worked with a great many European music masters. She studied for three years' in Berlin with Breithaupt and the world-renowned Arthur Schnabel. Last year she studied with Prof. Mathay during the winter season. She has also coached with him in four of his "summer schools."

PIQUA, O.
CALL

APR

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS ENJOYED FRIDAY

Splendid Organization from Ohio State University Gives Delightful Program.

Realization of how much we miss by not being able to hear symphony orchestras often must have come to every member of the audience who gathered Friday night at Piqua Central high school auditorium to listen to the concert presented by the Ohio State University Symphony orchestra under the direction of Eugene J. Weigel. The occasion was the second of the concerts on the series brought here this spring by the Piqua Madrigal Singers and to whom Piqua music lover's should be unanimously grateful for bringing such a musical treat to this city.

The orchestra is composed of 90 young musicians, each one majoring in music at Ohio State university; each a talented performer in his or her own right and each bespeaking an earnestness that cannot help but infect their audience. No musical sophistication or other depressing influence can deaden the response to fine orchestral music finely played. There is always that marvel of minds and instruments swayed into a singleness of purpose by one mind, all intent on the recreation of wonderful music by another mind and made eternal by the many.

The program was well chosen, including as it did some of the better known classical masterpieces Opening with the Oberon overture by von Weber, it proceeded to Beethoven's glorious Fifth Symphony in which each young musician evidenced a musical awareness, playing for all they were worth and responding to the director in a manner that brought a complete cooperation in the result.

After the intermission Winnifred Roudebush was soloist when the orchestra played Schumann's Concerto in A Minor, another well known and inspiring composition. Miss Roudebush, who is a senior majoring in music in the university Department of Music, left no doubt as to her talent, playing the entire, difficult Concerto from memory, a feat in itself even without the necessity of blending with 90 other musicians.

The fourth number on the program, "America," an epic rhapsody, by Ernest Bloch, was so completely modern that it was amusing to watch the reaction of the audience. Beginning on the strings, it took various themes from well known American airs such as "My Old Kentucky Home" and "Pop Goes the Weasel," but so completely modernized that little vestige of the original tempo remained. This rhapsody was composed in the middle of the last decade and was unanimously selected as the winning composition among 92 manuscripts submitted in Musical America's "Symphony Contest," the prize being awarded to the composer in June 1928, the judges being Walter Damrosch, Hertz, Koussevitsky, Stock and Stokowski so it MUST be good, no matter what the Piqua audience thought.

The program closed with the brilliant and exciting "Espana" by Chabrier, which has become familiarized to American audiences during the past winter through being used as the concluding number on a number of symphony broadcasts. Written in the form of a rhapsody, it presents a succession of tunes bound together as an effective whole.

Enthusiastic applause after the concluding number was responded to with an encore, the well known and popular Intermezzo from Wolf-Farrari's "Jewels of the Madonna."

Great credit goes to Mr. Weigel for the splendid training and vision which has enabled him to produce such a musical organization and it is hoped that the group will return to Piqua again so that more music lovers may have the opportunity of hearing and enjoying such splendid music.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1938

227

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Debussy's 'La Mer' Feature of Farewell Concert Directed by Koussevitzky

STRAVINSKY WORK PLAYED

His 'Le Baiser de la Fee' and Brahms's Spring Symphony Round Out Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, closed its New York season of 1937-38 yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and this in a memorable way. The concert displayed the characteristics of the orchestra which in the last fourteen years, under its present leadership, has become as a single instrument in the hands of a most sensitive and imaginative interpreter.

For there are certain scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are unequaled. One of these is Debussy's "La Mer," which came second on yesterday's program. Nothing could have been more perfect and finished in detail than its performance, but the magic lay in the merging of each of the wondrous colors of Debussy's palette and in the freedom and imaginative sweep of the entire conception. In this Dr. Koussevitzky was singularly at one with the composer, who found his inspiration in the ever-changing sea, capricious, tumultuous or treacherously calm; in colors of water and sky and melodies of the storm. These images provoked an expressive method as precise as the most formal logic, yet in form as free as wind and wave.

Among Great Pages of Music

The subtlety and fantasy of this music are reflected by the sensitiveness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, discoursing such beauty, has colors both deep and glinting, and the rhythms of many waters, and a rhythmic life that causes the whole ensemble to pulsate and flash like a prism. Solo instruments sing haunting songs, like those who are "fey." The emergence from instrumental depths of the chorale of the first part and its noble return at the end, while other instruments clamor in the higher registers of the orchestra, are among the great pages of modern orchestral music.

Of this astonishing performance one cannot speak dispassionately. It is a supreme achievement, hardly short of a miracle of conception and execution. Among the greatest artistic experiences of which the present generation can boast in years to come will be the right to say "I heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play 'La Mer.'" And the world of music could so change its character in a century that a person reading a detailed description of such a performance might conclude that it was a legend, as some today believe that accounts of singers of former periods are legendary and untrue.

Other Works on Program

The program began with the Stravinzky divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fee," originally a ballet, admirably and consciously put together, and richest when the style nearest approaches Tschaikovsky and the score reflects that master's invention. The performance was a model of taste and finish. Dr. Koussevitzky addressed himself to his task as if he were revealing a masterpiece, but it would be difficult to believe that the virtuoso representation was the product of any such opinion. It is incredible that a modern composer of Stravinsky's stature would be willing so to consort with the empty and banal.

The concert ended with Brahms's Spring Symphony—that is to say his Second. No work could have represented a finer or more poetical leave-taking of a season. It was a praiseworthy performance, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given greater interpretations of this score. Again, as at the concert of Thursday night, the audience rendered homage with cheers as well as applause.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3 - 1938

RECORDS IN REVIEW

Easter Music Recorded by Boston Symphony With Harvard Glee Club—Mozart Serenade Transcribed

By Roderick O. Williams

AS THE Lenten season draws on toward Easter it is particularly fitting to consider some of the greatest music ever composed in celebration of the Passion and events leading to the Cross. Johann Sebastian Bach, besides being a musical genius, was a profoundly devout and spiritual character. He must have felt the full impact of the powerful drama contained in the New Testament scriptures. If the Passion According to St. Matthew is not his greatest work, it is certainly his most moving and comes closest to the realm of pure drama. An Easter season virtually never passes without an important performance of the Passion, and this year it will be heard again in the Oratorio Society's repetition of their last year's appearance in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The RCA Victor Company has just released the third and final album of records which contain an actual performance of the Passion under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The manifold difficulties of recording this mighty work may well be imagined. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Ernst Wolff's harpsichord, a host of vocal and instrumental soloists, and, finally, the exacting music of Bach all furnish the raw materials for a herculean task of organization and moulding on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky, and innumerable technical problems on the part of the recording engineers. May it be said at once that the job is a creditable one, and ensuing comments may be interpreted as reactions and suggestions for even greater results in the already highly developed technique of recording a performance of this kind.

Despite the record breaks, the sometimes lengthy silences and the rumble of the chorus as it stands up and sits down, one cannot help feeling the mighty power of the drama as it unfolds and sweeps on, reaching its ultimate poignancy in the exquisitely sad final chorus, "In Tears of Grief." The outstanding feature of the performance is the singing of the chorales, which are marked by well balanced blend of tone and effective shading and dynamic control. Diction, too, is clearer than in the other choruses, which are almost unintelligible even while following the text in the accompanying pamphlet. In its effort to produce mellow tone the Harvard Glee Club so covers its tone and modifies its vowels that words are completely lost. The soloists are Mmes. Vreeland and Meisle, and Messrs. Priebe, Faulkner and Lechner. They cope adequately with the difficult music, but there is not consistent distinction in their performance. It is hoped that future recordings of this kind will take more into account the acoustical problem of sound intensity. This reviewer found it necessary to increase volume for an adequate hearing of the harpsichord and soloists and then to decrease it for the choruses.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1938

RECENT RECORDINGS

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

WITH Mozart's Symphony No. 25, in G minor (K. 183), Alfred Wallenstein and his Sinfonietta make their first appearance on records. From inquiries received by this department it is to be gathered that the debut has been unduly postponed. The choice of the earlier G minor for the occasion is singularly appropriate. It was Wallenstein who unearthed the symphony for use in his broadcasts, its only traceable previous performances in this country having been by the Boston Symphony Orchestra almost forty years ago. It is a fresh, vital and immensely engaging work.

Those of us who habitually tune in on Wallenstein's broadcasts find here the fine understanding, distinguished taste and determined direction that mark those concerts. Would that recording might have been done under other conditions. The hollow tone that Columbia gave the St. Louis Orchestra in Haydn's "Paukenwirbel" symphony is again evident and suggests the studio is to blame. A feature of the set that might be said to make record history, and realizes a hope long held, is the inclusion of a miniature score in each album. Columbia is to be especially thanked and congratulated on an innovation that it is to be hoped will soon be regarded as regular practice.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1938

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has released the third and final album in its recording of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priere, tenor; Keith Falkner and Fritz Lechner, basses. The transference to the disks was made at the performance of the work in Boston on March 27, 1937. Included with the set is a pamphlet which brings the English translation of the text and a dissertation on the work by Professor Archibald T. Davison, of Harvard.

Why Mr. Koussevitzky chose to have his interpretation of the "Passion" recorded in the unsatisfactory English version instead of in the original German text of Picander, which Schweitzer has praised for its pictorial, vital attributes and freedom from sentimentality, is not known. The translation, especially of the arias, often makes essential alterations in the phrasing most disturbing to the musical line and utterly opposed to the composer's intentions. These purely musical considerations apart, the English form of the text is far less poignant and telling than the original German.

The performance itself is of variable excellence. Most moving and tonally satisfying is the singing of the chorales, although some of the great, dramatic choruses are admirably delivered and the final sorrowful double-chorus is sung affect- ttribute all the arias to he soloists; for while none of those concerned, with the exception of Keith Falkner, whose voicing of the recitatives carries conviction, makes more than a mediocre contribution, these arias, even when interpreted by first-rate artists, fail to arouse the emotions of present-day listeners. Mr. Koussevitzky has wisely given them without the traditional repeats, but, even thus shortened, they tire the ear and mind because of their rigid rhythmical patterns and stylized floridity.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the score departs little from accepted traditions. His pacing is just and his devotion to Bach's intentions is unfailing. Technically regarded, the recording falls considerably short of perfection; for, although much of the score emerges in tonally satisfying fashion, there are too many breaks in the recording at untimely moments which it seems could easily have been avoided.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
APR 3 - 1938

College Sponsors Talk By Famous Teacher

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger has the distinction of having been one of the first women ever to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London last year. More recently she has increased her experience conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the Philadelphia orchestra.

Many musicians and music critics in this section have attended her classes in Paris. Among her more noted American pupils have been Virgil Thomson, composer of "Four Saints in Three Acts;" Aaron Copeland, Walter Piston of Harvard, Ross Lee Finney, Douglas Moore of Columbus and Roy Harris of the faculty of Westminster Choir School. More close to home is Henry Lynne Woodward, instructor in theoretical music at Western College, Oxford.

Mlle. Boulanger will speak at Presser Hall, Western College, Oxford, Ohio, Saturday night.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 4 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last New York concert of the present season Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. As on the previous Thursday, both conductor and players were received with tumultuous applause and cheers, partly gratitude for a season of brilliant concerts and part enthusiasm for the achievements of the afternoon.

A performance of Debussy's "three symphonic sketches," "La Mer," was the triumph of the day. This was recreation, in the highest sense of the word, of a score with which Koussevitzky and his men have become particularly identified. Each exquisite, sensuous detail came to life at the hands of the unparalleled Boston ensemble, while the broad line of the work achieved its full architectural splendor through the inspired imagination and the potent baton of Dr. Koussevitzky.

A Divertimento from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," composed in 1928, opened the program. This composition was intended as a kind of homage to Tchaikovsky, several of whose melodies are used in the score. But in spite of its glittering instrumentation, the total result is of a banality only faintly flattering to Tchaikovsky. And certainly it adds nothing to the stature of Stravinsky.

The concert came to a stirring close with Brahms' Second Symphony. It is possible to differ with Dr. Koussevitzky on details of Saturday's performance of this work, but the interpretation was deeply felt and it threw the architecture of the symphony into heroic relief. It was a fitting climax to a memorable concert series.

E. D.

Cont

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 3 - 1938

Symphony Concert To Be Series' Last

Program, Tuesday Night, Will Include Works of Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy.—Other Musical Affairs Also Listed

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in the fifth and final concert of the Providence series, Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The program will consist of the first symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms and two nocturnes by Debussy.

A free lecture on the various numbers to be played will be given by John Archer at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4 o'clock, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Themes and other illustrations will be demonstrated on the piano by Christine Gladhill.

The week's events also include a song recital by Elsie Lovell Hankins, contralto, in Churchill House, Thursday evening, at 8:30 o'clock; a joint recital by Elizabeth Siedhoff, pianist, and Richard Burgin, violinist, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Plantations Auditorium, Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock, and a pianoforte recital by Ruth Campbell in the Music Mansion, Saturday evening, at 8:30 o'clock.

Invitations have been sent to a piano recital by Jeane Marren, assisted by Earl Hedberg, violinist, in the studio of Eva Webber, 178 Bowen street, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock. At the Lockwood high school, Apponaug, Thursday evening, the Rhode Island Civic Symphony Orchestra will give a concert under the conductorship of Dr. Wassili Leps.

Symphony's Final

The program with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will make their final bow for the season at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C-major, opus 31.... .... Beethoven
  I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
  II. Andante cantabile con moto
  III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace; Trio
  IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
  "Nuages"
  "Fetes"
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, opus 68.... .... Brahms
  I. Un poco sostenuoto; Allegro
  11. Andante sostenuto
  III. Nn poco allegretto e grazioso
  IV. Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Debussy's 'La Mer' Feature of Farewell Concert Directed by Koussevitzky

STRAVINSKY WORK PLAYED

His 'Le Baiser de la Fee' and Brahms's Spring Symphony Round Out Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, closed its New York season of 1937-38 yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and this in a memorable way. The concert displayed the characteristics of the orchestra which in the last fourteen years, under its present leadership, has become as a single instrument in the hands of a most sensitive and imaginative interpreter.

For there are certain scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are unequaled. One of these is Debussy's "La Mer," which came second on yesterday's program. Nothing could have been more perfect and finished in detail than its performance, but the magic lay in the merging of each of the wondrous colors of Debussy's palette and in the freedom and imaginative sweep of the entire conception. In this Dr. Koussevitzky was singularly at one with the composer, who found his inspiration in the ever-changing sea, capricious, tumultuous or treacherously calm; in colors of water and sky and melodies of the storm. These images provoked an expressive method as precise as the most formal logic, yet in form as free as wind and wave.

Among Great Pages of Music

The subtlety and fantasy of this music are reflected by the sensitiveness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, discoursing such beauty, has colors both deep and glinting, and the rhythms of many waters, and a rhythmic life that causes the whole ensemble to pulsate and flash like a prism. Solo instruments sing haunting songs, like those who are "fey." The emergence from instrumental depths of the chorale of the first part and its noble return at the end, while other instruments clamor in the higher registers of the orchestra, are among the great pages of modern orchestral music.

Of this astonishing performance one cannot speak dispassionately. It is a supreme achievement, hardly short of a miracle of conception and execution. Among the greatest artistic experiences of which the present generation can boast in years to come will be the right to say "I heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play 'La Mer.'" And the world of music could so change its character in a century that a person reading a detailed description of such a performance might conclude that it was a legend, as some today believe that accounts of singers of former periods are legendary and untrue.

Other Works on Program

The program began with the Stravinzky divertimento, "Le Baiser de la Fee," originally a ballet, admirably and consciously put together, and richest when the style nearest approaches Tschaikovsky and the score reflects that master's invention. The performance was a model of taste and finish. Dr. Koussevitzky addressed himself to his task as if he were revealing a masterpiece, but it would be difficult to believe that the virtuoso representation was the product of any such opinion. It is incredible that a modern composer of Stravinsky's stature would be willing so to consort with the empty and banal.

The concert ended with Brahms's Spring Symphony—that is to say his Second. No work could have represented a finer or more poetical leave-taking of a season. It was a praiseworthy performance, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given greater interpretations of this score. Again, as at the concert of Thursday night, the audience rendered homage with cheers as well as applause.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE
APR 3 - 1938

RECORDS IN REVIEW

Easter Music Recorded by Boston Symphony With Harvard Glee Club—Mozart Serenade Transcribed

By Roderick O. Williams

AS THE Lenten season draws on toward Easter it is particularly fitting to consider some of the greatest music ever composed in celebration of the Passion and events leading to the Cross. Johann Sebastian Bach, besides being a musical genius, was a profoundly devout and spiritual character. He must have felt the full impact of the powerful drama contained in the New Testament scriptures. If the Passion According to St. Matthew is not his greatest work, it is certainly his most moving and comes closest to the realm of pure drama. An Easter season virtually never passes without an important performance of the Passion, and this year it will be heard again in the Oratorio Society's repetition of their last year's appearance in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine. The RCA Victor Company has just released the third and final album of records which contain an actual performance of the Passion under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky.

The manifold difficulties of recording this mighty work may well be imagined. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Dr. Ernst Wolff's harpsichord, a host of vocal and instrumental soloists, and, finally, the exacting music of Bach all furnish the raw materials for a herculean task of organization and moulding on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky, and innumerable technical problems on the part of the recording engineers. May it be said at once that the job is a creditable one, and ensuing comments may be interpreted as reactions and suggestions for even greater results in the already highly developed technique of recording a performance of this kind.

Despite the record breaks, the sometimes lengthy silences and the rumble of the chorus as it stands up and sits down, one cannot help feeling the mighty power of the drama as it unfolds and sweeps on, reaching its ultimate poignancy in the exquisitely sad final chorus, "In Tears of Grief." The outstanding feature of the performance is the singing of the chorales, which are marked by well balanced blend of tone and effective shading and dynamic control. Diction, too, is clearer than in the other choruses, which are almost unintelligible even while following the text in the accompanying pamphlet. In its effort to produce mellow tone the Harvard Glee Club so covers its tone and modifies its vowels that words are completely lost. The soloists are Mmes. Vreeland and Meisle, and Messrs. Priebe, Faulkner and Lechner. They cope adequately with the difficult music, but there is not consistent distinction in their performance. It is hoped that future recordings of this kind will take more into account the acoustical problem of sound intensity. This reviewer found it necessary to increase volume for an adequate hearing of the harpsichord and soloists and then to decrease it for the choruses.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1938

F TIM

By COMPTON PAKENHAM

WITH Mozart's Symphony No. 25, in G minor (K. 183), Alfred Wallenstein and his Sinfonietta make their first appearance on records. From inquiries received by this department it is to be gathered that the debut has been unduly postponed. The choice of the earlier G minor for the occasion is singularly appropriate. It was Wallenstein who unearthed the symphony for use in his broadcasts, its only traceable previous performances in this country having been by the Boston Symphony Orchestra almost forty years ago. It is a fresh, vital and immensely engaging work.

Those of us who habitually tune in on Wallenstein's broadcasts find here the fine understanding, distinguished taste and determined direction that mark those concerts. Would that recording might have been done under other conditions. The hollow tone that Columbia gave the St. Louis Orchestra in Haydn's "Paukenwirbel" symphony is again evident and suggests the studio is to blame. A feature of the set that might be said to make record history, and realizes a hope long held, is the inclusion of a miniature score in each album. Columbia is to be especially thanked and congratulated on an innovation that it is to be hoped will soon be regarded as regular practice.

NEW YORK, N. Y.
EVENING POST
APR 4 - 1938

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last New York concert of the present season Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. As on the previous Thursday, both conductor and players were received with tumultuous applause and cheers, partly gratitude for a season of brilliant concerts and part enthusiasm for the achievements of the afternoon.

A performance of Debussy's "three symphonic sketches," "La Mer," was the triumph of the day. This was recreation, in the highest sense of the word, of a score with which Koussevitzky and his men have become particularly identified. Each exquisite, sensuous detail came to life at the hands of the unparalleled Boston ensemble, while the broad line of the work achieved its full architectural splendor through the inspired imagination and the potent baton of Dr. Koussevitzky.

A Divertimento from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss," composed in 1928, opened the program. This composition was intended as a kind of homage to Tchaikovsky, several of whose melodies are used in the score. But in spite of its glittering instrumentation, the total result is of a banality only faintly flattering to Tchaikovsky. And certainly it adds nothing to the stature of Stravinsky.

The concert came to a stirring close with Brahms' Second Symphony. It is possible to differ with Dr. Koussevitzky on details of Saturday's performance of this work, but the interpretation was deeply felt and it threw the architecture of the symphony into heroic relief. It was a fitting climax to a memorable concert series.

E. D.

Cont

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
APR 3 - 1938

RECENT RECORDS

By JEROME D. BOHM

VICTOR has released the third and final album in its recording of Bach's "St. Matthew Passion," by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, with the assistance of the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society, Jeannette Vreeland, soprano; Kathryn Meisle, contralto; John Priere, tenor; Keith Falkner and Fritz Lechner, basses. The transference to the disks was made at the performance of the work in Boston on March 27, 1937. Included with the set is a pamphlet which brings the English translation of the text and a dissertation on the work by Professor Archibald T. Davison, of Harvard.

Why Mr. Koussevitzky chose to have his interpretation of the "Passion" recorded in the unsatisfactory English version instead of in the original German text of Picander, which Schweitzer has praised for its pictorial, vital attributes and freedom from sentimentality, is not known. The translation, especially of the arias, often makes essential alterations in the phrasing most disturbing to the musical line and utterly opposed to the composer's intentions. These purely musical considerations apart, the English form of the text is far less poignant and telling than the original German.

The performance itself is of variable excellence. Most moving and tonally satisfying is the singing of the chorales, although some of the great, dramatic choruses are admirably delivered and the final sorrowful double-chorus is sung affectingly. One should not attribute all of the ineffectiveness of the arias to the shortcomings of the soloists; for while none of those concerned, with the exception of Keith Falkner, whose voicing of the recitatives carries conviction, makes more than a mediocre contribution, these arias, even when interpreted by first-rate artists, fail to arouse the emotions of present-day listeners. Mr. Koussevitzky has wisely given them without the traditional repeats, but, even thus shortened, they tire the ear and mind because of their rigid rhythmical patterns and stylized floridity.

Mr. Koussevitzky's conception of the score departs little from accepted traditions. His pacing is just and his devotion to Bach's intentions is unfailing. Technically regarded, the recording falls considerably short of perfection; for, although much of the score emerges in tonally satisfying fashion, there are too many breaks in the recording at untimely moments which it seems could easily have been avoided.

CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
APR 3 - 1938

College Sponsors Talk By Famous Teacher

Mlle. Nadia Boulanger has the distinction of having been one of the first women ever to conduct the Royal Philharmonic Society Orchestra in London last year. More recently she has increased her experience conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and also the Philadelphia orchestra.

Many musicians and music critics in this section have attended her classes in Paris. Among her more noted American pupils have been Virgil Thomson, composer of "Four Saints in Three Acts;" Aaron Copeland, Walter Piston of Harvard, Ross Lee Finney, Douglas Moore of Columbus and Roy Harris of the faculty of Westminster Choir School. More close to home is Henry Lynne Woodward, instructor in theoretical music at Western College, Oxford.

Mlle. Boulanger will speak at Presser Hall, Western College, Oxford, Ohio, Saturday night.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
APR 3 - 1938

Symphony Concert To Be Series' Last

Program, Tuesday Night, Will Include Works of Beethoven, Brahms, Debussy.—Other Musical Affairs Also Listed

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will appear in the fifth and final concert of its Providence series, Tuesday night in the Metropolitan Theatre. The program will consist of the first symphonies of Beethoven and Brahms and two nocturnes by Debussy.

A free lecture on the various numbers to be played will be given by John Archer at the Providence Public Library this afternoon at 4 o'clock, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club. Themes and other illustrations will be demonstrated on the piano by Christine Gladhill.

The week's events also include a song recital by Elsie Lovell Hankins, contralto, in Churchill House, Thursday evening, at 8:30 o'clock; a joint recital by Elizabeth Siedhoff, pianist, and Richard Burgin, violinist, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Plantations Auditorium, Friday evening, at 8:15 o'clock, and a pianoforte recital by Ruth Campbell in the Music Mansion, Saturday evening, at 8:30 o'clock.

Invitations have been sent to a piano recital by Jeane Marren, assisted by Earl Hedberg, violinist, in the studio of Eva Webber, 178 Bowen street, tomorrow night at 8 o'clock. At the Lockwood high school, Apponaug, Thursday evening, the Rhode Island Civic Symphony Orchestra will give a concert under the conductorship of Dr. Wassili Leps.

Symphony's Final

The program with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony will make their final bow for the season at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday night follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C-major, opus 31.... .... Beethoven
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Andante cantabile con moto
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace; Trio
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
"Nuages"
"Fetes"
Symphony No. 1 in C-minor, opus 68.... .... Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuoto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Nn poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

NEW YORK, N. Y.
TIMES
APR 3 - 1938

CHANGES IN AUSTRIA

New Musical Situation With Nazi Control —Americans Develop Festivals

By OLIN DOWNES

THERE will be many changes in the Austrian musical world, aside from the loss of Toscanini and Bruno Walter to Vienna and Salzburg. Josef Krips and Carl Alwin were dismissed as soon as the Nazi party took control of the State Opera. Hermann Scherchen, his "Musica Viva" orchestra gone up in smoke, has left Austria for Switzerland. It is whispered that some 70 per cent of the Vienna Philharmonic, which for ninety-six years has been a cooperative and self-governing body of musicians, are "racially tainted or politically suspect." This organization now comes under the control of the Reichsmusikkammer. Its chairmanship has passed from Toscanini's friend, Dr. Hugo Burghauser, to Wilhelm Jerger, one of the double-bass players. It appears that Furtwaengler will play a considerable part in the Vienna Philharmonic destinies, and it is probable that he will conduct from time to time at the State Opera. Another of the leaders of the historic orchestra will be Fritz Knappertsbusch, formerly of Munich. We are informed that efforts are being made to engage Victor de Sabata, in addition to Furtwaengler and Knappertsbusch, as one of its leaders. Changes are already reported in the personnel of the organization. It must be admitted, on purely musical grounds, that some young blood injected into its ranks—if politics were only omitted from the reorganization—would be for the good of the famous institution.

* * *

But these changes, important and ominous as they are for music, are only incidental to the manner in which free and creative expression is throttled in that art by the governments of Germany, Italy and Russia. We are not of those who make no distinction between the purposes of these three governments, but it remains a fact that an absolute dictatorship of the sort now practiced in such extensive areas of the world overseas is nothing but destructive to creative thought in any field.

Art is not a matter that can be cut to a political or economic cloth. Art has sprung up in a people despite need or distress, when the men who created it expressed themselves naturally and without restriction in their work. But the effort to find in Germany a living composer who can create music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream" equal to Mendelssohn's is as childish and ignorant as the effort made in Russia to produce by order music representative of the ideals of the Soviet Republic. It is true that Russia has wakened in a degree to the absurdity of favoring musical politicians and discouraging composers and performers with too much courage and sincerity to follow anything in their work but their own inspiration. The ranks of the musicians have been partly purged of political organizations. But it will be a rare genius indeed who rises today, in the countries where freedom is a mockery and personal safety dependent upon political favor, to produce real music. In these countries the miasma of fear is spreading and paralyzing every impulse toward beauty or original expression.

The sad conviction grows that art has not an immediate future in the Eastern Hemisphere. It is incredible that the oldest civilizations in the world can find nothing real enough in centuries of culture to prevent insensate and barbaric processes of extinction, but it is so. Temples of beauty become in the twinkling of an eye shambles and junkhouses. The will to think or act in a way to end the horror seems gone.

Music needs youth of the spirit, and faith in the future. For it is not enough to look back upon beauty, and cease creating it. Young art is absolutely necessary to the life of the world-art with roots in a rich past, but whose young branches stretch out toward new horizons. On this side of the Atlantic there is a future, also a great heritage. Nor are signs lacking that in America music is feeling the currents of a new age.

* * *

One of the signs of the times is the development of American Summer music festivals. Some new ones are likely to sprout since the overrunning of Salzburg by politics. There could and there should be American music festivals of an importance equal to the great festivals of Europe, and planned, in an American way, on fully as great a scale. The nearest approach to this, up to the present time, is the Berkshire Festival given each August by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its scope should be extended, and would have been if Dr. Koussevitzky's plans had been fully supported. The possibility is now that other places will institute festivals, and that the lead which Stockbridge had in this direction will be lost, while astonished local citizens wonder what has happened.

A Westport (Conn.) project has been advanced with enthusiasm in recent weeks. It has met opposition from residents who fear to have a big music festival running across their lawns—an objection that is easy to understand. Saratoga Springs has an embryo music festival. Los Angeles, so retiring and modest in all its statements, visualizes a vast affair with the resources of the deepest minds of Hollywood enlisted in its purposes. These new tremors take no account of the extensive programs of music that are given regularly in American centers in the summertime. May we say, timidly, that we trust and believe the greatest music festival of all will transpire at the New York World's Fair? These various activities, and others unmentioned, are portents of a change, very momentous for the culture of the United States, and indicative of the new musical balance of power.

DALLAS, TEX.
Keep NEWS
APR 3 - 1938

PROGRAM NOTES:

Batonist as Virtuoso And Symphony As Musical Instrument

BY JOHN ROSENFIELD JR.

WHEN THE GOVERNING BOARD of the New York Philharmonic Symphony chose a successor to the idolized Toscanini he was Wilhelm Furtwaengler, a conductor of almost equal stature. But Herr Furtwaengler, despite a minor row with the Nazi regime, was one of Hitler's fair-haired boys. Propagandist Goebbels, with classic Teutonic tactlessness, let loose something to the effect that New York had to turn to the Reich for its new musical superman. Since Gotham isn't a wholly Aryan city, Herr Furtwaengler's welcome was worn out before he arrived.

The deal was canceled and the Philharmonic-Symphony Society veered sharply to the right. "To perdition with prima donna conductors, anyway." The personality of Toscanini had so far transcended the orchestra that attendance rose and fell according to his sporadic presence. It was decided to engage an obscure director who would never be bigger than his orchestra.

The ultimate successor to Toscanini, John Barbirolli of London, meets all the specifications of mediocrity, to judge by the performances heard round the world via radio pickup. The Philharmonic guarantors had a salutary idea and might have got away with it, had not NBC impishly brought back Toscanini to head radio's first exclusive broadcasting orchestra. The day of the primo homo conductor was anything but over and the Philharmonic was stuck with Barbirolli, who certainly is no primo homo.

The virtuoso conductor can be a millstone around music's slender neck and also can be a consummate personal nuisance. There is a fine sublimity in the notion that music is greater than its interpreters but it doesn't square with either the facts or the forces of musical evolution. Since Nikisch the trend has been to the conductor as virtuoso and the orchestra, despite its manifold man power, has become merely the conductor's instrument. The vogue of the podium soloist probably will continue. The air-waves are laden with symphonic music. Symphonic albums sell like sheet music over the music store counter. Almost anybody anywhere can hear all the symphonic music he desires without too much effort.

Other Prodigies

As musical Dallas coos elation over the possession of an interesting young conductor, it might be wise to note that other cities are celebrating the same thing at the same time. Minneapolis is entranced with Dimitri Mitropoulos, Baltimore hails Werner Janssen, Pittsburgh takes Fritz Reiner, Indianapolis embraces Fabien Sevitzky, nephew of Boston's Koussevitzky and Cincinnati is giving Eugene Goossens at long last the adulation he so richly deserves. Our sister city, Houston, apparently has ended a long quest with the success of Ernst Hofmann, a conductor of sound ideas and solid competence.

In America the big three of the baton are Toscanini, Koussevitzky and Stokowski. With New York for a sounding board, Toscanini's preeminence resounds throughout the universe. This is no time to go into it, but we demur. We demur only as to Toscanini's infallibility. Like all great artists Toscanini has weaknesses as conspicuous as his fortes. We think he is human and we prefer our artists that way. With Koussevitzky it is a certain austerity, a tendency to intellectualize—all in the Boston tradition of Karl Muck. Quite to the opposite of the Muck tradition is Koussevitzky's magnificent achievements in modern music. He has built an orchestra second to none other on this continent and only a bent of taste would make you prefer the Philadelphia Symphony.

This lush, miraculously responsive orchestral instrument is the creation of Stokowski. Better advertised west of the Atlantic seaboard than the Boston Symphony, the Philadelphia band is first in the hearts of the Nation. The critical voice outside New York cannot hope to talk down that of the Metropolis. Stokowski as a conductor never has been the darling of the larger city. For one thing his box-office popularity and the obvious superiority of his orchestra have stirred the defense mechanisms of the Carnegie Hall reviewers, who are as loyal to the Philharmonic as Podunk is to its water works. New York has never given Stokowski credit for the artistic versatility that is his.

Vladimir Golschmann has achieved enormous results in St. Louis, a town that has difficulty staying in the big leagues. The depression played havoc with its ancient symphony but thanks to Golschmann, also to the managerial acumen of Arthur Gaines and to the spectacular open-handedness of Oscar Johnson, chief backer, the orchestra is one of the most vital factors in American music.

The Figure of Golschmann

Every other aspiring city has looked for another Golschmann. The Franco-Russian's able musicianship, romantic musical temperament and ingratiating personality exactly fill the requirements of the situation. Costs of a symphony orchestra do not vary proportionately to the size of the community. It would cost Dallas just as much as Philadelphia to sustain the Philadelphia Symphony. The smaller the city, the larger must be the proportion of symphony supporters to total population. Almost anybody can float an orchestra in New York. It took a Golschmann to sustain a major orchestra in St. Louis.

When the St. Louis Symphony plays at McFarlin Auditorium Thursday night for Civic Music, it will be the third visit in as many years. Both Golschmann and the orchestra have worn well here. In 1936, we had a memorable reading of Beethoven's Seventh. In 1937 there was a stirring performance of Brahms' First and we met the Polka and Fugue from "Schwanda." Last spring the St. Louisans followed the Philadelphia Symphony. As showmen say, the spot was tough. Local music lovers acknowledged more interest and stimulation in the Golschmann program despite the fact that neither his orchestra nor any other save Boston's is the peer of the Philadelphia Symphony.

April 3/38
NEW YORK TIMES,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS SEASON HERE

Debussy's 'La Mer' Feature of Farewell Concert Directed by Koussevitzky

STRAVINSKY WORK PLAYED

His 'Le Baiser de la Fee' and Brahms's Spring Symphony Round Out Program

By OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, closed its New York season of 1937-38 yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and this in a memorable way. The concert displayed the characteristics of the orchestra which in the last fourteen years, under its present leadership, has become as a single instrument in the hands of a most sensitive and imaginative performer.

There are certain scores in which this Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are unequaled. One of these is Debussy's "La Mer," which came second on yesterday's program. Nothing could have been more perfect and finished in detail than tthis performance, but its magic lay in the merging of each of the wondrous colors of Debussy's palette and in the freedom and imaginative sweep of the entire conception. In this Dr. Koussevitzky was singularly at one with the composer, who found his inspiration in the ever-changing sea, capricious, tumultuous or treacherously calm; the colors of water and sky; the melodies of the storm. These elements provoked an expressive method as precise as the most formal logic, yet in form is free as wind and wave.

Among Great Pages of Music

The subtlety and fantasy of this music are reflected by the sensitiveness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, discoursing such beauty, has colors both deep and glinting, and the rhythms of many waters, and a rhythmic life that causes the whole ensemble to pulsate and flash like a prism. Solo instruments sing haunting songs, like those who are "fey." The emergence as from the depths of the chorale of the first part and its noble return at the end, while other instruments clamor in the higher registers of the orchestra, are among the great pages of orchestral music.

Of this astonishing performance one cannot speak dispassionately. It is a supreme achievement, not short of a miracle of conception and execution. Among the greatest artistic experiences of which the present generation can boast in years to come will be the right to say "I heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play 'La Mer.'" And the world of music could so change its character in a century that a person reading a detailed description of such a performance might conclude that it was a legend, as some today believe that accounts of singers of former periods are legendary and untrue.

Other Works on Program

The program began with the Stravinzky divertimento, "Le Baiser de in Fee," originally a ballet, admirably and consciously put together, and richest when the style nearest approaches Tschaikovsky and the score reflects that master's invention. The performance was a model of taste and finish. Dr. Koussevitzky addressed himself to his task as if he were revealing a masterpiece, but it would be difficult to believe that the virtuoso representation was the product of any such opinion. It is unbelievable that a modern composer of Stravinsky's stature would be willing so to consort with the empty and banal.

The concert ended with Brahms's Spring Symphony—that is to say his Second. No work could have represented a finer or more poetical leave-taking of a season. It was a praiseworthy performance, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given greater interpretations of this score. Again, as at the concert of Thursday night, the audience rendered homage with cheers as well as applause.

COLUMBIA, S. C.
RECORD
APR 2 - 1938

Columbia's Ensemble Struck New High in Festival

Next Year's Program

With the 1938 festival only a week back, work on even details for next winter and spring's series and festival has begun. And more than 2,000 tickets have already been sold, tickets for both the series and the festival—or six great concerts!

In the pre-festival series will be concerts by the Philadelphia Symphony orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor; Joseph Zsigeti, the distinguished Hungarian violinist, and Mme. Bidu Sayao, the Brazilian lyric seprano of the Metropolitan Opera association.

This represents an enormous advance in caliber for the pre-festival series. Nothing approaching this has been attempted here before. The Philadelphia orchestra alone embraces prestige and merit beyond the combined strength of previous pre-festival series. With the New York Philharmonic, the Boston Symphony and the National ~~Broadcasting~~ orchestra (assembled last year for Toscanini), the Philadelphia orchestra ranks in the very top bracket of world symphonies.

Mme. Sayao is probably the leading operatic lyric of the day, and Zsigeti stands at the top among violinists.

In the festival proper, March 31 and April 1, there will be three artists where heretofore there have been only two. They are Nelson Eddy, the baritone; Kathryn Miesle, the contralto, and Muriel Kerr, the Canadian pianist, and again the National Symphony, the Shandon chorus and the statewide college chorus.

—H. C.

BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
APR 4 - 1938

Mrs. Olive Appleton Newcombe of Watertown, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Royal C. Appleton of Fairfield street, has been selected as one of the five soloists, chosen from among the top ranks of concert singers, for "The Children's Crusade," to be presented April 17, Easter Sunday evening, at Symphony Hall, Boston. The orchestral music will be by 75 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The entire production is under the direction of the Handel and Haydn Society, for whom Mrs. Newcombe has sung before.

PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

APR 2 - 1938

..Music and Other Notes..

Serge Koussevitsky has planned another of his interesting programs for the final concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Metropolitan Theatre, Tuesday evening at 8:15.

"Two first symphonies, the Beethoven C major Opus 21 and the Brahms C minor, Opus 68 begin and end the program. Between them are placed two delightful nocturnes by Debussy, Nuages and Fetes.

The Beethoven Symphony was first played in Vienna on April 2, 1800 at a concert given by Beethoven for his own benefit. Tickets were to be purchased of "Herr Beethoven at his lodgings im tiefen Graben, No. 241, third story, and of the Box-keeper." The program began at 6:30 p. m. and included a Mozart Symphony, an air and duet from The Creation, his own pianoforte concerto which he played himself, his septet, his improvisations on Haydn's "Emperor Hymn" and last but not least, this new Symphony No. 1. The earliest record of its performance in America is at a performance on April 24, 1821 by the Philadelphia Musical Fund Society but this was probably only one movement. It was not until later that Symphony orchestras as an institution were established (that is, orchestras capable of playing complete symphonies). Artistic progress had not then reached all the sections of the orchestras to an equal degree. The New York Philharmonic began in 1842.

In an article published in 1927 at the 100th anniversary of the death of Beethoven, Ott Kinkeldy writes that an orchestra in Boston, conducted by Henry Schmidt, a violinist, was connected with the Boston Academy of Music, which was headed by Lowell Mason. This group of amateurs developed a semi-professional orchestra of from 30 to 40 players who could play the works of Beethoven adequately. They presented the Beethoven Symphony No. 1, on Feb. 13, 1841 and this was doubtless the first complete performance in America.

The symphony is in the conventional four movements and has in it the promise of great things to come. Its form is delightfully simple and clear, and it illustrates clearly Beethoven's genius for relating all his themes and preserving the unity of the composition. Beethoven was probably 28 or 30 when he wrote this work.

Brahms was 29 years old when he finished the first movement of his first symphony. Almost 15 years elapsed before he completed the entire composition. Rough sketches existed, but Brahms did not resume work on the symphony until 1874, and in September, 1876, when Brahms was 43., the manuscript was finished. The first performance was given at Carlsruhe on Nov. 4 under Dessoff's direction.

Brahms had a very individual style. Robust harmonies and logical construction are characteristic of his work. He once said, "I am fond of discords, but they must come on the strong beats and be resolved smoothly and gently." He is most resourceful and original in his use of rhythm and in this respect allows himself the greatest freedom. He enlarged the scope of the orchestral color in his symphonies by his choice of keys for the various movements. In this Symphony No. 1 the first movement is in C minor and each movement is a major third higher until, at the fourth movement, the original key is reached.

The Debussy nocturnes should prove an agreeable transition from Beethoven to Brahms. They were written for orchestra in 1897-1899 and the set includes three. "Fetes," "Nuages" and "Sirenes." The first two are the most played.

Debussy was born at St. Germaine-en Laye, Aug. 22, 1862, and died at Paris, March 25, 1918. He was the founder of the school of impressionism. His influence on writing for piano has been tremendous. The delicacy of his music and its imaginative content seems to have added the word atmosphere to the list used to describe music. Many of his chord progressions which seem strange and modern really had their origin in the old ecclesiastical modes and his use of fourths and fifths goes back to the very beginnings of music. It takes a peculiar kind of genius to write music which was so lacking in form as that of Debussy and modernists, more and more, are taking refuge in the safety and strength of form although they continue to experiment with their tonal material.

The two nocturnes we are to hear were first performed Dec. 9, 1900, at the Lamoureux concerts in Paris. Nuages is only 102 measures in length and its chord progressions are delightful. Fetes is a gay, rhythmical composition which at the end gradually diminishes leaving only the percussion instruments to suggest the rhythm. Debussy conducted orchestra in Moscow [illegible] 1913, and these nocturnes w[illegible] cluded in the program.

Debussy wrote articles on music for La Revie Blanche and signed himself Monsieur Croche. He died in Paris and his death notice in the papers was given very little space because of the war news.

The MacDowell Club will hold its annual meeting on Monday. The hostesses will be Mrs. Frederick W. Roberts and Mrs. Wallace D. Gray.

On Th[illegible]

NEW YORK, N. Y.
SUN

APR 4 - 1938

Music of the Boston Orchestra Ends Series.

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra concluded their New York season in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, with a program that reached its peak in a blazing, irridescent performance of Debussy's "La Mer." The performance of this remarkable score has become virtually a seasonal rite with the Bostonians, and well it might be; for it displays the most individual qualities of conductor and players in a wholly admirable light. There were some portions of the first and third movements which suffered from too much insistence on instrumental detail, but the superb sonority of the performance, its ceaseless life and movement were satisfying beyond cavil. Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were rewarded with one of the season's most enthusiastic receptions.

"La Mer" was preceded by the divertimento drawn by Stravinsky from his music for the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee." This was described as a "first concert performance" in New York, but the music made no greater impression than it did last spring when the work was performed by the American Ballet. The themes utilized by Stravinsky are hardly outstanding, and the treatment is illustrative only of the composer's mechanical skill. It was brilliantly played. The program concluded with the Brahms second symphony, directed by Mr. Koussevitzky in a disjointed and unvital fashion. I. K.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

APR 4 - 1938

Boston Symphony

By G. Y. Loveridge

Boston Symphony Program

Two first symphonies—one by Beethoven and the other by Brahms—will be on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct. It will be the last concert of the season here by the orchestra.

The first performance of the Beethoven symphony was almost exactly 138 years ago—on April 2, 1800. The composer was 30. Brahms did not present his first symphony to the public until he was 43. He appeared in awe of Beethoven and once wrote to a friend, "I shall never compose a symphony! You have no conception of how the likes of us feel when we hear the tramp of a giant like him behind us."

The Beethoven symphony is in C major, and reminds the listener of Haydn and Mozart in various ways. The first movement begins not in C major, but in F major, and goes then to G major. This was not considered proper in Beethoven's time and aroused some adverse declarations from the critics, but to this day's listeners the symphony does not seem startling. It is in the customary four movements.

The Brahms symphony is in C minor. It was played first by the Grand Duke's orchestra in Carlsruhe, on Nov. 4, 1876. Dessoff conducted and Brahms was among the listeners. A few days later, Brahms conducted his symphony at Mannheim.

This symphony did not achieve popularity for a long time, but in the past few years more and more persons have come to enjoy it, as they have the three others by this master. In 1878, when it was heard in Boston for the first time, John S. Dwight wrote in his "Journal of Music" that "it will not be loved like the dear masterpieces of genius." Now it is considered to be one of those masterpieces.

Brahms, by the way, died 41 years ago yesterday, at Vienna.

Two nocturnes, "Fetes" and "Nuages," by Debussy, also will be played tomorrow night. There is a third one, "Sirenes," for which a wordless choir of 16 female voices is needed. It is rarely heard.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.
EAGLE

APR 4 - 1938

Music of the Day

By MILES KASTENDIECK

Five Orchestras Give Weekend Programs—New Porter Symphony Heard—Rodzinski Back at NBC—Fiedel Trio at Academy

No less than five orchestras offered a variety of programs over the weekend—enough to satisfy the musical appetite and to meet almost every kind of taste. The fare ranged from the final concert in New York this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra conducted by Serge Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon to the second all-Tchaikovsky program by the New York Civic Orchestra conducted by Eugene Plotnikoff at the Federal Music Theater last night. The regular Saturday evening and Sunday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall of the Philharmonic-Symphony under John Barbirolli's direction, the Saturday broadcast concert of the NBC Symphony Orchestra from Studio 8-H in Radio City, conducted by Artur Rodzinski, and the first of the special programs of the Federal Symphony Orchestra conducted by Willem Van Hoogstraten at the Federal Music Theater yesterday at 1:30, completed the bill.

Stravinsky's Divertimento from his allegorical ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" was given its first New York performance by the Boston Symphony but it is not of sufficient importance to merit more than passing notice. The attractive side of it was the composer's orchestration and the orchestra's performance. For the most part it was vapid music. Debussy's "La Mer," which had been heard in Brooklyn the previous evening, was given another luminous performance. Part of the fascination of this work is the interplay of realistic and unrealistic impressions. One can almost feel the spray and see the wind move across the surface of the waters, yet at the same time be conscious of far deeper meanings than these surface attractions. Brahms' Second Symphony rounded out the program in a stirring performance, up to tempo as the one in Brooklyn a month ago was not, and full of the romantic warmth of the music. The audience was moved to ecstatic applause.

CINCINNATI, O.
POST

APR 4 - 1938

HARVARD GLEE CLUB IN CITY WEDNESDAY

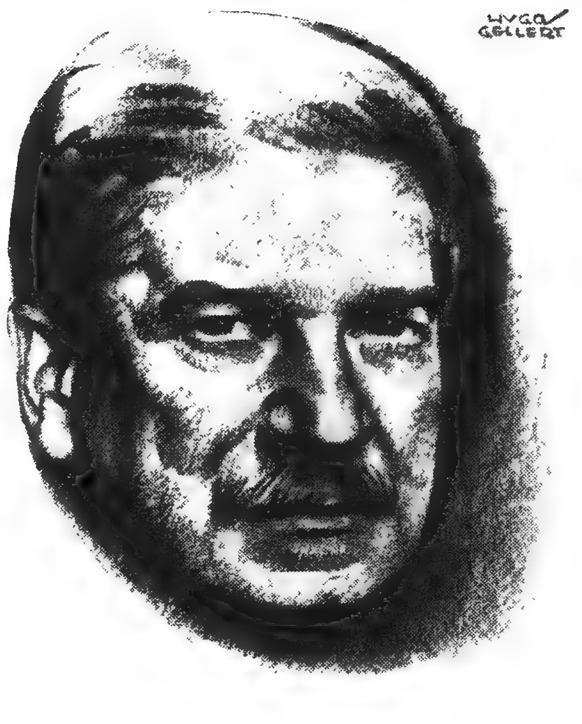
Will Sing Only Classics and New Concert Compositions

Only selections from the old classics and new concert compositions will be sung by the Harvard Glee Club when it appears at Emery Auditorium Wednesday evening. The club's personnel of 60 men will be led by Dr. Archibald T. Davison, professor of choral music.

Dr. Davison was presented the Academic Palm in France in 1921 when he toured Europe with the Harvard Glee Club of that year. The present club has sung many times with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussecitsky. Among its best known renditions are Stravinsky's "Oedipus Rex" and Brahms' "German Requiem." Seats for the concert are on sale at the Baldwin Piano Co., 142 W. Fourth street.

PROFILES

MUSIC'S FAITHFUL SERVANT



Artur Schnabel

ON the afternoon of Christmas Day, 1922, a few hundred perennial concertgoers, who by no means filled Carnegie Hall, sat listlessly through two long hours of straight Beethoven. At the concert grand on the platform, Artur Schnabel went about interpreting the transcendental message of Beethoven's last works, playing with a serious determination notably at variance with the somnolent mood of his holiday listeners. One lengthy sonata followed another, while most of the audience lingered in the hope of being rewarded at the end by some lighter fare; no virtuoso making his initial appeal to an American audience was expected to confine himself strictly to Beethoven. The stocky, efficient figure at the piano offered no fillips of any kind—no "Liebestraum" or "Träumerei," not even the "Butterfly Etude," to restore the light-hearted spirit of the day. Finally he struck his last note and bowed once or twice. That was all. There was no encore. Groggy, the audience walked out into the December dusk, and one newspaper critic returned to his office to report that the dignified, frowning Artur Schnabel looked more like a depressed banker than a pianist.

Such was the New York début of Germany's top-ranking pianist. Only a fanatical minority considered the event significant. Schnabel was unconcerned, but his managers, to whom his American tour represented a substantial investment, were in a mild panic. A piano-manufacturing firm, too, had hoped to profit from Schnabel's prestige. So his backers went to work on him. To begin with, they told him, his programs were all wrong: Americans weren't prepared to take their culture in unadulterated form. There had to be a sugar coating, they insisted, as they urged him to adhere to the tried-and-true program formula—one sonata (as a sop to the intellectuals), followed, on a progressively descending plane, by examples of Liszt's pyrotechnics and the iridescent titillations of the "impressionists." It was thus that the greatest pianists of the day were contributing to America's musical life, to say nothing of their own fortunes. But Schnabel wouldn't see the light. The audience, he said, didn't matter, and the same went for the critics. "My only employer," he declared, with a finality emphasized by his broken English, "is the art."

America had to take him as he was. He was led across the continent and back, scoring some rather surprising successes in places like Santa Barbara and Youngstown, and returned to this country the following year for another tour. It was marred, however, by a deplorable episode in Chicago when Schnabel found a key stuck while he was in the middle of a concerto. The conductor, Frederick Stock, working fast in the emergency, ordered stagehands to hoist a house piano through a trapdoor to the platform and Schnabel finished the concerto on the substitute instrument. When he came back to New York at the end of his tour, Schnabel found that his contract forbade his changing makes of pianos for seven years. A row ensued and he decided to return to Europe, swearing that he would not come back until that time was up. A conciliatory box of his favorite cigars was rushed to his stateroom. Schnabel smoked the cigars but stayed on the boat. He did remain in Europe, and at the end of five years, America had all but forgotten him.

IN 1930, Serge Koussevitzky, Russian conductor of the Boston Symphony, hit upon an impressive plan. The orchestra would be a half-century old that year. As a preliminary to a jubilee celebrating the event, Koussevitzky planned a Brahms festival, and Schnabel, an outstanding Brahms protagonist at the piano, was invited to play the composer's concertos. He accepted. The festival was a decided success, and the managers were inclined to have another fling with Schnabel. The piano difficulty was solved, for the time being, by bringing over Schnabel's own Bechstein from Berlin. The stage was set to try America a second time.

This time, oddly, New York's cognoscenti turned out in impressive numbers. It developed that since his first visit thousands had been converted to an appreciation of the rigid musical discipline required by Schnabel's programs. Assuredly the joke was on America, for so far as Schnabel was concerned, nothing had changed. He still offered only serious, long works, and no encores; he still made no concessions of any kind to the public taste. His success grew and soon his name was spoken reverently in some musical circles. The climax of this right-about-face came in 1935, when Schnabel played the thirty-two Beethoven sonatas in a series of seven two-hour concerts. Carnegie Hall was sold out on each of the seven nights, just as Queen's Hall in London had been the year before.

Perhaps nothing quite like it had ever occurred in New York. None of the ordinary ballyhoo had attended Schnabel's rise, which now seemed to threaten certain canons of the concert-giving business. Some went as far as to suggest that the depression had so chastened a frivolous society that it was now more ready to take comfort in the metaphysics of Beethoven, unrelieved by virtuosity.

That explanation probably overdramatized the situation. What Schnabel had needed for success here, and what he belatedly drew, was a small but earnest band of disciples to invade the vast outer fringes of the city's intelligentsia and recruit followers who like to consider themselves well informed in musical matters. Some of the disciples were youthful pupils inspired by contact with Schnabel, and ambitious persons with intellectual curiosity about music. Others, such as the late Mrs. R. D. Lanier and her Friends of Music, worked in groups to swell the ranks of Schnabel admirers.

THOSE who revere Schnabel sometimes speak in awed tones of his "gospel," but they have a hard time defining it. That is not odd, since, like the British Constitution, it is unwritten, yet it is as inflexible as the Ten Commandments. Essentially, they admire Schnabel's altruistic attitude toward his art: he seeks primarily to serve music

341

NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N. Y.
APR 2 - 1938

rather than to have it serve him. But he regards himself as more than a handmaiden—he is also music's champion and defender. Music, he feels, is in constant danger, not so much of sudden death because of faulty rendition or misinterpretations as of gradual extinction at the hands of mass production. He regards music as an exclusive art whose essential spirit is diluted by careless repetition.

So Schnabel turns his broad back on box-office blandishments and bends all his efforts to serve "my only employer," personified for him chiefly in Beethoven, Bach, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms. He cares about protecting only the relatively small amount of music which he regards as "better than it can be played." Most of the works he admires are lengthy, and he is opposed to all "arrangements" and "transcriptions," all curtailments and omissions (even of the repeats), all isolated little pieces, and virtuoso music in general. Schnabel resents any alteration, even in the smallest particular, of what he fervently regards as the word of God.

Characteristic of his attitude is his reaction to external conditions. He is inclined to be touchy on certain subjects, but not, he insists, because of any desire to spare himself. When he shivers in a drafty English hall he complains that "this is no climate for Mozart." If his piano chair squeaks or there are coughs in the audience, he mutters "Poor Schubert!" Once, when the orchestra had not had sufficient time to rehearse a concerto, he refused to play. "Mozart isn't here to protest," he explained, "so I have to do it for him." Some may snicker at this attitude and regard it as a conceit, but Schnabel means what he says, with childlike simplicity.

On the other hand, he has developed a set of glib answers to explain his iconoclastic behavior. Rather than offer a complicated analysis of his feeling, he says he plays no encores because "applause is a receipt for music played and not a bill for further performance." He does not resort to the annotated editions of the classics because "I am entitled to my own mistakes." He refuses to broadcast on the ground that "I can't be sure that the man who listens is properly dressed." He spurns press conferences and other means of obtaining publicity with the flip explanation that "the breakfast food I eat has no bearing on what I play." He carries his aversion to printed accounts of himself to the point of refusing to let his managers reprint favorable press notices.

For years Schnabel would not even make phonograph records, but he has had an important (and lucrative) change of heart. H.M.V. of London today can supply his recordings of almost the complete works of Beethoven. The wide circulation given these records is perhaps partially responsible for Schnabel's being tagged as a Beethoven player. He resents being called a specialist and says he didn't even discover how to play Beethoven until after the war. He thinks he could easily devote the remainder of his life to fathoming the works of that composer. Specialist or no, however, when Schnabel says he would undertake to write down Beethoven's thirty-two sonatas from memory, it probably is no idle boast.

D S C
Richard Decker

"It's for you."

FIFTY years ago, when Artur Schnabel was six, his ambitious mother took him from their middle-class family home in Bielitz, Austria, to Vienna to play for the great piano instructor, Leschetizky. A few years earlier, little Josef Hofmann had commenced earning prodigious amounts for his family. The elder Schnabels, finding the market in prodigies brisk, hoped that Artur, too, might make a fortune for them. True, their boy had had no lessons, but he had mocked his older sister by trilling off with ease the pieces she had laboriously practiced for weeks.

Although Artur impressed Leschetizky, he failed to make his parents rich, because by the time he was about ten and ready to be exhibited, he decided that the exploitation of prodigies was improper. He thought it would be better for him to remain in Vienna studying under Leschetizky and his wife, Annette Essipoff, who joyfully offered the Wunderkind free lessons. The decision was made easier for him by the fact that when he was only eight, Artur was regarded as so promising that three wealthy patrons of music, including a Rothschild, volunteered to provide his living expenses anonymously.

GLUYAS WILLIAMS

RACONTEURS

"Here's a new one I heard downtown today—F.D. and Eleanor were going shopping, and she said, 'Franklin . . .' "

• • •

Except for one semester, Schnabel never attended formal school, although he did for a while study Latin with a tutor, Dr. Siegfried Husserl, then a young medical student in Vienna and now a successful Newark physician. In Leschetizky's class, stretching two pudgy legs toward the distant pedals, Artur played anything that was put in front of him. He quickly learned most of the established piano music by heart, and his teacher, when in a caustic mood, used the lad to shame his elders by showing them what a mere child could do. The group about that time included Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Mark Hambourg, and Ignaz Friedman.

Through another of his Viennese teachers, Mandyczewski, who introduced him to the mysteries of counterpoint, young Schnabel met Brahms. He did not, as has been widely reported, ever sit on Brahms' lap, but he was adopted as a mascot by Brahms' friends. They liked the boy not only because of his musical ability but also because he was a skillful card player. Close association with the greatest living composer roused Schnabel to creative activity; at the age of fourteen he submitted three piano pieces in a prize competition organized by Leschetizky. A jury of composers awarded prizes to all three without suspecting that they were the work of the same young composer.

34 x

34 x

During this period, Schnabel gave his first recital, playing Brahms as well as Schubert and Weber, although both the latter were despised by musical authorities. By the time he was fifteen he was playing sonatas with Kreisler, hobnobbing with the literati of Vienna, and enjoying what is generally known as the bohemian life.

At sixteen, Schnabel moved on to the centre of things, Berlin. He arrived with a letter to Brahms' publisher, Simrock; his three prize-winning piano pieces; and the beginnings of a mustache. He soon was being booked by Hermann Wolff, the great German impresario. One of his first private engagements was at the palace of Princess Henckel-Donnersmarck, who rejected a Chopin program, saying, "Remember, my guests are accustomed to the best." The adolescent Schnabel was normally vain about his appearance and wore his hair slicked down with eau de quinine. The Princess deducted a hundred marks from his fee because she didn't like the smell of the perfume in his coiffure.

Schnabel has always had a prejudice against playing in private homes. People who accept invitations to musical salons simply to be polite, he says, should not be compelled to listen to his playing. On the few occasions when he has played at such affairs in recent years, he has presented the longest pieces in his repertoire, at twice his usual fee.

WHEN he was eighteen, Schnabel met Therese Behr, whose contralto was a musical highlight of the day. Contraltos usually are tall and Fräulein Behr was no exception, but Schnabel, who is about five feet four, was not disturbed by their difference in height. After accompanying her in recitals for five years, he married her. They continued to appear together and their joint recitals of Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms songs (usually in complete cycles) set a standard for song interpretation in which the pianist and the singer assumed equally important rôles. Although some critics were unkind enough to suggest that the performance was a piano recital with voice obbligato, Schnabel and his wife enjoyed a successful twenty-five years in concert halls throughout Germany and Scandinavia.

For more than a quarter of a century the Schnabels lived and taught music in a vast apartment in Berlin. By 1914 his reputation was so impressive that when war was declared, the government preferred to have him remain at his piano rather than take up arms. After the armistice, the young German Republic made him an honorary professor, a title Schnabel now dislikes because he fancies it leads critics to regard him as academic. During the years of the German inflation, Schnabel, like Busoni and Schönberg, taught master classes in the government Hochschule für Musik. "A sour apple is better than no apple," he sighed when his friends found him working there.

Schnabel became conscious of his Jewish ancestry shortly after Hitler took over in 1933. He had been engaged to play the piano music in the official Brahms Centenary Festival in Berlin. A few weeks before the event, the organizer, a former pupil of Schnabel's, called on the telephone to stammer something about the arrangements having been altered. Schnabel, who is an Austrian citizen, interrupted the man to say, "I may not be pure-blooded, but I want you to know that I am cold-blooded." Then he hung up. "Kaltblütig" was the word Schnabel used, and it also means "indifferent." A few months after the incident, Schnabel moved his household out of Germany and down to the shores of Lake Como. There, when not travelling, he has lived ever since. About a year ago, at the Vienna Brahms Festival, Schnabel met Wilhelm Furtwängler, the conductor, who had become virtual musical dictator of Germany. Furtwängler begged the pianist to accept an engagement with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, promising to get Hitler's consent. Schnabel said he would return only when every Jewish artist and professor had been allowed to reënter Germany.

FIGHT
KID HALLIGAN
KID

DIVIDING his time between Italy, England, and this country, Schnabel lives a leisurely existence. He never practices, in the sense of drilling himself in scales and arpeggios, and has not done so since he was a child. Technique, he holds, should grow out of the music; music should not be expected to emanate from technique. He keeps his repertoire fresh and his fingers nimble by working over the compositions he reveres and by teaching a score of pupils at his Italian villa each summer. He does his memorizing from music on trains or boats or in hotels—anywhere he happens to be.

"I can see the ruddy old girl now, pacing up and down in her flat heels and smelling like saddle soap."

• •

He wakes between eight and nine, reads the local papers of whatever town he is in, and dresses slowly and with considerable care. He is conservative in his attire and even today wears a black vest with white tie in the evening—a style considered fashionable some years before the war. Friends and former pupils are welcome to visit him during the morning. The discussion generally runs to music, with Schnabel, in some stage of undress, wandering to the keyboard of the piano from time to time to try over a phrase or to illustrate a point. After lunch he frequently goes for a walk, carrying with him a carefully rolled-up umbrella. If he has a concert in the evening, he goes without dinner until it is over. Then he retires to the home of some close friend for a hot meal, many cigars, and a lengthy chat upon a great variety of subjects.

Notwithstanding his negligible amount of formal schooling, Schnabel can talk with ease in three languages upon anything, from the contemporary scene to such subjects as medieval painting or the philosophy of Kierkegaard. He is addicted to punning and to humorous translations of proper names and is proud of his facility along such lines. Although his greatest musical success thus far has been in Germany and England, he is fond of America, because he regards it as the only country in which cultural expansion remains possible. His sons, Karl Ulrich, a pianist, and Stefan, an actor, have taken out citizenship papers.

During his vacations in the last fifteen years, Schnabel has composed a quantity of serious music, including four string quartets, a piano sonata, one dance suite for piano, and a violin-solo sonata which requires an hour to play. Most of them have been publicly presented in Europe and several of them have met moderate success, tempered by loud protests against their radical modernism.

Schnabel has never played his compositions before an audience. He feels that, like children coming of age, they ought to make their own way in the world. But there is another reason, the same which prompts his refusal to play the works of any but a select group of composers: he'd have to practice the music. Schnabel will practice Beethoven, but he won't practice Schnabel.

—CÉSAR SAERCHINGER

•

THE DAEMON

Must I tell again
In the words I know
For the ears of men
The flesh, the blow?

Must I show outright
The bruise in the side,
The halt in the night,
And how death cried?

Must I speak to the lot
Who little bore?
It said "Why not?"
It said "Once more."

—LOUISE BOGAN

34x

THE THEATRE

THREE FOR ME

ETHEL BARRYMORE makes her second entry of the season in "Whiteoaks," this time with more of a personal bang than she did in "The Ghost of Yankee Doodle." As the 101-year-old matriarch of Mazo de la Roche's story, she is "Whiteoaks." It seems like the old days to see a star carrying both tradition and a play on her shoulders and absolutely loving it.

Although I never have read the so-called "Jalna books" of Miss de la Roche, I gather that there was a certain familiar pattern around which they were built which would not bowl me over if I were to pick up one of them now. The large family of brothers, sisters, and grandchildren, all waiting for an old lady to die and the old lady refusing not only to die but to relinquish the whip of a biting tongue and a keen mind, has, as a situation, a comfortable familiarity which might easily induce indifference. And a scene after the old lady's death, in which it is disclosed before the assembled relatives that she has left all her money to the unstablest of her grandsons, comes with so little excitement at this late date that we wonder how anyone had the industry to set it all down again on paper.

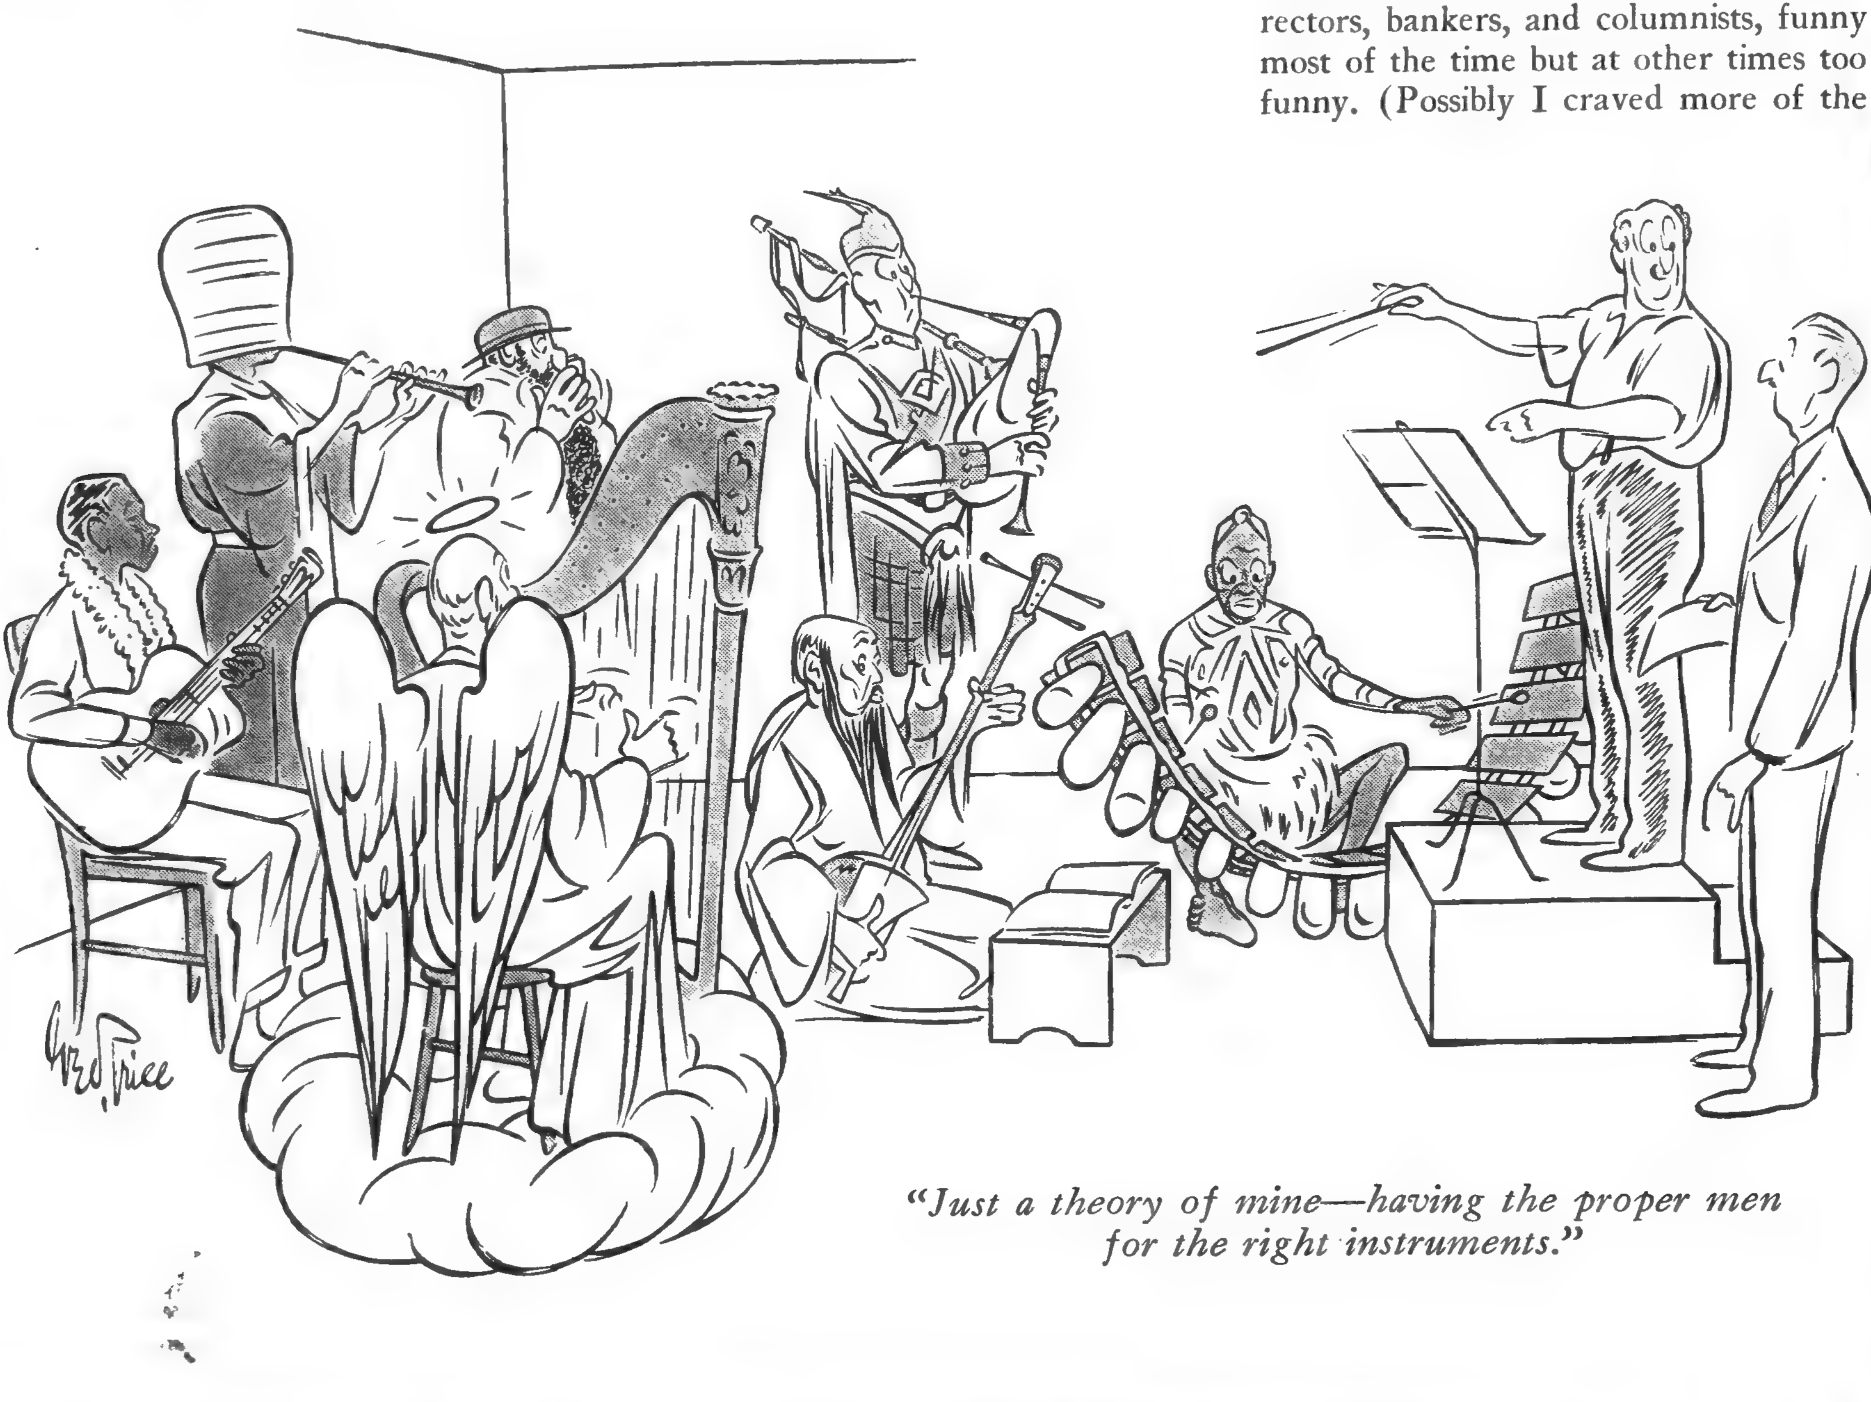
However, Miss Barrymore hobbles her way through this well-trodden territory with so much humor and distinction, in spite of all the old-age routines she has taken over from her brother Lionel, that one is conscious of a real fire and a fine spirit dominating the action and is glad to be in at so splendid a finish as hers at the backgammon board.

The rest of the family are the usual group of character studies, some interesting and some not. Stephen Haggard from the London company, remembered here for his playing of Chatterton in "Come of Age" in 1934, is the young grandson who wins the Matriarch Sweepstakes, and gives a vivid if slightly hysterical performance in dramatic contrast to the horsy solidarity of the rest of the tribe, among whom Robert Shayne, as Renny the red-head, is outstanding.

For "Jalna" fans, "Whiteoaks" has probably sufficient recognition value to recommend it. For the rest of us, Miss Barrymore more than suffices.

BEING unhappily familiar with the more subtle inflections of Hollywood diplomatic language and a push-over for any sort of Jewish comedy at all, I may have had a specialized good time at "Schoolhouse on the Lot." At any rate, it was a good time.

The Messrs. Fields and Chodorov have written another in the series of sockeroos at picture business which, while not so deep as "Once in a Lifetime" or so wide as "Boy Meets Girl," nevertheless packs a lot of really comical cracks in its broad bosom and makes use of several convincing performers. This time it is the child star who takes it, and takes it good. The main trouble with "Schoolhouse on the Lot" seems to be that it doesn't stick quite close enough to its theme, which is that little emergency shack on each lot where the child actors assemble at certain hours of the day to go through the motions of complying with the state educational laws, a formality comparable to that of the old sandwich which used to be served with drinks in the historic Raines Law hotels. When "Schoolhouse on the Lot" deviates from its cultural purposes, it becomes just another free-for-all, mixing it up with executives, directors, bankers, and columnists, funny most of the time but at other times too funny. (Possibly I craved more of the



"Just a theory of mine—having the proper men for the right instruments."

230

NEW YORK, N. Y.
WORLD - TELEGRAM
APR 4 - 1938

Boston Symphony Closes Its Series With Concert at Carnegie

Splendid Program Brings Ovation from Audience

By PITTS SANBORN.

Completing the season's Carnegie Hall series on Saturday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, devoted its concert to the consecration of sound. Tonally the playing of the orchestra was of an unsurpassable beauty.

The program began with excerpts from the ballet "Le Baiser de la Fee" that Stravinsky dedicated to "the Muse of Tschaikowsky." Whatever one may think of the thematic material of this work, there is no denying the precision and mastery of Stravinsky's orchestration, which was presented to perfection by Mr. Koussevitzky and his men.

There followed a performance of Debussy's "La Mer" which convinced one that sea water, whatever ocean's mood, could only be of a crystalline purity. The Second Symphony of Brahms concluded the program, set forth with some peculiarities of accent, contrast, and pace, but with unvarying instrumental splendor.

At the end the great audience gave the performers a deserved ovation.

Prov Jour. 4/6/38

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Gives Last Concert of the Season

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra said farewell for the season, in Metropolitan Theatre last night. The audience was not as large as for some of the four other concerts, but it was demonstrative gathering, and loath to let Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his men depart.

The program was decidedly interesting. The first symphony by Beethoven and the first by Brahms were performed and two nocturnes by Debussy. There is not much question whose first symphony is the finer; Beethoven had Haydn and Mozart to lean on — and he did—while Brahms had them and Beethoven also—both an advantage and a handicap.

The Beethoven First, heard about as seldom as the Ninth, is a sprightly and tuneful work that almost anybody would enjoy. It carries its hundred-and-some years easily, and the rhythmic gaiety and melodic charm are as attractive as though they had been conceived but yesterday, though at the last count, there was nobody yesterday who could have conceived them. The antics of the almost boisterous finale were delightfully exploited by Dr. Koussevitzky. Genuine, unabashed heat, as the swing musicians say.

There could hardly be a stranger contrast than the Debussy "Nuages," which came next. The symphony was quite of this world; the nocturne was not. In imagery and utterance it proclaimed a different phase of the tonal art. Beethoven had set the pulses going; Debussy lulled and mystified. The curious fragments of melodies in English horn and viola, the haunting voices of the strings, the sense of lights and shadows were magical. The orchestra was brilliantly obediant to the will of its conductor.

"Fetes," in its own way, was quite as beautiful. The lively accents and the pleasant orchestral chatter kept one interested, and the procession, approaching in 'cellos, harps and trumpets, sweeping by and disappearing, was superb.

After the customary smoke-screen had been laid down by the audience the orchestra attacked the first symphony of Brahms. Here was a reading both poetic and muscular. In large outline and in detail it was, this department thought, one of the best performances of the season. The unhurried certainty of the composer, the serene contemplation that leans to austerity, were here displayed with profound effect. Perhaps one felt that sometimes Brahms approached, or announced, his ideas ponderously, but they are always solid ideas and worth contending with.

Brass and woodwinds were especially brilliant in the last movement which rose by slow waves to a climax such as only the Boston Symphony can produce. Dr. Koussevitzky and the men were applauded again and again after this masterful performance.

The program:

Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21 .... Beethoven
1. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Andante contabile con moto
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace; trio
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace
Two Nocturnes .... Debussy
Nuages
Fetes
Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 .... Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio

Richard Burgin, concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will give a recital with Elizabeth Siedhoff, pianist, in Plantations auditorium on Friday night.

Mr. Burgin was born in Warsaw in 1892. He took his first lessons on the violin when he was five, and at eight he became a pupil of Isidore Lotto. He went to Berlin with his father in 1902. There he played for Joachim, and impressed the great violinist so favorably that a scholarship from the Mendelssohn Fund was made available. Burgin studied two years in Berlin under the supervision of Joachim.

He came to this country at 13, and played in Carnegie hall. Then he went to Petrograd to study with Leopold Auer. After several seasons on the continent he returned here as concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1920.

Miss Siedhoff, a pupil of Tobias Matthay, has given concerts and lecture recitals here and abroad.

B. Trans. Apr. 6/38

News of Music

The matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week will occur on Thursday instead of the following day, which will be Good Friday. For this occasion and Saturday evening the program will consist of Florent Schmitt's setting of the Forty-Seventh Psalm, Thomas de Hartmann's 'Cello Concerto and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini." In the performance of the Schmitt work the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky will be assisted by the chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, and Beal Hober, soprano. Paul Tortelier, member of the orchestra, will be the soloist in the Concerto which was dedicated to him and will receive its first performances at these concerts.

The series of supplementary matinee and evening concerts of the Boston Orchestra will be brought to a close on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, April 18 and 19, when the program will include Beethoven's First Symphony, "Nuages" and "Fetes" by Debussy, and the Brahms Second Symphony.

The Composers' Forum-Laboratory will present at its next meeting, in the Lecture Hall of the Public Library on Friday evening of this week, compositions by students from the New England Conservatory, Tufts College and Boston University. The writers in question are Arnold Chaitman, Michael Denesuk, William Alden Johnson, Edith Stearns and Ethelwyn Wardle.

The Wheaton College Dance Group will present a program of modern dance and studies in technique in the auditorium of the Y. W. C. A. next Saturday afternoon. The program will consist of numbers, for small and large groups, to music of Debussy, Palmgren, Coleridge-Taylor, Roussel and Bartok, as well as an arrangement. The successive titles will be "Duo," "May Night," "Ritual," "Studies in Technique, Arranged in Dance Form," "Revival," "Prelude," "Song for the Dead," "Song for the Living" and "College Scenes: Two Satires on the Wheaton Scene" ("The Mail Hour Rush" and "Prom"). The choreography is by Virginia H. Gallagher, director of the Group, and by members of the Group itself.

Bostonians Afield

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played the last of its five groups of concerts in New York and Brooklyn last week-end to the now customary acclaim—in fact, perhaps a little more than usual. The program of the Thursday night concert contained Haydn's Symphony in G major (No. 88), Brahms' First Symphony and Prokofiev's Second "Romeo and Juliet" Suite. The latter piece fared little better than in Boston at the hands of the New York reviewers, who, however, found much to write in praise of the several orchestral performances.

The final program, on Saturday afternoon, included Stravinskys' "Baiser de la fee," Debussy's "La mer" and Brahms's Second Symphony. The performance of "La mer' in particular excited the gentlemen of the press. Irving Kolodin wrote in the Sun that "the superb sonority of the performance, its ceaseless life and movement were satisfying beyond cavil." And Olin Downes of the Times made this extraordinary comment:

"There are certain scores in which Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are unequalled. One of these is Debussy's 'La mer' . . . Nothing could have been more perfect and finished in detail than this performance, but its magic lay in the merging of each palette and in the freedom and imaginative sweep of the entire conception. . . .

"Of this astonishing performance one cannot speak dispassionately. It is a supreme achievement, not short of a miracle of conception and execution. Among the greatest artistic experiences of which the present generation can boast in years to come will be the right to say, 'I heard Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony play "La mer."'"

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
APR 2 - 1938

Music

Men's Glee Clubs to Sing in Fall River Tomorrow. Boston Symphony Here Tuesday.—Recitals by Miss Siedhoff and Richard Burgin, Elsie Lovell Hankins

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the last concert of its season here in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night. The week will bring several recitals also.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky has chosen two symphonies, for the program, the first of Beethoven and the first of Brahms. The noctures "Fetes" and "Nuages" are the other items.

A free lecture on the program will be given by John Archer in the Providence Public Library tomorrow afternoon at 4 o'clock, under the auspices of the Monday Morning Musical Club.

The program in detail:

Beethoven .... Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 31
I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio
II. Andante cantabile con moto
III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace; Trio
IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace
Debussy .... Two Nocturnes
Nuages
Fetes
Brahms. Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
1. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro
II. Andante sostenuto
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso
IV. Adagio: Allegro non troppo, ma con brio ....

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
APR 6 - 1938

Providence Has Concert

Boston Orch. Gives Final Program There, Koussevitsky Conducting

Special to the Herald Tribune

PROVIDENCE, April 5.—Society tonight attended the last Boston Orchestra concert here this season. Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, held ~~an informal~~ reception on the Metropolitan Theater stage later.

At the Handicraft Club this afternoon, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, the president, introduced Augustus L. Newman, who gave a demonstration of metalcraft. Mrs. C. Frederick Frost had charge of tea. A private view at the Providence Art Club today opened the third ~~annual~~ advertising and printing arts exhibition. Mrs. E. Tudor Gross served tea.

Mrs. Halsey De Wolf returned to New York tonight after three months abroad. Dr. De Wolf met her.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Powell will return tomorrow from a West Indies cruise.

Mr. Felix F. Friedheim jr., of Berlin, a student at Harvard Law School, is here with his aunt, Mrs. Frank L. Hinckley. Sharp Dana, son of Mr. and Mrs. Albro M. Dana, returns to St. Mark's School tomorrow.

Miss Beatrice Herford will be the guest tomorrow night of the Rhode Island Branch, English-Speaking Union and she will [illegible] of her monologues.

LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
APR 4 - 1938

AUDIENCE THRILLED AT OPERA 'CARMEN'

Instead of the audience of several hundred listeners that gathered in Turn hall last evening to hear the concert performance of Bizet's "Carmen," there should have been several thousand in attendance.

The reasons for that statement lie in the various qualities of the presentation as well as in the fact that as far as memory serves it marked the first time the colorful operatic masterpiece has been given locally. To this might be added that not since the last appearance here of the Boston Symphony orchestra several years ago have local music fans been privileged to hear a first class instrumental ensemble such as participated in last evening's event.

ROCHESTER, N. Y.
Democrat - Chronicle
APR 4 - 1938

Cincinnati Renews Goossens Contract

Eugene Goossens, who vacated leadership of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in 1930 to become conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, yesterday had renewed his contract at the Ohio city.

Goossens, who married a Rochesterian, the former Miss Janet Lewis, daughter of Mrs. Leon D. Lewis, 195 Rutgers St., in January, 1930, will not conduct the entire season, however. He will spend the first seven weeks of the sason as gust conductor of the Boston Symphony.

The first three concerts of Cincinnati's next season will be conducted by Jose Iturbi, who succeeded Goossens as Rochester conductor. When the announcement was made Friday at Cincinnati the fiery Iturbi, then en route to New York from Louisville, Ky., dropped in for two hours—just long enough to say "Hello . . . 'til the 1938-39 season."

NEW YORK, N. Y.
HERALD - TRIBUNE
APR 6 - 1938

Hadley Memorial Concert

Philharmonic, at Carnegie Hall Tonight, Play Late Composer's Works

The Henry Hadley Foundation, Inc., recently organized in memory of the noted American composer and conductor who died last September, will give a memorial concert of Hadley's music tonight in Carnegie Hall, where the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will be heard under the direction of John Barbirolli, Fritz Reiner and Philip James. The soloists will be Marjorie Lawrence, Metropolitan Opera soprano, in the aria "Halcyone," and Eunice Howard, pianist, in Hadley's concertino. The proceeds are to form the nucleus of a fund to establish scholarships in Dr. Hadley's name for American musicians.

Among members of the musicians' sponsors' committee are Serge Koussevitzky, Frederick A. Stock, Artur Bodanzky, Lucrezia Bori, Edward Johnson, Walter Damrosch, Giovanni Martinelli, Lily Pons, Elisabeth Rethberg, Frances Alda, Leopold Godowsky, Mischa Elman, John McCormack, Cecelia Loftus, Charles Wakefield Cadman, Georges Barrere, Sigmund Spaeth, Edwin Franko Goldman, A. Walter Kramer, Dr. T. Tertius Noble, William Lyon Phelps, Frank La Forge, Leon Barzin and Mrs. Ethelbert Nevin.

231

l Musicians --- News of

Complete 'Matthew Passion'

Bach's Masterpiece in Bostonian Performance as Recorded by Victor Company

B. Trans Apr. 5/38

By MOSES SMITH

The complete recording of Bach's "Matthew Passion," played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and associated forces under Serge Koussevitzky and issued serially in three album sets (M-411, 412 and 413) by Victor, is now available. It is indeed Boston's remarkable book, as a contemporary called it. No less than fifty-three record sides are used up in the vast undertaking; that is—with a single blank side — twenty-seven records. For sheer physical magnitude combined with artistic importance the recording stands unrivalled in the field of phonography.

Some of the difficulties encountered in making this recording have already been suggested in this space. For the most part they had their origin in the fact that the recording was made direct from an actual performance of the "Passion" in Symphony Hall on Good Friday afternoon and evening, March 26, a little more than a year ago. The usual studio procedure, allowing for "retakes," careful planning of the breaks and so forth, was not available. The recording balance had to be found as the performance proceeded.

Inevitably therefore the present set has obvious and glaring imperfections, Some of the recording is exceptionally clear, as has been true of most of the music recorded in Symphony Hall in recent seasons. Some of it is poor, according to our present high standards. The chorus, consisting of the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society (G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor) suffers most in this regard, though part of the difficulty is inherent in its own method of singing.

There are some very awkward breaks as when a side ends abruptly on the leading-tone as a da capo aria slides from major into the relative minor. The text which the same chorus seems to enunciate so distinctly in concert is frequently a jumble here. Nor are the soloists impeccable. Furthermore the printed text accompanying the set—itself a melange — does not always agree with the words issuing from the singers. One cannot help wishing that the original German text had been employed in the performance and both German text and English translation issued with the set of records.

The performance, too, is uneven. The Boston Symphony Orchestra plays magnificiently. The choral singing has its faults, as already indicated, though one is grateful for its thoroughgoing precision and frequent expressiveness. Only one of the vocal soloists, Keith Faulkner, was entirely satisfactory; and his voice and singing are indeed a joy to hear. Jeannette Vreeland's soprano voice is a little too white and piercing for this music. Kathryn Meisle's alto is warmer; and her singing would have been more enjoyable if it were not so constantly full of "expression." John Priebe struggles manfully with the tenor recitatives, but unfortunately a hero is required. Fritz Lechner's briefer moments are also, in general, too heavily stressed.

On the other hand there is some remarkably beautiful playing from some of the instrumental soloists, particularly the violin solo of Richard Burgin in one of the airs. All of the instrumentalists, of course, came from the Symphony Orchestra with the exception of Dr. V. Ernst Wolff, harpsichordist, and Carl Weinrich, organist, who seem to have done their work well.

But almost any performance of the difficult "Matthew Passion" may be a catalogue of errors. As offset in the present case there is the magnificent vitality of the orchestra and much of the singing under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction. Above all there is the music itself, some of which not even Johann Sebastian himself ever surpassed. For a publication in "book" form of a masterpiece of the ages one can express only admiration and gratitude.

The accompanying leaflet has an interesting article summarizing the Passion form, with special reference to the "Matthew," by Dr. A. T. Davison, and a briefer note on the recording itself by G. H. L. Smith.

Pets Diversion for Artist

B. Am. April 1938

is Here Fit After nt in Florida

MARSTERS

les "that big" were the subject e Koussevitzky, returned after onduct this afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

Perhaps it was the spring day,—perhaps it was the thought that another New York season was completed (last weekend) with undiluted success,—perhaps it was just that the rehearsal had gone so well.

At any rate a strenuous romp through the Sibelius first Symphony, a swift and cursory glance at the Beethoven first, found Dr. Koussevitzky mopping his brow in that delicate and familiar gesture, drinking a glas of water from a thermos that the Madame had at hand and refusing to be serious.

During his month's absence from Boston the conductor has found time to wind up the orchestra's out of town engagements (except for a single concert in Worcester) and to vacation for two weeks at Winter Park, Florida.

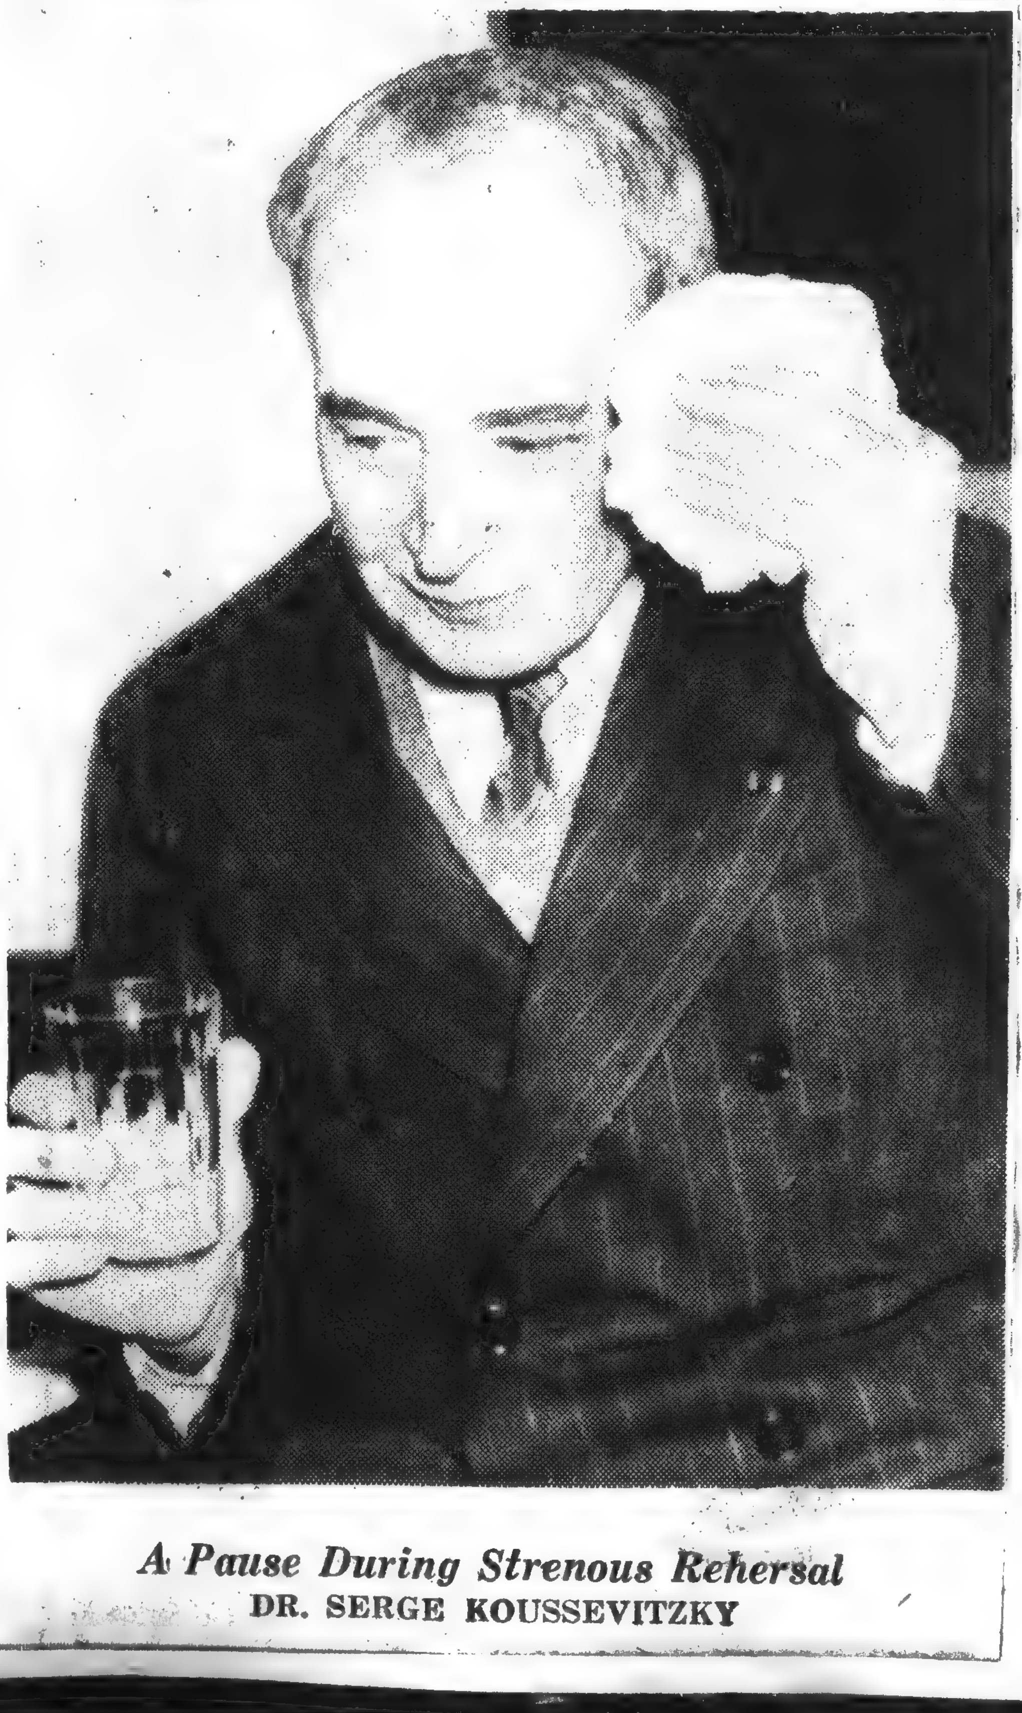
According to his own report he has done nothing but enjoy the sun and feed Billy the Alligator. The latter ate out of his hand. (It is assumed the turtles did not, nothing having been said about it.)

Dr. Koussevitzky includes both turtles and crocodiles in his enthusiastic approval however. "They are such nice people" was his way of putting it.

Dr. Koussevitzky's audiences this week end will find him looking tremendously fit.

By RUTH MARSTERS

Billy the Crocodile and turtles "that big" were the subject of an interview with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, returned after an absence of four weeks to conduct this afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.



A Pause During Strenous Rehersal
DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Steering a Straight Course

WALTER PISTON
Who will conduct the first performances of his new Symphony at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening.

B. Trans. Apr. 7/38

Walter Piston's New Symphony

Foreword to Novel Work On Symphony Program Of This Week-End

By Moses Smith

The program to be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening has an obvious symmetry in consisting of three first symphonies. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will begin and end the concerts with the symphonic first-born of a pair of musical giants, Beethoven and Sibelius. In between, modest Walter Piston will direct the presentation of his own First Symphony, completed at his house in Belmont in October of last year.

To Professor Piston I am indebted for informative notes (musical as well as verbal) about the new work. The Symphony, which has no literary program, is written for an orchestra of moderate size, containing wood winds in threes, four French horns, three trumpets, three trombones, tuba, timpani and strings. The heavy brass is silent in the second of the three movements.

The first movement is an allegro in sonata-form in C, with a slow introduction ("andantino quasi adagio"). The main or "germinating" theme (as Professor Piston describes it) of the Symphony is sounded at the very beginning by the plucked strings of the 'cellos and double-basses—a somewhat irregular as well as mysterious affair. It is joined very soon by the second theme of the Introduction, a melody which, played by the bassoon and then violas, is suaver. It later becomes in transformation the second theme of the last movement. Finally there is a variant of the main theme, played by oboe and then strings.

The main theme of the first movement proper appears in the strings. Its relation to the germ-theme is apparent, but it is much brusquer, especially since the tempo is now fast. After this theme has been developed there is a second in E, lighter and almost dance-like in character. After further development, mainly of the first theme, there is the usual recapitulation in the main key, C, with the second theme for close and with no coda.

The second movement is an adagio in F-sharp. An expressive melody is sung by the English horn. There is a middle section in five-eight meter, the flute giving out a theme quietly over an accompaniment of violas, with a counter-melody for the oboe. The last part of the movement deals with the same subject-matter as the first, but the contrapuntal writing is here much more elaborate.

"Allegro con fuoco" is the indication for the last movement, which has two themes and a rondo-like form. The first theme appears originally in the violins in C, and is strongly rhythmed without being of homogeneous metrical pattern. The second theme in G follows in the 'cellos, much broader than in its original form (in the introduction), of which it is a doubly augmented version. The first theme is then developed and varied (in F-sharp), again developed (in C-sharp) and varied (in C). The two themes are combined in counterpoint, strings and wood wind taking their subject matter from the first theme, brass from the second. The brass sounds the original motive alone. And there is a coda in C.

"Symphony" is the only title the composer gives the piece. The fact that he does not specify a key, although he does not hesitate to indicate the keys of the several sections, may or may not be significant. If it will make the listener more comfortable Professor Piston will probably have no objection to its being called "Symphony in C."

Audience Welcomes Dr. Koussevitzky
Large and Enthusiastic

B. Trav. April 9/38

apr 9

OSTON POST, SATU

CONDUCTOR BACK WITH SYMPHONY

Three First Works, Beethoven, Piston and Sibelius

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After an absence of three weeks and two intervening pairs of concerts, led by the composer-conductors, Enesco and Prokofieff, it was a pleasure yesterday afternoon to welcome again Dr. Koussevitzky and to hear a programme not overburdened with the music of one man. There were three composers on Dr. Koussevitzky's list, Beethoven, Walter Piston and Sibelius, each represented, unusually enough, by his first symphony.

MR. PISTON'S WORK

Someone has said that the first operas, like the first kittens, should be destroyed. If this practice had been followed the world would have lost some fine music. It would have been even more out of luck if the first symphonies had been the victims. All of those written by composers, even afterwards important composers, under 20 could be spared together with that of the 8-year-old Mozart, but not the first symphonies of Beethoven, Schumann, Franck, Brahms, Mahler, D'Indy and Sibelius. As for Mr. Piston's Symphony, conducted yesterday by its composer and heard for the first time, we must wait and see. Clearly it is a work not without merit. As clearly it has its defects.

Mr. Piston follows here the later practice of confining himself to three movements. The first, with an introduction containing the thematic germs of the whole—another modern device—is the most engrossing; the third, the most stimulating. If the Adagio might be shortened the energetic Finale might be as profitably be lengthened. Mr. Piston stops too soon and his piece seems badly balanced.

Hard Yet Logical

In the matter of style Mr. Piston has yet to find an immediately recognizable idiom of his own, though he has achieved his personal synthesis of existing idioms; which is all we have a right to expect. A new voice for him in this work, however, is that of Sibelius here and there discernible, if but faintly. In the slow division, almost invariably the weakest part of a contemporary symphony, Mr. Piston occasionally remembers the French impressionists. Otherwise, we feel the influences so prevalent today, those of Stravinsky and Hindemith.

The music in the main is hard. It is also, again excepting the slow movement, logical. Mr. Piston's command of the orchestra, both as composer and conductor, is absolute. He and his music were cordially if not exactly enthusiastically received.

Beethoven's First

Some first symphonies, again to generalize, are wholly of their composers, as for example, those of Schumann and Franck. The first symphony of Beethoven, though not without Beethovenish touches, leans heavily on Haydn and Mozart. There is even less harmonic freedom and fancy than we find in the ripest symphonies of the last-named masters. But there is a youthful freshness and an already mature control, which make the symphony thoroughly enjoyable today, particularly in a performance such as that of yesterday.

Once more Dr. Koussevitzky wisely reduced the number of his strings, thus bringing into prominence the wind instruments, for which Beethoven wrote with a boldness that once invited criticism.

Early Sibelius

In his Symphony in E minor, on the other hand, Sibelius is immediately and almost continuously himself. There is much talk of the influence of Tchaikovsky, but it is not so easy to put one's finger upon the measures in which it occurs. And we have here a new note in music, a somewhat rude, challenging, northern voice which cut across the music of its day like a breath of icy wind. To hear it yesterday after the exceedingly intellectual music of Mr. Piston was like stepping from the lamplit study into the cool open air and the noonday sun. Less firmly welded than certain of its successors this symphony has a strength and vigor shared only by the Second.

With Sibelius, as with Beethoven, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra were surpassingly eloquent; and the two symphonies inhabit defferent worlds.

Saturday, April 9, 1938

Personals—Social

Women's Clubs

May School, Baldwinville, Will Benefit by First Pops

Part of Proceeds from Opening Concert on May 4 Will Aid Scholarship Fund, Cottage Hospitals

Music in the Spring! The two seem to be almost as synonymous as ice cream and cake or champagne and caviar. And though at present our hopes of warm spring weather have been dashed once more by cold winds and snow flakes, the time will come—for the spring, and with it, music.

In Boston the advent of spring brings much with it—crocus on the lawns along Beacon street and Commonwealth avenue; tender young grass shoots and newly raked beds in the Public Garden, together with the refurbishing of the Swan Boats, children roller skating on the Esplanade and—the Pops.

These concerts have become a tradition, with their air of informality, the tables where music lovers may take their ease, sipping the foamy beer or light wines which make the hearing of music so much more pleasant and the added fun of "request programs" listing all the old favorites.

This year will be no exception, and besides the six weeks or more of regular concerts, there are to be a number of benefit nights, when colleges, schools or charitable organizations reserve all or part of Symphony Hall. These dates are usually taken a year ahead, so popular are the Pops. Arthur Fiedler will again conduct the orchestra, many members of which are "regulars" in the Boston Symphony.

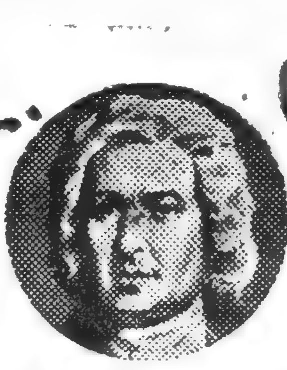
The opening night this season comes on Wednesday, May 4, and two organizations are selling tickets for it, the proceeds to be divided between them. The May School has taken half of the front part of the floor, to benefit their Scholarship Fund, while the Baldwinville Cottage Hospital for Children will be aided by the result of the ticket sale of the other half.

Mrs. Charles H. Haskins of Cambridge, head of the May School, leads the group of patronesses of the affair, the others of whom, all alumnae of the school are Mrs. Walter I. Badger, Mrs. Talbot C. Chase, Mrs. James Bryant Conant, wife of the president of Harvard; Mrs. Parker Converse, Mrs. Henry Parsons King, Jr., and Mrs. Bertram K. Little.

Tickets may be had at the school, through the patronesses, committee members, alumnae, or from Miss Elizabeth Lowell Ware of 49 Brimmer street, who is in charge of the ticket sale.

Mrs. W. Russell MacAusland heads the Boston Committee for Baldwinville, which remains the same as last year, and Mrs. Thomas Allen, Jr., is in charge of the tickets for their half of the benefit.

B. Her. April 10/38



Bach's

THE PASSION OF OUR LORD ACCORDING TO ST. MATTHEW

BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Assisted by the Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society

The Easter Month brings one of the most monumental recordings ever achieved by Victor ... Bach's "The Passion of Our Lord According to St. Matthew", complete in 3 volumes. Performed by an array of talent that may never again be duplicated: brilliant soloists, one of the great orchestras of the world under Dr. Koussevitzky, two magnificent choruses, and all the authentic instruments required by Bach ... captured by Victor with superlative fidelity! Hear it at your dealer's.

Volume 1—Album M-411 (AM-411 for Automatic Operation)	$20.00
Volume 2—Album M-412 (AM-412 for Automatic Operation)	$15.00
Volume 3—Album M-413 (AM-413 for Automatic Operation)	$18.00

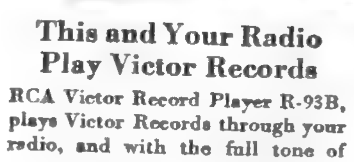
Join the VICTOR RECORD SOCIETY and get this RCA VICTOR RECORD PLAYER List Price $14.95, without cost. Your dealer has details.

Another new release of exceptional and timely interest

PARSIFAL—Prelude and Good Friday Spell (Wagner). The Philadelphia Orchestra, Leopold Stokowski, Conductor. Album M-421 . $8.00

(AM-421 for Automatic Operation)

Listen to: The NBC Symphony Orchestra every Saturday night at 10:00 E.S.T., over the NBC Red Network . . . The "Magic Key of RCA" every Sunday afternoon at 2:00 E.S.T., over the NBC Blue Network.



This and Your Radio Play Victor Records

RCA Victor Record Player R-93B, plays Victor Records through your radio, and with the full tone of your radio! Can be attached to any modern AC radio.

VICTOR RECORDS RCA

A SERVICE OF THE RADIO CORPORATION OF AMERICA

Many Young People Are Noted In Throng at Symphony Hall

Miss Marjorie Motley, Miss Jenny McKean, Miss Margarett McKean and Miss Constance Turner Among Those Present

By ALISON ARNOLD

A large and enthusiastic audience greeted Dr. Serge Koussevitzky upon his return to Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon after an absence of three weeks. Boston audiences are known for their loyalty, and no matter who the guest conductor is, they always turn out in large numbers for their own. The program opened with Beethoven's No. 1 Symphony in C major, which is always a favorite. Then followed Mr. Walter Piston's First Symphony, which he completed last autumn at his home in Belmont. Mr. Piston, who is chairman of the Department of Music at Harvard University, conducted his symphony, which was a complete contrast to Beethoven in its very modern development. The Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor concluded the program.

There seemed to be a great many of the younger set in the audience. An attractive trio were Miss Marjorie Motley, wearing a turban of rust antelope with her black frock; Miss Jenny McKean in a gray tailleur, and her sister, Miss Margarett McKean, in black. Miss Nancy Cochrane, who attended with her stepfather, Mr. Dudley L. Pickman, Jr., wore with her black coat and silver fox scarf, a tiny hat that was the cynosure of all eyes. Its low crown was bright mauve, and tucked at the front of the up-turned brim were two wee rosebuds and tufts of pale pink ostrich, while at the back was a wide band of black velvet tied snugly about her long blonde bob.

Chatting with Miss Constance Turner, in a suit of fine black and white checks, was Miss Dorothy Preston, who topped her black skirt with a multi-colored wool jacket, with which she wore a visored hat of beige antelope. Miss Phyllis Forbes wore pearls with her black frock, and greeted Miss Jane Ragle as she flitted by. With her checked tweed skirt, Miss Josephine Emery wore a wine red sweater and a Glengarry bonnet, and Miss Mary Casey wore with her navy blouse and skirt of navy, beige and maroon stripes, a jaunty Scotch cap.

Miss Ramelle Cochrane wore brown with touches of red, and Miss Jeanne Maddux was all in black, with a long veil trailing from her hat. Miss Reinette Plimpton's gray-blue leopard trimmed jacket and skirt were adorned with bands of scallops, and in her peaked brown hat was a perky quill. Miss Faith Barney wore a jacket of rose tweed with her black skirt and fetching black bonnet.

Sitting in the very front row was Mrs. Augustus N. Rantoul, in tan tweeds, with a cluster of flowers on the brim of her black hat. With her was her daughter, Miss Charlotte Rantoul, all in black. In their usual seats were Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld, in a luxurious mink coat, and her sister, Mrs. Horace H. Soule, in black. Also in her accustomed seat near the front was Mrs. Barrett Wendell.

Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman wore a smart Watteau hat brightened by gay loops of crimson and blue ribbons, and Mrs. Edward A. Taft was all in black. With her black ensemble, Mrs. George Putnam wore a velvet Ascot of gentian blue, and Mrs. Henry Prout's coat was trimmed with Persian lamb. Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike wore a hat of beige felt with her turqouise tweeds.

Since an April snowstorm was in progress, there were many furs worn. Mrs. Charles F. Hovey was wrapped in mink, and with her gray frock, Mrs. Charles Cunningham wore a silver fox cape and a hat of shiny black straw tied under her chin. Mrs. Valentine Hollingsworth's coat was fashioned of Persian lamb, and Mrs. Alexander Steinert and Mrs. William Dana Orcutt both wore wraps of silky black caracul.

Mrs. Horatio Lamb, wearing with her black gown a cape of silver fox, was accompanied by her daughter, Miss Aimee Lamb, in slate gray, and another mother and daughter present were Mrs. Roland Nickerson and Mrs. H. Nickerson Sears. Chatting with a group of friends was Mrs. Francis W. MacVeagh, in black with bands of white on her hat. Mrs. E. Fred Cullen's rust coat was lavishly trimmed with beaver, and Mrs. John Gorham Palfrey's brown coat was collared with mink.

Mr. and Mrs. Edward Jackson Holmes were in the large audience, and Mrs. Robert Livermore left early, wearing a silver fox scarf with her black suit. Mrs. A. O. Barker came up from Cohasset to attend, as did Mrs. Philip Stearns, who had with her her small daughter. Mrs. Edward Hamlin, Jr., was gowned in a bright print, and Mrs. Edward Wigglesworth Grew, Jr., was all in brown.

Among the many others present were Mrs. George Megrew and her daughter, Miss Jane Megrew, Miss Elizabeth C. Leland, Mrs. William Stanley Parker, Mrs. Roswell Parrish, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Mrs. Edward Harding, Mrs. Augustus W. Soule, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Walter Clifford, Mrs. Charles Howard, Miss Louisa Bazeley, Mrs. John Phelan, Miss Jeannie Robinson, Mrs. William H. Coburn and Mrs. Malcolm Bradley French.

CONCERTS THIS WEEK

Symphony Hall

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor, at 2:30 Thursday afternoon and 8:15 Saturday evening. It should be noted that the afternoon concert will be given on Thursday, by exception, since Friday is Good Friday. Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen an unusual program that will begin with Tchaikovsky's symphonic fantasia "Francesca da Rimini." Based upon an episode from Dante, the work has not been played by this orchestra since January, 1932. The setting by Florent Schmitt of the 47th Psalm will be revived. The chorus will be that of the Cecilia Society, and the soprano soloist will be Beal Hober. Schmitt's work was first given in Paris in 1906, and was introduced to the Boston Symphony concerts by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1928. The Psalm begins "O clap your hands, all ye people!" The remaining number will be the Cello Concerto by Thomas de Hartmann, a naturalized French citizen whose ancestry and early training were Russian. The soloist will be Paul Tortelier, a French musician who joined the cello section of the Boston Symphony just this season. The Hartmann Concerto, which will be given first performance this week, is dedicated to M. Tortelier, who was born in Paris in 1914, and was graduated from the Paris Conservatoire in 1935. Before coming to the United States, M. Tortelier was soloist with various European orchestras, and was leading cellist of the Orchestre Philharmonique de Paris.

Three First Symphonies And a Pair of Conductors

230

Koussevitzky Returns; Walter Piston Directs His Own New Composition

B. Trans. Apri. 9/38

BY MOSES SMITH

Returning to the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall after a second holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had arranged for this week's pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a somewhat spectacular program consisting of the First Symphonies by Beethoven, Walter Piston and Sibelius. Times have so changed that there was little evidence at yesterday's matinee concert that the audience regarded the program only as an ordeal to be borne. After the warm reception for the conductor at the beginning, there was, it is true, no great show of enthusiasm at any time, even though the performance of the Beethoven Symphony was delightful and that of the Sibelius incandescent. One might even say iridescent, in the light of the gorgeous display of color of the Boston Orchestra at its best. But at least a persistent minority applauded warmly after the apparently good performance of the Piston Symphony under the capable direction of the composer. The mild exodus before the end of the Sibelius Symphony was no greater than is likely to attend a long program; while the few who left their seats during the Piston Symphony were merely giving expression to their opinion about the plain and direct musical speech of Professor Piston.

The juxtaposition of the three Symphonies gave some of us an exceptional opportunity to make some interesting comparisons. Beethoven wrote his First Symphony in his late twenties. Sibelius was in his thirty-fourth year when he completed his. And now Professor Piston had almost attained his forty-fourth birthday before he turned out his First Symphony. The difference in ages was not entirely accidental. It reflected the progressively complicated and specialized art of music, if not consistently of the form of the symphony, during the last century and a half.

In the case of the two First Symphonies by the established masters, furthermore, it was possible to observe that they were but remarkable beginnings from which the composers made equally remarkable advances in their later symphonies. As to Professor Piston one can set down the categorical opinion that his, too, is an exceptional work. What his later symphonies, if any, will be like it would be both foolhardy and presumptuous to suggest. But comparing this Symphony with his previous compositions in other forms and employing a not-too-distant analogy with the other composers, one has good reason for optimism.

* * *

For here is honest music, itself not too common nowadays. (It never was, I suppose.) The composer speaks in an unaffected tone. The fact that all of his speech was not intelligible or pleasing at first acquaintance was less likely due to his lack of clarity than to the listeners' mental habits. Mr. Piston does not engage with unctuous flattery. He does not take ten minutes to declare what can be expressed in five. He offers no breathing-spaces. And unless the hearer attends closely he is bound to miss an essential step in the tonal argument.

"Neo-classical" he has been called. Nicholas Slonimsky, who is probably as responsible as anyone for the description, employs it in all but two of his six references to the composer in "Music since 1900"; and one of those two includes the word "classical." Now neo-classicism is in bad repute in music, because it has come to mean pseudo-classic. Mr. Slonimsky and some others may be relied upon to employ the term exactly, and in this sense I agree. Professor Piston has swept away ornamentation and finery, got down to essentials of form and idiom. His idiom is not precisely original, as has been pointed out. He uses a vocabulary that is at hand, instead of forging a new one. There is nothing wrong with that procedure, which some of the greatest artists have followed.

* * *

The first movement of the Symphony is spare of line and transparent if you listen—a condition that is not inconsistent with some surprising and grateful touches. One of them, a transitional episode for the wood-wind preceding the second theme, suggested the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which may or may not have influenced Mr. Piston. Another, more characteristic of the gentle Cantabrigian, was the end of the movement. Mr. Piston says it is no coda. And it is in fact but a restatement of the second theme. The repetition is so disguised, though, that it sounds like a coda.

The adagio is constructed in masterly fashion, particularly the last section, where Mr. Piston's counterpoint is forceful and sounds inevitable. Similarly in the last movement, when the excitement suddenly ceases in an impressive pause, there emerges in the brass a sort of chorale that would be positively cacophonous if it were not so logical. The composer does not strain for effect with a clever succession of chord-blocks. His writing is contrapuntal or harmonic (in the correct sense). The chords grow; they are not arbitrarily assembled. An anecdote told of the late Gustave Holst is applicable: When a listener commented on a certain line of development in a work of Holst—whether in praise or disparagement does not matter—that composer replied substantially, "I can't help it if it comes out that way!"

All of which would indicate only that Mr. Piston is a composer of the greatest competence, a fastidious and even ingenious workman and musical logician, were it not that in addition the resulting music was exceedingly enjoyable, flavorsome, forceful, sometimes even poetic. It is not 100 per cent American. It is, rather, cosmopolitan and eclectic in the best sense, not simply a melange of Russian and German and French and Italian and whatnot. It is a communication of a civilized man of the world. It is good music anywhere.

* * *

The composer was fortunate in having at his service a magnificent orchestra that made light of the apparent difficulties of the Symphony. The same orchestra played superlatively, as has already been suggested, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction in the Smphony of Sibelius and most of the time in the Beethoven Symphony.

Walter Piston's First Symphony Played

C. S. Monitor April 9/38

The Arts in Boston

The first symphonies of three composers made up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for yesterday's concert, the first of the twenty-first pair of the season. That of Walter Piston, chairman of the department of music at Harvard University, was played for the first time, with its composer directing. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning after an absence of three weeks, conducted Beethoven's in C major, to open the concert, and Sibelius's in E minor, to close it.

When the defendant in a criminal case fails to take the stand in his own defense, the legal profession suspects that he is guilty. When a symphonic conductor, at a concert which he is directing, turns over the first performance of a new work to its composer, the public suspects that the conductor doesn't think much of the work. In neither instance is the suspicion admissible as evidence.

Let us not therefore approach Mr. Piston's symphony with prejudice, even when we recall that he was also permitted to conduct the last two works of his which figured on these programs. After all, a conductor may be mistaken. Indeed, we have heard much less interesting music than Mr. Piston's Symphony introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky with every appearance of sincerity and even enthusiasm.

Besides, Mr. Piston is, as everybody knows, one of the most gifted of that erstwhile younger generation of American composers which is now entering on artistic middle age. He is a thorough musician. None of the arts of composition is concealed from him. He has learned the lessons of modernism, has adopted the twentieth-century manner of musical thought, as is quite natural. He speaks the musical speech of his time. If he seems melodically sterile, we must recognize that melody has not been in fashion of late years. If he seems to display no great originality, why, how many original composers are there in a generation?

His score is well and truly made, it exploits dissonant polyphony, and it has a good deal of liveliness. On a first hearing, the first movement was the most interesting, the last, next in power to hold the attention. This is usual among the moderns: their quick movements are generally their best. Mr. Piston's slow movement is far too long for the material it contains, which in any event is not very interesting. This movement throws the symphony out of proportion and tends to make the listener less receptive to the Finale. The repetition in the brass, toward the close, of a motto stated in the introduction to the first movement, was too conspicuously stressed.

Mr. Piston apparently secured a satisfactory performance, but it is possible that if Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen to conduct it, the symphony might have been presented in an even more favorable light.

Certainly it would be difficult to imagine more persuasive presentations of the first symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius. The opening pizzicato of the Beethoven was a little ragged; possibly the players, who had risen to greet the conductor, had not quite settled themselves when he began. Thereafter the symphony was played with entrancing delicacy and grace, although the final movement was taken at too rapid a pace—too rapid, not for the orchestra, but for the balance of the work itself. As for the Sibelius, its performance was, as always under these auspices, overwhelming.

L. A. S.

Georges Enesco

Twice within a month Bostonians have had an opportunity to observe Georges Enesco in several roles—as composer-conductor of the nineteenth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, and again last night in Sanders Theater as a virtuoso violinist. Under the auspices of the Division of Music, Harvard University, and for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, N. H., Mr. Enesco played the Nardini Concerto in E minor, the Prelude and Fugue from Bach's G minor Sonata for violin alone, Chausson's "Poème," a Mozart Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and to close, his own Sonata No. 3 in A minor, Op. 25 (dans le caractère populaire roumain). Preceding the Mozart item the violinist offered a tribute to Ravel which he requested be received in silence.

It was evident from the beginning that this was to be no ordinary concert of music for the violin. In a detached manner reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Mr. Enesco brought to completion as fine a performance of the Nardini as we have been privileged to hear in a long time. Although at first his tone seemed lacking in warmth—even a trifle thin—it became fuller as the work progressed, but it did not reach the climax of richness until the presentation of the Chausson number. The Bach excerpts were models of clarity, plus an emotional warmth which, while inherent in this work, is too seldom made apparent. Mr. Enesco obviously feels the romanticism of Bach and is able to reveal the characteristic to his listeners.

The Chausson "Poème" had an intense reading. No opportunity for enhancing its richness was overlooked by the violinist, yet withal, the performance was perfectly controlled.

The Mozart opus glowed with unaccustomed warmth, yet the performance was essentially classic. Probably few who heard this work last night will soon forget the exquisite phrasing of the Rondo or the delicacy with which the most difficult fingering was tossed off.

With all respect to Mr. Enesco as composer we found the program one slip in the Minuet of the Mozart work no doubt bothered him to far greater extent than it did his listeners.

If an artist possessing the discernment which is obviously Mr. Enesco's could be persuaded to complete his announced program before commencing the supplementary concert which is always demanded of one who is willing to oblige, it would make for a more enjoyable session.

G. M. S.

B. Globe April

9, 1938

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky chose three first symphonies for the concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—those of Beethoven, Sibelius and Walter Piston. The conductor, returning to the Symphony Hall stage after an absence of five weeks, was warmly greeted by audience and orchestra yesterday afternoon. Though in the interim the subscribers have been treated to a pair of guest conductors—the first of whom made a deep impression—it is good to sit again before the gifted man who has brought the Boston Orchestra to its present exalted estate.

Prof. Piston conducted his new Symphony, which was played publicly for the first time yesterday. No doubt it is characteristic of this eminent figure in Bostonian music, who has a lengthy list of compositions to his credit and who was first represented on a Boston Symphony program 10 years ago, that he has waited so long before making his initial essay with the symphonic form. Prof. Piston is a musician who writes upon inner compulsion and his work reveals the intellectual discipline of a man who reveres his art. Nothing superficial and nothing hastily contrived could ever be expected from his pen. Like Brahms, he has been content to wait before vouchsafing to the public his First Symphony.

The work is typical of the composer in that its facture is polished, its length generally adjusted to its substance, and the writing for orchestra highly skilled. He sets off the various instrumental colors in a neatly but not tightly woven texture, and he has obtained some unusual tints—one ingeniously based upon high tones of the double-basses. The composer disowns, in the program book, any aim but that of pure music for its own sake. Yet the Symphony indicates that he has veered away from his previous impersonality, biting dissonance and prevailing intellectual logic. If he still likes to write that restless figuration for strings to be found in nearly every piece of music since the war, he has also found room for sentiment: witness the flute, clarinet and English horn solos, and the softly plucked strings at the beginning.

There is still a great deal of dryness, and the melody is not distinguished. On the other hand, the finale with its almost Sibelian ruggedness and grandeur, speaks out boldly, and is perhaps the best movement that Prof. Piston has yet created. There are suggestions of Sibelius' instrumental procedures, no doubt fortuitous. These are mentioned simply for the sake of one listener's complete impression. Prof. Piston's style is his own, it goes without saying. Music, composer and performance were cordially received by the Friday audience.

The first symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius, as it happened, were last heard here upon the same Symphony program, two years ago. Again they made fitting contrast. Performing the Haydnesque work of Beethoven with a reduced orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky again wrought a delicate and beautifully clear reading of the work.

The great moments of the afternoon, as were to be anticipated, occurred during the marvelous E minor Symphony by Sibelius. Where Sibelius is concerned, Serge Koussevitzky's treatment is truly Promethean, although there is fire in the printed notes to begin with. Even more than the Second Symphony, this heroic First tempts one to make all sorts of extravagant word pictures, none of which could duplicate the poetry, the emotional intensity or the sheer sense of Nature gathered into sound that live in the music itself. It is exact if not eloquent to say that all these elements were vividly disclosed yesterday afternoon in another magical re-creation.

The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday, the evening one as usual on Saturday. The program will present Paul Tortelier as soloist in the first performance of Hartmann's Cello Concerto, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and the setting by Florent Schmitt of the 47th Psalm.

C. W. D.

TORTELIER AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

B. Post - Apr 11/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

EVERY member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a potential soloist, or he would not be there. Only on the rarest occasions, however, is anyone but the occupant of a first desk thrust into the limelight. One of these occasions will occur at the concerts of this week. Paul Tortelier, who joined the violoncello section at the beginning of the present season, will bring to its first performance a Concerto, Op. 57, by Thomas de Hartmann.

Mr. Tortelier was born in Paris in 1914 and, graduating with the highest honors from the Conservatoire in 1935, became the leading 'cellist of the Orchestra Philharmonique de Paris in the same year. He has made many solo appearances in Europe. De Hartmann, who is unknown as composer in these parts is a naturalized Frenchman of Russian birth and early training. He has dedicated his Concerto to Mr. Tortelier.

• • • •

Those radio listeners who are curious about the makeup of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, which became a virtuoso organization overnight, may find all about it in the handsome book issued by the National Broadcasting Company and obtainable for the sum of $1, postpaid. This book contains an introduction by Hendrik Willem Van Loon, a vivid history of the orchestra and each member of the orchestra, with reproductions of charcoal sketches of each, four pages of candid camera shots and details of the 20 programmes of this, the orchestra's first season.

Boston is mentioned but sparingly in these pages. To be sure, Pierre Monteux, one of the conductors who preceded Mr. Toscanini, was at one time fairly well known hereabouts. Georges Grisez, the bass clarinet player, was first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony from 1904-1914, and Laura Newell, the harpist, received her training at the New England Conservatory of Music.

• • • •

That remarkably informative as well as entertaining volume, Nicolas Slonimsky's "Music Since 1900," W. W. Norton and Co., has already reached a second edition, no small achievement for a work of this character, and has been brought up to date. Among the more important new entires are those of the death of Maurice Ravel, Dec. 28. There is a reference to the first performance of Schumann's Violin Concerto at the Leipzig Gewandthaus (sic) on Nov. 26; of the first performance, at Symphony Hall on Dec. 3, of the Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill and also of the transmission by radio photo from Leipzig to Boston of the string parts to Sibelius' score, "The Origin of Fire," on Dec. 28. So quickly does the news of the day become history.

Certain slight inaccuracies in this book which, taken as a whole, is a monument of correctness, were noticed in the reviews of the first edition and have been duly corrected. Apparently, however, not all have yet been discovered. Glancing through his copy of the second edition this reviewer hit upon this item, one of the many which had hitherto escaped his eye: "30 July, 1933, a Wagner Museum is opened at Triebschen, the villa near Lucerne, where 'Tristan and Isolde' was composed." Tut, tut, Mr. Slonimsky. Wagner completed the score of "Tristan" in August, 1859, and did not move to Triebschen until December, 1865. The crossing of the wires in Mr. Slinimsky's mind was occasioned, of course, by the fact that "Tristan" was finished, though not begun, in Lucerne itself, in a room in the Hotel Schweizerhof.

Walter Piston Excels; Conducts Symphony

B. Am.

By RUTH MARSTERS

April 10/38

Walter Piston's debut as a symphonist, and much fine playing on the part of the Boston Symphony Orchestra distinguished yesterday afternoon's concert in Symphony Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky, looking fit as was to be expected after his recent sojourn in the sun, opened the program with a rollicking performance of Beethoven's capricious First Symphony, in which nothing of fleetness was lost nor any impudent accent glossed over in the slightest.

Compared with the exuberant freshness of the Beethoven, Mr. Piston's work—which he appeared to conduct—was sombre indeed.

* * *

The distinguished head of Harvard's music department has identified himself as a classicist heretofore largely through his chamber music, though several pieces for orchestra have previously appeared on Boston Symphony programs. Furthermore his music is known to be cerebral. But this could not quite prepare us for the weight of arid disillusionment embodied in his symphony.

That stylistically it is of flawless workmanship hardly alleviates our grief. Quite the contrary. For it only serves to make convincing the dreary tenor of thought existing among so many of his contemporaries.

Mr. Piston's Symphony was written at his home in Belmont and completed in the autumn of 1937. Throughout its three movements—Andantino quasi Adagio, Allegro; Adagio, and Allegro con fuoco—it alternates between restless and enervating rhythms and eerie nostalgia, but the effect of the whole is static.

As a conductor, Mr. Piston proved thoroughly efficient.

* * *

The last part of the program was devoted to that feast of sound which is the Sibelius First Symphony. Under Koussevitzky's ardent direction its drama was intensified, its melodies sang to the heavens and its climaxes were an irresistible force.

The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

SANDERS THEATRE

Georges Enesco

B. Globe April 9/38

George Enesco, famous Rumanian conductor, violinist and composer, gave a violin recital last evening for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H. The concert was under auspices of the Division of Music of Harvard University and the Cambridge Chapter of the MacDowell Colony League.

This was a concert extraordinary. Not only because the soloist was Georges Enesco, but also because his accompanist, Sanford Schlussel, played with brilliance, intelligence and sensitivity, and the program did not compromise with the so-called "popular classical numbers."

Mr. Enesco gave his audience a Nardini Concerto, the Bach Prelude and Fuge (from the G Minor Sonata), unaccompanied; Chausson's lyrical Poeme, and the Andante, Minuet and Rondo from Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250). All these were played with an eloquence and a depth of feeling that stamped this as a performance rich in emotional content.

The event of the evening, Enesco's playing of his own Sonata No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 25; the Sonata played in Boston three years ago, by Enesco's pupil, Yehudi Menuhin. Played by its composer, this exotic, gipsy-like work portrayed both Teutonic solidarity and Latin vivacity. It has mystical qualities as well as passionate tendencies. It is dramatic, compelling and fantastic. To it Mr. Enesco gave a magnificent tone and somethnig of himself, especially in the nuances and dynamics.

Before playing the Mozart group Mr. Enesco, in memory of Ravel, played his "Kaddisch," a prayer for the dead. Throughout the program, which held the unfortunately small audience spellbound, the artist played several encores.

230

Three First Symphonies And a Pair of Conductors

Koussevitzky Returns; Walter Piston Directs His Own New Composition

B. Trans. Apri. 9/38

BY MOSES SMITH

Returning to the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall after a second holiday, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had arranged for this week's pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra a somewhat spectacular program consisting of the First Symphonies by Beethoven, Walter Piston and Sibelius. Times have so changed that there was little evidence at yesterday's matinee concert that the audience regarded the program only as an ordeal to be borne. After the warm reception for the conductor at the beginning, there was, it is true, no great show of enthusiasm at any time, even though the performance of the Beethoven Symphony was delightful and that of the Sibelius incandescent. One might even say iridescent, in the light of the gorgeous display of color of the Boston Orchestra at its best. But at least a persistent minority applauded warmly after the apparently good performance of the Piston Symphony under the capable direction of the composer. The mild exodus before the end of the Sibelius Symphony was no greater than is likely to attend a long program; while the few who left their seats during the Piston Symphony were merely giving expression to their opinion about the plain and direct musical speech of Professor Piston.

The juxtaposition of the three Symphonies gave some of us an exceptional opportunity to make some interesting comparisons. Beethoven wrote his First Symphony in his late twenties. Sibelius was in his thirty-fourth year when he completed his. And now Professor Piston had almost attained his forty-fourth birthday before he turned out his First Symphony. The difference in ages was not entirely accidental. It reflected the progressively complicated and specialized art of music, if not consistently of the form of the symphony, during the last century and a half.

In the case of the two First Symphonies by the established masters, furthermore, it was possible to observe that they were but remarkable beginnings from which the composers made equally remarkable advances in their later symphonies. As to Professor Piston one can set down the categorical opinion that his, too, is an exceptional work. What his later symphonies, if any, will be like it would be both foolhardy and presumptuous to suggest. But comparing this Symphony with his previous compositions in other forms and employing a not-too-distant analogy with the other composers, one has good reason for optimism.

* * *

For here is honest music, itself not too common nowadays. (It never was, I suppose.) The composer speaks in an unaffected tone. The fact that all of his speech was not intelligible or pleasing at first acquaintance was less likely due to his lack of clarity than to the listeners' mental habits. Mr. Piston does not engage with unctuous flattery. He does not take ten minutes to declare what can be expressed in five. He offers no breathing-spaces. And unless the hearer attends closely he is bound to miss an essential step in the tonal argument.

"Neo-classical" he has been called. Nicholas Slonimsky, who is probably as responsible as anyone for the description, employs it in all but two of his six references to the composer in "Music since 1900"; and one of those two includes the word "classical." Now neo-classicism is in bad repute in music, because it has come to mean pseudo-classic. Mr. Slonimsky and some others may be relied upon to employ the term exactly, and in this sense I agree. Professor Piston has swept away ornamentation and finery, got down to essentials of form and idiom. His idiom is not precisely original, as has been pointed out. He uses a vocabulary that is at hand, instead of forging a new one. There is nothing wrong with that procedure, which some of the greatest artists have followed.

* * *

The first movement of the Symphony is spare of line and transparent if you listen—a condition that is not inconsistent with some surprising and grateful touches. One of them, a transitional episode for the wood-wind preceding the second theme, suggested the First Symphony of Shostakovitch, which may or may not have influenced Mr. Piston. Another, more characteristic of the gentle Cantabrigian, was the end of the movement. Mr. Piston says it is no coda. And it is in fact but a restatement of the second theme. The repetition is so disguised, though, that it sounds like a coda.

The adagio is constructed in masterly fashion, particularly the last section, where Mr. Piston's counterpoint is forceful and sounds inevitable. Similarly in the last movement, when the excitement suddenly ceases in an impressive pause, there emerges in the brass a sort of chorale that would be positively cacophonous if it were not so logical. The composer does not strain for effect with a clever succession of chord-blocks. His writing is contrapuntal or harmonic (in the correct sense). The chords grow; they are not arbitrarily assembled. An anecdote told of the late Gustave Holst is applicable: When a listener commented on a certain line of development in a work of Holst—whether in praise or disparagement does not matter—that composer replied substantially, "I can't help it if it comes out that way!"

All of which would indicate only that Mr. Piston is a composer of the greatest competence, a fastidious and even ingenious workman and musical logician, were it not that in addition the resulting music was exceedingly enjoyable, flavorsome, forceful, sometimes even poetic. It is not 100 per cent American. It is, rather, cosmopolitan and eclectic in the best sense, not simply a melange of Russian and German and French and Italian and whatnot. It is a communication of a civilized man of the world. It is good music anywhere.

* * *

The composer was fortunate in having at his service a magnificent orchestra that made light of the apparent difficulties of the Symphony. The same orchestra played superlatively, as has already been suggested, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction in the Smphony of Sibelius and most of, the time in the Beethoven Symphony.

TORTELIER AS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

B. Post - April 11/38

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

EVERY member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a potential soloist, or he would not be there. Only on the rarest occasions, however, is anyone but the occupant of a first desk thrust into the limelight. One of these occasions will occur at the concerts of this week. Paul Tortelier, who joined the violoncello section at the beginning of the present season, will bring to its first performance a Concerto, Op. 57, by Thomas de Hartmann.

Mr. Tortelier was born in Paris in 1914 and, graduating with the highest honors from the Conservatoire in 1935, became the leading 'cellist of the Orchestra Philharmonique de Paris in the same year. He has made many solo appearances in Europe. De Hartmann, who is unknown as composer in these parts is a naturalized Frenchman of Russian birth and early training. He has dedicated his Concerto to Mr. Tortelier.

• • • •

Those radio listeners who are curious about the makeup of the NBC Symphony Orchestra, which became a virtuoso organization overnight, may find all about it in the handsome book issued by the National Broadcasting Company and obtainable for the sum of $1, postpaid. This book contains an introduction by Hendrik Willem Van Loon, a vivid history of the orchestra and each member of the orchestra, with reproductions of charcoal sketches of each, four pages of candid camera shots and details of the 20 programmes of this, the orchestra's first season.

Boston is mentioned but sparingly in these pages. To be sure, Pierre Monteux, one of the conductors who preceded Mr. Toscanini, was at one time fairly well known hereabouts. Georges Grisez, the bass clarinet player, was first clarinetist of the Boston Symphony from 1904-1914, and Laura Newell, the harpist, received her training at the New England Conservatory of Music.

• • • •

That remarkably informative as well as entertaining volume, Nicolas Slonimsky's "Music Since 1900," W. W. Norton and Co., has already reached a second edition, no small achievement for a work of this character, and has been brought up to date. Among the more important new entires are those of the death of Maurice Ravel, Dec. 28. There is a reference to the first performance of Schumann's Violin Concerto at the Leipzig Gewandthaus (sic) on Nov. 26; of the first performance, at Symphony Hall on Dec. 3, of the Third Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill and also of the transmission by radio photo from Leipzig to Boston of the string parts to Sibelius' score, "The Origin of Fire," on Dec. 28. So quickly does the news of the day become history.

Certain slight inaccuracies in this book which, taken as a whole, is a monument of correctness, were noticed in the reviews of the first edition and have been duly corrected. Apparently, however, not all have yet been discovered. Glancing through his copy of the second edition this reviewer hit upon this item, one of the many which had hitherto escaped his eye: "30 July, 1933, a Wagner Museum is opened at Triebschen, the villa near Lucerne, where 'Tristan and Isolde' was composed." Tut, tut, Mr. Slonimsky. Wagner completed the score of "Tristan" in August, 1859, and did not move to Triebschen until December, 1865. The crossing of the wires in Mr. Slinimsky's mind was occasioned, of course, by the fact that "Tristan" was finished, though not begun, in Lucerne itself, in a room in the Hotel Schweizerhof.

Walter Piston's First Symphony Played

C. S. Monitor April 9/38

The Arts in Boston

The first symphonies of three composers made up the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for yesterday's concert, the first of the twenty-first pair of the season. That of Walter Piston, chairman of the department of music at Harvard University, was played for the first time, with its composer directing. Dr. Koussevitzky, returning after an absence of three weeks, conducted Beethoven's in C major, to open the concert, and Sibelius's in E minor, to close it.

When the defendant in a criminal case fails to take the stand in his own defense, the legal profession suspects that he is guilty. When a symphonic conductor, at a concert which he is directing, turns over the first performance of a new work to its composer, the public suspects that the conductor doesn't think much of the work. In neither instance is the suspicion admissible as evidence.

Let us not therefore approach Mr. Piston's symphony with prejudice, even when we recall that he was also permitted to conduct the last two works of his which figured on these programs. After all, a conductor may be mistaken. Indeed, we have heard much less interesting music than Mr. Piston's Symphony introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky with every appearance of sincerity and even enthusiasm.

Besides, Mr. Piston is, as everybody knows, one of the most gifted of that erstwhile younger generation of American composers which is now entering on artistic middle age. He is a thorough musician. None of the arts of composition is concealed from him. He has learned the lessons of modernism, has adopted the twentieth-century manner of musical thought, as is quite natural. He speaks the musical speech of his time. If he seems melodically sterile, we must recognize that melody has not been in fashion of late years. If he seems to display no great originality, why, how many original composers are there in a generation?

His score is well and truly made, it exploits dissonant polyphony, and it has a good deal of liveliness. On a first hearing, the first movement was the most interesting, the last, next in power to hold the attention. This is usual among the moderns: their quick movements are generally their best. Mr. Piston's slow movement is far too long for the material it contains, which in any event is not very interesting. This movement throws the symphony out of proportion and tends to make the listener less receptive to the Finale. The repetition in the brass, toward the close, of a motto stated in the introduction to the first movement, was too conspicuously stressed.

Mr. Piston apparently secured a satisfactory performance, but it is possible that if Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen to conduct it, the symphony might have been presented in an even more favorable light.

Certainly it would be difficult to imagine more persuasive presentations of the first symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius. The opening pizzicato of the Beethoven was a little ragged; possibly the players, who had risen to greet the conductor, had not quite settled themselves when he began. Thereafter the symphony was played with entrancing delicacy and grace, although the final movement was taken at too rapid a pace—too rapid, not for the orchestra, but for the balance of the work itself. As for the Sibelius, its performance was, as always under these auspices, overwhelming.

L. A. S.

Georges Enesco

Twice within a month Bostonians have had an opportunity to observe Georges Enesco in several roles—as composer-conductor of the nineteenth pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, and again last night in Sanders Theater as a virtuoso violinist. Under the auspices of the Division of Music, Harvard University, and for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony in Peterborough, N. H., Mr. Enesco played the Nardini Concerto in E minor, the Prelude and Fugue from Bach's G minor Sonata for violin alone, Chausson's "Poème," a Mozart Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and to close, his own Sonata No. 3 in A minor, Op. 25 (dans le caractère populaire roumain). Preceding the Mozart item the violinist offered a tribute to Ravel which he requested be received in silence.

It was evident from the beginning that this was to be no ordinary concert of music for the violin. In a detached manner reminiscent of Rachmaninoff, Mr. Enesco brought to completion as fine a performance of the Nardini as we have been privileged to hear in a long time. Although at first his tone seemed lacking in warmth—even a trifle thin—it became fuller as the work progressed, but it did not reach the climax of richness until the presentation of the Chausson number. The Bach excerpts were models of clarity, plus an emotional warmth which, while inherent in this work, is too seldom made apparent. Mr. Enesco obviously feels the romanticism of Bach and is able to reveal the characteristic to his listeners.

The Chausson "Poème" had an intense reading. No opportunity for enhancing its richness was overlooked by the violinist, yet withal, the performance was perfectly controlled.

The Mozart opus glowed with unaccustomed warmth, yet the performance was essentially classic. Probably few who heard this work last night will soon forget the exquisite phrasing of the Rondo or the delicacy with which the most difficult fingering was tossed off.

With all respect to Mr. Enesco as composer, we found the program too long by one number, and that unfortunately happened to be his own. The work is colorful, abounding in characteristic melody of the folk-tune type and extremely difficult, placing an unusually heavy burden upon the pianist; and this brings us to a belated acknowledgment of the virtues of Sanford Schlussel as pianist. He has enormous technique, plus imagination. He knows the value of perfect timing, and proceeds to demonstrate it. His one slip in the Minuet of the Mozart work no doubt bothered him to far greater extent than it did his listeners.

If an artist possessing the discernment which is obviously Mr. Enesco's could be persuaded to complete his announced program before commencing the supplementary concert which is always demanded of one who is willing to oblige, it would make for a more enjoyable session.

G. M. S.

B. Globe April

9, 1938

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky chose three first symphonies for the concerts this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—those of Beethoven, Sibelius and Walter Piston. The conductor, returning to the Symphony Hall stage after an absence of five weeks, was warmly greeted by audience and orchestra yesterday afternoon. Though in the interim the subscribers have been treated to a pair of guest conductors—the first of whom made a deep impression—it is good to sit again before the gifted man who has brought the Boston Orchestra to its present exalted estate.

Prof. Piston conducted his new Symphony, which was played publicly for the first time yesterday. No doubt it is characteristic of this eminent figure in Bostonian m sic, who has a lengthy list of co positions to his credit and who w first represented on a Boston Sy phony program 10 years ago, th he has waited so long before ma ing his initial essay with the sy phonic form. Prof. Piston is musician who writes upon inn compulsion and his work reveal the intellectual discipline of a ma who reveres his art. Nothing superficial and nothing hastily contrived could ever be expected from his pen. Like Brahms, he has been content to wait before vouchsafing to the public his First Symphony.

The work is typical of the composer in that its facture is polished, its length generally adjusted to its substance, and the writing for orchestra highly skilled. He sets off the various instrumental colors in a neatly but not tightly woven texture, and he has obtained some unusual tints—one ingeniously based upon high tones of the double-basses. The composer disowns, in the program book, any aim but that of pure music for its own sake. Yet the Symphony indicates that he has veered away from his previous impersonality, biting dissonance and prevailing intellectual logic. If he still likes to write that restless figuration for strings to be found in nearly every piece of music since the war, he has also found room for sentiment: witness the flute, clarinet and English horn solos, and the softly plucked strings at the beginning.

There is still a great deal of dryness, and the melody is not distinguished. On the other hand, the finale with its almost Sibelian ruggedness and grandeur, speaks out boldly, and is perhaps the best movement that Prof. Piston has yet created. There are suggestions of Sibelius' instrumental procedures, no doubt fortuitous. These are mentioned simply for the sake of one listener's complete impression. Prof. Piston's style is his own, it goes without saying. Music, composer and performance were cordially received by the Friday audience.

The first symphonies of Beethoven and Sibelius, as it happened, were last heard here upon the same Symphony program, two years ago. Again they made fitting contrast. Performing the Haydnesque work of Beethoven with a reduced orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky again wrought a delicate and beautifully clear reading of the work.

The great moments of the afternoon, as were to be anticipated, occurred during the marvelous E minor Symphony by Sibelius. Where Sibelius is concerned, Serge Koussevitzky's treatment is truly Promethean, although there is fire in the printed notes to begin with. Even more than the Second Symphony, this heroic First tempts one to make all sorts of extravagant word pictures, none of which could duplicate the poetry, the emotional intensity or the sheer sense of Nature gathered into sound that live in the music itself. It is exact if not eloquent to say that all these elements were vividly disclosed yesterday afternoon in another magical re-creation.

The afternoon concert next week will be given on Thursday, the evening one as usual on Saturday. The program will present Paul Tortelier as soloist in the first performance of Hartmann's Cello Concerto, Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" and the setting by Florent Schmitt of the 47th Psalm.

C. W. D.

THIMBLE THEATER,
TAKE THE SHARK'S PEARL, WIMPY
!

Dr. Koussevitzky, looking fit as was to be expected after his recent sojourn in the sun, opened the program with a rollicking performance of Beethoven's capricious First Symphony, in which nothing of fleetness was lost nor any impudent accent glossed over in the slightest.

Compared with the exuberant freshness of the Beethoven, Mr. Piston's work—which he appeared to conduct—was sombre indeed.

* * *

The distinguished head of Harvard's music department has identified himself as a classicist heretofore largely through his chamber music, though several pieces for orchestra have previously appeared on Boston Symphony programs. Furthermore his music is known to be cerebral. But this could not quite prepare us for the weight of arid disillusionment embodied in his symphony.

That stylistically it is of flawless workmanship hardly alleviates our grief. Quite the contrary. For it only serves to make convincing the dreary tenor of thought existing among so many of his contemporaries.

Mr. Piston's Symphony was written at his home in Belmont and completed in the autumn of 1937. Throughout its three movements—Andantino quasi Adagio, Allegro; Adagio, and Allegro con fuoco—it alternates between restless and enervating rhythms and eerie nostalgia, but the effect of the whole is static.

As a conductor, Mr. Piston proved thoroughly efficient.

* * *

The last part of the program was devoted to that feast of sound which is the Sibelius First Symphony. Under Koussevitzky's ardent direction its drama was intensified, its melodies sang to the heavens and its climaxes were an irresistible force.

The program will be repeated at this evening's concert in Symphony Hall.

SANDERS THEATRE

Georges Enesco

B. Globe April 9/38

George Enesco, famous Rumanian conductor, violinist and composer, gave a violin recital last evening for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony at Peterboro, N. H. The concert was under auspices of the Division of Music of Harvard University and the Cambridge Chapter of the MacDowell Colony League.

This was a concert extraordinary. Not only because the soloist was Georges Enesco, but also because his accompanist, Sanford Schlussel, played with brilliance, intelligence and sensitivity, and the program did not compromise with the so-called "popular classical numbers."

Mr. Enesco gave his audience a Nardini Concerto, the Bach Prelude and Fuge (from the G Minor Sonata), unaccompanied; Chausson's lyrical Poeme, and the Andante, Minuet and Rondo from Mozart's "Haffner" Serenade in D major (K. 250). All these were played with an eloquence and a depth of feeling that stamped this as a performance rich in emotional content.

The event of the evening, Enesco's playing of his own Sonata No. 3 in A Minor, Op. 25; the Sonata played in Boston three years ago, by Enesco's pupil, Yehudi Menuhin. Played by its composer, this exotic, gipsy-like work portrayed both Teutonic solidarity and Latin vivacity. It has mystical qualities as well as passionate tendencies. It is dramatic, compelling and fantastic. To it Mr. Enesco gave a magnificent tone and somethnig of himself, especially in the nuances and dynamics.

Before playing the Mozart group Mr. Enesco, in memory of Ravel, played his "Kaddisch," a prayer for the dead. Throughout the program, which held the unfortunately small audience spellbound, the artist played several encores.

Piston's Symphony Impressive

B. Adv. By Ruth Marsters Apr. 11/38

Music Editor

SYMPHONISTS Piston, Sibelius and Beethoven, each represented by his "first symphony," contributed variously to the enjoyment of Boston Symphony audiences this week-end.

Everybody was pleased when Dr. Serge Koussevitzky came upon the stage of Symphony Hall after an absence of four weeks to launch the orchestra upon the performance of that irrepressibly gay and prancing work, the Beethoven First Symphony.

That equally joyous, and even more prodigal outpouring of sound, the Sibelius First, which closed the program, was likewise received with unanimity of approval.

The orchestra played superbly and with apparently renewed vigor throughout.

Walter Piston's First Symphony, which the distinguished head of Harvard's music department himself conducted in its first performance, does not, and is not intended to amuse.

The stark contrast it made with the other two works so filled with jubilant creative youth was sufficient to give one pause. For the Piston work has weight. It is, in fact, the most important writing to date of one of the most brilliant music scholars of the day. The devastating part of it is that it is probably a true reflection of the age in which he lives. It is the reflection of a world grown suddenly old.

* * *

THE PROGRAM note which carries the composer's denial of any "pictorial, narrative, political, or philosophical intent" is unnecessary. Mr. Piston's concern is for "pure music," it is true. But the point goes deeper than any differences between romanticism and classicism.

From the sombre introduction to the point where the music simply breaks off there is nothing that affirms anything. Through the enervating allegros—sometimes nervous, sometimes almost brutally didactic, through the nostalgic Adagio, there is nothing that is not a negation.

Finally, in denying the very vitality from which all art must spring, it ends by denying itself. It is by far the most exhausting thing we have ever listened to—for the very reason that it is so very well done.

* * *

AT THIS WEEK'S concerts Dr. Koussevitzky will present the setting by Florent Schmitt of the 47th Psalm for orchestra, organ, chorus and solo voices. The Ce cilia Society, prepared by Arthu Fiedler, will assist.

Paul Tortelier, French 'cellist will be the soloist in the performance of Thomas de Hartmann Violoncello Concerto, and the pr gram will also include Tchaik sky's symphonic fantasia, "Fr cesca da Rimini." The aftern concert will be given on Thu this week instead of Friday.

B. Her. Apr. 9/38

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 21st concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Walter Piston conducted the orchestra in the first performance anywhere of his symphony. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 1 in C major Op. 21 .... Beethoven
Symphony No. 1 .... Piston
Symphony No. 1 in E minor Op. 39 .... Sibelius

Mr. Piston has very probably earned the title of America's foremost composer of chamber music. No one else has written as much excellent music in a variety of combinations in this field. When, therefore, a man of his reputation and skill waits until he is 44 before composing a symphony, we may be positive that the result will be neither immature, indecisive nor footling. It will, in short, be a work demanding serious consideration and in all likelihood more performances than one if it is to be properly understood.

The symphony, heard yesterday for the first time, is an extremely interesting work. It is, of course, ably written and logically constructed. That much one expects from one who is celebrated as a teacher of musical theory. It is not, however, academic in the old-fashioned manner, for its harmony and counterpoint are dissonant and contemporary in feeling. It is possible to say that the first movement is chiefly of intellectual interest and tends to dryness. That is a fault, if it be a fault, that is shared by a great many intelligent musicians in a revolt from excessive lushness.

The second movement is contemplative and lyrical in mood. The contrast provided by the middle section is possibly too long deferred; but from that point to the end Mr. Piston has seldom written more lovely music. He may even have had those excellent artists, Messrs. Laurent and Speyer, in mind when he conceived the melodies for flute and English horn that are so moving.

Mr. Piston is always at his best in his finales, or at least those movements are invariably attractive to the ear. Here he has composed lively and stirring music. There are clever effects of contrast in slower time, there is ingenious use of the brass choir in series of chords. It is the inevitable conclusion to the musical thought of the two preceding movements and makes a brilliant finale to what is certainly one of the most important American scores to have been heard in Symphony hall. There was a good deal of dissenting opinion, as conversation in the lobby revealed; but the actual reception in the hall was most cordial.

Two other "first symphonies" on the same program made an interesting comparison. The Beethoven is an enchanting work, dependent on Haydn and not obviously the maturer and more original Beethoven; but anyone objecting to this Symphony on that score would be captious indeed. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the orchestra in a singularly precise, clean and invigorating performance.

Silbelius's First Symphony is also immature, in that it has not the originality of the composer of the seventh and fourth. The first movement is clearly under the influence of Tchaikovsky, and it is tempting to say that it is better than Tchaikovsky. For us the finale dates; its impassioned eloquence rings hollow. But the andante is beautiful, romantic music, and the scherzo is splendid. The perfo[illegible] Dr. Koussevitzky was superb.

Next week the concerts will be given Thursday afternoon (because of Good Friday) and Saturday evening. Paul Tortellier, 'cellist of the orchestra, will be soloist in Thomas de Hartmann's Concerto. F[illegible] Schmitt's 47th Psalm, with chorus, and Tchaikovsky's "Francesca da Rimini" will be heard.

GEORGE ENESCO

George Enesco, violinist, gave a recital last evening in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, for the benefit of the MacDowell Colony, playing this program:

Concerto in E minor............Nardini
Prelude and fugue..................Bach
(from G minor Sonata)
Poeme ....Chausson
Cortege ....Ravel
Andante, Minuet and Rondo.......Mozart
Sonata No. 3 in A minor, op. 25...Enesco

Within recent seasons much has been written on the extraordinary musicianship of Mr. Enesco, part of which has been exemplified to Boston audiences by opportunities for hearing him as conductor and composer. Last evening's audience acknowledged one of the great violinists of the time, in a program which traversed several styles and periods of music, concluding with one of his own important works.

These composers all were great musicians, and most of them accomplished executants as well; Mr. Enesco brought out certain qualities associated with each in so complete a manner as to reveal them in the fullness of their own time rather than as period works played by an antiquarian. Obviously inherent as these living qualities are in their own measures, the spirit is not often set forth so clearly by great performers who lack the necessary musical discernment.

Thus, the Nardini Concerto, while not meeting the precise description given by the flowery Schubart that "His playing brings tears into the eyes of stony-hearted courtiers—nay, his own tears run down on his violin," embodied the grace and amiability typical of Tartini's best pupil. The Bach, frequent as this Prelude and Fugue appears on the season's programs, was presented as a vehicle of expression for its own sake and not as a technical display piece; played with extreme deliberation it retained the improvisational manner of a prelude, a quality so typical of Bach. In immediate contrast, the Chausson achieved a burning intensity. Mr. Enesco added Maurice Ravel's "Cortege" in tribute to the composer, immediately preceding the Mozart, a most appropriate interpolation in the proper setting. There were encores after each group, all of which extended the recital regrettably beyond the hour for reviewers to be allowed a full hearing of Mr. Enesco's Sonata.

Sanford Schlussel provided musicianly accompaniments throughout. The audience was overwhelmingly effusive, endeavoring in some part to communicate by its enthusiasm a sincere regret for the small attendance. Post-opera relaxations, symphonic matinees, university holidays, and stormy weather combined to explain, if not to excuse. H. E. J.

THE ORIGINAL
ROMEIKE
PRESS CLIPPINGS

220 W. 19th ST., NEW YORK
Tel. CHelsea 3-8860

Circ. (D 41,930)

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
JOURNAL EVERY EVENING

AUG 17 1940

Britain Also Fighting Our Cause, Group Told

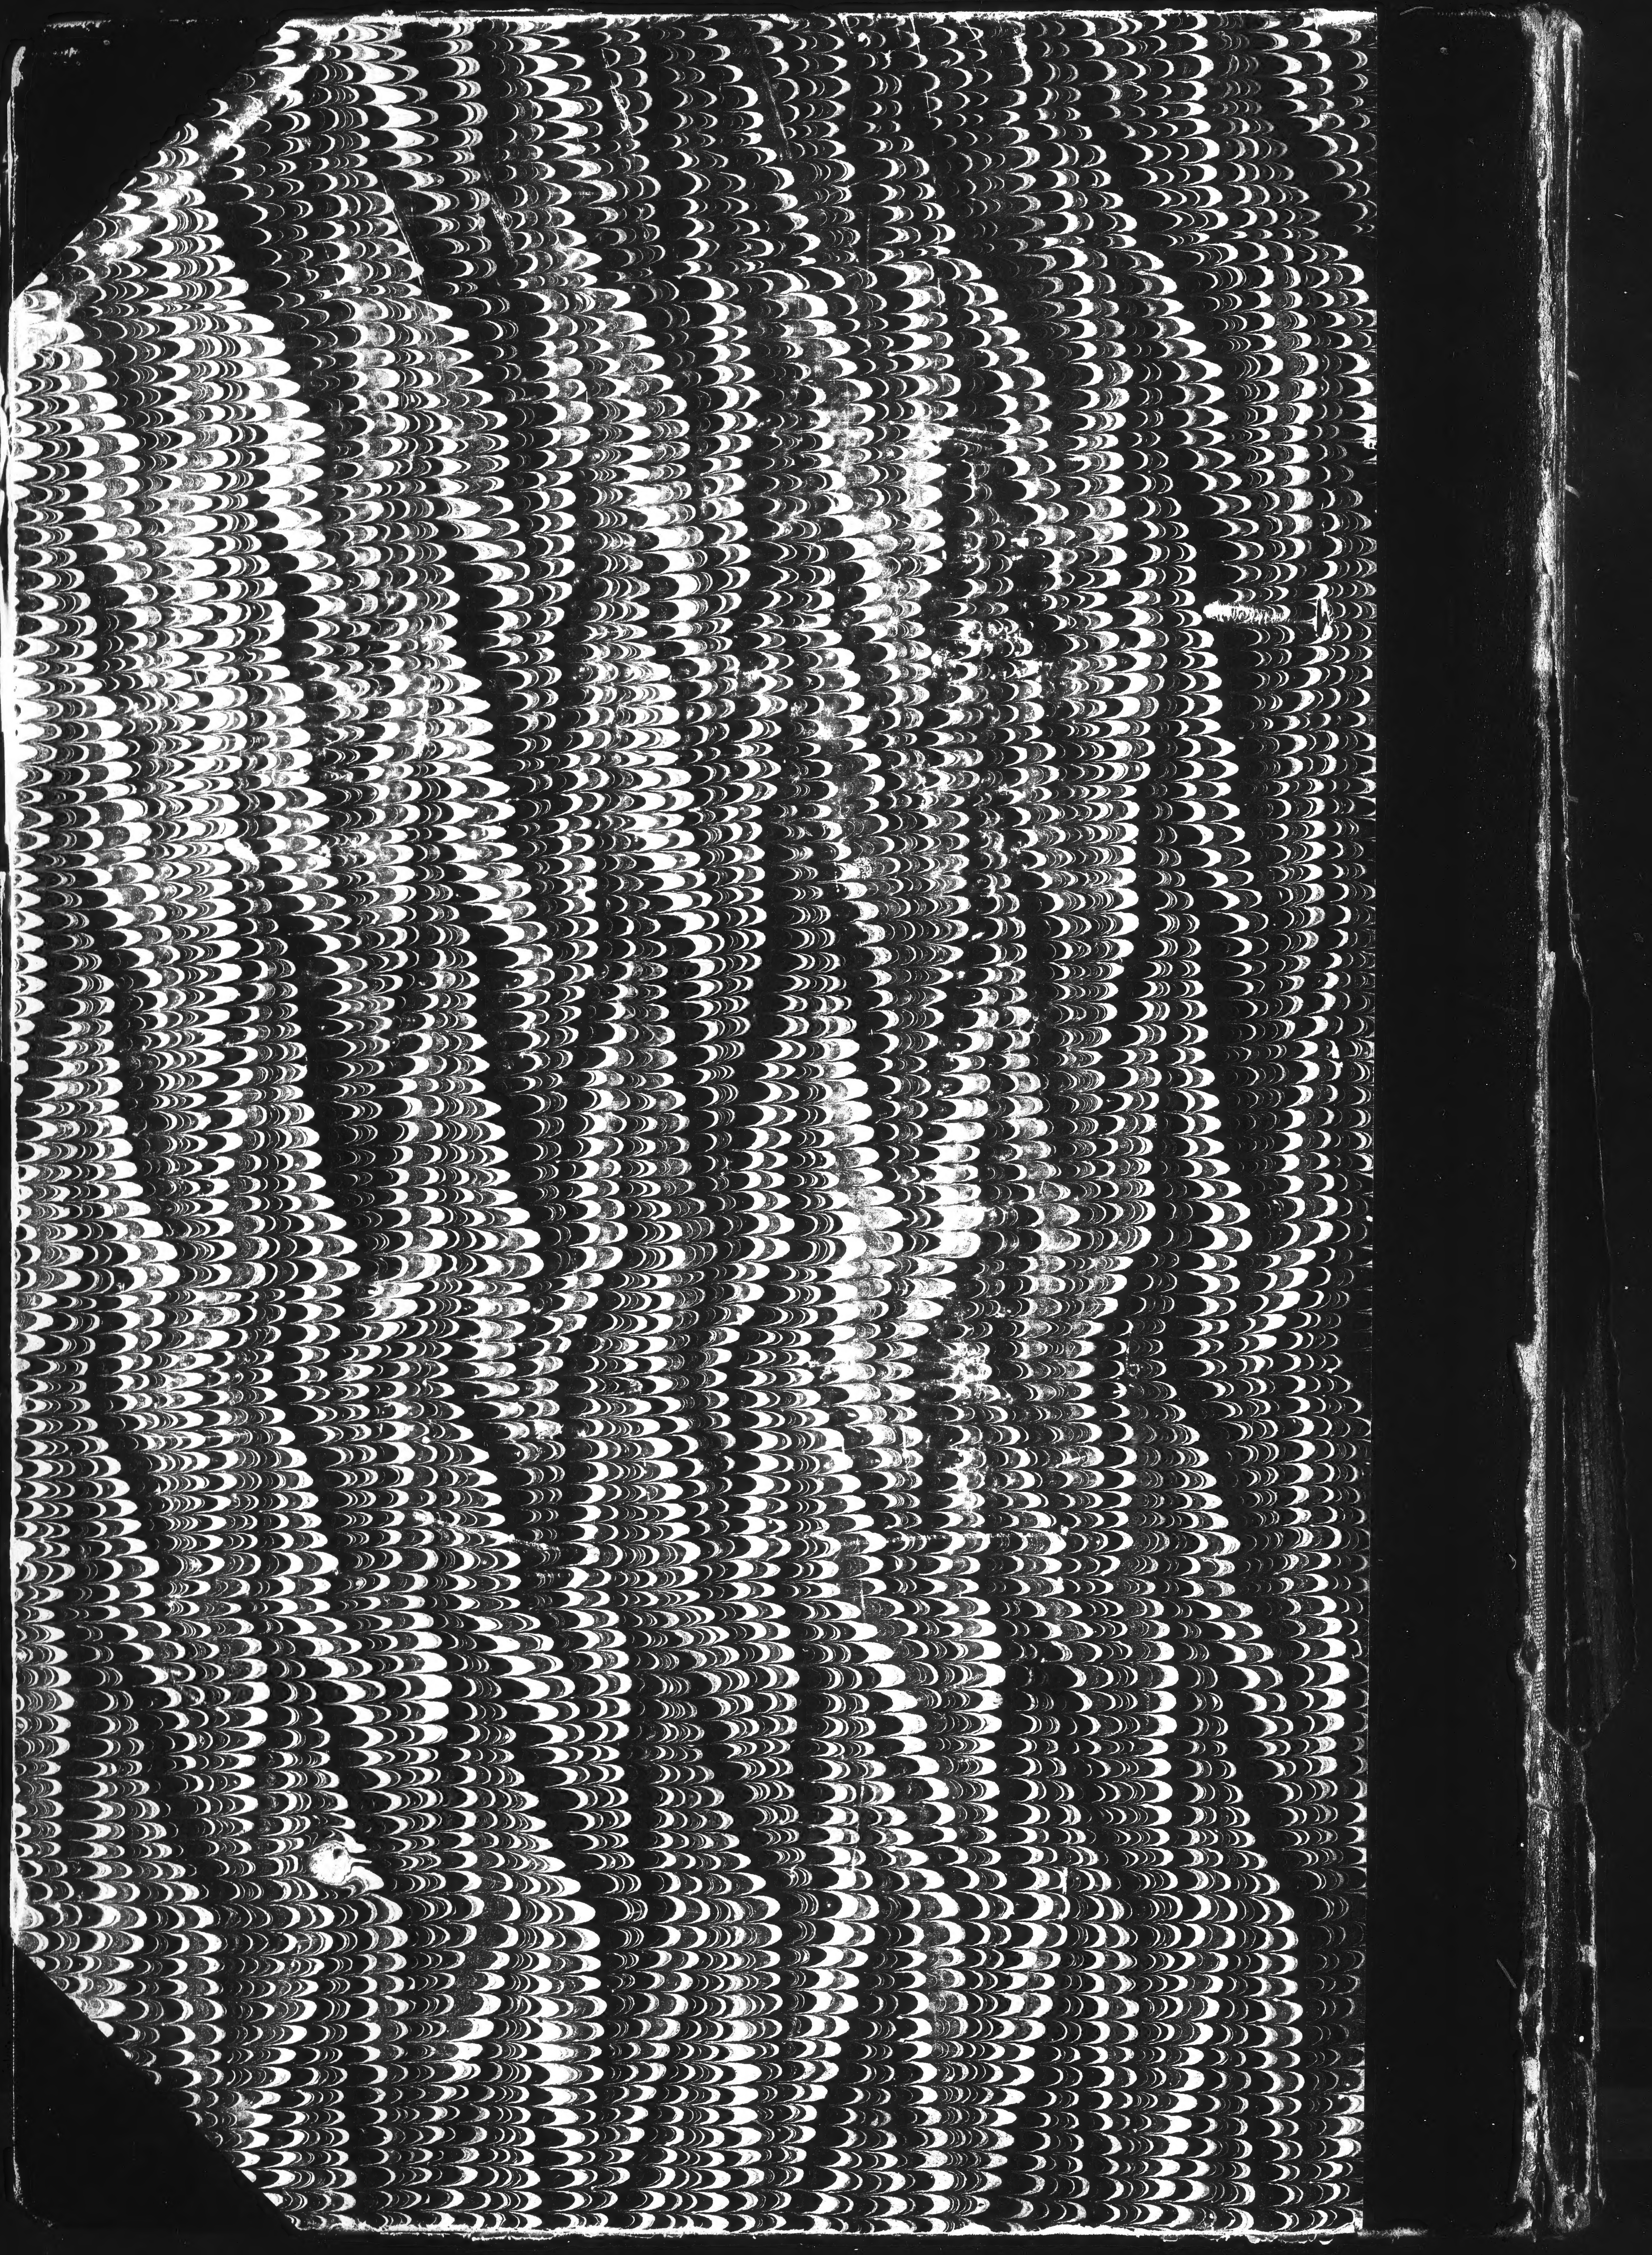
STOCKBRIDGE, Mass., Aug. 17 (AP).—If England is defeated, in the opinion of Governor Lehman of New York, the United States "cannot hope" to avoid war.

Speaking at an Allied relief fund benefit last night, the governor said this nation should supply Great Britain with all weapons of war that can be spared beyond our own defense needs because England is "fighting our battle as well as her own."

"Can anyone reasonably believe that the dictator nations, hating and fearing democracy, will give us time for orderly preparation and rearmament?" he asked his audience of 7,500 * * *."

Other speakers at the benefit, sponsored by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, included Sir Louis Beale of the British embassy in Washington. Archibald Mac Leish, librarian of Congress, presided.

Shipman's Scrap Book
FOR DUPLICATE ORDER NUMBER
911
ASA L. SHIPMAN'S SONS
NEW YORK



END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE REWIND